Strawn said the state party just started reaching out to candidates about the logistics of the event, and he expects some big-name conservative groups will get on board, giv ing added incentive for candidates to attend.

Beyond the long-standing controversies, the poll has struggled to stay relevant among increased competition from other events in recent years.

This year alone, Iowa Republicans and presidential contenders have already gathered for Rep. Steve King's Freedom Summit, the first-ever Ag Summit, and the Faith and Freedom Coalition Summit. In June, sev en candidates will be attending Sen. Joni Ernst's first-ever "Roast and Ride" event.

There is a GOP debate on Aug. 6 this year, just days before the straw poll, and the Red State gathering, which is going on the same weekend in Georgia, has generated considerable buzz, with Walker, Bush, Rubio, and Fiorina already confirmed, as well as Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry.

"You're getting too many events before the caucuses and the straw poll is just one more, and it's really become a nuisance," said Schmidt. "I used to be a supporter, but it's clear now that it's become a disruption."

Mike Huckabee and his tax plan got slammed on Fox // Business Insider // Rob Garver – May 25, 2015

A few months after he left his gig as a Fox News television host to pursue the Republican nomination for president in 2016, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee was back on Fox News Sunday, and to put it mildly, things did not go well.

While Fox has a reputation for being friendly, sometimes overly so, toward the GOP, Fox News Sunday host Chris Wallace is usually an equal opportunity interrogator, and he didn't hesitate to ask his former colleague to explain some of his more controv ersial claims.

Huckabee, for instance, is an advocate of the "FairTax" plan, which would eliminate the income tax and replace it with a consumption tax of about 30 percent while remaining revenue-neutral. Tax experts hav e repeatedly exposed the FairTax plan as highly regressive – meaning that lower-income individuals would pay a higher percentage of their income in taxes than the wealthy.

It was a point Wallace asked Huckabee to address, quoting an analysis by the Urban-Brookings Tax Policy Center which found that "the av erage rate of the lowest income group would exceed 33 percent, while the av erage for the top group would fall to less than 16 percent."

"They have it exactly wrong," Huckabee said. "In fact, it's the bottom third of the economy who benefit the most from the FairTax, and the people at the top third who benefit the least Ev erybody benefits some. That tax study is one that has been discredited by the people who spent over $20 million, very thoughtful economic study developing the FairTax. It's not just some political idea…."

Wallace interrupted, “Doesn’t it just stand to reason that if I make $5,000, I’m going to spend a higher percentage of my income just for necessities, and if I make $1 million, I’m not going to spend as much of a percentage of my income?”

Huckabee launched into an explanation of what FairTax advocates call a “prebate.” Under the proposal, the government would send a check ev ery month to every taxpayer equivalent to what someone living at the pov erty level would pay in taxes for “necessities.” He claimed that the prebates mean low-income earners do better under the sy stem than they do currently.

“The FairTax empowers the consumer,” Huckabee said. “That’s power to the people.”

As it turns out, though, the folks at the Tax Policy Center don’t take kindly to hav ing their analyses described as “discredited” on national television.

Asked to respond to Huckabee, William Gale, co-director of the Center, delivered a withering email takedown of Huckabee’s claims and the FairTax proposal in general.

“He has the distributional benefits backwards,” wrote Gale, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and a former senior economist for President George H.W. Bush’s Council of Economic Advisers. “The notion that a tax on consumption will help the poor and hurt the rich is contrary to just about everything that is known about rich/poor spending and income habits, not just our model.”

In a swipe at the FairTax program, he added: “The ‘people who spent over $20 million on this did not understand for a decade how the tax actually worked, and it took two papers by me as well as other work – for example, the Bush tax reform panel – to convince these people that they had vastly misstated the tax base because they made 20-25 percent of government disappear.”

Len Burman, the director of the Tax Policy Center, joined the fray as well. Also by email, he said that the idea that the poor would do better under the FairTax plan is simply wrong.

“This issue doesn't inv olve complicated economic analysis,” wrote Burman, who among other things served as a deputy assistant secretary for tax analysis in the Clinton Treasury Department. “It's simple math, and the FairTax advocates have repeatedly and willfully flubbed the math.”

“The distributional effects are pretty straightforward,” he wrote. “High-income people spend only a fraction of their income, so they effectively benefit from a giant tax exemption compared with an income tax.”

In the Fox interview, Wallace eventually let Huckabee wriggle away from the tax issue, but mov ed on to some other interesting claims the former governor has recently made – including a suggestion that presidents and lawmakers don’t necessarily need to abide by the rulings of the Supreme Court.

Huckabee claimed that the United States has fallen v ictim to what he called “judicial supremacy ,” in which the Supreme Court has set itself above the other branches of the government.

“The Supreme Court isn’t the Supreme branch, and for God’s sake, it isn’t the Supreme Being,” he said. Wallace, who had not suggested that the Supreme Court was in any way God-like, had no answer for that one, and Huckabee was off, dropping straw man arguments as he went.

“It’s a matter of balance of power,” he said. “If the Supreme Court could just make a ruling and everybody has to bow down and fall on their faces and worship that law – it isn’t a law because it hasn’t been yet passed.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Umm…

"What if the Supreme Court ruled that they were going to make the decision as to who is going to be the next president and save the taxpayers and the voters from all the expense and trouble of v oting and they'll just pick a president? Well we would say that they can't do that. Why can't they do it? They can't do it because it's not in the law," Huckabee continued.

But wait, nobody said….

"We are sworn to uphold the Constitution and the law and it has to be agreed on by three branches of government. One can't overrule the other two," He said "That's all I'm saying. We learned that in 9th grade civics, but I'm conv inced a lot of Ivy League law schools must have forgotten that simple, basic civics lesson along the way."

Okay , enough.

That's just not true. A bill passed by Congress and signed into law by the president can be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. That's pretty much the definition of one branch overruling the other two.

Sometimes it's a little difficult to tell if Huckabee is actually mounting a presidential campaign or just an extended book tour for his latest tome, God, Guns, Grits, and Gravy. On Sunday, it felt a lot like the latter.

Mike Huckabee: Creating cynicism // The Washington Post // Jennifer Rubin – May 25, 2015

Former governor of Arkansas Mike Huckabee speaks at the Freedom Summit in Des Moines, Iowa, in January. (Jim Young/ Reuters)

Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee complains that trust in government is at an all-time low. Perhaps he is a cause not a solution. Consider this exchange with Chris Wallace on Fox News Sunday:

WALLACE: Governor, I want to keep mov ing along, because as I say , there are a lot of things you said in your announcement. You also seemed to indicate that as president, you wouldn't necessarily obey court rulings, even the Supreme Court. . . . But, Governor, we have operated under the principle of judicial rev iew since the Marbury versus Madison case in 1803.

HUCKABEE: Judicial rev iew is actually what we've operated under. We hav e not operated under judicial supremacy. Presidents Lincoln, Jefferson, Jackson, presidents have understood that the Supreme Court cannot make a law. They cannot make it. The legislature has to make it, the executive branch has to sign it and enforce it.

And the notion that the Supreme Court comes up with the ruling and that automatically subjects the two other branches to following it defies everything there is about the three equal branches of government. Chris, the Supreme Court is not the supreme branch. And for God's sake, it isn't the Supreme Being. It is the Supreme Court.

WALLACE: But, sir, George Will, the conservative columnist, has pointed out that back in 1957, another governor of Arkansas, Orval Faubus, decided to disregard and refuse to obey the ruling to desegregate schools. President Eisenhower had to call in the 101st Airborne.

Are you saying President Huckabee might decide he wasn't going to obey the ruling on desegregation, or like President Nixon to turn over the tapes? You know, it's up in the air as to whether you're going to obey the Supreme Court?

HUCKABEE: Well, Chris, as you know, George Will is no fan of mine. He's not very fond of me. He recently called me appalling. So, I'm not surprised he would make such a false comparison.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the point is, in that case, the Supreme Court had ruled the legislature and the executive branch had agreed with the Supreme Court, and precisely what happened is what should happen. The president ordered the airborne to come in and enforce the law, the law that did exist.

WALLACE: But —

HUCKABEE: It wasn't that the president defied the law. The president was carrying out the law and using all the forces at his resource to do it.

WALLACE: But, OK, let's say the president decided, "I don't like the Supreme Court's ruling on that," let's say Nixon had said, for instance, in Watergate, "I don't want to turn over the tapes and the court can't make me"?

HUCKABEE: Well, the president has to follow whatever the law is. Does Congress have a law that tells him what he is going to do? In that case, the Congress was ready to impeach Nixon and he ultimately resigned.

So "the president has to follow whatever the law is," except if he's Mike Huckabee railing against gay marriage? Huckabee's notion is incoherent and in any event a recipe for chaos and lawlessness. The right wing can't demand the president abide by existing immigration law and any rulings on his executive order while at the same time preaching lawlessness on gay marriage. Huckabee is either deeply cynical or deeply ignorant, but in either case he offers a mirage for the unsophisticated. In doing so he, in essence, says that elected leaders are lying or misleading the public when they say they must obey the court's ruling. In short, Huckabee is spreading cynicism and a sense of betrayal.

He does not stop there. He and politicians like senators Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) and Rand Paul (R-Ky.) prey on voters' fears that their phone calls are being listened to and their e-mails read. As Wallace reminded Huckabee, "Section 215 of the Patriot Act, which is the section that is going to expire on June 1st, has nothing to do with listening in on phone calls. It's just recording the fact that my phone number called your phone number. So, aren't you, one, wrong there when you talk about listening in?" But facts don't get in the way of the fear-mongers. Again the result is to spread suspicion and cynicism.

There is plenty to be upset about in Washington. Seven years into the Obama administration there is no entitlement or tax reform, for example. Immigration reform is going nowhere (in part, because there are those to tell the public that immigrants will steal our jobs and lower wages). The international scene is frightful. But while presidential candidates should highlight legitimate failures, they should not heighten the anti-government and conspiratorial fever that already exists. The GOP voters can do their part as well — by rejecting the cranks and fear-mongers. They could start by sending Huckabee packing.

Cruz says GOP candidates afraid to talk gay marriage // GOPUSA // Michael F. Haverluck – May 25, 2015

Taking on the competition in his run for the White House, GOP presidential candidate Ted Cruz says that there are many Republican politicians who are scared to jump into the debate over same-sex "marriage" and religious liberty, including some of the candidates he's running against.

While speaking at the Watchman on the Wall three day conference that ended Friday, Cruz told the crowd of more than 600 in the nation's capital that he is not afraid to champion their religious freedom. He wore his faith on his sleeve and addressed some touchy subjects other candidates have appeared to be a bit reticent to tackle.

Opening up the recent debate over the passage of Indiana's Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), the Texas senator addressed the topic of religious freedom, noting that the bill was grossly misinterpreted by the great majority of Democrats opposing the bill, according to the Christian Post.

Delving into the issue further, Cruz pointed out how the highly controversial Indiana bill was "substantively identical" to the federal RFRA that was relatively uncontested when President Bill Clinton signed it — a bill that passed with an impressive 97 Senate votes, while unanimously passing the House.

“[The federal RFRA] receiv ed the support of such famed right-wing nut cases as Ted Kennedy, Chuck Schumer and Joe Biden," Cruz said in jest to the hall filled with pastors at the event, which was hosted by the Family Research Council.

He went on to explain why Democrats had a sudden change of heart over RFRA, mentioning how the bill was opposed by a number LGBT supporters with deep pockets.

"The modern Democratic Party, working hand-in-hand with big business, decided their allegiance to gay marriage trumps any devotion to religious liberty," Cruz asserted.

Blues in Red’s clothing?

Cruz said it’s even more of a trav esty that a large amount of Republicans cease to champion Americans’ religious liberty to avoid a head-on collision with activists pushing for LGBT rights, noting that several of them were running alongside him in the GOP presidential pool for the 2016 Republican ticket.

"I'm going to tell you something that was even sadder was just how many Republicans ran for the hills,” Cruz added, without pointing fingers. "I'll point out that some of the Republicans running in 2016 were nowhere to be found when Indiana was being fought."

Using other candidates’ silence to amplify his v oice on the issue, Cruz emphasized that he will champion the freedom of expression and free speech rights of all in the faith community .

"And I can tell you this — I will always, always, always stand and fight for the religious liberty of ev ery American," Cruz promised.

Fighting persecution

He then revisited the latest attempt by the state to silence churches, reminding the audience how believ ers scored a victory over Houston Mayor Annise Parker, who unsuccessfully tried to subpoena pastors’ communications on homosexuality . Cruz said the scandal was overcome by Christians who applied “pressure and heat and light” to the situation — not allowing the government to quash religious freedom in the pseudo name of tolerance.

Cruz stressed that the threat to religious liberty is nowhere more rampant than in nations that are threatened by Islamic terrorists, where Christians suffer a level of persecution for their faith that few Americans can fathom.

"What's happening here pales in comparison to what is happening across the globe," Cruz insisted.

The senator from the Lone Star State went from ISIS beheading children to crucifying Christians for not denying Jesus Christ and submitting to the Islamic god, Allah.

He also brought up Meriam Ibrahim’s time in a Sudanese prison, where the pregnant mother was released before the Islamic nation’s judicial system could execute her for not submitting to Allah.

Attributing Ibrahim’s release to Christians’ “pressure and heat and light on the government of Sudan,” Cruz recounted meeting with the nearly martyred Sudanese Christian at a previous FRC event, sharing with the crowd a question he posed her. In response to Cruz’s inquiry about how she managed to not renounce her faith throughout her horrific experience in prison, Ibrahim simply told him, “Jesus was with me.”

Cruz used the response as a segue to incite gratefulness in Americans who complain about being discriminated against for their faith.

"Compared with that, problems in America don't seem all that bad," Cruz concluded.

Walker emerges from Southern confab as GOP front-runner // Washington Examiner // Timothy P. Carney - May 24, 2015

OKLAHOMA CITY — The annual Southern Republican Leadership Conference provided a glimpse into the state of the Republican base and the presidential field.

The conference revealed a Republican base that is (1) broadly happy with the crowded and conservative field, (2) still smitten with Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, and (3) unimpressed and uninterested in Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

Senate chaos over the Patriot Act kept the four senators who are running from making it, dampening the mood a bit.

The candidates running a second time — Rick Santorum, Rick Perry, and Mike Huckabee — do not excite the conservative base.

Also, it was evident from the speakers and the attendees that defense and national security have returned to the forefront of the Republican mind.

Straw Poll: The straw poll results mostly reflected Scott Walker's popularity, and the apprehension the Republican base has for Jeb Bush and Chris Christie, the perceived establishment moderates in the field.

1) Dr. Ben Carson won the straw poll handily, thanks to his having the biggest organized effort. His campaign bought a booth and bought 100 tickets, to allow supporters to attend for free. Many of these supporters came in from out of state. All told, Carson won about 240 votes.

2) The biggest winner may have been Wisconsin Gov. Walker, who finished a close second, with about 200 votes. He had no organized effort to win the straw poll, but he still won the most votes among Oklahomans in the crowd. His Friday afternoon speech was spot-on and well delivered. His strong showing reflects that the good will Walker garnered through his fights in Madison, Wis., sill buoy him, even after other conservative stars have entered the race.

3) Sen. Ted Cruz was a big reason many conservatives attended the event — he was slated to be the keynote speaker, and is something of a superstar, but he had to miss the confab for Senate votes. Cruz's campaign ran a small but clever operation to try and win the straw poll. A third-place finish for a no-show isn't bad.

THE CANDIDATES

Walker: Walker continues to impress the GOP crowd, especially those who haven't seen him before.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1) His strong second-place finish in the straw poll was impressiv e because he was the only candidate to post double digits without an organized straw poll effort.

2) Pacing the stage, jacketless, in a blue shirt, sleeves rolled up, Walker's speaking style was easy and comfortable. Some attendees found him too low-key. Most saw his sty le as confident and assuring.

3) What recommends Walker most to Republican voters is his successful battles with powerful labor unions, the media, and the Wisconsin Democratic Party. Walker made these battles — including his recall election victory — the focus of his talk.

4) Walker was able to tick off a long list of legislative accomplishments, touching on all the major conserv ative policy priorities: cutting spending, cutting taxes, bringing the bureaucracy to heel, defunding Planned Parenthood, expanding gun rights, passing right to work, requiring photo ID for voters and so on.

5) Walker cast his political and policy wins as populist victories ov er powerful insiders. He described his fight against the government unions as "taking power out of the hands the big-government special interests" and putting it in the hands of ordinary people.

6) Walker closed with a pointed critique of his rivals. He said many Washington politicians are good at picking fights, but they don't win — a clear reference to Cruz's failed Obamacare shutdown, and Marco Rubio and Paul's lack of a record. Alternatively, many Republicans, Walker said, are good at winning races, but they never fight for important, tough things — presumably referring to Christie and Bush.

7) Conference attendees praised Walker's "courage," and ability to "solve problems." They said he reminded them of Reagan.

8) The word "front-runner" can carry many meanings, but it probably fits Walker at the moment.

Cruz: Cruz was a no-show because of Senate votes, but he still made an impression from afar.

1) Cruz was supposed to be the dinner keynote address. Instead he gave a 25 -minute video-taped speech. The message was standard Cruz, and the delivery was constrained by the format. Still he elicited applause from the dinner crowd.

2) Cruz's father, pastor Rafael Cruz, spoke twice — once at the dinner and once Saturday , near the end of the proceedings. The elder Cruz pleased the crowd.

3) Cruz's 16.6 percent in the straw poll was enough for third place, and it was three times the vote total of the fourth-place finisher, Chris Christie. This was partly the fruit of his campaign's small but clever campaign to win the straw poll.

4) Along with his decent positives, Cruz has some negatives with the base — more than the other conservatives. Some Republicans dislike his libertarian streak (these people dislike Rand Paul more), while others see him as a grandstander.

5) Cruz was probably the most common target (unnamed) of criticism from other candidates. Many candidates made pointed reference to grandstanding, empty speechifying, ineffective unbendingness and inexperience in office.

Carson: Carson has high positiv es and low negatives among the conservative base, but many see him more as a running mate or a cabinet official.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1) Carson's straw poll victory was not proof that he is the favorite of the southern Republican crowd. It was instead the fruit of a deliberate, paid effort by his super PAC to win the straw poll. Still, he earned at least 150 more votes than his supporters bought in tickets — an impressive showing that would have put him in third place.

2) The assembled Republicans all had good things to say about him. At least three attendees independently called Dr. Carson "a healer," suggesting he could "heal" the country.

3) Conservative enthusiasm for Carson is partly grounded in the belief that Obama has divided Americans along racial lines, and that Carson would bridge that divide.

4) Carson is the only Republican in the field who has never before run for office, and that is generally seen as a positive among a base that has grown increasingly anti-establishment and anti-Washington.

5) Carson's speaking style, while endearing, is not compelling. He's sleepy, down to earth, charming and funny. But he's not forceful in the way Walker is, nor does he seem as purposeful as Carly Fiorina. Although he's not a career politician, his message isn't significantly different from that of the other candidates.

6) Attendees often mentioned Carson as a potential running-mate for a more experienced nominee.

Christie: Greeted with skepticism as a possible squish from the Northeast, Christie won over — or at least entertained — the conservative crowd. His was probably the best speech of the weekend.

1) Christie speaks in an easy, relaxed tone that conveys confidence. He walked the stage, with no script or notes at hand, but still delivered a well-crafted speech, peppered with personal stories both funny and moving.

2) His two main themes are his record, and criticism of Barack Obama.

3) Christie was perhaps the most consistent candidate in knocking Obama (as opposed to merely Hillary Clinton). This is likely an attempt to undo the harm he did to himself among the GOP base by hugging President Obama after tropical storm Sandy. When he pledged to undo Obama's executive orders, the crowd roared.

4) Christie touted his record of "fiscal conservatism," in New Jersey, cutting spending and regulation and axing thousands of state jobs. He didn't play up his cooperation with Democrats, but instead portrayed himself as fighting the special interests in his state.

5) Electability — specifically, his ability to beat Hillary — was a powerful point Christie made in his talk. Republicans need a nominee who "knows how to fight and knows how to win."

6) In his catalog of policy prescriptions — not a central focus of the talk — Christie won some decent applause. He hit some standard GOP issues such as entitlement reform and flatter taxes.

7) Christie's forceful critique of the civil libertarian wing of the party divided the crowd more than any other issue. When he attacked (without naming) Rand Paul for holding up the Patriot Act reauthorization, deploring the "very dangerous debate," half the crowd rose to their feet in applause, while the other half sat on their hands.

8) Attendees received Christie's speech well, applauding often, and in interviews saying they were pleasantly surprised.

9) Still many conservatives rule out Christie, as a RINO, often mentioning his post-Sandy embrace of Obama. Christie's hard line in favor of NSA spying also turns off a subset of the conservative crowd.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

10) Christie has serious upside potential. There will probably be a Christie boom or boomlet at some point in the primary season.

Perry: Rick Perry's speech was excellent, one of the two best of the weekend. Still, few conservatives see him as their top choice.

1) Perry's style was more formal than the others. He stood behind the podium, in his crisp dark suit, and read clearly with gravity from a script — but it was a good script.

2) Perry played up his record in Texas, as a series of policy victories, as an economic success story, and as having provided the experience a president will need. He said the president must be "someone who's been tested."

3) Perry specifically contrasted his executive experience with the inexperience of his rivals who sit in the U.S. Senate, particularly Paul and Cruz: "Leadership's not a speech on the Senate floor — it's a record of action." Along similar lines, Perry said: "A lot of candidates will say the right thing. We need a candidate that will do the right thing."

4) He ticked off his accomplishments on job growth, budgets, border enforcement and education, eliciting a roar from the crowd with his criticism of Common Core.

5) Very few attendees volunteered Perry's name as one of their favorite candidates, even after his powerful speech. His fifth-place finish — behind Christie, and in a state neighboring his own — suggests the Perry's failed 2012 run puts him at a disadvantage as 2016 starts.

Jindal: Bobby Jindal delivered a culture-war polemic that seemed to touch the rawest nerves of the conservative crowd.

1) Jindal — whether he was talking about the Islamic State, religious liberty, school, his life story or immigration — spoke in terms of a culture war.

2) Jindal seemed the most in touch with this conservative, mostly older and white, Oklahoma crowd. He warned that Obama wants to "redefine our country" and works to "divide us." This sort of talk of cultural identity and divisiveness is ubiquitous among the conservative crowd. Jindal was the only one to clearly tap into this apprehension.

3) Jindal's style was down-home story-telling, filled with legitimately funny jokes — not just politician jokes, but actual comedian material. On a dreary, rainy Friday afternoon he woke up a crowd that had been dulled by Jeb Bush, and a bit dispirited by the recently announced absence of superstars Rubio and Cruz.

4) Most of Jindal's speech was his own American dream story. This quietly highlighted his ethnic minority status in a way that appealed to the crowd.

Fiorina: Fiorina has little support but the biggest upside potential of any candidate in the field.

1) Fiorina barely registers in the minds of conservatives when you ask them to name their favorite candidate or candidates. Speaking last at the conference — after the straw poll — didn't help her in OKC.

2) Fiorina defines herself as the anti-Hillary. She leads and closes her speech with barbed attacks on the Democratic front-runner. She elicited one of the weekend's loudest cheers with a direct and undeniable headshot to Clinton: "She. Can. Not. Be. Trusted."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

3) Her sty le is fairly flat, but poised. She comes across as possibly the smartest of the Republican candidates — and that's in a field with some high IQs.

4) She is most insistent and direct in going after crony capitalism, an issue that has the power to motivate the base, and which will be potent against Clinton.

5) Fiorina makes a decent case that her business experience would be useful to the presidency, but her defense of her rocky tenure at HP ("when you lead, you make enemies,") may not be convincing.

Santorum: Santorum barely registered in the straw poll. He'll have a hard climb to conv ince GOP voters that he's the guy for 2016.

1) Santorum's speech was at times compelling, but often awkward and stiff.

2) He lays on the populism better than the others. His populist pitch to the conservative crowd is part of an electability pitch: unless Republicans get over their Romney 47-percentism, and speak to middle America and the working class if they want to win.

3) Santorum barely registered in the straw poll, even though he won this state's primary in 2012.

Bush: Bush was the loser of the weekend — except maybe when it came to fundraising from the oil and gas barons in OKC.

1) Bush's speech was the worst of the bunch. The delivery was flat and uninspired. He didn't seem to want to be there, and it looked like he barely wanted to be running for president.

2) He has a strong governor record to tout, and the crowd applauded as he recalled his battles with trial lawy ers, teachers' unions, and the like.

3) Bush leans hard on the electability issue. "We have to get outside of our comfort zones" in order to win the presidency, he says.

4) I asked dozens of attendees if there were any candidates they would rule out, and Bush's name was easily the most mentioned — for a v ariety of reasons. Some cited his immigration stance. Others just pointed to his last name. The dislike for Jeb showed up in the straw poll, where he finished in sixth place with less than five percent of the vote.

5) One state party official attended the small gatherings where candidates met with big local donors. She said Bush's gathering had the most impressiv e crop of billionaires and millionaires, and that they received his message warmly .

The Field: Other candidates didn't register very much at the conference.

1) Rubio was often mentioned when attendees were asked to name their favorite candidates, but Senate votes kept him from attending.

2) Paul also was a no-show, but he hadn't signed up to attend in the first place.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

3) Huckabee, who surely would need to win Southern states to even have a chance in the primary, oddly was absent.

Issues: There is no clear priority issue among the candidates nor among the attendees.

1) Education — specifically opposition to Common Core standards — was a common theme from the candidates, and it always revved up the crowd.

2) Along similar lines, religious liberty was big for candidates and attendees alike. As with Common Core, the attacks on religious liberty leave conservatives feeling powerless and disenfranchised. In both cases, big business sides with big government against cultural conservatives.

3) Populism in general was a theme with the candidates, with Fiorina taking on crony capitalism; Walker, Christie and Bush talking about battling the special interests; and Santorum calling for outreach to the working class.

4) Foreign policy was up there with economics as a top concern of the gathered conservatives. It was one of the favorite issues for the candidates. Consistently, support for Israel invoked loud applause.

5) Many attendees — in a crowd that was overwhelmingly old, white, and Southern — fretted about America "losing its identity," and "coming apart," due to "divisiveness."

And now Christie's moment of Zen // North Jersey.com // Charles Stile - May 25, 2015

Days after his now legendary "sit down and shut up" outburst aimed at a heckler in Belmar last October, Governor Christie issued a blanket warning of sorts: If anyone pushes him too far, he's going to push back. They can expect the full-throated Christie takedown.

"I'm not going to change, Matt," Christie told NBC's Matt Lauer. "This is who I am."

Yet as Christie edges closer to a possible plunge into the 2016 presidential campaign, he is presenting himself as a changed man, with a thicker skin and a new appreciation of restraint. Gone — at least for the time being — are the town-hall confrontations and the tart-tongued putdowns that his office proudly circulated on YouTube.

The once-combative Christie now wants the nation's voting public to see him as the cool-under-pressure Christie, who could be trusted not to go ballistic in a nuclear standoff with Russia or North Korea. The Christie who fired off barbs at public school teachers now wants to demonstrate that he can take the heat of a national campaign.

The anger-management makeover comes as Christie is struggling to climb out of the second tier of hopefuls for the 2016 Republican nomination. But this rebooting of the Christie image presents him with a paradox: New Jersey's self-proclaimed "tell it like it is" governor runs the risk of becoming more generic, more like the "air-brushed" politicians he once derided.

Instead of standing out, he's more likely to blend in.

And at this stage, he needs to be noticed.

"At some point, you have to stand out from the pack," said Fergus Cullen, a former New Hampshire Republican state chairman and a political consultant not affiliated with any candidate. "He just can't drift along as just one of 18 candidates forever. "There are also a significant number of Republicans who want somebody who is combative."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During Christie's recent swings through New Hampshire, Cullen witnessed a careful Christie, staking out positions and staying clear of any conflict that might go viral. The same approach has also been on display in his recent New Jersey appearances.

At a town-hall-style event in Hasbrouck Heights last month, Christie sparred with a critic for 16 minutes — an unprecedented stretch for him — without losing his patience or his temper. The encounter ended in a handshake.

Christie also refused to take the bait from a couple of patrons in a New Hampshire bar who needled him with jokes about the George Washington Bridge lane-closing scandal.

And in an interview last week on CNBC, Christie — who once labeled a legislator "numb nuts," called Democrats "animals" and urged reporters to "take a bat" to state Sen. Loretta Weinberg — argued that the GOP needed to rally behind a nominee who was capable of striking a more tolerant, inclusive tone.

Someone like himself.

"I feel very strongly about the things that I feel very strongly about," Christie said. "But I don't have to denigrate somebody else in the process. I think part of our problem has been tone."

Christie's defenders say he's undergoing a rite-of-passage transformation that all presidential candidates face as they step onto the national stage.

"I see it more as a natural progression from a guy who is running a state that is Democratic … to a guy who now realizes he has to show that he can be a statesman," said former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who ran a brief, unsuccessful campaign for the 2008 Republican nomination for president. "Part of what he has to do is show people the depth of his personality, that he's not a caricature."

Impact of GWB case

A raucous, ruffle-the-feathers style was key to Christie's swift rise to celebrity during his first term. But the George Washington Bridge lane closings — a politically vindictive plot allegedly carried out by close Christie associates to punish Fort Lee's mayor with traffic snarls — damaged the governor's image as a leader. While no evidence has linked Christie to the scheme, it created the impression that intimidation and retaliation were tolerated.

Suddenly, Christie's sharp retorts didn't seem like truth-telling as much as the words of a political bully. So Christie may be holding his tongue, eager not to reprise the image that he has worked hard to banish.

Others, however, say Christie's restraint is guided by a more practical consideration. He cannot afford to alienate any voters at this stage, especially in New Hampshire, the early, pivotal primary state that usually embraces pragmatic, moderate Republicans. If Christie fails to make a strong showing there, most analysts say he has little chance of winning the nomination.

"The voters who are only attracted to him because of his bombast are already with him," said Patrick Murray, director of the Monmouth University Polling Institute. "The voters who are not sure of him … are not going to be won over by that kind of behavior."

Questions about his temperament are clearly a concern for Christie. At a VFW Hall in Hudson, N.H., last week, he went so far as to make the case that he is the Republican Party's best choice to run against Hillary Clinton because he's already defeated a liberal Democratic woman, former state Sen. Barbara Buono, in his 2013 reelection bid. Most important, Christie stressed that he never lost his cool when Buono, a weak candidate who posed no real threat to him, goaded him with attacks on the campaign trail and during a debate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The point is, the entire time my eyes were focused on the prize. The prize wasn’t to beat her that night,” Christie said of their debate. “The point was to win in November so that I could govern.”

Can it last?

Of course, given Christie’s back-of-the-pack status, he might need more than a behavioral adjustment to become competitive. But if he does formally announce his candidacy and gain momentum, some question how long Christie can keep his measured approach. He hasn’t faced the heat of a debate, the competition of a mid-summer straw poll in Iowa or the negative campaign ads financed by super PACs aligned with his rivals — ads that could raise questions about his temperament and fitness for office.

“I don’t think we’re ever going to end up with Chris Christie who is a milquetoast,” Giuliani said. “No matter how much anybody reins him in, there will be times during this campaign when Chris Christie is going to be very tough, that’s just going to happen. The question is the style he uses to display that.”

He added: “Can he do that? I think he can, but that’s the challenge.”

Echoes of Hamilton in Huckabee's message // Philly.com // Robert Patterson - May 25, 2015

Not long ago, pundits were dismissing Mike Huckabee as a religious-right candidate whose folksy demeanor wouldn't fly outside the South. Yet in his presidential announcement this month, the former Arkansas governor is already distinguishing himself as the Republican with the most compelling vision in a generation.

Insisting "we need to be able to fight for ourselves by bringing manufacturing back to our communities, where we make our own planes, tanks, bullets, and bombs," Huckabee is breaking from the globalist-corporatist groupthink that has handicapped the post-Reagan GOP. His championing of domestic nation-building imperatives that Alexander Hamilton outlined in Philadelphia will resonate not only in Middle America, but also in Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

A strong dose of economic nationalism couldn't be timelier, as a Democratic president and a Republican Congress prepare to deal away more prime sectors of our economy to rival nations, as well as third-world backwaters, via the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP). Huckabee cuts through all the "free-trade" happy talk, noting that "unbalanced trade deals ... undercut American workers and drive wages lower than the Dead Sea."

Yet more concerning to Huckabee is the threat to national survival as Washington and Wall Street have abandoned our healthy economic independence for dysfunctional codependency on foreign powers.

It's the inverse of Hamilton, the founder who in 1791 advised the second Congress that "every nation ought to endeavor to possess within itself all the essentials of national supply." Our first treasury secretary's national strategy transformed the fledging republic into a continental superpower and preserved American independence for 200 years. But today, bowing to the gods of globalization is decimating the industrial base needed for maintaining a defense second to none.

Thanks to an unprecedented wave of subsidized and "dumped" foreign steel, we no longer produce enough steel to supply our defense and infrastructure needs. And trade surpluses in advanced technology are gone as we face troubling inadequacies in defense-related industries such as propellant chemicals, batteries and photovoltaics, specialty metals, hard-disk drives, and flat-panel displays. Not to mention our reliance on foreign suppliers of semiconductors, printed circuit boards, and machine tools.

Most disheartening: the emasculation of the U.S. aerospace sector. As Eamonn Fingleton has detailed in Forbes, Boeing has led the crown-jewel industry in "one of the most outrageous sellouts in modern business history": transferring technology and production secrets achieved via defense contracts at the expense of U.S. taxpayers to its international "partners," especially Japan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now fancying itself a "sy stems integrator," Boeing merely assembles airplanes here at home, relying on overseas vendors for high-end components, from av ionics to jet engines and wings, a downshift that Fingleton also sees occurring in the U.S. auto industry. Yielding America's "comparative advantage" in plane-making and "consciously cooperating in its own demise," the company has turned David Ricardo's free-trade theory on its head.

British historian Paul Kennedy sensed this erosion of the "arsenal of democracy" in his 1987 classic, The Rise and Fall of the Great Powers: "Were there ev er to be a large-scale future war ... one is bound to wonder what the impact upon U.S. productive capacities would be after years of decline in certain key industries."

Kennedy's fears have become reality , warns Dan DiMicco, former Nucor CEO. As he notes in his new book, American Made: Why Making Things Will Return Us to Greatness: "For 30 years we hav e supported a failed business model of our economy that said we could ignore being a nation that creates, makes, and builds things; that we could remain a rich nation that only services things."

Even the 1999 Nobel Prize winner and father of supply-side economics, Robert Mundell, laments: "It has been a mistake to let U.S. manufacturing run down so low. While other nations have industrial policies to maximize their trade benefits, the United States leaves itself open like a naked woman. A big problem is with nations that may prov e to be future enemies."

In short, America can't afford to lose any more industrial capacity . The pending TPP portends to expand commerce for the United States and 11 other nations. But its true significance is the de facto surrender of America's automotive sector to the Japanese car industry, aided by the same currency manipulation that has boosted China. If ratified by an unwitting Congress, the Pacific pact would leave the country vulnerable in a perpetually hostile world.

To ensure we don't lose the next war - including stealth trade wars aimed at wiping out our industrial base - Huckabee's call for "bringing back manufacturing to our communities" like Philadelphia, a former industrial powerhouse, deserves a full hearing. By hitting a chord that resonates not only with historians, economists, and Founding Fathers - but also with working Americans - the gifted communicator may achiev e just that.

T he day President Bush's tears spilled onto a Marine's face at Walter Reed // Fox News // Dana Perino - May 22, 2015

News of America’s military men and women [who] were wounded and killed in Iraq and Afghanistan almost overwhelmed me on some days. I may have sounded strong when I was talking to the press, but sometimes I had to push my feelings way down in order to get any words out of my mouth to make statements and answer questions.

The hardest days were when President Bush went to visit the wounded or families of the fallen. If it was tough for me, you can only imagine what it was like for the families and for a president who knew that his decisions led his troops into battles where they fought valiantly but were severely injured or lost their lives.

He regularly v isited patients at Walter Reed military hospital near the White House. These stops were unannounced because of security concerns and hassles for the hospital staff that come with a full blown presidential v isit.

One morning in 2005 , Scott McClellan sent me in his place to visit the wounded warriors. It was my first time for that particular assignment, and I was nervous about how the visits would go.

The president was scheduled to see 25 patients at Walter Reed. Many of them had traumatic brain injuries and were in very serious, sometimes critical, condition. Despite getting the best treatment available in the world, we knew that some would not survive.

We started in the intensive care unit. The chief of naval operations (CNO) briefed the president on our way into the hospital about the first patient we’d see. He was a young Marine who had been injured when his Humvee was hit by a roadside bomb. After his rescue, he was flown to Landstuhl U.S. Air Force Base in Kaiserslautern, Germany . At his bedside were his parents, wife, and five-year-old son.

“What’s his prognosis?” the president asked.

“Well, we don’t know sir, because he’s not opened his eyes since he arrived, so we haven’t been able to communicate with him. But no matter what, Mr. President, he has a long road ahead of him,” said the CNO.

The Marine’s young child tugged on the president’s jacket and asked, “What’s a Purple Heart?” The president got down on one knee and pulled the little boy closer to him. He said, “It’s an award for your dad, because he is very brave and courageous, and because he loves his country so much. And I hope you know how much he loves you and your mom, too.”

We had to wear masks because of the risk of infection to the patient. I watched carefully to see how the family would react to President Bush, and I was worried that they might be mad at him and blame him for their loved one’s situation. But I was wrong.

The family was so excited the president had come. They gave him big hugs and thanked him over and over. Then they wanted to get a photo. So he gathered them all in front of Eric Draper, the White House photographer.

President Bush asked, “Is everybody smiling?” But they all had ICU masks on. A light chuckle ran through the room as everyone got the joke.

The Marine was intubated. The president talked quietly with the family at the foot of the patient’s bed. I looked up at the ceiling so that I could hold back tears.

After he visited with them for a bit, the president turned to the military aide and said, “Okay, let’s do the presentation.” The wounded warrior was being awarded the Purple Heart, given to troops that suffer wounds in combat.

Everyone stood silently while the military aide in a low and steady voice presented the award. At the end of it, the Marine’s young child tugged on the president’s jacket and asked, “What’s a Purple Heart?”

The president got down on one knee and pulled the little boy closer to him. He said, “It’s an award for your dad, because he is very brave and courageous, and because he lov es his country so much. And I hope you know how much he loves you and your mom, too.”

As they hugged, there was a commotion from the medical staff as they moved toward the bed.

The Marine had just opened his ey es. I could see him from where I stood.

The CNO held the medical team back and said, “Hold on, guys. I think he wants the president.”

The president jumped up and rushed over to the side of the bed. He cupped the Marine’s face in his hands. They locked eyes, and after a couple of moments the president, without breaking eye contact, said to the military aide, “Read it again.”

So we stood silently as the military aide presented the Marine with the award for a second time. The president had tears dripping from his eyes onto the Marine’s face. As the presentation ended, the president rested his forehead on the wounded warrior's for a moment.

Now everyone was crying, and for so many reasons: the sacrifice; the pain and suffering; the love of country; the belief in the mission; and the witnessing of a relationship between a soldier and his Commander in Chief that the rest of us could never fully grasp. (In writing this book, I contacted several military aides who helped me track down the name of the Marine. I hoped for news that he had survived. He did not. He died during surgery six days after the president's visit. He is buried at Arlington Cemetery and is survived by his wife and their three children.)

And that was just the first patient we saw. For the rest of the visit to the hospital that day, almost every family had the same reaction of joy when they saw the president.

But there were exceptions. One mom and dad of a dying soldier from the Caribbean were devastated, the mom beside herself with grief. She yelled at the president, wanting to know why it was her child and not his who lay in that hospital bed.

Her husband tried to calm her and I noticed the president wasn't in a hurry to leave—he tried offering comfort but then just stood and took it, like he expected and needed to hear the anguish, to try to soak up some of her suffering if he could.

Later as we rode back on Marine One to the White House, no one spoke.

But as the helicopter took off, the president looked at me and said, "That mama sure was mad at me." Then he turned to look out the window of the helicopter. "And I don't blame her a bit."

One tear slipped out the side of his eye and down his face. He didn't wipe it away, and we flew back to the White House.

Koch Brothers Plan to Fund 'Several' GOP 2016 Presidential Hopefuls // Bloomberg // David Knowles - May 25, 2016

The good news for Republican presidential candidates seeking to get a slice of Koch brothers cash is that the siblings, two of the world's richest individuals, seem to be in a sharing mood.

In a Saturday interview on the Larry Kudlow Show, a nationally syndicated radio broadcast, David Koch let it slip that the roughly $900 million that he and his brother, Charles, plan to lavish on the 2016 presidential race could find its way into the hands of more than one GOP contender.

"We are thinking of supporting several Republicans," David Koch said, adding, "If we're happy with the policies that these individuals are supporting, we'll finance their campaigns."

Koch said the brothers would begin writing checks to individual candidates in "the primary season, winter and next spring."

The pledge to fund multiple Republicans is consistent with what Charles Koch told USA Today in April about the candidacies of Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, former Florida governor Jeb Bush, Texas Senator Ted Cruz, Kentucky Senator Rand Paul, and Florida Senator Marco Rubio. He indicated all six were at the top of the list in terms of who might receive funding.

"Those are the ones we have talked to the most and who seem to be the possible leaders," Charles Koch said.

Cruz, Rubio and Paul all spoke at the Koch brothers' event in Palm Springs, California, in January, which was dubbed the "American Recovery Policy Forum." Walker has been a frequent recipient of Koch donations, and Bush also is considered to be still in the running for Koch backing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"What we've told them all is that right now, we're not supporting anyone," Charles Koch said in April. "We're telling them that if they want our support, one way to get it is articulating a good message to help Americans get a better understanding and a better appreciation of how certain policies ... will benefit them and will benefit all America."

The GOP field is still growing, and the Koch brothers seem content to let the sifting process play out before placing their chips on a single candidate.

"Only if somebody really stands out from the standpoint of their message and what they would actually do to benefit America and has a chance a decent chance of being elected, only then would we select one over the others," Charles Koch told USA Today.

Charles and David Koch have matching fortunes of $51.3 billion dollars each, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index, ranking them equal at number five in the world.

GOP's fight for 2016 nomination likely to drag on longer than party desires // WaPo // Chris Cillizza - May 25, 2015

Republicans have made no secret of their desire for a quick presidential primary fight aimed at rapidly producing a nominee to take on former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton.

They almost certainly won't see that wish granted — thanks to the greatly crowded GOP field and a drastically reshaped fundraising landscape that could combine to keep the fight for the Republican nomination active until late spring, and maybe later.

Let's start with the size of the field.

At the moment, there are six announced candidates: Ben Carson, Ted Cruz, Carly Fiorina, Mike Huckabee, Rand Paul and Marco Rubio. By my count, there are at least nine others — including bold-faced names such as Jeb Bush and Scott Walker — who will be in the race by this summer.

That puts the field at 15 (and it could easily be a few candidates more), which would make it the largest Republican primary to date — eclipsing the 12 candidates who actively ran in 2008 and 2012.

The enormousness of the Republican field is due to a number of factors. The most obvious is that there is no strong front-runner a la George W. Bush in 1999, and so every GOP pol who has ever looked in the mirror and thought "Hello Mr./Mrs. President" is getting in.

But it's also become a winning business proposition for many second-tier (or lower) candidates to run for president. Think back to 2008. No one knew who Huckabee was before that race. By the time it ended, he was one of the hottest commodities in Republican politics — and cashed in (TV show, radio show, speeches, books) accordingly. Winning the nomination isn't the true goal for some of the 2016 candidates; upping their speaking fees and visibility is. (And I'm not even talking about Donald Trump.)

Then there is the rise of the ever-present super PAC. Virtually every candidate — from the Jeb Bushes of the world on down — has an "independent" organization aligned with their campaign. And that super PAC can collect checks for unlimited amounts — meaning that a single donor or two could finance millions of dollars' worth of ads for a candidate who might not be able to raise that sort of money in the $2,700 increments allowed by federal law.

We've already seen a glimpse of what this everybody-has-a-super-PAC world might look like. During the 2012 presidential primary, former House speaker Newt Gingrich was struggling to raise money after finishing fourth in the Iowa caucuses and the New Hampshire primary. But Gingrich had casino magnate Sheldon Adelson in his corner; Adelson donated $5 million to Gingrich's super PAC in the run-up to the South Carolina primary, which Gingrich won. All told, Adelson and his wife, Miriam, donated $16.5 million to Gingrich's super PAC; Gingrich raised $25 million total for his campaign committee.

Now, rather than just a handful of candidates with a well-funded super PAC, we could be looking at a dozen or more who have a setup similar to Gingrich's in 2012. And, although Bush's super PAC, which reportedly will have raised $100 million by the end of this month, gets all the attention, it's actually super PACs for the Fiorinas and Rick Perrys of the world that will prolong this race.

Traditionally — that is, in the time before super PACs — the way that the field was winnowed was via fundraising. A candidate underperformed expectations in Iowa or New Hampshire (or both), the fundraising spigot dried up, and he or she was forced to acknowledge reality and drop from the race.

Now, though, your aligned super PAC can function as a sort of campaign life support — keeping candidates alive for as long as wealthy donors want them to be around.

Gone is the incentive to drop out of the race; here is the incentive to stick around as long as possible because in a field this wide open and with so many super PACs spending so much money, who knows when your opportunity might come?

Then there is the ever-present uncertainty about the state of the primary calendar. What we know is that Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada will be the first four states to vote. Beyond that, though, chaos reigns. There is talk of an "SEC" primary, named after the NCAA's Southeastern Conference, featuring a passel of southern states on March 1. And several more states are trying to push their way closer to the front of the calendar.

What a crowded early primary calender could mean is that candidates pick and choose states where they think they can run well, meaning that there is rarely, if ever, a state in which every candidate is playing hard at the same time.

Add up a historic number of candidates, a potentially limitless amount of funding and the potential for a series of different winners in the early going, and you see why Republicans seem likely to be fighting for their presidential nomination well into next spring and even, possibly, as summer begins.

The nightmare scenario for Republicans is a brokered convention fight — playing out in mid-July in Cleveland. We're not there yet. Yet.

The Right's Political Correctness // WaPo // E.J. Dionne - May 25, 2015

WASHINGTON -- Scott Walker insists that when he changes his positions, he is not engaged in "flips."

"A flip would be someone who voted on something and did something different," the Wisconsin governor explained last week on Fox News. His altered views on immigration don't count because he is not a legislator. "These are not votes," he helpfully pointed out.

Sheer brilliance! Other than former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Walker's major rivals at the moment are Senator Marco Rubio, R-Fla., Senator Ted Cruz, R-Texas, and Senator Rand Paul, R-Ky. They have all cast lots of votes. So Walker can accuse them of flip-flopping while claiming blanket immunity for himself.

Unfortunately for the Republican Party and the country, Walker's careful parsing of shape-shifting counts as one of the cerebral high points of the debate among the party's 2016 presidential candidates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The shortage of philosophical adventure and the eagerness of GOP hopefuls to alter their positions to make them more conserv ative have the same cause: a Republican primary electorate that has moved so far right that it brooks no deviationism. What makes it even harder for the candidates to break new ground is that the imperatives of orthodoxy are constraining even the thinkers who are trying to create a new "reform conservatism."

The fall-in-line-or-fall-in-the-polls rule means that Walker has gone from supporting to opposing a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants, as has Gov. Chris Christie, R-N.J. Rubio got much praise for his work in negotiating a bipartisan bill that would have allowed the undocumented to become citizens -- and then, faced with hostility from tea partyers, he turned against it.

Paul, the most daring of the lot because of his libertarian convictions, deserves kudos for being true to his small-state ideology by standing up -- literally, for nearly 11 hours on the Senate floor -- against the Patriot Act. But even Paul has recast his foreign policy positions to make them sound more hawkish and thus more in keeping with prevailing Republican views.

Accommodating right-wing primary voters poses real risks to the party in next year's elections. Its candidates' messages on immigration and gay marriage, could hurt the GOP with, respectively , Latinos and the young.

But the greater loss is that none of the leading Republicans is willing to offer a more fundamental challenge to the party's rightward lurch over the past decade. L. Brent Bozell III, a prominent activist on the right, could thus legitimately claim to The Washington Post: "The conservative agenda is what is winning the field."

Where, for example, is the candidate willing to acknowledge that, like it or not, there's no way anywhere close to all Americans will be able to get health insurance unless government plays a very large role? Where is the Republican who will admit that if the party had its way on further tax cuts, many programs Americans like would fall by the wayside?

The reform conservatives were supposed to remedy this shortcoming, and they have issued some detailed proposals. But their efforts remain largely reactive. Last week, Yuval Levin, the intellectual leader of the movement, joined a sy mposium in Reason, the sprightly libertarian magazine, to reassure others on the right that reform conservatives are -- honest and true! -- no less committed than they are to "limited government," to rolling back "the liberal welfare state," and to reducing government's "size and scope."

It's not surprising that Levin's fervently anti-statist Reason interlocutors were not fully persuaded. What's disappointing to those outside conservatism's ranks is that the Reformicons are so often defensive.

With occasional exceptions, they have been far more interested in prov ing their faithfulness to today's hard-line right than in declaring, as conservatives in so many other democracies have been willing to do, that sprawling market economies need a rather large dose of gov ernment. Conservatives, Levin says, are "eager to build on the long-standing institutions of our society to improve things." Good idea. But somehow, the successes of decades-old gov ernmental institutions in areas such as retirement security, health care provision and env ironmental protection are rarely acknowledged.

Many Republicans, especially reform conservativ es, know that most Americans who criticize gov ernment in the abstract still welcome many of its activities. Yet stating this obv ious fact is now politically incorrect on the right. Conservatives who condemn political correctness in others need to start calling it out on their own side. Otherwise, Scott Walker's artful redefinition of flip-flopping could become the 2016 Republican debate's most creative intellectual contribution.

Deadly Flooding Wreaks Havoc in Texas, Oklahoma // ABC News via Good Morning Am erica – May 25, 2015

At least five people were killed, three others are missing and hundreds of homes were destroyed as large parts of the central and southern Plains states faced flash floods and tornadoes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Claremore, Oklahoma, about 30 miles northeast of Tulsa, firefighter Jason Farley died when he was swept away while attempting a water rescue, said Deputy Chief Matt Wilson of the Claremore Fire Department. A 33-year-old woman in Tulsa died a traffic-related crash, Oklahoma Department of Emergency Management spokeswoman Keli Cain said. In Texas, a man's body was recovered from a flooded area along the Blanco River, which rose 26 feet in one hour and left piles of wreckage 20 feet high, authorities said.

Alyssa Ramirez, 18, a student at Devine High School in Texas, died Saturday driv ing home from her school's prom, after her car got stuck in floodwater, ABC affiliate KSAT reported.

According to the National Weather Service, one other person died in Union, Mississippi when a tree fell on the victim's car.

In Wimberley, about 40 miles southwest of Austin, hundreds of homes were destroyed, many of them washed away, after more than 9 inches of rain was reported and the Blanco River rose. Trey Hatt, Communications Specialist for the city of San Marcos, told ABC News that three people remain missing from the Wimberley area -- and 5 50 properties and 1,100 structures were impacted by the flood waters.

A tornado touched down in Houston, severely damaging an apartment complex and sending at least two people to the hospital. The National Weather Service identified the tornado in a preliminary report as an EF-1 with 100 mile per hour winds.

Two EF-1 tornadoes were also reported in Dallas County, Texas, on Saturday.

The threat for severe weather will encompass a large swath of Texas and the southern part of Oklahoma yet again on Memorial Day with large hail, damaging winds, and an isolated tornado possible across the region.

Heav y rain and more flash flooding are expected for areas that are already extremely saturated.

Biden praises Iraqi military after U.S. defense chief questions its will to fight // CNN // Kevin Liptak, Barbara Starr and Jim Acosta – May 25, 2015

Washington (CNN)American officials attempted to explain on Monday the claim made over the weekend by Defense Secretary Ash Carter that Iraqi defense forces "showed no will to fight" prior to the ISIS siege of Ramadi.

The comment, made in an exclusiv e interview with CNN, was the harshest public criticism of the Iraqi security forces to date from the Obama administration. The United States has said local fighters, rather than U.S. forces, must lead the fight against ISIS, a strategy that has come under withering criticism as the terror group gains ground in Iraq and Syria.

The remark surprised Iraq's Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi, who told the BBC that Carter was "fed the wrong information."

In a Monday phone call with Abadi, Vice President Joe Biden "recognized the enormous sacrifice and bravery of Iraqi forces over the past 18 months in Ramadi and elsewhere," according to a statement from the White House.

Biden, who told Abadi before Ramadi's fall that shipments of weapons were being expedited to help protect the city, explained to the prime minister on Monday the U.S. was planning to ramp up training to combat ISIS truck bombs, which were deployed in brutal fashion during the group's takeov er of the Anbar capital.

Meanwhile, U.S. officials were parsing what precisely Carter meant when he told CNN Pentagon correspondent Barbara Starr that "we have an issue with the will of the Iraqis to fight ISIL and defend themselves," despite outnumbering ISIS forces.

A senior administration official said Carter's remarks were in reference to the Ramadi siege specifically, which came after months of fighting and was hastened by a rash of ISIS suicide bombings, some of them at the same magnitude as the 1995 Oklahoma City blast.

"The reference to lack of will was in relation to this specific episode, which followed 18 months of fierce (Iraqi Security Forces) attrition against ISIL in Ramadi, coupled with what the Iraqi government has acknowledged were breakdowns in military command, planning, and reinforcement," the official said.

A senior defense official pointed to specific factors that may have contributed to Iraqi troops' lack of fighting will in Ramadi, including the absence of regular payments, the inability to visit family members and a general sense that commanders weren't looking after their battalions.

According to this official, the U.S. has grown increasingly concerned about a lack of leadership skills within the Iraqi ranks, seen as crucial to winning the support of troops in combat situations like the battle for Ramadi.

The White House has consistently ruled out sending American combat forces back into Iraq after the decade-long war begun by President George W. Bush. Instead, the U.S. is relying on a strategy of empowering local forces to beat back ISIS where they 've made gains.

President Barack Obama, speaking to The Atlantic magazine last week, said that "if the Iraqis themselves are not willing or capable to arrive at the political accommodations necessary to govern, if they are not willing to fight for the security of their country , we cannot do that for them."

Officials say in Anbar prov ince, the equipping and training of Sunni tribes is a priority as Iraqi forces regroup and attempt to retake Ramadi.

"The rapid integration of the Sunni tribes into the fight alongside other Iraqi forces is essential as they will be the most invested in fighting for their areas," an administration official said.

Michele Flournoy , a former undersecretary of defense who Obama considered naming to the top Pentagon post, said on CNN Sunday the administration has "under-resourced" its counter-ISIS strategy.

"We need to provide more fire power support, more intelligence surveillance," she told CNN's Jim Acosta on "State of the Union."

Joe Biden tries to patch things up with Iraq // Politico // Nahal T oosi – May 25, 2015

Vice President Joe Biden is trying to calm tensions with Iraq's leaders after the U.S. secretary of defense accused Iraqi troops of lacking the "will to fight" Islamic State.

Biden spoke to Iraqi Prime Minister Haider Al-Abadi on Monday to reaffirm U.S. support for Iraq's government and to recognize "the enormous sacrifice and bravery of Iraqi forces," according to a White House statement.

Defense Secretary Ash Carter, in an interview with CNN that aired Sunday, said that although Iraqi troops greatly outnumbered the forces of Islamic State, they could not hold their own against the extremists in the city of Ramadi, allowing it to fall just over a week ago.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His comments were among the harshest to date from the administration, which has invested for years in training and equipping Iraqi troops, and his words implied the White House is growing frustrated with the Iraqis as they battle the militant network, which also is known as ISIS or ISIL.

"We have an issue with the will of the Iraqis to fight ISIL and defend themselves," Carter said. "We can give them training, we can give them equipment. We obv iously can't give them the will to fight."

In an interview with the BBC, the Iraqi premier expressed surprise at Carter's comments, adding, "I am sure he was fed with the wrong information."

Ramadi is the capital of Iraq's Anbar province, a Sunni-majority area; the city fell to the Islamic State after more than a year of fighting and numerous casualties. For the most part, Obama administration officials have described its loss as a tactical setback, and they hav e stressed the battle is a long one.

But there's a growing sense within the administration and bey ond that Ramadi's loss is a major blow, although President Barack Obama is resisting calls to deploy additional U.S. troops to Iraq beyond those adv ising the Iraqi army.

According to the White House statement, Biden welcomed the Iraqi gov ernment's recent decision "to mobilize additional troops, honor those who hav e fallen, and prepare for counter-attack operations." He also promised the U.S. would speed up its provision of training and equipment to deal with the militants' use of truck bombs.

ObamaCare fallout? Supreme Court ruling sets up potential Obama, GOP battle // Fox News – May 25, 2015

March 4, 2015 : Demonstrators rally outside the Supreme Court in Washington, as the court was hearing arguments in President Obama's healthcare ov erhaul.

The upcoming Supreme Court decision on the Affordable Care Act could wipe out insurance for millions of people cov ered by the president's health care plan, leaving states that didn't set up their own health care markets scrambling to subsidize coverage for those left uninsured.

Twenty -six of the 34 states that would be hardest hit by the ruling have GOP governors. Twenty-two of the 24 Senate seats that are up for re-election in 2016 are currently held by Republicans. What that means is that it's the GOP – and not the White House –that's working on damage control.

President Obama's landmark legislation offers subsidized priv ate insurance to those without access to it on the job. In the Supreme Court case, opponents of the law argue that its literal wording allows the government to subsidize coverage only in states that set up their own health insurance markets.

The justices will determine whether the law makes people in all 50 states eligible for federal tax subsidies -- or just those who live in states that created their own health insurance marketplaces. The question matters because about three dozen states opted against their own marketplace, or exchange, and instead rely on the U.S. Health and Human Services Department's Healthcare.gov.

If the court rules against the Obama administration, insurance subsidies for people in those states would be in jeopardy.

If the court invalidates the subsidies in those states, the results would be "ugly ," former Kansas insurance commissioner Sandy Praeger told The Associated Press.

"People who are reasonably healthy would just drop coverage," she said. "Only the unhealthy would keep buy ing health care. It would really exacerbate the problem of the cost of health insurance."

Praeger, a Republican who retired this year, called it "a classic death spiral," using a term for market collapse.

In March, the Supreme Court appeared divided along ideological lines after hearing the challenge that, if struck down, could affect up to 8 million policy holders.

If the subsidies surv ive, the ACA will look like settled law to all but a few passionate opponents. However, if they are overturned, the shock could carry into next year's elections.

Here are just a few of the potential consequences:

BAD TIMING

Around the time when the court announces its decision, insurers will be working to finalize premiums and plans for the coming year. Contracts with the government for 2016 health law coverage have to be signed by early fall. If the subsidies are overturned, insurers would have to tear up their projections about markets in more than half the states.

Populous states such as Texas, Florida, Ohio, Illinois, New Jersey, Georgia and Pennsylvania would be among those affected.

State lawmakers could mitigate the impact by setting up their own insurance markets, or exchanges. But that can't be done overnight.

States might try authorizing an exchange, and then contracting with the federal government to run it. But that sort of end-run might prompt lawsuits from opponents of the law.

In any case, most state legislatures will be out of session by the summer.

During arguments, Associate Justice Samuel Alito raised the possibility that the court might be able to delay the effective date of its decision. Even a delay through the end of this year wouldn't buy much time. Enrollment for 2016 health law plans is scheduled to start Nov. 1.

HOUSE OF CARDS

The health law was designed as a balancing act. Insurers can't turn people away because of health problems, but most healthy people are required to contribute to the insurance pool, and the government subsidizes most of the premium for low- to middle-income households.

Take away subsidies, and the other two parts become unstable.

The law's requirement to carry insurance, never popular, would probably become the biggest target for repeal.

"My guess is there would be overwhelming political support for the elimination of the individual mandate if people can't afford the premiums," said former Sen. Tom Daschle, D-S.D., who was an influential Obama adviser on health care.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Insurers would demand relief from provisions of the law intended to limit premium increases, or they might drop out of the insurance exchanges.

STICKER SHOCK FOR SELF-PAY CUSTOMERS

Many people still buy individual health care policies directly from an insurance company, by passing the law's markets and paying the full cost. They tend to be small-business owners, self-employed professionals and early retirees.

But even they would not escape the tumult in states losing subsidies.

The health law created one big insurance pool in each state, combining customers who purchase their policies directly with those who buy through the government market. If healthy people exit the insurance exchanges in droves, premiums for those buying directly would go up. Some may be unable to afford the higher cost.

"It would set off cascading events," said Larry Levitt of the nonpartisan Kaiser Family Foundation. "The individual market would empty out as premiums rise significantly."

REPUBLICANS TO THE RESCUE?

Leading congressional Republicans have been walking a fine line, opposing the law in the Supreme Court case while pledging to protect consumers if their side wins.

If the subsidies are overturned, Republicans will first try blaming Obama and the Democrats for writing flawed legislation and then trying to paper over problems with regulations. Then they'll move ahead with a patch to appease angry constituents.

A bill introduced by Sen. Ron Johnson, R-Wis., would continue the subsidies for existing customers only on the federal exchange until September 2017. That would open a window for states to act, but it would ultimately leave the problem for the next president and Congress. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., is a co-sponsor.

Johnson's bill would repeal the requirements for individuals to have insurance and for larger employers to offer coverage to workers.

Obama is unlikely to accept any of those changes.

"The president is likely to veto whatever we would propose, because we don't have a willing partner," said Sen. John Barrasso, R-Wyo., leader of a GOP working group on health care.

Islamic State faces battle in Iraq, U.S. reassures Abadi // Reuters // Baghdad Bureau, Jeff Mason, Andrea Shalal, Isabel Coles, Sylvia Westall – May 25, 2015

Islamic State poured more fighters into Ramadi as security forces and Shi'ite paramilitaries prepared to try to retake the Iraqi city, while Washington scrambled on Monday to reassure Baghdad after a U.S. official's sharp criticism of Iraqi forces.

U.S. Vice President Joe Biden spoke to Iraqi Prime Minister Haidar al-Abadi after Defense Secretary Ash Carter questioned Iraqi troops' will to fight when Ramadi fell. The U.S. damage-control effort came as the loss of Ramadi and Palmyra in Syria put its strategy against Islamic State into question.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The vice president recognized the enormous sacrifice and bravery of Iraqi forces over the past eighteen months in Ramadi and elsewhere," the White House said in a statement about Biden's call with Abadi.

"The United States will ... do all we can to help the brave Iraqi forces, including the tribes of Anbar, secure the province from ISIL terrorists," a senior U.S. official said separately, referring to the group by an acronym.

The insurgents reinforced Ramadi on Monday, deploying fighters in preparation for battle against security forces and paramilitary groups advancing on the provincial capital, 110 km (70 miles) northwest of the capital, Baghdad.

Iraqi forces have regained ground east of Ramadi since launching a counter-offensive on Saturday, a week after it was overrun, and on Monday retook a rural area south of the city.

In comments to CNN on Sunday, Carter knocked Iraqi forces for being unsuccessful in holding Ramadi despite being more numerous than the militants, drawing a rebuke from Abadi, who told BBC the U.S. defense chief had been misinformed. Abadi predicted Iraqi forces would take back Ramadi "in days."

In Palmyra, the Syrian air force struck at buildings captured by the Sunni militant group, whose arrival has raised fears that the city 's famed Roman ruins will be destroyed.

The air force leveled Islamic State "hideouts" and killed a large number of its members around Palmyra's military air base, Syrian state media said.

Islamic State has killed at least 217 people execution-style, including children, since it moved into the Palmy ra area 10 days ago, according to the British-based Syrian Observatory for Human Rights.

RAMADI PUSH

Police sources said Iraqi forces supported by Iran-backed Shi'ite militia and locally recruited Sunni tribal fighters had retaken parts of al-Tash, 20 km (12 miles) south of Ramadi.

Pro-government Sunni tribal fighters, with the help of the army, laid land mines to reinforce their defensive lines around Baghdadi, a settlement northwest of Ramadi that controls access to a major Iraqi air base. Islamic State attacked Baghdadi with seven suicide car bombs on Sunday.

In Ramadi, residents said trucks carrying Islamic State fighters arrived on Sunday evening.

Abu Saed heard a commotion outside his house in the city's southeastern Officers neighborhood. "I saw two trucks pull up outside with dozens of fighters carrying arms running quickly into nearby buildings and taking cover."

Another resident said at least 40 fighters had jumped out of three trucks that arrived in the southern al-Tamim district on Sunday evening.

"They were carrying weapons and wearing mostly khaki dress with ammunition belts wrapped around their chests," said Abu Mutaz. "They were talking in an Arabic dialect, they were not Iraqis."

MAJOR SETBACK

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The seizures of Ramadi and Palmyra were Islamic State's biggest successes since a U.S.-led coalition launched an air war against it last year.

The near simultaneous victories against the Iraqi and Syrian armies have forced Washington to examine its strategy of bombing from the air while leaving fighting on the ground to local forces.

One analyst said the U.S. defense secretary's remarks suggested the White House realized a change in policy was needed. A spokesman for Abadi dismissed Carter's comments as "untimely and surprising at a time when Iraqi security forces are preparing to launch a counter-offensiv e to retake Ramadi".

The general in charge of Iran's paramilitary activities in the Middle East said the United States and other powers were failing to confront Islamic State.

"Today, in the fight against this dangerous phenomenon, nobody is present except Iran," said Major General Qassem Soleimani.

In a move that could mark an expansion of U.S. involvement in the conflict, Turkey said it and the United States had agreed in principle to give air support to some forces from Syria's mainstream opposition.

The United States and its allies carried out 10 air strikes against Islamic State militants in Syria and 25 strikes in Iraq since Sunday, the U.S. military said.

Days after taking Ramadi, Islamic State defeated Sy rian government forces to capture Palmyra, home to 50,000 people and site of some of the world's most extensiv e and best-preserved Roman ruins.

The Syrian Observatory for Human Rights said there had been no reports so far of Islamic State destroying Palmy ra's ruins and artifacts.

The militants have proclaimed a caliphate to rule over all Muslims from territory they hold in Syria and Iraq. They have carried out mass killings in towns and cities they have captured, and destroyed ancient monuments, which they consider evidence of paganism.

In Syria, Hezbollah fighters captured two hilltops from al Qaeda's Syria wing, the Nusra Front, in areas close to the Lebanese border and killed dozens of enemy combatants, Hezbollah-run al-Manar telev ision reported on Monday.

Iranian-backed Hezbollah has backed Syrian President Bashar al-Assad in his country's civil war. The group's leader, Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, has vowed to clear the border area of Sunni Muslim militant groups that have carried out attacks on Lebanese soil.

White House expected to remove Cuba from State Sponsors of T errorism list // Aljazeera America // Sara Hassan – May 25, 2015

The White House is expected to remove Cuba from America's "State Sponsors of Terrorism" list later this week. Despite progress during the talks between the two countries, negotiators have failed to reach an agreement on exchanging ambassadors.

The Assistant Secretary of State for Western Hemisphere Affairs Roberta Jacobson commented on the situation by saying, "We made great progress ... but we still have a few things that need to be ironed out, and we're going to do that as quickly as possible. I do remain optimistic, but I'm also a realist about 54 y ears that we have to overcome."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cuba was placed on the U.S. terror list during the Reagan Administration in 1982. It's one of four other countries still on the list, along with Iran, Sudan, and Syria.

Historians say that Cuba and the U.S. were once close to sparking a global nuclear war. Former Cuban President Fidel Castro nationalized all businesses in his country after taking power, prompting the United States to close its embassy in Hav ana in 1961 and impose a crippling embargo. Later that y ear, the U.S. tried to overthrow Castro in a failed coup known as the Bay of Pigs incident.

Castro then turned to the Soviet Union for help, setting off decades of mistrust between Washington and Havana.

It wasn't until 2012, when Raul Castro took over power from his ailing brother Fidel Castro, that Cuba suggested normalizing relations with the United States. President Barack Obama responded by moving to lift parts of the trade embargo and kick-starting talks in January.

Not everyone is on board with the President's strategy, but many are optimistic about better relations between the two countries.

During Al Jazeera America's Sunday night segment "The Week Ahead," Lisa Fletcher spoke to Christopher Sabatini, founder and Editor-in-Chief of the website Latin America Goes Global, and Paul Bonicelli, a former Assistant Administrator at USAID.

Bonicelli say s that he does not agree with President Obama's approach on the negotiations. "The President hasn't really required concessions from this government," he says. "The Castro brothers are running a dictatorship, and you would think that the President would require at least some movement on politics, on economics, and on our national security interests before he's willing to give them everything. He could have gotten a lot of Republican support for that kind of negotiation, but he hasn't asked for anything in return."

Sabatini say s, however, that the Cuban government had made changes even before Obama's announcement last December to begin negotiations. "Right now Cuba has far fewer political prisoners than it has had in decades," he says. "Detentions and harassment continue, but there have also been economic reforms. There were over 400,000 entrepreneurs that Cuba's allowing to help grow the economy and help bolster socialism, that's been really important in creating some space for civ ic activism."

Bonicelli disagrees, saying "entrepreneurial activity is not up in Cuba. In fact, the number is down over the years because the Cuban government has been more talk than action. I think the President missed a great opportunity to sit down with Congress and get a bi-partisan deal."

Sabatini say s though that there is a better chance for success with diplomatic negotiations. "Cuba hasn't been engaging in sponsoring terrorism for decades. In fact, it is sponsoring a peace negotiation between the FARC (Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia) guerillas and the Colombian government, one of our allies."

When asked how opening U.S. trade with Cuba would be different than what Canada and Europe have already been doing with the island for decades, Sabatini says "neither of them is 90 miles off the coast of Cuba, and neither of them have close to 2 million Cubans living on their shores." He adds that once the Castro brothers out of power, "we need to be engaged in Cuba. We cannot risk having that regime collapse without us having some sort of stake in its present, if we want to have a role in the future."

2016 presidential cam paigns chase m oney, with no cop on the beat: Our view // USA T oday // T he Editorial Board – May 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Money has always been the dark force of politics, but it's reaching a tipping point in the 2016 presidential election. Whoever wins will be more beholden than any recent predecessor to megadonors who write huge checks. Campaigns are skating up to, or over, ethical and legal lines to maximize the dollars.

There's little worry about prosecution, though. The agency set up to enforce campaign laws after the Watergate scandals in 1974 — the Federal Election Commission — is mired in partisan stalemate on major issues, meaning there's effectively no cop on the beat.

That leaves no one (except the news media) to police the flood of big money set loose by court decisions in 2010 that made it legal for corporations, labor unions and rich people to give unlimited amounts to "super PACs," which can support candidates as long as they remain independent from them.

In practice, the independence is fiction. Super PACs are typically run by a candidate's close aides, but it's hard to prove illegal coordination.

Advisers to Republican Jeb Bush have already told reporters that his presidential campaign — which technically doesn't exist yet because Bush hasn't officially declared — will be offloading big expenses such as television ads, direct mail and get-out-the-vote efforts to its super PAC.

Democrat Hillary Clinton's campaign will also rely on an affiliated super PAC for TV and Internet advertising. The idea that campaigns would outsource crucial activities to groups they could not at least clandestinely steer is hard to swallow.

At least super PACs are required to disclose the names of anyone who gives more than $200. That's not true of non-profit "social welfare" organizations, which can do what super PACs do but keep contributors' names secret as long as the PAC's chief purpose isn't politics. Reformers say groups routinely abuse this rule, but a challenge to four such groups went nowhere when the FEC deadlocked and refused to investigate. FEC Chairwoman Ann Ravel told The New York Times that the agency, which has three Democratic commissioners and three Republicans, is "worse than dysfunctional," and that "the likelihood of the laws being enforced is slim."

When candidates comment on the situation, they tend to sound like St. Augustine asking to "make me pure, but not yet." Clinton says if she's elected, she'll appoint Supreme Court justices who will make the money-grubbing unconstitutional. Bush has ordered donors to his super PAC to cap their donations at $1 million, apparently on the theory that no one can be corrupted for a mere million. Meanwhile, they and their rivals are raising megabucks for their super PACs.

This would be amusing if it weren't such a sad indictment of politics. It's a reason why Americans don't vote, why elections seem like arms races, and why the next president will get to office with an indelible taint.

Americans demanded change once and got it, but it took one of the worst political scandals in history. That's a terrible price to pay for something politicians should see is in their and the nation's best interest.

Super PACs are not the problem: Opposing view // USA Today // Bradley A. Smith – May 25, 2015

A super PAC is a group of people pooling their resources to support candidates for political office. They don't contribute to candidates' campaigns, but instead say what they want to say. Super PACs must register with the Federal Election Commission, and report all of their expenditures and contributions over $200. Why is all that considered so bad?

Americans tend to forget, or not know, that until 1975 our elections always featured the equivalent of super PACs. But that year, we decided to vastly increase the government's role as a speech policeman. Not surprisingly, the combined incumbent re-election rate over the three election cycles since the return of super PACs is lower than at any time since 1974.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

People hate political spending the same way that children hate spinach, but it turns out to be good to have. Studies show that spending increases voter knowledge and turnout, but it's not cheap. One recent study showed it cost roughly $87 a vote to increase turnout.

Unfortunately, current campaign-finance laws make it difficult for candidates to raise the money necessary to get their message to v oters. Super PACs help fill that need. And that, in turn, means that candidates can spend less time fundraising and more time talking to v oters.

Before super PACs, if a presidential candidate didn't do well in Iowa and New Hampshire, his campaign typically ended for lack of money. In 2012, however, super PACs kept campaigns of candidates such as Newt Gingrich and Rick Santorum alive. They didn't ultimately win, but they did win primaries and millions of votes, and, more important, gav e Americans more time to consider and debate the candidates and issues. What's wrong with that?

In the old day s, the 2016 GOP primary would have played out like this: Jeb Bush would have just out-fundraised everyone, leav ing voters with less choice and less information about the candidates. Why is that good for democracy?

Let's take stock: Since the return of super PACs, turnout, up; competition, up; candidate time spent fundraising, down; personal freedom, up. Our campaigns aren't perfect, but super PACs aren't the problem.

BUSINESSFORWARD

John—

As a business leader, your experiences are important to creating effective public policies that will grow our economy and create jobs. But how can you best communicate your views so that Washington listens?

Sharing your perspective with local and national media can be a particularly effective tool for encouraging policy action. And it can help bring attention to your business as a leader in your industry.

Please join Business Forward for an interactive media training. Using the effect of severe weather and climate change as a case study, seasoned public affairs strategists Aric Caplan and Jonathan Hahn will show you:

- How to present yourself as a thought leader and expert source;
- Tips for speaking about policy issues from your perspective as a business leader;
- Best practices for print and radio interviews.

Subsequent trainings in this series will focus on social media, television and public speaking appearances, and writing letters to the editor and op-eds.

Can you join our media training on print and radio interviews?

ABOUT THE TRAINERS

ARIC CAPLAN is the founder and president of Caplan Communications. For over 18 years, Mr. Caplan's winning issues advocacy campaigns have furthered the timely missions of civic organizations, non-profit groups and NGOs seeking to advance human rights, environmental protection and safeguard social justice. Caplan Communications also maintains a robust literary division that services the needs of major book publishers across the United States. As a seasoned public affairs strategist and avid news junkie, Mr. Caplan has made a career of renovating the air products of major-market news/talk radio stations in Pittsburgh and West Palm Beach, FL. He worked in radio as a reporter and producer at KDKA and program director at WJNO before entering public relations. In February 2004, Mr. Caplan founded his agency to champion issues in the public interest and on behalf of social justice and environmental causes. Aric Caplan frequently publishes editorials in industry trend magazines such as O'Dwyer's magazine and has been invited to address audiences on communications panels as a public affairs practitioner whose insights and approaches continue to reach and influence target audiences and Capitol Hill with precision.

JONATHAN HAHN is the managing director of Caplan Communications. He is a seasoned media trainer who specializes in strategic communication, public advocacy and story development. Mr. Hahn has managed press operations for various clean, renewable energy media relations events, including the Climate Action Campaign's 27-state "I will Act on Climate" bus tour. He also specializes in strategic advocacy and crisis public relations, which include the BP oil disaster in the Gulf of Mexico and Japan's Fukushima Daiichi nuclear disaster. He is a veteran media trainer with more than a decade of experience coaching executives to prepare for television, radio and print interviews.

Statement of Frank Giustra

POSTED ON APRIL 23, 2015 BY FRANK GIUSTRA
CATEGORY FRANK GIUSTRA ,

A book that has not yet been published has caused the New York Times to publish a wildly speculative, innuendo-laced article about the Clinton Foundation and my role in contributing money to it. There is not one shred of evidence to back up the Times' conclusions. This is not about me, but rather an attempt to tear down Secretary Clinton and her presidential campaign. If this is what passes for investigative journalism in the United States, it is very sad.

The facts do not comport with the story in the New York Times. The reporter, Jo Becker, wrote a similar piece in 2008, which was eventually debunked by Forbes. http://www.forbes.com/2009/01/12/giustra-clinton-kazakhstan-pf-ii-in_rl_0912croesus_inl.html

1. I began working on financing the purchase of mining stakes from a private Kazakh company in early 2005. The purchase was concluded in late 2005.

- In late 2005, I went to Kazakhstan to finish the negotiations of the sale. Bill Clinton flew to Almaty a few days after I arrived in the country on another person's plane, not on my plane, as the Times reported. Bill Clinton had nothing to do with the purchase of private mining stakes by a Canadian company.
- I sold all of my stakes in the uranium company – Uranium One – in the fall of 2007, after it merged with another company. I would note that those were sold at least 18 months before Hillary Clinton became the Secretary of State. No one was speculating at that time that she would become the Secretary of State.
- Other media outlets have insinuated that I influenced the decision by the U.S. to sign a free trade agreement with Colombia. At one point, I was an investor in Pacific Rubiales, a Colombian energy company. I sold my shares in Pacific Rubiales several years before the U.S.-Colombia Free Trade Agreement, which, I will note, was approved by several U.S. agencies and the White House. To theorize that I had anything to do with that is sheer conjecture.

I hope that the U.S. media can start to focus on the real challenges of the world and U.S. society. Focus on poverty, homelessness, infrastructure, health care, education, or fractious world politics. You are a great country. Don't ruin it by letting those with political agendas take over your newspapers and your airwaves. I am extremely proud of the work that we have done at the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership. Thousands of people, all over the world, have been helped by this initiative. I plan to continue that work long after the harsh glare of this week's media stories has faded.

McConnell, Shelby & GOP Undermine America's National Security

Washington, D.C. - Conservatives continue escalating their shameless attacks on America's national security institutions, criminal justice system and military. On Fox News, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell insulted the FBI professional on the frontlines of the fight against terrorism, saying that Larry King gives a tougher interview than the FBI does when interrogating a terrorism suspect. And today, Sen. Richard Shelby is putting petty partisan political demands over the security of the country by placing a blanket hold on over 70 Administration appointees, including several critical national security positions. This follows a broader pattern of the GOP distorting the facts and disparaging our security institutions - and the men and women who risk their lives to keep us safe - for political gain.

Conservatives spout mistruths, insult law enforcement professionals as a means to politically attack Obama administration. Conservative leaders in congress and pundits have been trying to score cheap political points by attacking America's civil servants and those on the front line combating extremists. Just yesterday, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, referred to the FBI interrogation of Umar Farouq Abdulmutallab, the underwear bomber, saying that, "He was given a 50 minute interrogation, probably Larry King has interrogated people longer and better than that." Similarly, Susan Collins mocked the FBI interrogation saying, "Less than one hour. That's right, less than one hour. In fact, just fifty minutes. That's the amount of time that the FBI spent questioning Abdulmutallab, the foreign terrorist who tried to blow up a plane on Christmas Day. Then, he was given a Miranda warning and a lawyer, and, not surprisingly, he stopped talking." And Michael Hayden, the Bush administration's final CIA Director, wrote in the Washington Post that, "We allowed an enemy combatant the protections of our Constitution before we had adequately interrogated him," And David Frum fallaciously declares in a CNN.com op-ed on Monday that, "As soon as the underwear bomber got his Miranda warning, he stopped talking." [Mitch McConnell, 2/4/10 . Susan Collins, 1/30/10 . Michael Hayden, 1/31/10]

These remarks are disrespectful and just plain wrong. Earlier this week FBI Director Robert Mueller confirmed that federal agents have been successful in obtaining intelligence from Abdulmutallab: "It is a continuum in which over a period of time, we have been successful in obtaining intelligence, not just on day 1, but on day 2, day 3 day 4 and day 5 down the road." And the Washington Post reports that, "Umar Farouk Abdulmutallab, the man accused of trying to blow up a jet airplane on Christmas Day, has been providing FBI interrogators with useful intelligence about his training and contacts since last week, Obama administration sources said Tuesday. Separately, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III told senators at an intelligence committee hearing that Abdulmutallab was giving information to investigators." In addition, the Los Angeles Times reported, the FBI decided to mirandize Adulmutallab after he had stopped providing useful intelligence.

In fact, the interrogation of Abdulmutallab has already proven fruitful. Ken Gude of the Center for American Progress writes that, "The intelligence gained from Abdulmutallab has been shared widely throughout the intelligence community - and has already produced results. On January 21, Malaysian counterterrorism authorities arrested 10 suspected terrorists tied to Abdulmutallab. The suspected cell was made up of mostly non-Malaysians including two Nigerians who were thought to be part of an international terrorist network." [LA Times, 2/01/10 . ABC News, 2/02/10 . David Frum, CNN, 2/1/10 . Robert Mueller, via Adam Serwer, 2/03/10 . Ken Gude, Think Progress, 5/3/10]

Richard Clarke: FBI is "good at getting people to talk." What makes the statements from Sen. McConnell, and his conservative cohorts, even more egregious is that the FBI is in fact very good at interrogating terrorists. Richard Clarke, the counterterrorism advisor to Presidents Clinton and Bush, and a career intelligence official, said earlier this week that, "The FBI is good at getting people to talk...they have been much more successful than the previous attempts of torturing people and trying to convince them to give information that way. The FBI does it right." Similarly, Vicki Divoll, a former legal adviser to the CIA's Counterterrorist Center and general counsel for the Senate intelligence committee told the Washington Independent that, "The FBI is experienced at using nonviolent but aggressive techniques, within the rule of law, to elicit information from individuals who are hostile and uncooperative."

In fact some of the most important intelligence gained on al Qaeda has been gained through FBI interrogations. Ali Soufan, was an FBI interrogator who, through traditional interrogation techniques of Abu Zubaydah discovered that Khalid Sheikh Mohammad was the mastermind of the 9/11 attacks. This was some of the most important intelligence gathered on al Qaeda, and it was obtained by an FBI agent. In fact, once he and his FBI team were removed from the interrogation by contractors and intelligence officials, Zubaydah stopped talking. They were then asked to return. Shortly after they returned they received more actionable intelligence.

In the case of Umar Farouq Abdulmutallab, the Underwear Bomber, cooperation and intelligence was gained not in spite of using the FBI and following the rule of law, but because of it. As a senior national security official told ABC News, "One of the principal reasons why his family came back is because they had complete trust in the US system of justice and believed that Umar Farouq would be treated fairly and appropriately... And that they would be as well." [Richard Clarke, ABC, 2/3/10. Vicki Divoll, via Washington Independent, 6/24/09 . Ali Soufan, 5/13/09 . ABC News, 2/02/10]

Disparaging of the FBI is part of a larger pattern of conservatives attacking national security apparatus for political gain. Conservatives have long demonstrated their willingness to trade our national security for political gain.

Obstructing national security policy by blocking votes on key nominees. Senator Richard Shelby (R-IA) has put a hold the nominees for the top Intelligence officers at the State Department and the Department of Homeland Security as well as a senior civilian at the Pentagon. ABC News reported yesterday: "Sen. Carl Levin, who chairs the Senate Armed Services Committee, gave a frustrated speech on the Senate floor. 'They've been sitting on our calendar since December 2, over two months, while these positions go unfilled and we're in the middle of two wars,' said Levin of five total defense department nominees Shelby has held up (civilian positions only, points out Shelby's office). It all has to do with Alabama-based defense contracts. In other words - pork." [ABC News, 2/4/10]

Ignoring facts and seeking political points. After blatantly lying about the facts surrounding the investigation of the Umar Farouk Abdulmutallab, Senator Kit Bond further attacked the White House. The NY Times reports, "Robert Gibbs, the White House press secretary, said yesterday that Senator Kit Bond, the ranking Republican on the Intelligence Committee, should apologize for suggesting that the administration leaked information in the investigation of the Nigerian man accused of trying to blow up a jetliner on Christmas Day...Mr. Gibbs said the senator's assertion was incorrect. Mr. Abdulmutallab's cooperation with the authorities, he said, was first disclosed at a Congressional hearing on Tuesday by the director of national intelligence, Adm. Dennis Blair, and the director of the F.B.I., Robert Mueller." [NY Times, 2/4/10]

Jeopardizing defense spending. In 2009, "Senate Republicans failed...in their bid to filibuster a massive Pentagon bill that funds the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, an unusual move designed to delay President Obama's health-care legislation," reported the Washington Post. While unsuccessful, the move would have had major consequences for national security priorities at a time when American troops are at risk in Iraq and Afghanistan. Conservatives had previously obstructed the entire 2010 defense appropriations bill, because of an amendment "that would specify harsh penalties for hate crimes, including those based on sexual orientation or gender identity," reported the Hill. As a result, 34 Senate Republicans sought to block a vote on the defense bill, prioritizing their opposition to the Hate Crimes amendment over support for the appropriation of critical funding for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. [Washington Post, 12/18/09 .The Hill, 10/22/09 . Senate Roll Call Vote, 10/22/09]

Rushing to send troops into harm's way into Afghanistan without a clear strategy. Throughout the fall of 2009, conservatives consistently called for the President to abandon his methodical review of the U.S. strategy for Afghanistan and come to a snap decision to put more troops into harm's way. But, as senior military strategists, including CENTCOM commander General David Petraeus and NATO-ISAF commander General Stanley McChrystal have both testified, the President's painstaking review was critical for setting the strategy. [Sens. Graham, Lieberman, and McCain, via WSJ, 9/13/09 . Gen. David Petraeus, 12/09/09 . General Stanley McChrystal, 12/01/09]

Placing a hold on a major veterans bill. This fall, Sen. Tom Coburn (R - OK) placed a hold on a bill that provided "Enhancements in VA health care for female veterans, including new training for VA mental health providers to handle veterans who experienced military sexual trauma. ... Support to family caregivers of severely disabled veterans by giving them access to counseling, support and a living stipend... Expanded mental health services to rural regions where veterans currently have to drive hundreds of miles to seek mental health care... Improved traumatic brain injury (TBI) care... [and] Additional programs for homeless veterans," according to Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, a non-partisan veterans' advocacy organization. [IAVA, 10/30/09]

Denying threat of climate change outlined by Pentagon. Conservatives in Congress have built up a record of climate change denial. Senator Jim Inhofe (R - OK) and Rep. Paul Broun (R- GA) have both called global warming a hoax, and Rep. Mike Pence (R - IN) said that the "science is very mixed on the subject of global warming." Yet the Pentagon's Quadrennial Defense Review - the document setting defense strategy for the United States - devotes over four pages to addressing the issue.[Senator Jim Inhofe, via Countrywide and the Sun, 6/26/09 . Rep. Paul Broun, via Think Progress, 6/26/09 . Rep. Mike Pence, via Think Progress, 5/05/09 . 2010 QDR, 2/1/10]

Politicizing intelligence on Iran in order to justify military action. There are emerging signs that neoconservatives are once again attempting to recklessly politicize the intelligence community's activities in order to pave the way for their militant policies. Last month, Josh Marshall noted Center for Security Policy President Frank Gaffney's "argument that Obama needs to appoint a 'Team B' to come in and analyze the threat of Islamic fundamentalism," to ensure that the U.S. intelligence community is taking the threat seriously enough. Such efforts to politicize intelligence are especially troubling, given the reports that the intelligence community is updating its analysis of Iran's nuclear program. [TPM, 1/12/10 .Frank Gaffney, via the National Review, 12/4/07 . Danielle Pletka, via the Washington Post, 12/07/07]

Undermining and obstructing America's policy toward Latin America. Sen. Jim DeMint (R - SC) traveled to Honduras in support of the coup against Honduran President Manuel Zelaya, actively undermining sensitive efforts by the Administration to restore democratic rule. In addition to this trip, also blocked the, "nominations of Thomas Shannon, President Barack Obama's pick to serve as ambassador to Brazil, and Arturo Valenzuela, the choice for the post of assistant secretary of state for Western Hemisphere affairs," according to the Hill. Steve Clemons of the New America Foundation explains how historically, this borders on treason. [The Hill, 9/20/09 . The Washington Note, 10/1/09]

…Some Work to Do on Foreign Policy
By Brian Katulis, Published: January 30

Brian Katulis is a senior fellow for national security at the Center for American Progress. He is on Twitter: @katulis.

President Obama's State of the Union address focused mostly on domestic issues. Yet how Obama talked about his foreign policy agenda underscores a crisis of purpose about U.S. engagement in the world.

To advance his national security agenda in the next three years, Obama should offer a more cohesive strategic argument for global engagement, one that more clearly articulates the values informing his policies. Economic challenges at home, including slow job growth, have made many Americans more selective about which global problems they think the United States should take on. A Pew poll released last month found that most Americans think we should mind our own business internationally.

It won't be sufficient for the administration to state how the president intends to approach particular national security questions: He needs to articulate why they matter and what's at stake. Obama has done this before; his 2009 Nobel Peace Prize acceptance speech made a compelling moral and strategic argument for U.S. engagement in the world.

To be sure, Obama outlined sound and pragmatic positions Tuesday on most of the leading foreign policy questions of the day. He made a measured case for more time to pursue nuclear talks with Iran without overselling the prospects for success. He also sketched out how his administration is addressing questions about National Security Agency (NSA) surveillance and drone strikes while remaining vigilant to the threats posed by al-Qaeda and its affiliates.

But missing was the connective tissue between the different elements of his foreign policy agenda. It sounded like a "to do" list of chores in search of a broader argument for why these policy proposals matter. The lack of an overarching worldview is partly why Obama made only passing mention of the Syria conflict and said nothing about the complicated changes in Egypt. It is important that Obama used his stirring recognition of Sgt. 1st Class Cory Remsburg to rally support for our veterans — but it's not clear what the president would like to see as the end result of the Afghanistan and Iraq wars in which Remsburg served.

At the start of its sixth year, the Obama administration runs the risk of remaining intellectually stuck, cleaning up the inheritance of the Bush years. Yet major global changes, including the rise of other powers and widespread social protests for dignity, require a forward-looking moral framework for U.S. engagement. A clearer vision is necessary to rally public support and votes in Congress for key agenda items, such as a possible nuclear deal with Iran and proposed future trade deals with Europe and Asia. It is important for Obama to do this because Republicans are sharply divided on foreign policy and Obama's own party looks for him to lead.

The administration's planned release this year of a new national security strategy offers a chance to make a clearer argument for global engagement with three core elements.

First, it must make a case for how its global economic agenda, including proposed trade agreements with Asia and Europe, would benefit Americans and expand growth while meeting the president's aspirations of reducing domestic inequality.

Second, it must demonstrate how the government will keep Americans safe while protecting our core values. Obama's record here is mixed: He has brought troops home and kept the homeland safe, but threats from terrorist networks have morphed abroad. The principles Obama has outlined for reining in NSA surveillance and drone strikes must be applied with real actions to rebuild confidence in U.S. leadership.

Third, Obama must tell the world more clearly what we stand for and what costs we are willing to bear to advance the causes of freedom and dignity — and not shy away from the toughest cases. From Ukraine to the Middle East to China, the struggle to advance freedom endures, and many see a growing American reticence to engage on this complicated front. Egypt will present an important test — in the coming weeks, the administration will face calls on whether to certify that Egypt is on a path toward democracy.

Many people in this country and abroad are still looking for U.S. leadership in the world. Vague notions of turning the page on the Bush years, pivoting to new regions of the world and rebalancing to the wider global arena are not sufficient arguments to make a case for global engagement. Obama has a sound set of policies, but if he wants to achieve great things in the world in the next three years, he has to sharpen his argument and answer the question many are asking about his foreign policy: What's the big idea?

CNN: “Rubio calls Clinton 'a 20th century candidate'”

By CNN Political Unit

July 22, 2014, 9:52 a.m. EDT

Marco Rubio's apparently not so concerned if Hillary Clinton decides to make another run for the White House.

"I just think she's a 20th century candidate," the first-term senator from Florida and potential 2016 GOP presidential candidate told NPR.

"I think she does not offer an agenda for moving America forward in the 21st century, at least not up till now," Rubio said, in an interview with "Morning Edition" that posted early Tuesday.

"The truth of the matter is she was the secretary of state during an administration that has had virtually no successes on foreign policy," Rubio added.

This is far from the first time Rubio's been critical of Clinton's tenure as America's top diplomat.

"First, I think she's going to be asked to account for her time as secretary of state and I don't think it's the sterling success people think it is. Quite frankly, much of the foreign policy failures we see in place today began when she ran the Department of State," Rubio told CNN's Wolf Blitzer in an interview in February on "The Situation Room."

"Should she decide to run for president, Hillary Clinton would present a forward-thinking agenda, one that presents new, bold ideas to keep our country moving in the right direction. With his history supporting the Tea Party’s outdated, regressive policies, Senator Rubio is the one stuck in the stone ages. This is nothing but a desperate attempt by him to divert from his failed legislative record," Adrienne Elrod, communications director at the pro-Clinton rapid response shop Correct The Record, told CNN.

Clinton has said she'll decide on running for the White House by the end of this year or early next year. Rubio, who's also up for re-election to the Senate in 2016, said in the NPR interview that he'd make up his mind by early 2015.

"There's a lot of work to be done if you're going to run for president, or if you're going to run for re-election in a state as big as Florida," Rubio added.

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Marco Rubio calls Hillary Clinton a '20th century candidate'"

By Sean Sullivan

July 22, 2014, 9:28 a.m. EDT

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) says former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) would not offer a platform that addresses the country's future challenges if she runs for president in 2016.

"I just think she's a 20th century candidate," Rubio told NPR in an interview published Tuesday. "I think she does not offer an agenda for moving America forward in the 21st century -- at least not up to now."

Rubio argued that Clinton is "extremely vulnerable in her record" because of the foreign policy "failures" of the Obama administration.

Rubio, like Clinton, is a possible candidate for president.

It's not the first time Rubio has made the "20th century"" argument. He said something similar in New Hampshire in May, though he did not mention Clinton by name. Democrats, Rubio said then, could "nominate someone now who wants to take us to the past, to an era that is gone and is never coming back. The 20th century is gone. We live in the 21st century, a time of extraordinary challenges but also extraordinary opportunities."

Adrienne Elrod, communications director for Correct the Record, a pro-Clinton super PAC, responded in a statement: "Should she decide to run for president, Hillary Clinton would present a forward-thinking agenda, one that presents new, bold ideas to keep our country moving in the right direction."

Media Matters for America: "When A GOP Presidential Hopeful Earned $11 Million In Speaking Fees And D.C. Press Didn't Care"

[Subtitle:] Different "Wealth" Coverage For Democrats And Republicans

In the thirteen months directly prior to kicking off his Republican presidential campaign in February 2007, Rudy Giuliani earned more than $11 million dollars giving paid speeches. The former New York City Mayor, who was thrust into the national and international spotlight after the terror attacks of September 11, 2001, typically charged between $100,000 and $300,000 for his speeches and spoke more than 120 times.

According to one speaking contract published at the time, Giuliani required clients pay for meals and lodging for himself and four travel companions. Giuliani required a two-bedroom suite (with a king-sized bed) for his overnight stays; a suite preferably located on an upper floor with a balcony. Clients also had to pay for four additional rooms to house Giuliani's entourage.

As for travel, the contract stipulated that clients "should provide Mr. Giuliani with first class travel expenses for up to 5 people to include a private plane." What kind of private plane? "Please note that the private aircraft MUST BE a Gulfstream IV or bigger."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Note that along with the $11 million in speaking fees Giuliani pocketed in 2006, he also earned $8 million on the speech circuit in 2002. If Giuliani was able to average between $8 and $11 million in speaking fees from 2002 until he announced his candidacy in early 2007, he would have earned more than $40 million giving speeches in the five years prior to his White House campaign. (Speaking fees represented only part of his income.)

What's newsworthy about that today? Simply the fact that back in 2007 when a wealthy Republican became a presidential hopeful the Beltway press didn't care that he'd earned an eight-figure income giving 45-minute speeches. (With an additional 15 minutes allotted for Q & A.) Indeed, Giuliani's financial revelations barely registered with pundits and reporters who gave the information little time and attention. The Washington Post, for example, published just three mentions of Giuliani's multi-million dollar "speaking fees."

The press certainly never elevated the issue to a defining narrative for the Republican's campaign. Perhaps they realized there was nothing intrinsically wrong with a speaker being paid what organizations are willing to offer them.

Compare that collective shoulder shrug with the nearly month-long media fascination still churning over Hillary Clinton's speaking fees; a fascination that's part of a larger, misguided media obsession over the issue of Clinton wealth. ("Speaking fee" articles and columns published by Post so far this year regarding Clinton? 28.)

Even though the Republican hopeful in thirteen months prior to his candidacy earned nearly twice as much money in speaking fees as Clinton has in the sixteen months since stepping down as Secretary of State, the press has universally agreed that Clinton's fee are not only newsworthy but deeply disturbing and that her family wealth poses a "a political liability."

Why a major political hurdle? Clinton's "windfall [is] at odds with her party's call to shrink the gap between the rich and the poor," Bloomberg News preposterously proclaimed this week.

Note to media: American history is filled with wealthy Democrats who have fought for income equality and on behalf of the working class. Based on her past performance, as a candidate Hillary Clinton would simply extend that tradition. And last time I checked, the Democratic Party platform doesn't discourage the accumulation of personal wealth. That's simply a media stereotype.

The other steadfast media angle in play has been that Clinton's speech-driven wealth means she's no longer "authentic" and that she's "out of touch" with everyday voters. But a recent poll thoroughly debunked that notion, so why does the lazy press keep pushing it?

When you examine the two sets of facts, the press treatment and the gaping media double standards in play for Giuliani and Clinton could not be more vivid: The D.C. press holds the Clintons, and Democrats, to a much tougher standard than they do Republican candidates.

Note that last week, appearing on Morning Joe, while hosts and guests all agreed that the Clinton speaking fees were a big problem for Hillary, NBC's Chuck Todd insisted the inflated paychecks looked unseemly [emphasis added]:

“All of this book tour; all of these decisions to go out and basically make your post-presidential money before you run for--before you actually are president? Which is really what's going [on]. Ex-presidents make money like this, not candidates before they run.”

But what did Giuliani do in 2006? He went out and made big, "ex-president" speech money before he ran for president. But most pundits remained quiet.

And how about the Washington Post harping on the fact that Clinton received big speaking fees from college and universities and that it just looked bad. (Even though no student fees were used to pay Clinton and she donated the fees to charity.) Article after article from the Post has obsessed over that angle.

But guess what Giuliani did? He not only cashed a big university paycheck, paid for by student fees, but the Republican also demanded the school pay for his pricey travel.

From the Chicago Tribune, one of the few news organization that took a close look at Giuliani's speech earnings in 2007:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"In one speech last year at Oklahoma State University, Giuliani requested and received travel on a private Gulfstream jet that cost the school $47,000 to operate. His visit essentially wiped out the student speakers annual fund."

By the way, if anyone thinks my description of the Post's Clinton speaking fees as having been obsessive represents an exaggeration, here's a sampling from Washingtonpost.com archives of recent, fevered dispatches from the Clinton speech beat:

University at Buffalo paid $275,000 for Hillary Clinton speech

At time of austerity, 8 universities spent top dollar on Hillary Rodham Clinton speeches

Hillary Clinton's speaking fees are a drop in the Clinton Foundation's massive fundraising bucket

What did the Post's coverage of Giuliani's speaking fees look like in 2007? It looked liked this:

Disclosure Forms Show Wealthy Lot Of Hopefuls

Giuliani to Seek Advice From FEC About Speaking Fees

That, according to a Nexis search, captures most of the Post's coverage and commentary about Giuliani's $11 million earnings from speaking fees. You'll note in the first piece the Post didn't even publish a stand-alone article about the topic. Instead, the paper simply grouped Giuliani's speaking fees with the other candidates and detailed all their earnings. (The issue garnered three additional sentences of coverage is this Post article.)

As for the second article -- the only one the paper published devoted entirely to Giuliani's speeches -- the Post focused exclusively on any ethical issues raised by Giuliani continuing to give paid speeches after he had formed a presidential exploratory committee, not on whether he'd earned too much money, which is what the current Clinton coverage revolves around.

For Giuliani, being a Republican and cashing large checks for speaking fees was definitely not a political problem according to the Washington Post, and according to the rest of the Beltway press, which now on a weekly, and sometimes even daily, basis devotes time and space to harshly examining Hillary's earnings.

Washington Post opinion: Catherine Rampell: "Limousine liberalism's good works"

By Catherine Rampell

July 21, 2014, 7:28 p.m. EDT

Is it hypocritical for a really, really rich person to object to rising inequality?

I've been thinking about this in light of the derision the Clintons are facing for charging six-figure speaking fees while pontificating about income polarization and the plight of the poor.

Other high-income, high-net-worth figures have been similarly mocked for expressing concerns about a growing income and wealth imbalance that benefited them. Among the targeted upper-crusters are Goldman Sachs chief executive Lloyd Blankfein, who said in a recent interview that "too much of the [gross domestic product] over the last generation has gone to too few of the people"; Warren Buffett, the Oracle of Omaha, who has advocated higher tax rates on high-earners such as himself and consistently decried rising inequality; and Paul Krugman, the Nobel-winning economist and New York Times columnist who will soon receive $25,000 a month from an institute that studies income inequality.

These economic elites aren't alone in balking at rising inequality. A rare survey of 1 percenters found that nearly two-thirds believe "differences in income in America are too large," according to research by Benjamin I. Page, Larry M. Bartels and Jason Seawright. That's almost identical to the share of the general population that espouses this view.

Given the e-mails I received when I wrote last week about Chelsea Clinton's lucrative speaking gigs, lots of people see this sort of "limousine liberalism" as, if not outright hypocrisy, at least a sign of cognitive dissonance. The implication is that to credibly care about — and advocate on behalf of — poor people, you need to take a vow of poverty yourself.

I find this view highly problematic.

First of all, when low-income people do jump on the soapbox about raising taxes on the rich or expanding the social safety net, they're usually accused of class warfare. But more important, the poor, unlike billionaires, don't get a lot of airtime.

Pretty much every time a rich person sneezes, a banner headline sprouts. Some of this outsize influence over the public discourse comes from the fact that very rich people tend to be more politically active than the typical American. Billionaires have the resources to spritz their agendas throughout the airwaves, and when they ask the White House for a meeting, they can be pretty sure they will be accommodated . But some of their influence reflects the fact that regular Americans, for whatever reason, put a lot of stock in what rich people think, no matter how inane such commentary might be. We listen when Kim Kardashian prattles on about "having it all" and when Tom Perkins mouths off about apportioning votes according to taxes paid. Why? Because, as Tevye the Milkman wisely surmised, "When you're rich, they think you really know."

Given this state of affairs, I would much rather the megarich wield their wealth and influence to try to improve conditions for the working class, rather than to further pad their pocketbooks.

Of course, when it comes to inequality, these two goals are not necessarily mutually exclusive. Blankfein's objections to rising inequality, for example, could be said to represent a sort of enlightened self-interest, as he emphasized that he thinks the yawning income gap is politically "destabilizing" and could lead to legislative gridlock and slower economic growth — all of which potentially affect his own well-being.

But for some rags-to-riches moguls — including Blankfein and Bill Clinton, both of whom grew up poor — objections to economic inequity may also reflect a fear that the system is now stacked against the kinds of people they once were. As social structures ossify and the income ladder becomes more rickety, the son of a postal clerk, growing up in a Brooklyn housing project, might never again be able to rise to become the chief executive of one of the United States' biggest financial institutions.

Amassing a great fortune can lead to a very different outlook on life. For some, success begets contempt for those not similarly situated, those lazy schmoes who didn't manage to lift themselves up by their own bootstraps. (One recent study of lottery winners, for example, found that a financial windfall typically leads people to become less egalitarian-minded and more approving of the existing distribution of wealth.) But for others, proximity to poor and working-class Americans can be a constant reminder that there but for the grace of God go they. The term I'd use for a 1 percenter who expresses concern about the wages, economic opportunities and safety nets available to the 99 percent is not hypocrisy; it's empathy.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Rubio: Clinton is '20th century candidate'"

By Jesse Byrnes

July 22, 2014, 9:13 a.m. EDT

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) on Tuesday said Hillary Clinton is a "20th century candidate" ill-suited to leading the nation going forward.

"I just think she's a 20th century candidate," Rubio told NPR. "I think she does not offer an agenda for moving America forward in the 21st century, at least not up till now."

Rubio, who's weighing a White House bid or reelection in Florida, said he would make his decision about a presidential run by early 2015.

"There's a lot of work to be done if you're going to run for president, or if you're going to run for reelection in a state as big as Florida," Rubio said.

Earlier this month the freshman senator said he believed he could beat Clinton in a race for the White House.

"Multiple people can beat her. Hillary Clinton is not unbeatable," he said in an interview with radio host Hugh Hewitt.

On Tuesday, Rubio reiterated his attack on the former secretary of State's record, saying she worked in "an administration that has had virtually no successes on foreign policy."

The Cuban-American senator, who last year co-sponsored an immigration overhaul that passed the Senate but failed in the House, also called for immigration reform amid the recent border crisis. But he said there first must be better border security and a modernization of the immigration system.

Democrats fired back, arguing Rubio's policies would take the coutnry back even further.

The criticism of Clinton is "rich coming from a Senator who wants the minimum wage to have less purchasing power than it did in the 1960's, take women's health care back to the 1950's, shut down the government like Republicans did in the 1990's and has voted time and again to end Medicare as we know it," Democratic National Committee nation press secretary Michael Czin said in an e-mail.

Des Moines Register: "Possible presidential rival to Hillary Clinton coming to Iowa again"

By Jennifer Jacobs

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

July 22, 2014, 10:15 a.m. EDT

Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley seems willing to fill the void in Iowa from the relative lack of Democratic White House hopefuls touching base here.

It has been 2,392 days since Hillary Clinton, the Democrats' most popular choice for a 2016 presidential run, stepped foot in Iowa in 2008.

But O'Malley, who was just here a month ago for his introductory visit of the 2016 cycle will return this weekend to gain more exposure - and to campaign for Iowa candidates running for office this fall.

O'Malley will help raise money for Iowa Democrat Jack Hatch, who is challenging Republican Terry Branstad for the governor's office, as well as for state Sen. Rita Hart of Wheatland and for Kevin Kinney, a sheriff's deputy from Johnson County who's running for the Iowa Senate this fall. His pending trip was first reported by Politico.

In comparison to the traffic from the GOP presidential aspirants, Iowa hasn't gotten much attention from Democrats who are on the buzz list for 2016. Liberal blogger John Deeth keeps a running tally on his website on Clinton's absence; she has said she is still trying to decide whether to run for president a second time.

U.S. Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota will be back in Iowa on Aug. 23 to campaign for U.S. Senate hopeful Bruce Braley; she was last here in August 2013. U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, an independent will make his second Iowa visit this year when he holds events in Dubuque on Sept. 13 and in Waterloo and Des Moines on Sept. 14 – the likely weekend of the Harkin Steak Fry. Vice President Joe Biden dropped in on a couple hundred Iowans who were in D.C. for an annual lobbying trip in May, and was last in Iowa for the steak fry in September 2013. Former Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer was here in December. And a group of people who claim to be from Iowa are trying to recruit U.S. Sen. Joe Manchin of West Virginia to run for president.

O'Malley who received a warm welcome from Iowa Democratic activists during a two-day visit a month ago. He praised retired U.S. Sen. Tom Harkin at a dinner on June 20, then gave the keynote speech at the Democrats' state convention on June 21. In his speech, orated with the aid of teleprompters, O'Malley offered up commentary on his achievements and his belief in the future.

Linda Langston, who is one of Iowa's representatives to the Democratic National Committee, in an interview with the Register last month predicted that Iowans will be intrigued by O'Malley. "He's well positioned to run should (Clinton) decide not to run," she said. "And obviously if she does run, she's got to figure out who she's going to put her on the ticket with her."

In summer 2012, O'Malley courted Iowa activists at the Democratic National Convention in North Carolina, and he was the keynote speaker at U.S. Sen. Tom Harkin's 35th annualsteak fry fundraiser in fall 2012.

Slate: "Adventures in Warrenland"

By David Weigel

July 21, 2014, 5:51 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] The movement to elect Elizabeth Warren president is make believe.

DETROIT—Every time she's asked, Sen. Elizabeth Warren gives the same frustrated answer. No. Nope. She is not running for president. She has literally rolled her eyes at the question. She's offered to "add an exclamation point." She's even signed a letter calling on Hillary Clinton, who leads polls of Democrats by up to 50 points, to run for president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And yet there they were on Friday morning, the people who wanted Warren to reconsider. Days before this year's Netroots Nation conference, the annual gathering of the online left, an Obama campaign veteran launched a draft campaign called Ready for Warren. (The name is a wink at the pro-Clinton PAC Ready for Hillary, which claims to have 2.5 million supporters in its database.) The new group printed "Warren for President" signs and plastered "Warren for President" stickers on free skimmer hats. As activists entered the Cobo Center, which resembles a pile of faded Rubik's Cubes that have tumbled from a closet, volunteers handed out the goods. There was even a folk song soundtrack, by Jessie Murphy:

Americans want our next president to be a woman

Hey babe, here's lookin' at you, Senator Elizabeth Warren

The planet is warming and the power is shifting

We will need a leader who won't stand for all the Wall Street bullshit, the lobbyist grifting

The reluctant hero never stood a chance. When her applause lines hit, up went the signs.

"The game is rigged," said Warren toward the end of her remarks. "We can whine about it, we can whimper about it, or we can fight back. I'm ready to fight back. Are you ready to fight back on this?"

Up went the signs, up went the chant: "Run, Liz, Run."

"Si'down," Warren chuckled. "Si'down."

But the story was already being told. The signs made it into write-ups by Politico, Huffington Post, McClatchy, and a Washington Post story about how "cracks are beginning to emerge" in the Clinton restoration's coalition.

The evidence for a left-wing challenge to Clinton that could defeat her is thin to nonexistent. Defeating Clinton wasn't even a theme at Netroots Nation, where in 2007 both Sens. Barack Obama and John Edwards clearly outpaced her in support. Anyone who could force Clinton to the left—on Wall Street, on bank reform, on student loans, on inequality—was worth talking about. Not far from where Warren was speaking, a D.C. activist named Edrie Irvine was sporting a Bernie Sanders for President 2016 shirt, and getting into conversations that assumed the Vermont senator could never win.

"I love my Bernie," said Irvine. "I want him to run not because I expect that he would ever win, but because he would force the conversation in a direction it might not otherwise go."

That's just it. Progressives want to change the party, which means more than choosing a president. (Several Netroots panels featured activists who had moved the Obama administration when it was acting too slowly on issues like immigration.) The institutions that created the online left were birthed by no-chance campaigns. MoveOn was founded in 1998 by Silicon Valley liberals who wanted Congress to stop short of impeaching Bill Clinton. "Censure," it said, "and move on." Howard Dean's 2004 campaign brought in a young generation of activists and techies, spawning some of the data and campaign companies that would elect Barack Obama.

Yet MoveOn lost its first fight. The Dean campaign lost every major primary. The lesson activists took away: Try something. The media, at least, is going to cover a primary threat more than it covers a sui generis student loan bill.

Thus the Warren "presidential campaign," a masterful branding and messaging exercise. In September 2013, the New York Times wrote an attention-getting profile of Warren's appeal to progressives, proven by the growing crowds for organizers wise enough to book her. "Bumper stickers and T-shirts surfacing in liberal enclaves proclaim, 'I'm from the Elizabeth Warren Wing of the Democratic Party.' " Jonathan Martin reported that those stickers were mass-produced by the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, which was founded in 2009 by Adam Green (a veteran of MoveOn and Democratic campaigns) and Stephanie Taylor (a veteran of the SEIU, AFL-CIO, and yes, MoveOn).

In its early years, the PCCC confounded Democrats, losing a run of primaries and buying ads to pressure red state Senate Democrats who were slow-walking the Affordable Care Act. The Warren brand—earned after the group signed up activists and donors for her nascent Senate bid—is self-evidently a way to move the conversation, whether or not anyone challenges Clinton. "We're going to make sure that every Democrat who runs for president is forced to say whether they agree with Elizabeth Warren on key issues," Green told the Boston Globe last year, "like expanding Social Security benefits and more Wall Street reform."

Green repeated that point at the Netroots conference, though he hardly needed to. Rep. Dan Kildee, a freshman Democrat from one of the new safe Michigan districts, said it was "clear" that any 2016 candidate had to cop from Warren.

"The basic premise, that we need to restore some balance in the equation between corporate interests and consumers—that's what she's done for a long time," he said, recalling how he'd cited her when he worked at a think tank. "More people should embrace it. It cuts across partisan lines. "

But he wasn't calling for a primary. The point was getting the next candidate to move where the Netroots crowd wanted her to move.

"Hillary Clinton is going to say these things," said former Rep. Brad Miller, a North Carolina Democrat who left his seat after a 2011 gerrymander. "Whoever our Democratic nominee is will run as an economic populist. When the pollsters and consultants come back with the numbers, they'll tell her: Holy crap, you may not have been a populist before, but you are one now! The problem will be credibility, and whether it's believable coming from someone who has close ties to the financial sector."

At the conference, for most attendees, Clinton was credible enough. A Ready for Hillary organizer pointed out that some of the people who applauded when they saw Warren at a nearby hotel were sporting Hillary gear. There was no mass boycott of the main Friday night party, sponsored by Ready for Hillary, held at a downtown music venue called St. Andrews, with the PAC's bus parked right outside. As guests arrived, they ran into a table loaded with PAC stickers ("I'm ready for Hillary") and the room-filling pop of KGB, a Motown cover band.

Activists born in the 1980s; music from the 1960s. Not the ideal metaphor for a Clinton campaign, but it got a PCCC leader tweeting that after "one more margarita" even he, too, would be ready for the Clintons.

I didn't find a true Clinton critic, actually, until the next night's after-party. It was hosted by the Alliance for American Manufacturing. (In a Saturday speech, the labor group's president, Scott Paul, had told activists to nominate "a woman who not only says the right thing but does the right thing.") At the party, I ran into the last guy who challenged Clinton from the left and lost. Jonathan Tasini, a writer and activist who ran against Clinton in the 2006 New York U.S. Senate race, was at least willing to muse about one of the progressive branding campaigns turning into an actual primary.

"Warren would have the best chance," he said. "Whenever [Hillary] opens her mouth, there's enough people who say: 'I just don't believe her.' "

But how many Democrats? In 2006, Tasini asked progressives to hold Clinton accountable for backing the Iraq War. She won the primary with 83 percent of the vote. And on this particular Saturday night, the Clinton agita was not too serious. On the way out of the party, Scott Paul spotted me and corrected the record on his quote—the one absolutely everyone interpreted as a call for Warren to run.

"I saw the tweet about that," he said. "I wasn't talking about Warren!"

Washington Examiner: "'Lost control': MSNBC hits Hillary Clinton for wrecking her personal Image"

By T. Becket Adams

July 22, 2014, 8:57 a.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has "lost control" of her public Image, a sorry place to be for someone who's reportedly considering a 2016 presidential bid, and she has no one to blame but herself, an MSNBC panel suggested Tuesday morning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Questions about whether Clinton has done irreparable harm to her Image began with "Morning Joe" co-host Mika Brzezinski citing a recent Politico survey that shows a majority of voters disapprove of how the former first lady performed as secretary of state.

The poll found that only 14 percent of voters rate Clinton's performance at state as “excellent,” while 28 percent rate her performance as “good,” 21 percent rate it as “fair” and 32 percent rate it as “poor.”

“[I]t's a major change from a year-and-a-half ago when the then-secretary of state had a 70 percent approval rating,” Brzezinski said, noting a separate Bloomberg article that reported Clinton has made roughly $12 million since stepping down from state in February 2013.

Co-panelist and political analyst Mark Halperin weighed in on the issue: “She has lost control of her public Image. It's the worst thing that can happen to somebody thinking of running for president, and it's at a time when she should be in command. You know, she had a book tour, she can control the message,” he said.

“Her operation is playing defense on a lot of stories and, again, it's fine. She can recover from it. But right now, she has lost control of how people are thinking about her, how the media is covering her."

The Clinton machine, for its part, claims that much of the negative press surrounding the former secretary of state is either uninteresting or simply untrue. Meanwhile, Clinton's tour promoting her new book, Hard Choices, continues apace, providing the media with one wealth-related gaffe after another.

“Would it have been better -- in hindsight -- if Hillary Clinton had not written this book and gone on a book tour?” co-panelist Willie Geist asked. “Because look where she was when she was out of the fray: No one was talking about her in terms of politics, just in terms of how she had done as secretary of state.”

President Obama and Secretary Kerry have been persistent and determined in pursuit of this goal, building on a decade of bipartisan pressure and diplomacy. Getting the rest of the way to a final deal by June won't be easy, but it is absolutely crucial. I know well that the devil is always in the details in this kind of negotiation. So I strongly support President Obama and Secretary Kerry's efforts between now and June to reach a final deal that verifiably cuts off all of Iran's paths to a nuclear weapon, imposes an intrusive inspection program with no sites off limits, extends breakout time, and spells out clear and overwhelming consequences for violations. The onus is on Iran and the bar must be set high. It can never be permitted to acquire a nuclear weapon. It is also vital that these efforts be part of a comprehensive strategy to check Iran's regional ambitions, defend our allies and partners, and reinforce American leadership in the Middle East. There is much to do and much more to say in the months ahead, but for now diplomacy deserves a chance to succeed.

Hillary Clinton adds top digital talent to campaign-in-waiting (The Washington Post)
By Philip Rucker
March 25, 2015
The Washington Post

Hillary Rodham Clinton has added some of the Democratic Party's most experienced digital strategists to her team of political advisers as she gets ready to launch her 2016 presidential campaign.

Teddy Goff, the digital director of President Obama's 2012 reelection campaign, is advising the Clinton campaign-in-waiting on its digital strategy, while longtime Clinton aide Katie Dowd is on board to be the campaign's digital director with Jenna Lowenstein as her deputy, according to several Democrats with knowledge of the moves.

Andrew Bleeker, a digital marketing guru and veteran of Obama's 2008 and 2012 campaigns, also could join the Clinton campaign in an advisory role, according to the sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the Clinton team's staffing decisions.

Goff is expected to serve as a top adviser for digital strategy to the Clinton campaign, which would enable him to continue running his private business. Dowd, who is widely respected in the Clinton orbit as a skilled manager and has a personal relationship with the former secretary of state, will be on staff overseeing the campaign's day-to-day digital operations. And Lowenstein, who has been vice president of digital at Emily's List, one of the outside groups laying the groundwork for Clinton's candidacy, would join the staff as deputy digital director.

In 2008, the Obama team pioneered the use of new technologies for political campaigns while the Clinton campaign struggled to keep up. Now, two cycles later, Clinton is the overwhelming favorite for the Democratic nomination and has her pick from the party's deep bench of digital talent, which includes alumni of Obama's innovative campaigns.

During his 2012 stint, Goff led a staff of 250 and oversaw the Obama campaign's social media outreach, online advertising and fundraising, and product development and design. He managed state-level digital efforts in more than 25 battleground states during Obama's 2008 campaign. Goff is a partner at Precision Strategies, a firm he co-founded with Obama campaign veterans Stephanie Cutter and Jennifer O'Malley Dillon.

Bleeker is another Obama world star, having overseen digital marketing strategy on the president's 2008 and 2012 campaigns. He founded Bully Pulpit Interactive, a digital firm that advises corporations as well as political campaigns, and worked for Clinton's 2008 campaign.

Dowd has been Clinton's director of digital strategy at the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation. She served as new media director on Clinton's 2008 campaign and followed Clinton to the State Department, where she worked as an innovation adviser running Foggy Bottom's digital diplomacy efforts. She also worked at the White House as senior adviser to the U.S. chief technology officer.

Lowenstein joins the Clinton team from Emily's List, which helps elect Democratic women who support abortion rights. She is credited with expanding the group's reach on social media and breaking its online fundraising records in the 2014 midterm campaign cycle. Emily's List is preparing to play a major role supporting Clinton from the outside and earlier this month honored her at its 30th anniversary gala. Lowenstein previously has served as deputy digital director for the Democratic National Committee and for Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe's 2013 campaign.

In partnership with the Clinton Foundation, the University of Arkansas Clinton School of Public Service in Little Rock will hold an event called "Empowering Women and Girls: Amplify Your Voice" on Monday.

No Ceilings: The Full Participation Project is a Clinton Foundation initiative led by former Secretary of State and U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Chelsea Clinton to inspire and advance the full participation of women and girls around the world. Earlier this month, the Clinton Foundation unveiled the "Full Participation Report," presenting the most complete picture of the status of women's participation since the 1995 United Nations' Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing.

Participants include Arkansas Children's Hospital President and Chief Executive Officer Marcy Doderer; Wal-Mart Senior Director of Women's Economic Empowerment Beth Keck; Director of No Ceilings: The Full Participation Project Terri McCullough; Chief Executive Officer of YWCA USA Dara Richardson-Heron; and founder and Executive Director of KIPP Delta Public Schools Scott Shirey.

Round 1: Hillary Clinton vs. Liberal Ideas (TIME)
By Haley Sweetland Edwards
March 24, 2015
TIME

Hillary Clinton does not face a serious primary challenger for the Democratic nomination in 2016, but that isn't stopping some liberals from putting together the trappings for one.

The handful of Democrats who have expressed interest in challenging Clinton — Sen. Bernie Sanders, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb — are all polling double digits behind her and raising minimal funds. None have the kind of name recognition that could seriously threaten her inevitable march to the nomination.

But that's not stopping some on the left from trying their hand at the classic primary squeeze play of raising issues in the primary in an effort to persuade her to adopt them.

Over the weekend, during his first foray into the early caucus state of Iowa, O'Malley called for tougher sanctions on Wall Street and "too-big-to-fail" banks, and for reinstating Glass-Steagall, a law that separated commercial and investment banking which was repealed in 1999. He also called for strongly supporting the long-embattled Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act, which was passed in 2010 response to the financial crisis.

"Today, most Republicans in Congress are hell-bent on disassembling the Dodd-Frank Act," O'Malley's PAC, O'Say Can You See, wrote in a press release Monday, along with a link to a petition. "And too many Democrats have been complicit in the backslide toward less regulation."

O'Malley's populist swing came the same weekend that the Boston Globe featured a splashy package begging Massachusetts Senator and liberal hero Elizabeth Warren to run for president. "Democrats need Elizabeth Warren's Voice in the 2016 presidential race," the editorial board urged. (The idea is not totally out of left field, as it were. Though Warren has said repeatedly that she is not running for president, she has been somewhat cagey about it. She studiously uses the present tense — "I am not running for president" — and has yet to endorse a Clinton candidacy.)

This week, the Progressive Change Campaign Committee also re-upped its ongoing effort to motivate liberals to challenge Clinton's famously Wall Street-friendly economic positions. Liberals should join New Hampshire and Iowa leaders in urging candidates to "campaign on big, bold, economic populist ideas," the PCCC urged. "The more momentum we get, the more Hillary Clinton and others will take notice."

So what's all this clamoring, calling-to-arms actually add up to?

Liberal optimists argue that it's the only thing that will help scooch Clinton to the left at a time when she's already planning her general election strategy. They believe that Clinton will adopt some of their positions in order to win the full-throated endorsement of key liberals such as Warren who she'll need to rally the base in 2016.

Liberal pessimisists say it's all for naught. Without a face to put on these ideas — or even a name on a ballot — the left won't have enough clout to persuade Clinton to change course. Even if she doesn't adopt any of their ideas, Clinton could still rally the liberal base in the general election because she'd be the first female president, by adopting other liberal planks or by running against the right Republican.

Rift in Bush camp illustrates Israel's high profile in 2016 race (The Washington Post)
By Anne Gearan and Ed O'Keefe
March 25, 2015
The Washington Post

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush on Tuesday disavowed criticism of Israel levied by longtime family counselor and former secretary of state James A. Baker III - laying bare a problem faced by the entire 2016 presidential field.

Israel, and U.S. policy toward it, has become an intensely partisan issue with serious implications for Jewish voters, campaign fundraising and foreign policy.

For Republicans seeking office, almost any critique of Israel has become taboo. That doesn't leave much leverage for diplomacy if a Republican wins the White House.

And for presumed Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton, the tough line that President Obama is taking with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu forces her hand. Clinton is in the awkward spot of appearing to side against Netanyahu or against the president she served as secretary of state.

"Frankly, I have been disappointed with the lack of progress regarding a lasting peace - and I have been for some time," Baker told a left-leaning audience Monday night, according to news reports of his speech.

He added that "in the aftermath of Netanyahu's recent election victory, the chance of a two-state solution seems even slimmer, given his reversal on the issue."

That put Baker - a longtime friend of the Bush family and an unpaid adviser to Jeb Bush's expected presidential campaign - alongside Obama and firmly outside the Republican wagon circle.

Baker was notably critical of comments Netanyahu made in the closing hours of his reelection campaign last week, when the prime minister suggested that he no longer supported a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Netanyahu has since backtracked, with limited effect.

Obama on Tuesday said he took Netanyahu "at his word" and was openly skeptical that the Israeli leader would support an independent state for Palestinians.

Ilan Goldenberg, director of the Middle East Security Program at the Center for a New American Security and a former Obama administration Mideast policy aide, said Netanyahu's speech to Congress this month crystallized the growing partisan divide.

Republicans invited Netanyahu over White House disapproval, and Democrats accused Republicans of colluding with Netanyahu to sabotage nuclear diplomacy with Iran.

"The fact that Netanyahu has become such a hero to them, and that the whole confrontation has such a partisan tinge to it, just exacerbates a division that was not there" to the same degree in past elections, Goldenberg said.

Clinton has not addressed Netanyahu's remarks or the White House reaction to them. She is on record supporting the diplomatic outreach to Iran that undergirds the current U.S.-Israeli tension.

[For Hillary and Bibi, a long and fraught relationship]

As Obama sought to do Tuesday, candidate Clinton will no doubt stress the ongoing strength of U.S. support for Israel despite policy differences with its leader. In the short term, she will probably try to avoid criticizing Netanyahu directly, according to analysts and Democrats involved in outreach to Jewish voters.

"Hillary Clinton as both a candidate and as president would put serious effort into healing the rift between the United states and Israel," said Jon Alterman, director of the Middle East Program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

If the rift continues, Clinton may seek to distance herself from Obama's stance. That is because any tension with Israel makes many Jewish Democrats squeamish and because she would want to pave the way toward better relations with Netanyahu if she wins.

Baker has been an outspoken advocate for the former Florida governor's likely White House bid. Bush touted

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Baker's support last month when he announced a 21-member foreign policy advisory team that is counseling him as he prepares to run for president.

Baker has also long supported peace negotiations that would require concessions from Israel and the Palestinians. As secretary of state to Jeb Bush's father, George H.W. Bush, in 1990, Baker famously told off Israel for stiff-arming U.S. efforts to broker talks.

"When you're serious about peace, call us," Baker said, addressing the Israeli leadership from afar at a congressional hearing. "The phone number is 202-456-1414," he added. Then and now, the number reaches the White House switchboard.

Baker's views are now out of step with Republican primary campaign orthodoxy, if not with many actual Republican general-election voters.

Baker spoke Monday night at a conference hosted by J Street, an advocacy group focused on U.S.-Israel relations and support of negotiations toward a Palestinian state.

Spokeswoman Kristy Campbell said in a statement that Bush "respects Secretary Baker, he disagrees with the sentiments he expressed last night and opposes J Street's advocacy. Governor Bush's support for Israel and Prime Minister Netanyahu is unwavering, and he believes it's critically important our two nations work seamlessly to achieve peace in the region."

Bush, who said he has visited Israel five times, has repeatedly expressed support for Netanyahu and for Israel. He tweeted congratulations last week to Netanyahu on his reelection.

Other Republicans see the current division as a way to criticize Obama and burnish their own pro-Israel credentials. Announcing his presidential bid at Liberty University on Monday, Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) drew long applause criticizing Obama on Israel.

"Instead of a president who boycotts Prime Minister Netanyahu, imagine a president who stands unapologetically with Israel," Cruz said.

Another possible Republican contender, Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), said on the Senate floor last week that Obama is making a "historic mistake."

"Allies have differences, but allies like Israel, when you have a difference with them and it is public, it emboldens their enemies," Rubio said.

The sharp critiques could help Republican contenders win over some of the party's most influential donors. Many top contributors will assemble in Las Vegas next month for the annual spring meeting of the Republican Jewish Coalition, which touted Netanyahu's appearance before Congress last month. Cruz, former Texas governor Rick Perry, Sen. Rob Portman of Ohio and Gov. Mike Pence of Indiana are scheduled to address the gathering, as is former president George W. Bush.

Staunch support for Israel is a prime motivator for major GOP donors such as Sheldon Adelson and Norman Braman. Rubio visited Israel with Braman, a wealthy car dealer who is expected to give a Rubio-aligned super PAC as much as $10 million if the fundraising group is formed.

Hillary Clinton Caught Between Dueling Forces on Education: Teachers and Wealthy Donors (The New York Times)
By Maggie Haberman
March 25, 2015
The New York Times

The last time she ran for president, Hillary Rodham Clinton did not have to take a position on the Common Core, Race to the Top or teacher evaluations in tenure decisions.

She won the endorsement of one of the nation's largest teachers' unions in 2007 after deploring the use of standardized tests and the underfunding of the No Child Left Behind law by President George W. Bush's administration.

Now, as she prepares for a likely second run at the White House, Mrs. Clinton is re-entering the fray like a Rip Van Winkle for whom the terrain on education standards has shifted markedly, with deep new fissures in the Democratic Party.

Already, she is being pulled in opposite directions on education. The pressure is from not only the teachers who supported her once and are widely expected to back her again, but also from a group of wealthy and influential Democratic financiers who staunchly support many of the same policies -- charter schools and changes to teacher tenure and testing -- that the teachers' unions have resisted throughout President Obama's two terms in office.

And the financiers say they want Mrs. Clinton to declare herself.

''This is an issue that's important to a lot of Democratic donors,'' said John Petry, a hedge fund manager who was a founder of the Harlem Success Academy, a New York charter school. ''Donors want to hear where she stands.''

The growing pressure on education points out a deeper problem that Mrs. Clinton will have to contend with repeatedly, at least until the Iowa caucuses: On a number of divisive domestic issues that flared up during the Obama administration -- trade pacts, regulation of Wall Street, tax policy -- she will face dueling demands from centrists and the liberal base of the Democratic Party.

Her allies believe that with no strong primary opponent to force her into the open, Mrs. Clinton has plenty of time to maneuver before taking sides. But advocates will be using what leverage they possess to draw her out sooner.

Mr. Petry said there were many other political contests where wealthy Democrats who favor sweeping changes to education -- including a more businesslike approach, and tying teacher tenure to performance as measured by student scores -- could focus their resources next year instead, including congressional, state and local races.

Some progressives already view Mrs. Clinton as overly cozy with Wall Street. And should she align herself with the elite donors who favor an education overhaul, many of them heavyweights in the investment world, it could inflame the liberal Democratic base.

The outcome is particularly important for advocates of an overhaul, whose movement has faced growing opposition the past few years. Political crosswinds have whipped up from both the right and the left, particularly over the Common Core education standards that more than 40 states have put in place, but also over Race to the Top, the Obama administration's program to reward school districts that improve, using measurements that union leaders often find controversial. Reform proponents include donors, but also a cross section of parents and business advocates.

Jeb Bush, a likely Republican presidential candidate, has been a staunch supporter of the Common Core, but other contenders in his party have railed against it.

And in Chicago, Mayor Rahm Emanuel, a Democratic proponent of education overhaul, is battling to survive an April 7 runoff in his bid for a second term. Mr. Emanuel closed dozens of underperforming schools, many of them in predominantly black neighborhoods, and had an angry run-in with a leader of the city teachers' union.

Not surprisingly, supporters of an education overhaul speak apprehensively about Mrs. Clinton's longstanding friendship with Randi Weingarten, the president of the American Federation of Teachers, which endorsed her in 2007.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

‘‘I hope she sees this as a winning political issue,’’ said Whitney Tilson, manager of Kase Capital and a board member of Democrats for Education Reform, a leading left-of-center advocacy group on the subject.

But he said he was concerned: ‘‘She has had more longstanding ties to the teachers’ union, certainly, than Obama ever had. She’s thrown some bones to both sides and I think is sort of trying to triangulate on this.’’

In another sign of that anxiety, the executive director of Democrats for Education Reform, Joe Williams, recently circulated a memo to its board members highlighting the ‘‘strong ally’’ the group has had in the White House over the past six years and describing the ‘‘stiff pushback’’ the group and its allies are now facing.

Presumably in an attempt to set the terms for a policy discussion with Mrs. Clinton and other candidates, the memo said the group had commissioned polling showing that ‘‘voters support our policies, and if candidates want to meet voters where they are, they should, too,’’ according to a copy obtained from a recipient.

Mr. Williams concluded, ‘‘Democratic candidates who support education reform are representative of where the American people are, and those who want to roll back progress risk becoming outliers.’’

Mr. Williams noted that the polling had been conducted by Benenson Strategy Group, founded by Joel Benenson, whom Mrs. Clinton had recently retained as chief strategist. An official at the firm said research had been done before it was hired by Mrs. Clinton and had not been conducted by Mr. Benenson himself.

Still, Mr. Benenson, who was Mr. Obama’s pollster, would be familiar with how the issue played out in the 2012 campaign, when Mitt Romney accused Mr. Obama of being too close to teachers’ unions, and Mr. Obama’s advisers saw his support for changes to education as an asset against Mr. Romney, a businessman.

In fact, Mr. Obama’s ties with teachers’ unions have grown increasingly toxic. Union leaders complained that his administration did not listen to them, and anger over the use of test scores to gauge success boiled over last year when the head of the largest union, the National Education Association, called on Education Secretary Arne Duncan to resign.

Mrs. Clinton intends to listen to both sides, according to her advisers.

‘‘I think it will be different than the Obama administration in the sense that both the teachers’ union and the reformers will really feel like they have her ear in a way they haven’t,’’ said Ann O’Leary, a onetime aide to Mrs. Clinton in the Senate and now a senior vice president at Next Generation, a group involved with the Clinton Foundation on an education initiative.

‘‘She believes we need to have some kind of ways that we can measure student progress,’’ Ms. O’Leary said. But she said Mrs. Clinton was ‘‘also sympathetic that the test regime has become very burdensome in driving the education system in ways that many people think is problematic.’’

Mrs. Clinton will at least not have to establish credibility on the subject.

Her involvement with efforts to overhaul education dates back at least to the early 1980s, when her husband named her co-chairwoman of an Arkansas committee that called for a teacher-competency test, smaller classes and a higher dropout age. As a senator, she voted for No Child Left Behind in 2001, but later attacked the law, saying it was failing children.

Her association with Ms. Weingarten of the American Federation of Teachers began when Ms. Weingarten was a local union leader in New York and Mrs. Clinton was the state’s junior senator. Yet her incoming campaign chairman, John D. Podesta, has been a charter school supporter.

In an interview, Ms. Weingarten suggested that those she termed ‘‘the so-called education reformers’’ were most worried that the agenda they have pushed for with the Obama administration, and in places like Chicago, ‘‘does not work.’’

But she rejected the idea that Mrs. Clinton would set policy based on anything other than ‘‘her experience and the evidence.’’

‘‘She has been versed in these issues for a long time, and will give everyone a fair hearing and a fair shot, but she will look at it through the lens of what’s good for kids. Period,’’ Ms. Weingarten said. ‘‘Anybody who thinks otherwise just doesn’t know her.’’

Trading Favors: Why the GOP is Helping Hillary Clinton (The Atlantic)
By Russell Berman
March 25, 2015
The Atlantic

Improbable as it may sound, House Republicans are on the verge of approving, without much fanfare, a major priority of Hillary Clinton's.

When Clinton ran for president in 2008, she touted her role as first lady in "designing and championing" the Children's Health Insurance Program, or CHIP, which provided coverage for millions of children whose parents did not qualify for Medicaid but could not afford private insurance. At the time President Clinton signed the law in 1997, it constituted the largest expansion of government-funded children's health insurance since the enactment of Medicaid in 1965.

On Tuesday, Republicans unveiled legislation that would extend CHIP for another two years, without spending cuts or changes of any kind. The program's funding is due to expire at the end of September, making this an unusual case of Congress moving to act well in advance of a deadline. You won't hear much about the CHIP extension from Republicans, however. They are supporting it to gain Democratic backing for one of Speaker John Boehner's top goals: a package that permanently prevents steep cuts in Medicare payments to doctors and institutes a few long-sought reforms to the entitlement program. The so-called "doc fix" is an annual headache for both parties, and repealing it for good has commanded most of the attention inside the Beltway. Yet extending funding for children's health insurance is equally significant, and its inclusion in the bill represents a rare bipartisan breakthrough, as well as a sign that the nation's improved fiscal footing is helping to ease the gridlock in Congress.

That Republicans might extend CHIP is a testament to its popularity. After 18 years on the books, the program is an accepted component of the social safety net. Health policy experts say it has succeeded in its original goal of providing coverage to more than half of the nation's uninsured children. And when congressional leaders asked governors last year what to do with the program, both Republican and Democratic state leaders urged them to continue it, said Ron Pollack, the executive director of FamiliesUSA. CHIP's trajectory is a mark of hope for supporters of Obamacare—and a reason for fear among conservatives. The longer a government program endures, the more popular it becomes, and the harder it is to eliminate it.

Still, there's a crucial difference between CHIP and the Affordable Care Act, aside from the much broader scope of the 2010 overhaul. "The Children's Health Insurance Program has, from its origination, been a bipartisan program," Pollack noted. In Congress, it was the brainchild of the late Senator Ted Kennedy and Senator Orrin Hatch, a Republican of Utah who now heads the Finance Committee. Hillary Clinton, just three years removed from her failed bid to shepherd universal health care into law, championed the more limited insurance expansion from the White House. It was ultimately included in a larger budget deal that Republicans passed and President Clinton signed in 1997. A decade later, Hillary Clinton drew some criticism for embellishing her role in the program's passage, given that she stayed mostly behind the scenes after stumbling on health care earlier in her husband's tenure. "Success has more than one set of parents in the political arena," Pollack said. "Clearly, she played a significant role."

Count on Clinton to tout CHIP again during her 2016 presidential run, especially considering the bipartisan effort it took to create it. Along with Bill Frist, the Republican former Senate majority leader, Clinton co-authored an op-ed last month in The New York Times urging Congress to extend the program. "This is an opportunity to send a message that Washington is still capable of making common-sense progress for American families," they wrote.

"As 2015 unfolds, we know Congress will continue to debate the future of health care reform. We most likely won't see eye to eye about some of the more contentious questions. But one thing everyone should be able to agree on is that our most vulnerable children shouldn't be caught in the crossfire."
While CHIP began as a bipartisan program, it did not escape the ideological battles of the last decade over healthcare. President George W. Bush signed the first reauthorization in 2007, but only for two years and only after vetoing two Democratic attempts to expand it. President Obama signed the expansion shortly after taking office, despite opposition from most Republicans. The Affordable Care Act extended the program again through this coming September.

Given CHIP's popularity, conservative fiscal hawks didn't realistically expect the GOP Congress to let funding completely run out in September, but they hoped Republicans would demand reforms to the program, starting with a roll-back of its expansion under Obama. “I don’t think there’s any doubt that Republicans and Democrats have sort of accepted that CHIP is here,” said Dan Holler, spokesman for Heritage Action, a conservative group frequently at odds with Boehner. Heritage’s main objection to the $200 billion Medicare deal is that it will add significantly to the deficit, but Holler also said Republicans “missed a huge opportunity” to reform CHIP.

An even bigger fear, Holler said, is that Boehner’s deal with Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi will set a precedent for future big-spending agreements with Democrats. After facing revolt after revolt from conservatives, the speaker changed course when it came to fixing the Medicare reimbursement rate. As National Journal’s Daniel Newhauser reported, Boehner went first to Pelosi to strike a deal, not to his right flank. Congress faces another set of deadlines on the debt ceiling and the Highway Trust Fund in the coming months, and with the improving economy helping to bring down the deficit, more bipartisan deals could come as lawmakers loosen the federal pursestrings. Instead of fighting over how which programs to cut, Democrats and Republicans may strike more bargains in which they agree to fund each other’s priorities.

Boehner hasn’t publicly discussed the children’s health program extension, but a House Republican leadership aide noted that the deal was only for two years, not the four that Democrats wanted. That could give Republicans time to enact reforms that would be implemented by the next president. “By extending CHIP, this bill would keep more than three million people from being uninsured or enrolling in the Obamacare exchanges over the next decade,” the aide said. While the bill is seen as likely to pass the House this week, Democrats in the Senate could put up a fight over the length of the extension or abortion provisions tucked into the legislation.

For advocates like Pollack, the quicker the measure passes, the better—in part because of concerns that a Clinton campaign could complicate things. If Hillary is out on the stump demanding that Congress reauthorize CHIP, support among Republicans could disappear, especially with increased pressure from conservatives. “It’s fair to say,” Holler noted, “that Hillary Clinton’s healthcare legacy is being extended in this deal.”

Obama Draws on Tight Circle for Adviser (The New York Times)
By Michael D. Shear
March 25, 2015
The New York Times

WASHINGTON -- Shailagh Murray, a former political reporter who has spent the last four years as a senior adviser to the vice president, will move to the West Wing as the top message strategist for President Obama, the White House announced on Tuesday.

Ms. Murray will replace Dan Pfeiffer as one of the president's senior advisers, and will help coordinate the president's agenda during the final two years of his term. In a statement, Mr. Obama called her an ''invaluable asset'' to Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr.

''For four years, I've relied on Shailagh Murray's strategic advice and keen ability to cut through the Washington noise to focus on what matters to everyday Americans,'' Mr. Obama said. ''I'm proud to have her as a senior adviser.''

In addition to bringing Ms. Murray to the White House, the president also announced the hiring of Jason Goldman, an early executive for companies like Twitter and Medium, as the chief digital officer of the White House, focusing on the use of social media to advance the president's message.

Mr. Goldman was formerly head of product at Twitter and served on the company's board of directors. He also worked at Google.

In the statement, Mr. Obama said that Mr. Goldman ''brings new energy and coveted expertise as someone who's helped shape the digital age. Our mission is to use every single tool available to ensure that all Americans can contribute to and benefit from our American resurgence.''

Ms. Murray's office will be just down the hall from the Oval Office, in a place previously occupied by David Axelrod and David Plouffe, the chief architects of Mr. Obama's White House campaigns.

In the last several years, Mr. Pfeiffer had aggressively pursued ways to broaden the White House's reach beyond the traditional media. He had Mr. Obama appear on Internet-only comedy sites, and post important announcements first on Twitter and other sites.

Ms. Murray's charge will be to find a way to keep Mr. Obama on offense even as the national spotlight shifts from the White House to the 2016 presidential campaign. White House officials said they believed that dynamic could be an opportunity for the president to pursue his agenda aggressively.

Stephanie Cutter, a former senior adviser to Mr. Obama who helped run his 2012 re-election campaign and has known Ms. Murray for the better part of two decades, said she had an ability to get to the point of any issue.

''There is going to be a natural shift in attention to the 2016 campaign and away from the White House that happens at the end of any administration, and that will be a challenge,'' Ms. Cutter said, ''but Shailagh understands how to cut through the clutter to reach the American people.''

In selecting Ms. Murray, 49, Mr. Obama is turning to a trusted aide to Mr. Biden with whom the president also has a warm rapport. That is a well-established pattern for Mr. Obama, who is most comfortable among a tight circle of familiar advisers.

As some of his closest aides have left the White House in recent days to join the nascent presidential campaign of Hillary Rodham Clinton, Mr. Obama has held to that approach.

He named Brian Deese, who has served in the administration since Mr. Obama took office, as a senior adviser, replacing John D. Podesta, who is expected become chairman of Mrs. Clinton's campaign. And he selected Jen Psaki, a spokeswoman for both of his White House bids, to take over for Jennifer Palmieri, the communications director who departed last week to take that post for Mrs. Clinton.

But if Ms. Murray does not bring new blood, people close to the president said, she may offer some fresh perspectives on how to get Mr. Obama's message across in an increasingly complex and competitive media environment.

''She understands the old media well, and I think it's an asset to have someone inside who comes from that background, but she also has a very deep appreciation for new media and for innovative ways to get a message across, and I think that's going to be very, very valuable for the president,'' Mr. Axelrod, Mr. Obama's longtime communications guru, said.

He added, ''She's someone who has been totally willing to level with the people she's working for and tell them what they needed to know, not in an obstreperous way, but in a clear and forceful way.''

As a reporter, Ms. Murray covered Congress for The Washington Post and The Wall Street Journal, and covered political campaigns in 2006, 2008 and 2010. She joined the White House in 2011 as Mr. Biden's communications director and was promoted to deputy chief of staff two years later.

Ms. Murray will start next week.

Would Hillary Clinton inherit Obama's black voter enthusiasm? (CNN)
By David Love
March 25, 2015
CNN

Hillary Clinton held a closed door meeting with President Barack Obama at the White House on Monday. Although the former secretary of state, senator and first lady has not declared, it is treated as a foregone conclusion that Clinton is running for president.

Likely to launch her campaign in April, Clinton is regarded as the front-runner — if not the only Democratic candidate — and the inevitable Democratic nominee.

There is an assumption that since Clinton supported Obama, the black community will now embrace her. But there are more than a few who didn't get that memo. At this stage of the game, many African-Americans may not be excited about a candidate Hillary Clinton in 2016. And after two terms of the nation's first black president, she should proceed with caution.

Clinton need look no further than the 2008 contest, when black voters doused water on her presidential prospects. Early on, Clinton was the favorite of black folks, lest you forgot, and it did not hurt that President Clinton had been regarded as the "first black president" with high approval among African-Americans.

Then, support for a senator named Barack Obama blew up after the Iowa caucuses. And Clinton found herself apologizing for her husband's comments about Obama's win in the South Carolina primary.

President Clinton was relieved of his black card privileges for the remainder of the 2008 election season when he compared Obama's win in the Palmetto state to that of Jesse Jackson in 2004 and 2008, suggesting that Obama, like Jackson, would not win. The misstep was an affront to many African-Americans, as were Hillary Clinton's suggestions on the campaign trail that Obama was only good for making speeches, but not for taking action.

And let's not forget her assertions that she was the candidate for "hard-working Americans, white Americans."

We can chalk up some of that rhetoric to spirited campaign-trail junk-talking, and obviously much has happened since the 2008 election. President Obama made Clinton his secretary of state, and she served as a capable top diplomat and a loyal member of the Obama Cabinet. But that does not mean black voters will completely forget the bitter, racially tinged presidential campaign politics of seven years ago.

Black voters are among the most loyal of the Democratic Party base, and their record high turnout for Obama was an important part of his victory. However, with a charismatic Obama no longer on the ballot, maintaining the same level of enthusiasm for any other candidate is a challenge.

Moreover, as for Clinton, who (understandably?) has her own ideas and may not agree with the President on certain issues, any criticism of Obama could cost her some black voters. Remember that Clinton voted in favor of the unpopular, costly and deadly Iraq war. That support cost Clinton in 2008. And while she has remained silent on the recent re-election of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Clinton's strongly pro-Israel stance on Mideast peace now appears at odds with the emerging consensus among major groups in the Democratic base, including blacks, Latinos and young voters.

However, it is likely that foreign policy will not pose as great a challenge to Hillary Clinton as economics. Because she is tied to the Wall Street wing of her party and commands sky-high speaking fees, people may take a closer look at her approach to tackling inequality and the shrinking of the middle class, and whether she is too concerned about offending the wealthy. The nation is hurting, despite the economic turnaround, and this is felt particularly strongly among blacks, who still have high unemployment rates, a rising wealth gap compared to whites, and, for many, no recovery in sight.

And while police shootings of young black men continue to stir outrage in the community, Clinton has remained relatively quiet on the subject. She will have to prove that she can identify with this frustration and offer ideas for reform in local law enforcement. This, rather than her email account, is what concerns the black electorate.

Perhaps a populist, more down-to-earth challenger such as Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren or former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb could appeal to black and working-class voters, and unlike Clinton, would not have to fight the perception of living in a protective security bubble, or lacking core beliefs other than being in power.

It is safe to assume that if Clinton wins the Democratic nomination that she will ultimately win the majority black vote in the general election, but that may not be enough. Let's remember President George W. Bush won re-election in 2004 with just 11% of the black vote. Had Mitt Romney been able to duplicate that number of black votes, he would be president now.

Obama won in no small part because blacks turned out for him in record numbers in 2012, particularly in swing states like Ohio.

Clinton can't assume she'll inherit that same level of black voter enthusiasm. Support for Barack Obama does not necessarily translate into support for another Democrat. This means Clinton must fight for votes like anyone else: knock on doors, kiss babies, clap off beat at the AME church, and do whatever it takes.

Clinton Tenure Lacked Top Watchdog --- The State Department had no permanent inspector general during her time as secretary (The Wall Street Journal)

By Byron Tau and Peter Nicholas
The Wall Street Journal

The State Department had no permanent inspector general -- the lead watchdog charged with uncovering misconduct and waste -- during Hillary Clinton's entire tenure as secretary, leaving in place an acting inspector who had close ties to State Department leadership.

President Barack Obama didn't put forward a nominee to lead the inspector general's office while Mrs. Clinton led the State Department, making it the only agency with a presidentially appointed inspector general that had neither a confirmed nor nominated head watchdog during that full time period.

Five months after Mrs. Clinton left office, Mr. Obama nominated a permanent inspector general, who was confirmed by the Senate three months later.

The lack of a confirmed inspector general raises questions about oversight of the department under Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton. The department has been criticized for its failure to gather and archive the email records of Mrs. Clinton and other officials and for responses to public-record requests that lawmakers and advocacy groups say were insufficient, including its response to requests for information from a congressional panel investigating the 2012 terror attack in Benghazi, Libya.

The vacancy in the top watchdog spot left the State Department with no confirmed inspector general for more than five years, the longest gap since the position was created in 1957, according to department records. While other agencies have had no permanent inspectors general at various points in recent years, some of those vacancies were due to a lack of confirmation by the Senate on nominees put forward by Mr. Obama.

Is isn't clear whether Mrs. Clinton had any role in the lack of a nomination.

The acting inspector general, Harold Geisel, had served in a variety of roles, including U.S. ambassador to Mauritius in Bill Clinton's administration and in a State Department job under Richard Nixon. Because he was a longtime foreign-service officer, Mr. Geisel was banned from becoming permanent inspector general, a prohibition to ensure that oversight is conducted by people who don't have ties to the departments they investigate.

"It's a convenient way to prevent oversight," said Matthew Harris, a University of Maryland University College professor who has worked in law enforcement and researches inspectors general. Acting inspectors general "don't feel empowered; they don't have the backing of their people."

Rep. Ed Royce (R., Calif.), chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, said Mr. Geisel's role as a Clinton administration ambassador undercut his status as a watchdog.

"We did not believe he could be truly independent. We raised the issue," Mr. Royce said. He said an independent inspector would likely have uncovered and raised objections to Mrs. Clinton's use of a private email account and computer server for official correspondence.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, Nick Merrill, said Mr. Geisel "was a career official spanning Republican and Democratic administrations alike, independent and hard-hitting." A spokesman for the State Department said Mr. Geisel led a team that "conducted more investigations between 2007 and 2012 than the IG had under his predecessor."

The White House declined to elaborate on the reason for the lack of an appointment. A White House spokesman said the inspector general's office issued more than 450 reports while there was no permanent head.

Mr. Geisel, assuming his tenure would be short-lived, said he did little to decorate his office. "I never even put up a picture," he said in an interview. After his five-year stint, the State Department gave him a paid temporary assignment reviewing staffing conditions at outposts in Egypt and Nairobi, Mr. Geisel said.

Designed to be isolated from political pressure, inspectors general are tasked with uncovering waste, fraud, abuse and mismanagement of federal agencies. The State Department office has a large staff that conducts audits and investigations.

During Mr. Geisel's tenure, members of Congress and watchdog groups raised questions about his distance from top leadership at the State Department.

The nonpartisan Project On Government Oversight said Mr. Geisel had an unduly close relationship with Patrick F. Kennedy, the department's undersecretary for management, a top post. In a 2010 letter to the White House, the group cited friendly emails between the two as evidence of a close relationship, as well as the fact that Mr. Geisel recused himself from an investigation into a situation involving Mr. Kennedy during his tenure.

Asked whether he believed he was compromised in his ability to do his job, Mr. Geisel said: "My work absolutely speaks for itself." He described his mission as "telling the truth that needs to be told, which may not be the truth that people want to hear."

One person who worked in the office from 2009 to 2013, Evelyn Klemstine, spoke highly of Mr. Geisel. "I personally never felt that he inhibited any of the audits that we did," she said.

U.S. visa official faulted; Homeland Security's No. 2 leader created appearance of special access, a report says. (Los Angeles Times)
By Joseph Tanfani
March 25, 2015
Los Angeles Times

The No. 2 official at the Homeland Security Department intervened several times in projects with connections to insiders, including Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe and a brother of Hillary Rodham Clinton, according to a report issued by the department's watchdog Tuesday.

Alejandro Mayorkas, while head of the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, created an "appearance of favoritism" in a program that offers visas to wealthy foreigners willing to invest in American companies, the report says, though it stops short of saying Mayorkas was guilty of wrongdoing.

More than 15 whistle-blowers came forward to complain that Mayorkas was giving special treatment to connected applicants, the report by the department's Office of Inspector General says.

The projects included McAuliffe's electric car company, GreenTech Automotive; a series of films by Sony Pictures; and a luxury hotel and casino in Las Vegas.

Mayorkas intervened "in unprecedented ways," the report says, and "created a perception ... that certain individuals had special access and would receive special consideration." If it were not for Mayorkas, the report says, the applications would have been decided differently.

The report says the projects eventually won approval after Mayorkas heard from advocates like Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and former Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell, both Democrats.

In a 32-page response, Mayorkas, now the department's deputy secretary, said he weighed in only to fix a broken system that wasn't moving applications.

"I did so not because I wanted to but because I needed to," Mayorkas wrote. "It was not easy or pleasant to hear complaints of how poorly our agency was performing."

Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson said he still had "full confidence" in Mayorkas, but said the report also showed that leaders needed to avoid the "appearance of special treatment."

The complex EB-5 visa program, mixing immigration policy with economic development goals, offers U.S. visas to people willing to invest at least $500,000 in projects that create at least 10 jobs and meet other requirements.

Most of the visas, about 10,000 annually, are snapped up by wealthy Chinese investors.

But a number of the deals have turned out to be fraud schemes, and critics in Congress have charged that the government isn't properly screening the investors for security risks.

Mayorkas, who once served as U.S. attorney in Los Angeles, said the visa program was a mess when he began at Citizenship and Immigration Services in 2009. The office was short-staffed, he said, and the agency was deluged by complaints about stalled applications.

Some of the complaints were from McAuliffe, a former chairman of the Democratic National Committee who helped run presidential campaigns for Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton. Gulf Coast Funds Management, a company run by Anthony Rodham, Hillary Clinton's brother, was trying to attract EB-5 applicants to invest in GreenTech, where McAuliffe was board chairman until he left in 2012 to run for governor.

The report says Mayorkas became involved at some point in the long application process but declined to do so in others, saying it was inappropriate. The project eventually won approval. Though Mayorkas didn't ultimately make the decision, the report says, his unusual involvement was "corrosive" and intimidated staffers. Mayorkas, though, said McAuliffe kept complaining about his treatment, at one point leaving an expletive-laced message.

Mayorkas also intervened in 2011 in a project called LA Films, set up to steer money from about 200 investors into Sony Pictures films, the report says. His staff members wanted to deny the project, the report says, but that changed after Mayorkas received a call from Rendell, who knew the project head from his previous dealings in Philadelphia. And Reid, then Senate majority leader, asked Mayorkas to look into a stalled application from a company that wanted to invest in the SLS Hotel in Las Vegas.

The report spurred biting criticism of Mayorkas from Republicans.

The report shows “just how questionable Mr. Mayorkas’ ethics and judgment were,” said Iowa Sen. Charles E. Grassley, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and a long-standing critic of Mayorkas and the EB-5 program.

Rep. Michael McCaul (R-Texas), chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, said he would hold a hearing Thursday to explore the report’s findings.

Johnson said that he also had concerns about the integrity of the EB-5 program but that the problem was not Mayorkas, but lawmakers.

“Officials of this department are constantly contacted by outsiders, including members of Congress of both parties, on behalf of those with an interest in the outcome of a particular EB-5 case,” Johnson said. He said he had asked his staff to come up with a way to keep the program free from outside influence.

Clinton Email Probe Means Political Tightrope for House GOP (National Journal)
By Ben Geman
March 24, 2015
National Journal

House Republicans probing the Benghazi attacks have a politically delicate task that goes well beyond investigating the 2012 incident that claimed the lives of four Americans. They have to make clear they're out to get Hillary Clinton's emails—not Hillary Clinton.

Thus far, Select Committee on Benghazi Chairman Trey Gowdy and his aides have taken pains to cast the overall Benghazi probe as a methodical one. It's even taken some criticism from the Right for not being more aggressive against the former secretary of State.

And that's by design. The panel wants to avoid the appearance that it is attacking Clinton by any means possible. That—ideally—means few leaks and little grandstanding.

"We are not putting out for the public bits and pieces of our investigation. That's not how a solid, fair investigation is conducted," said Rep. Susan Brooks of Indiana, one of seven Republicans on the panel. "I am very pleased with the professional nature and the civility of the investigation and how it is progressing."

"If you look back at the three hearings we have had so far, I have mentioned Hillary Clinton's name a whopping zero times. We were interviewing witnesses that have nothing to do with Secretary Clinton when this story broke," Gowdy said on Fox News Sunday.

The emphasis on perception is a marked change from some previous House GOP investigations of the Obama administration, including probes into Fast and Furious and Solyndra, which were seen in some circles as political fishing expeditions. Many Republicans took note when House Speaker John Boehner announced last May that the Benghazi panel would be headed by Gowdy, not then-House Oversight Chairman Darrell Issa—the author of those more controversial probes.

"They have to be careful not to make it look too nakedly partisan, and more specifically, not exclusively built around the prospects of Hillary Clinton winning the White House in 2016, even though everyone in this town knows that that's true," said Thomas Schaller, a political science professor at the University of Maryland, Baltimore County.

To that point, last week Gowdy sent a letter to Clinton's attorney asking for her private email server to be turned over to the State Department's inspector general or another "neutral, detached, and independent arbiter." Gowdy didn't, however, ask for it to be sent over to the House panel.

Schaller's recent book, The Stronghold: How Republicans Captured Congress but Surrendered the White House, argues that the increasingly powerful House wing of the GOP has hobbled the party's White House prospects in recent decades. But in this case, Schaller believes the House panel is poised to help the party's 2016 prospects.

"This might be the one case where, if it is done right and it is done successfully, I suppose it could actually help the presidential wing of the party because it does look like Hillary Clinton was damaged by this revelation," he said of the discoveries about Clinton's email practices.

GOP strategist Rick Wilson framed it this way in Politico: "Let's try something new: maintain message discipline, hold focus and keep an eye on a bigger objective than your daily press release, social media hits or email fundraising drops."

David Marin, a former top GOP aide on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee and a veteran of congressional investigations, says the Select Committee has proceeded with integrity.

"I think they have proceeded exactly as I would have wanted to proceed if I were working for this committee. They are quietly, diligently doing their work. You haven't seen leaks from this committee in terms of documents, you haven't see any show hearings," Marin said.

"I think at the end of the day, this committee will be judged on the quality of its report, on the report's objectivity and utility, on whether the facts presented match the conclusions the committee reaches. Everything else is just theater and noise, and I do have a strong sense that Mr. Gowdy understands this," said Marin, who is now with the Podesta Group, a prominent lobbying and PR firm.

Democrats are having none of it.

Rep. Adam Schiff, a Democratic panel member, said on Fox News Sunday recently that the GOP-controlled committee has not yet had Clinton testify on Benghazi because Republicans want that to occur “as far into the presidential cycle as possible.”

And GOP efforts to keep a lid on political talk or appearances may not make a difference anyway, given the personalities and strong feelings involved.

“It doesn’t matter what we do,” said committee member Lynn Westmoreland, a Georgia Republican. “It is going to be looked at as being political.”

Report criticizes official who helped Dems with visa program (Associated Press Newswires)
By Alicia A. Caldwell
March 25, 2015
Associated Press Newswires

WASHINGTON (AP) — When influential Democrats with stakes in different investment groups needed help securing visas as part of a complicated foreign investor program, they sought out a fellow Democrat who just happened to be in charge of the immigration agency overseeing their applications.

Homeland Security Deputy Secretary Alejandro Mayorkas, the head of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services at the time, took up their causes, according to a report by the Homeland Security Department's inspector general. Investigators say Mayorkas improperly intervened in three cases involving prominent Democrats, including a company run by the youngest brother of likely Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton.

In the report released Tuesday, investigators said Mayorkas helped efforts to secure the visas in ways that created the appearance of favoritism and special access. That, in turn, caused resentment among career government employees, managers and lawyers.

The agency's inspector general, John Roth, said he could not suggest a motive for Mayorkas, a longtime Democrat who served on President Barack Obama's transition team after his 2008 election and was U.S. attorney in California under President Bill Clinton. Roth did not accuse Mayorkas of violating any laws and acknowledged that Mayorkas sometimes declined to become involved in cases because he said he did not think it would be appropriate.

Mayorkas said in a statement that he disagreed with the inspector general's findings but that "I will certainly learn from it and from this process."

He added: "There was erroneous decision-making and insufficient security vetting of cases. I could not and did not turn my back on my responsibility to address those grave problems. I made improving the program a priority and I did so in a hands-on manner."

The U.S. government's investor-visa program, known as EB-5, allows foreigners to obtain visas to live permanently in the U.S. with their spouse and children if they invest $500,000 to $1 million in projects or businesses that create jobs for American citizens. Approved investors can become legal permanent residents after two years and later can become U.S. citizens.

The chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, Rep. Michael McCaul, R-Texas, said the findings were "extremely concerning" and that he will conduct a congressional hearing about them Thursday. Roth was expected to testify.

The Associated Press first reported in July 2013 — as Mayorkas was being considered for the No. 2 job at the Homeland Security Department — allegations that he had improperly intervened in the investor case involving a financing company run by Anthony Rodham, brother of Mrs. Clinton. Mayorkas told senators at his confirmation hearing that the allegations were "unequivocally false" and said he oversaw the program "based on the law and the facts, and nothing else."

The inspector general's new conclusions also cast doubt on whether the Homeland Security Department withheld embarrassing internal files the AP had sought under the U.S. Freedom of Information Act as part of its own investigation nearly two years ago — and instead released records that indicated no wrongdoing.

The AP in July 2013 requested all emails to or from Mayorkas over the preceding seven months that contained specific words or names, including Rodham. The government eventually sent AP more than 200 pages, mostly censored, including emails in which Mayorkas told investors and agency staff that he would not become involved in internal deliberations.

"I cannot weigh in," Mayorkas wrote to Assistant Secretary Douglas Smith on Feb. 1, 2013, in a message turned over to the AP and cited in the new inspector general's report. "The (investor's) attorney sent an email to me and I responded that I could not weigh in."

But the inspector general's report also cited other messages from Mayorkas that were never turned over to AP. In one case, Mayorkas forwarded a January 2013 email from Rodham about delays with a high importance designation. The email would have been covered under AP's information request since Mayorkas sent it during the relevant time period and contained Rodham's name.

"Staff understood these applications were getting high-level attention," the inspector general's report said.

Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe was also connected to the investor proposal but later divested. His spokesman, Brian Coy, said the report demonstrated that McAuliffe asked the government to decide on the investment proposal in a timely fashion.

The other two cases involved a Hollywood investment program and an investment effort in Nevada that had ties to former Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell and Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, respectively.

Mayorkas previously came under criticism for his involvement in the commutation by President Clinton of the prison sentence of the son of a Democratic Party donor. Another of Mrs. Clinton's brothers, Hugh Rodham, had been hired by the donor to lobby for the commutation. Mayorkas told lawmakers during his 2009 confirmation hearing that it was a mistake to talk to the White House about the request.

Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson said there were lessons to be learned in the inspector general's investigation but described Mayorkas in a statement as "exceptionally conscientious, honest and patriotic."

"He is often impatient with our sluggish government bureaucracy, can at times be very hands-on in resolving issues and problems that are brought to his personal attention, and is always mindful that we are public servants," Johnson said. "Ali works hard to do the right thing, and never acts, in my observation, for reasons of personal advancement or aggrandizement."

Roth, the inspector general, praised as "courageous" the agency employees who confidentially had complained about Mayorkas' actions and promised they would be protected as whistleblowers.

Jeb Bush had another email account while Florida governor (Associated Press)
By Ronnie Greene
March 24, 2015
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Jeb Bush used another, previously unreported email address when he was governor of Florida, records show — the newest wrinkle in an evolving debate over public officials' use of private email accounts.

The disclosure follows revelations that Hillary Rodham Clinton used a private email address to conduct State Department business when she was secretary of state. Republican Bush and Democrat Clinton are two likely contenders in the 2016 race for the White House.

When Bush released thousands of emails from his tenure as Florida's governor as part of his preparations to run for president next year, he did so from the email account he shared openly, jeb@jeb.org.

Those emails also include references to another email address, jeb@gencom.net. Bush said through a spokeswoman that he was unaware of the account, although records showed that people wrote to him there more than 400 times between 1999 and 2004.

The same records show no replies from Bush coming from that address. Instead, when Bush responded, he did so from his more well-known email address. Writers sometimes also reached the governor at jeb@jebbush.org or jeb@myflorida.com.

Bush's spokeswoman, Kristy Campbell, said Bush had no knowledge of the other email account. "He doesn't know what that email address is," she told The Associated Press Tuesday.

There's no indication this other account was used in any improper or secretive way.

But its existence — and the mystery around it — show the potential complications when public officials, like Bush and Clinton, use private email accounts to conduct public business.

An AP review of Bush's emails spotlighted cases in which top donors sought to sway the governor on political appointments during his two terms in office.

The gencom address traces to ElectroNet Broadband Communications of Tallahassee, Florida's capital. The company did not immediately respond to a phone message Tuesday from the AP with questions about the Bush email address.

The majority of emails sent to Bush at that address came in 1999, and a slow trickle followed in ensuing years. Just one came in 2004, from a South Florida businessman who wrote to Bush at both addresses about a university board meeting. Several writers used both email addresses when contacting Bush.

Others reached Bush simply through the gencom account — writing to him on a range of issues from judicial appointments to the federal raid that captured the Cuban child Elian Gonzalez to state labor and literacy issues.

Hillary Clinton promised a new relationship with the media. She was kidding. (The Washington Post)

By Chris Cillizza

March 24, 2015

The Washington Post

"I am all about new beginnings," Hillary Clinton said at event honoring the late New York Times Robin Toner Monday night in Washington. "A new grandchild, another new hairstyle, a new e-mail account. The relationship with the press. So here goes: no more secrecy. No more zone of privacy. After all, what good did that do me?"

Clinton made clear that her change of heart was decidedly tongue in cheek, adding: "Before I go any further, look under your chair, you'll find a simple non-disclosure agreement my attorneys drew up. Old habits last."

ZING!

Here's the thing: Clinton shouldn't be joking. She badly needs a new relationship with the press after a 2008 campaign that was marked by the remarkably uncivil daily interactions between her press team and the reporters tasked with covering the campaign. (I am far from blameless in that as a participant in plenty of skirmishes that, in retrospect, were so tiny and meaningless as to not make much of a difference in even the short term.)

And, in her hires for the not-yet-announced-but-come-on-everyone-knows-she's-doing-it presidential campaign there does seem to be an acknowledgment that the press shop needs an entirely different approach. As Peter Nicholas wrote recently in the Wall Street Journal:

Mrs. Clinton's new campaign is shaping up to be a hybrid of longtime Clinton and Obama political operatives. Tensions are inevitable. But Mrs. Clinton seems to want some sort of rapprochement with the press.

Three of the people she has recently tapped for key spots in her media operation suggest as much. All have strong ties to the press corps; none is known for a combative approach to the media.

He's exactly right. Jennifer Palmieri, who is expected to be the communications director, has a long history with the national media -- from her time working for John Edwards' presidential bid to her service as a senior press person in the Obama White House. Brian Fallon, expected to be the national press secretary, spent time on Capitol Hill with the irrepressible Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) before going to head press operations at the Justice Department. And Jesse Ferguson, who is expected to play a major role in the Clinton 2016 press shop, comes out of the world of House Democratic politics and is known -- by me and lots of other reporters -- for his reasonableness.

Those hires will likely make some difference in how the Clinton campaign deals with the media. But, the key question is not really the philosophy of the people Clinton has hired when it comes to dealing with the media. It's whether she (and her husband) have actually changed their mind in any meaningful way about their approach to the press.

And, in that regard there's little evidence to suggest that anything like a new beginning is likely. Hillary Clinton's handling of her news conference addressing the email controversy a few weeks back was guarded and careful -- unwilling to play ball with the media up to and including the decision to stage it at the United Nations -- a less-than-ideal location for the crush of media at the event. And there was that whole following-reporters-to-the-bathroom thing.

Bill Clinton, in a speech last spring at Georgetown, lamented the way the press covers politicians. “If a policymaker is a political leader and is covered primarily by the political press, there is a craving that borders on addictive to have a storyline,” he said. “And then once people settle on the storyline, there is a craving that borders on blindness to shoehorn every fact, every development, every thing that happens into the story line, even if it’s not the story.” And, Hillary Clinton said much the same in a speech at the University of Connecticut around the same time; “A lot of serious news reporting has become more entertainment driven and more opinion-driven as opposed to factual,” she said at the time. “People book onto the shows, political figures, commentators who will be controversial who will be provocative because it’s a good show. You might not learn anything but you might be entertained and I think that’s just become an unfortunate pattern that I wish could be broken.”

Now, there is truth in the Clinton analysis of the media. The growth of journalists as “brands”, the rise of social media and the growth in both the ability to measure traffic and the increasing preeminence of traffic as a definition of journalistic success have altered journalism since even the last time Hillary Clinton ran for president -- and often in not-so-good ways.

But, it’s clear that the Clintons are not simply offering a clinical analysis on the media. Their feelings about the press are deeply held and laden with emotion, beliefs forged over more than two decades in the national spotlight. As Maggie Haberman and Glenn Thrush wrote in an absolutely seminal piece on Hillary Clinton’s relationship (or lack thereof) with the media in mid-2014:

While the white-hot anger she once felt toward the media has since hardened into a pessimistic resignation (with a dash of self-pity), she’s convinced another campaign would inevitably invite more bruising scrutiny, as her recent comments suggest. Public life “gives you a sense of being kind of dehumanized as part of the experience,” she lamented a few weeks ago to a Portland, Ore., audience. “You really can’t ever feel like you’re just having a normal day.”

When asked why Clinton hasn’t done more to reach out to reporters over the years, one Clinton campaign veteran began to spin several theories. She was too busy, she was too prone to speaking her mind and the like—then abruptly cut to the chase:

While “hate” might be overstating things somewhat, it is absolutely clear that Hillary Clinton’s disdain for how the media does its collective job isn’t going to disappear or even change because she says a few nice words at a dinner or hires a handful of senior press operatives who have a different approach to the media than her past flacks. Yes, people like Palmieri, Fallon and Ferguson can temper some of the media suspicion in Clintonworld but they will never cure the candidate (or her spouse) of their fundamental dislike and, more importantly, distrust of the press.

Now, distrusting the press isn’t exactly disqualifying for a presidential candidate. In fact, bashing the media is one of the most bipartisan applause lines a pol can deliver; I have been in Democratic and Republican audiences in which a little press-bashing elicits huge cheers. And, whining from reporters about access to a candidate or polite treatment from a campaign isn’t exactly the sort of stuff that the average voter feels a ton of sympathy for.

And yet, it’s hard to dispute that Clinton’s relationship with the media played a role in just how difficult -- and disappointing -- that campaign was for her. Clinton has made some moves in the last few weeks that suggest she recognizes that she can’t repeat those mistakes this time around. But, campaigns take their lead from the candidate. And Clinton doesn’t seem to, really, have adjusted her view of the media in any meaningful way between 2008 and today. That matters.

Group Urges Clinton to Embrace Liberal Agenda (The New York Times)

By Jonathan Martin

March 24, 2015

The New York Times

A liberal group is starting a campaign Tuesday aimed at pushing Hillary Rodham Clinton to adopt a full-throated liberal agenda in her all-but-certain presidential campaign, signaling that even some on the far left of the Democratic Party are now more focused on shaping Mrs. Clinton's eventual platform than they are on finding an alternative to her.

Over 200 Iowa and New Hampshire Democrats signed a petition at ReadyForBoldness.com, a website that plays on the name of the pro-Clinton group "Ready for Hillary."

The effort, sponsored by the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, will push Mrs. Clinton and other Democratic presidential hopefuls toward embracing expanded Social Security benefits, curbs on Wall Street and an overhaul of the campaign finance system, among other liberal priorities.

The organization is seeking volunteers in early primary states to attend campaign events and ask candidates where they stand on the liberal agenda.

Among those signing the "Ready for Boldness" statement are former Senator Tom Harkin of Iowa, Representative Dave Loebsack of Iowa, and Paul Hodes and Carol Shea-Porter, each former members of Congress from New Hampshire.

"Our Democratic nominee will have the best chance to win New Hampshire and other swing states in the general election if they campaign on a bold economic agenda that impacts kitchen table issues like jobs, wages, college affordability and retirement security," Ms. Shea Porter said.

Trusted Aide Declines Formal Role in a Clinton Campaign (The New York Times)

By Maggie Haberman

March 24, 2015

The New York Times

Cheryl D. Mills, an adviser to Hillary Rodham Clinton who has been closer to her than perhaps any other over the last six years, will not be playing a formal role in her soon-to-be-announced presidential bid, according to people in direct discussions with the campaign.

Ms. Mills, who had a senior role in Mrs. Clinton's 2008 campaign and then served as an adviser and chief of staff at the State Department, has told friends that she knows first-hand how intense and trying a presidential race can be and that she values the work she is doing outside of political life. That includes working for a hedge fund she started that is focused on Africa.

There had been some discussion of Ms. Mills taking a campaign co-chair title along with John Podesta, who served in senior roles in the Clinton and Obama administrations. Mr. Podesta is not currently planning to relocate to New York City, where Mrs. Clinton's campaign will be based, and advisers to Mrs. Clinton are still discussing who, if anyone, could play that role, according to people familiar with the discussions.

Ms. Mills has been singular among Mrs. Clinton's circle of trusted advisers in stating plainly to people that she hoped the former secretary of state would forgo another national campaign. At the same time, she has devoted much of the last two years to helping Mrs. Clinton preserve the option of running and has been strongly supportive of Mrs. Clinton's desire to delay declaring her candidacy as long as possible.

Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, declined to comment.

Even without an actual title, there is little doubt that Mrs. Clinton will continue to consult frequently with Ms. Mills, which could pose a familiar challenge for Mrs. Clinton's team of paid advisers, who will have to contend with a circle of counselors who aren't in the campaign structure, but who have her ear nonetheless.

At the same time, the fact that the campaign is still assessing how to structure top tier of her political operation just weeks before an expected announcement highlights the late start Mrs. Clinton has had in building her team, despite considering her campaign for the last two years.

Paul slams Clinton on women's rights (The Hill)

By Kevin Cirilli

March 24, 2015

The Hill

Likely presidential candidate Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said Monday that former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is not a consistent defender of women's rights.

Paul said on Fox News's "The Kelly File" that Republicans need to "aggressively go after the Clintons," since she is expected to announce her run for president.

"We need to go after their corruption. We need to call her out for not being a consistent defender of women's rights," Paul said. "There's a lot of hypocrisy on the Clinton side. ... You can't let that go."

Paul said that Republicans will not win the White House in 2016 unless they attack her record.

"We won't win unless we aggressively combat her and make sure that she has to explain her record as well," Paul said.

What Scott Walker Can Teach Hillary Clinton (Slate)

By Jamelle Bouie

March 24, 2015

Slate

Hillary Clinton has been polarizing her entire political career. But now, ahead of a second presidential run, she wants to be a uniter, not a divider. People should "get out of the kind of very unproductive discussion that we've had for too long, where people are just in their ideological bunkers, having arguments instead of trying to reach across those divides and have some solutions," she said, speaking to labor leaders and policy wonks during a Monday event at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank that doubles as the Clinton administration-in-waiting.

Elsewhere in Washington, the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities—another left-leaning think tank—released its analysis of the new Republican budgets. "Each budget plan," notes the CBPP, "derives more than two-thirds of its [approximately $5 trillion] budget cuts from programs for people with low or modest incomes even though these programs constitute less than one-quarter of federal program costs." This includes billions in cuts to tax credits for working families as well as trillions in cuts to health care for low-income people. At the same time, House Republicans are mulling huge tax relief for the wealthiest Americans; later this week the House Ways and Means Committee will consider a bill to repeal the federal estate tax.

Clinton hasn't announced a full agenda for 2016, much less a campaign for president. But when she does, it will stand on the opposite bank of anything offered by Republicans, with a vast distance between the two. She will give a plan for growing the welfare state. They will offer a plan for gutting it.

Put differently, she has to know that there's no way to bring the two sides together. Democrats and Republicans aren't just polarized; they've adopted distinct ideologies, and they've prioritized a maximalist approach to using power and influence. The first two years of the Obama administration weren't modest. Part of this was a massive economic crisis that demanded a proportional response, but part of it was policy ambition. From the stimulus to the auto bailouts, Affordable Care Act, Dodd-Frank, and a host of other, smaller policies, Obama and the Democrats steered the country in a much more liberal direction than any president and Congress since Lyndon Johnson.

Likewise, if elected president in 2012, Mitt Romney had promised a full repudiation of the Obama administration. His White House would have slashed social spending, repealed the Affordable Care Act, and pushed a sweeping agenda of broad tax cuts and deregulation. It would have been a complete ideological victory, scored without any input from liberals.

It's not that the "togetherness" talk is unreasonable. The public craves political comity and wants its leaders to affirm values like cooperation and bipartisanship. And even if they've built their appeal on the opposite, most politicians will oblige. "The answer will not come from Washington," said Sen. Ted Cruz—of all people—in his presidential announcement speech. "It will only come as it has come at every other time of challenge in this country, when the American people stand together and say we will get back to the principles that have made this country great."

But even if they try—and candidates tend to pursue their promises once in office—there's no way anyone can keep this pledge. If elected president, Hillary Clinton won't bring anyone together, just like Barack Obama didn't overcome bitter partisanship and George W. Bush couldn't sustain the national unity of his first two years in office (not that it was a huge priority). Not only are presidents pressured by party elites and activists with distinct visions, but the public is more polarized, and less willing to give approval or support to presidents from the other side. It's why Clinton polarized more than Bush, why the second Bush polarized more than Clinton, and why Obama stands as the most polarizing president we have known—until we elect the next one.

Indeed, the only person in the present presidential field who seems to understand that political comity is a fool's errand is Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, which, given his record for sowing ideological rancor, isn't a surprise. In 2013—just after the government shutdown—he spoke at a breakfast for reporters in Washington, D.C. And when asked about polarization, he refused to say he could bridge the divide:

"For years, the conventional wisdom was that Americans want divided government," he said. "I think they've seen in the last few years that that's not necessarily a good thing. Instead of checks and balances you get a lot of gridlock." …

"What we learned in Wisconsin and what many of the other battleground states, particularly in the Midwest, learned during the 2010 election, was that if you want to get big, bold reform done in your state you need a team to help you do that. So in our case everything switched from Democratic control to Republican control in 2010 and that empowered us to go out and make reforms that would've been much more difficult without those changes."

It's clear that Clinton wants to echo Barack Obama's 2008 campaign of change and togetherness. But, as per her critique in the 2008 Democratic primaries, Obama's message was a mistake. Outside of the most technical or non-salient issues, there's no chance of bipartisan cooperation in the next presidential administration, and to promise otherwise is to set yourself up for failure. The only way a President Hillary Clinton will succeed in 2017 is if she has a Democratic Congress to pass her policies, confirm her judges, and staff her administration.

In other words, Clinton needs to listen to Walker. He gets it. Instead of a promise to work with Republicans, Clinton should promise to elect Democrats. It's the only way she'll get results, and ultimately, that's what the public wants.

Congress Is the Best Bet to Recover Hillary's E-mails (The Hill)

By Shannen Coffin

The Hill

In opposing efforts to reopen Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) cases seeking Hillary Clinton's e-mails, the Department of Justice is playing perfectly to type. Last week, the department told the D.C. Circuit that there was no reason to re-open a case in which it had previously said it had no e-mail. Justice's lawyers argued that its prior statements to the court were literally true: It had no such e-mails at the time it conducted its prior searches.

As I previously wrote, the Supreme Court has consistently rejected the notion that private citizens can force the recovery of documents removed from agency recordkeeping systems through FOIA lawsuits. This precedent was established in 1980, in a case involving an effort to force the State Department to produce notes and tapes that Henry Kissinger took with him when he resigned as Secretary of State. The Court reasoned that the Freedom of Information Act requires an agency to search only those records within its possession and control at the time of the request.

The Department of Justice, representing the State Department now, relies heavily on that principle in arguing that, when it made its prior representations to the courts in some pending (and some now dismissed) FOIA cases, the State Department complied with the law. Because Secretary Clinton had removed – and, some might argue, even concealed — her e-mails from agency possession and control, the agency did not have an obligation to search those records in the past. So the Department of Justice's argument goes, and under the current law, it is likely to succeed.

Instead of giving power to the average citizen to claw back Mrs. Clinton's records through the Freedom of Information Act, federal law generally allows that only the federal government itself can seek to recover documents removed from its control. The Federal Records Act requires that when an agency head or the Archivist of the United States learns that official records have been or will be removed or destroyed, they must request that the Attorney General initiate a civil enforcement action to recover the documents.

This may be where the Department of Justice's recent filings fall short. DOJ explains that there is "no basis, beyond sheer speculation, to believe that former Secretary Clinton withheld any work-related e-mails from those provided to the Department of State." But the very fact that Mrs. Clinton took it upon herself to decide what to produce and what to delete – and the many inconsistencies in her own description of the document-review process – should give the Department of State and the Archivist pause as to whether she produced all of her official e-mails when requested. The State Department seems unconcerned about the possibility of the existence of other e-mails beyond the 30,000 or so Clinton has already handed over. The Archivist, at least, has raised his eyebrows, inquiring in a letter to the State Department about the circumstances surrounding the "potential alienation" of Mrs. Clinton's e-mail records.

If either the agency head or Archivist fail to act to recover improperly removed e-mails, a private party has some recourse to the courts, although that recourse is limited. A private citizen can petition a court to compel either official to fulfill this statutory duty. As one federal court recently held in a case involving an effort to seek the return of e-mails held in a private account by the Director of the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy:

If the agency head or Archivist does nothing while an agency official destroys or removes records in contravention of agency guidelines and directives, private litigants may bring suit to require the agency head and Archivist to fulfill their statutory duty to notify Congress and ask the Attorney General to initiate legal action. . . . [The private party must] plausibly allege that records have been unlawfully 'removed' [from the agency in order to be granted judicial relief].

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But judicial relief merely forces the agency head and/or Archivist to fulfill their statutory obligation to ask the Attorney General to sue. In every case, even where a court intervenes, the ultimate decision about whether to seek judicial relief to force return of the improperly removed documents is left with the Attorney General of the United States. And given the Department's current position that nothing is amiss, the likelihood of a civil enforcement action to force Mrs. Clinton to account for any missing records seems low.

A number of organizations have already begun to seek to reopen FOIA claims long-since closed. But absent some prior misrepresentations by the Department of State in those FOIA cases, this federal scheme leaves little chance of judicial relief for those public-interest and media organizations clamoring for Mrs. Clinton's e-mail servers to be seized and searched. Even in the face of clear violations of records laws, federal judges are simply unlikely to force the Attorney General to exercise his well-established discretion to enforce the law.

The best chance of recovering Mrs. Clinton's records, then, currently lies in congressional subpoenas. But that process may take months or even years – with an elaborate and predictable kabuki dance of subpoena, stonewalling, contempt citation, House votes, and, finally, judicial enforcement. A future President Clinton may have served her second term in office before that process is resolved.

So was all hope of recovery of any remaining e-mails lost with Mrs. Clinton's stroke of the delete button? Perhaps not. Assuming there is anything left to recover after Mrs. Clinton's rather arbitrary deletion process, there still exists an obvious avenue for relief through Congress that does not involve a protracted subpoena fight: Congress could simply amend the Federal Records Act to make clear that the Attorney General's duty to seek civil enforcement of the Act is non-discretionary, thus allowing a court to order the Attorney General to fulfill his duty to recover the documents.

Or, if Congress wishes to empower private citizen suits, it could amend the Freedom of Information Act to permit courts to order directly that a private party return improperly removed federal records for preservation by the agency. Such statutory tweaks could be applied immediately to remedy any improper records removal and topple the wall of secrecy Clinton has built around her public service.

Clinton: U.S. Should Consider German Model for Saving Jobs (Foreign Policy)

By David Francis

March 24, 2015

Foreign Policy

When times are tough in Germany, Berlin staves off unemployment by paying for private jobs with government subsidies. Hillary Rodham Clinton, a presumed Democratic 2016 presidential candidate, suggested Monday that a similar program could work in the United States.

Speaking about job creation at the Center for American Progress in Washington, Clinton said the United States should look to comparable foreign economies for examples of how to create and keep jobs. She said Berlin's model for dealing with job retention during downturns is one Washington should explore.

"The other thing that Germany does is, instead of an unemployment system, they have a wage subsidy system so you don't let people go in the first place," Clinton said.

She was referring to Germany's "Kurzarbeit," or short-work, policy, one that Germans are enthusiastically proud of. It allows companies to reduce workers' hours with the government picking up the tab for the lost time.

Of course, getting such a wholesale change to how the United States deals with job losses during economic downswings would require Congress to act, no sure thing given current partisanship. And U.S. officials have run into trouble in the past by suggesting European solutions to America's problems.

Moreover, Germany's policies would be difficult to replicate in the United States, said American Enterprise Institute scholar Desmond Lachman. The German workforce is highly unionized, he said, making it easier for workers to get concessions from the central government when times are tough.

Lachman also said the German policy does little to create new jobs, and widens the gap between top earners and those at the bottom who don't get salary increases when Berlin steps in with subsidies. During her speech, Clinton said job creation and lessening income inequality were priorities.

"Then what you're doing is basically just sharing the work," Lachman told Foreign Policy. You're not creating jobs, you're just keeping unemployment down … while increasing the number of people at the bottom."

During the Great Recession, the German labor market proved especially resilient. In 2010, when the United States and the rest of the world were losing jobs, Germany actually added them because companies there took advantage of the government program.

According to a survey for the Munich-based research group Ifo Institute, in the first quarter of 2010 — the depths of the European sovereign debt crisis — 39 percent of German manufacturers were using Kurzarbeit, allowing them to hold onto skilled labor at a time when many firms around the globe were shedding jobs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Many on the right and left, including President Barack Obama and former President Bill Clinton, have mentioned the Kurzarbeit concept as something the United States should consider. And evidence from Germany, Europe's strongest economy, shows that it stops companies from cutting jobs.

Clinton said she was willing to try. "Maybe we'll start not too far from here, in a beautiful domed building," she said to laughter and applause.

Hillary Clinton vs. the record-keepers (Yahoo)

By Nancy Scola

Yahoo

It was a Thursday morning, Jan. 26, 2012, and Hillary Clinton was standing onstage in the three-story, redwood-paneled Dean Acheson Auditorium at State Department headquarters in Washington, D.C., to speak with some of the 25,000 or so people who flesh out the department's organizational chart. Three years into her tenure, Clinton had been building a reputation for being eager to think hard about technology. Around the world, she pitched the idea that the networked society was remaking international relations, producing a need for "21st-century statecraft." InWashington, she gave speeches extolling Internet freedom. Inside Foggy Bottom headquarters, she launched an in-house online forum, calling it the Sounding Board.

But Clinton knew full well that the State Department's own technology was lagging behind. She chuckled knowingly when the moderator that day said that one of the hottest questions on the Sounding Board was about Internet Explorer 7 — so sluggish and dated that while activists in the Middle East were using Twitter to organize protests, those inside the State Department could see only a broken version of Twitter.com.

The question put to Clinton: When were those working at the State Department finally going to get a decent browser on their computers?

Once Clinton stopped laughing, she made a declaration. "I'm happy to announce that Google Chrome will be deployed worldwide on February 14." Consider it, she said, a Valentine's Day present.

The town hall meeting lasted just over an hour and covered topics ranging from the Armenian genocide to limits on career advancement for Foreign Service officers. And yet, says Ian Schuler, who served in the department's Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor at the time, "She could have said, 'You're all getting Chrome,' dropped the microphone and walked out. Because that's all anyone talked about."

There is perhaps no figure, now or ever, in American politics like Hillary Clinton: a former first lady, a powerful secretary of state, a potential Democratic presidential nominee. But standing there that day, Clinton was one of many presidential officials who have found themselves confronted with jalopy technology and a desire to maintain some degree of control over their records. In fact, the saga of Clinton's use of a nongovernmental email address is, in many ways, rooted in a question of control. Clinton, as secretary of state, would take control of which tools department employees had to do their work. And she would take control of the archive she would leave behind after what would turn out to be her 1,472 days in Obama's Cabinet.

A desire to be in command is natural, even healthy, in politicians. But for those charged with keeping the apparatus of government chugging along, it can also be where it all starts to go wrong.

The inconvenience of government tech

Joining the State Department, recalls Schuler, who is now CEO of the Washington, D.C., technology firm Development Seed, meant being assigned a "computing device that worked almost like a real computer." Talk to others who have worked with and around State's IT, and you hear phrases like "old" and "1990s tech" and "f—-ing terrible." Explains Schuler, "The technology is optimized for security. It's not at all optimized for doing work or for connecting with people beyond the State Department. It means you spend a lot of your day without any way to connect to the outside world. And that can make it really hard to do your job."

It's easy enough to chalk up the shouting over Clinton's decision to use clintonemail.com instead of government tools to yet another bout of Clinton hate or a fresh instance of Hillary Clinton being held to a higher standard than anyone else in politics. After all, Colin Powell used a personal account as secretary of state, from 2001 to 2005, and admitted on ABC's "This Week" that he "retained none of those emails." Peter Daou, the Internet director for Clinton's 2008 run for president, in a blog post dismissed the complaints about her as the whinging of the Beltway "innerati." And Philip "P.J." Crowley, who served as assistant secretary of state for public affairs from 2009 to 2011, agreed to talk about the Clinton emails — a subject he clearly considered trivial — only if we could work around an interview he already had scheduled on "real-world issues like the Islamic State."

But there are many others who have deep experience with the workings of the federal government who — though they may not want to shout it from the rooftops — find what Clinton did unsettling. They include Democrats, good-government activists and by-the-books federal employees who argue that they'd be pummeled if they did what she did. It's not the biggest issue in the world, perhaps. But it is a setback for those interested not just in transparency and accountability but also in dragging the federal government into the modern technology era.

"People should see getting a government email address as a benefit," says one high-ranking federal official who asked to remain anonymous because of the awkwardness of critiquing Clinton. "It should make your job easier," says the official, "not harder." But as things stand, the BlackBerrys loaded with Microsoft Outlook that are given to State Department employees can feel like a burden.

BlackBerry's long dominance inside government IT circles is, in part, a holdover effect of the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, when the then-novel devices proved the only reliable means of communicating. But it's also due in part to the fact that Microsoft products — and those who sell them — dominate the town's IT landscape, and BlackBerrys have long played particularly well with Microsoft's email products.

Indeed, the fact that government workers are still regularly issued BlackBerrys when most of the United States has moved on to iPhones and Samsung Galaxy smartphones, serves as a hard, plastic reminder of the remove from the general population at which government technology operates.

POEMS for the secretary

When it comes to the secretary of state, though, the department has attempted in recent years to lighten the technological burden.

It's little-known, but there is a high-security, concierge email system made just for the U.S. secretary of state and others on the "seventh floor," as Foggy Bottom's executive suite is dubbed inside the building. It's called, officially, the Principal Officers Electronic Messaging System, but it is known inside the department as POEMS. Schuler remembers traveling with those whose email accounts were on POEMS and witnessing that they received 24-hour support, far beyond what he jokingly calls the "plebes" in the department got. A State Department spokesperson describes POEMS as a "carve-out" from the department wide email system, with "services tailored to what the secretary would need."

Beyond that, Foggy Bottom isn't all that eager to speak of POEMS. There are only a handful of references to it online. I found one reference, with a number for a “POEMS Help Desk” in an old PDF of a State Department directory. I hadn’t yet deduced what the acronym represented, so I rang the POEMS number and asked the person who answered if he might be able to tell me what POEMS stood for. “No, I cannot,” he said. Can anyone at the State Department tell me? “No.”

Still, it’s clear that Clinton opted out of the Principal Officers Electronic Messaging System, the framework specifically designed by those on the federal payroll to meet the unique needs of a U.S. secretary of state.

“When I got to work as secretary of state,” Clinton said in the press conference she held two weeks ago at the United Nations about the controversy, “I opted, for convenience, to use my personal email account, which was allowed by the State Department, because I thought it would be easier to carry just one device for my work and for my personal emails instead of two.” She went on. “Looking back, it would’ve been better if I’d simply used a second email account and carried a second phone, but at the time, this didn’t seem like an issue.”

The two-devices-is-simply-too-much argument was roundly mocked, partly because modern cell phones, at least, let you set up two email addresses or more on one device. But that might be one of the few choices Clinton made that was coloring well within the lines: Best practices for government workers dictate not putting personal applications on devices paid for with tax dollars. But it was also mocked because — though there are moves afoot in official D.C. toward a “Bring Your Own Device” culture — hauling around two cell phones is still something much of Washington does as a matter of course. Clinton granted herself an early exemption from the hassle, but what about everyone else? “If it’s inconvenient for her to use, does she not think it’s inconvenient for everybody else?” asked the same anonymous official. “Did that not make her prioritize wanting to fix that system?”

Plenty of State Department employees, those with experience with the situation say, do grant themselves their own mini-exemptions, on occasion — perhaps dashing off a few quick iPhone emails from home rather than taking 10 minutes to log in to a virtual private network (VPN), deleting emails to get back below inbox size limits while out and about, or waiting weeks to get their hands on a laptop to take overseas.

What perhaps none will admit is doing it all the time with every sort of email, out of concern, in some cases, for exposing themselves to a safety breach — a constant threat. In her book “Hard Choices,” Clinton noted that State Department officials were targeted by email phishing attacks of remarkable “sophistication and fluency.” But she has said there are no signs that her email was ever violated; moreover, the servers that actually housed them were in her home and thus guarded by the U.S. Secret Service. Indeed, it might be easier in some ways to protect a handful of people using clintonemail.com than it is to safeguard all of POEMS.

Add into the mix that Clinton’s email address — hd22@clintonemail.com for most of her time at State — might not, in itself, have been a dead giveaway that she was working outside official circles. An unexpected domain name could have suggested to some a sanctioned security plan for her account (“OPSEC,” in national security speak) to throw off hackers. Though even an off-the-books address would probably have used “.gov,” the possibility might help explain why no one raised a red flag over the address while Clinton was in office. But there’s also another, more likely, explanation: Few saw it attached to emails that clearly had to do with State Department work.

“I knew exactly what her address was,” says P.J. Crowley, the former State Department spokesperson. Crowley is known for speaking his mind; an active, often colorful, tweeter while in office, Crowley resigned after delivering a negative opinion of the Pentagon’s treatment of alleged WikiLeaks source Chelsea (then Bradley) Manning. “I don’t recall any conversation where this was an issue. It wasn’t a big deal. It just never came up as an area of concern.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Crowley also paints a picture of working with Clinton where email was never much of an issue at all. Like many national security principals, Clinton, he says, was one step removed from day-to-day email traffic. “Email to her was not the means by which we communicated with her,” says Crowley. “We primarily used old-fashioned forms of communications: meetings, paper, phone calls. In formulating positions, the staff would use email a great deal. But the secretary isn’t necessarily going to be integrally involved in the sausage making, and getting those perspectives to the secretary, that was usually done on paper.”

Besides, Crowley says, “She was always staffed, and there was always someone with her.” When something was time-sensitive, “More often than not we’d email the staffer and say, ‘Hey, when she pops out of the meeting, can you make sure she’s aware of Y?’ We did a lot of communicating toward her.”

It’s a work pattern that is ingrained in the geography of the State Department. The so-called “Mahogany Row” where the secretary’s suite is located, is a Sensitive Compartmented Information Facility, or SCIF. Those entering must drop their mobile devices into tiny lockers and take with them a numbered key.

Being more email-adjacent than email-dependent isn’t all that unusual for high-ranking officials. David Almacy was the Internet director for the George W. Bush White House from 2005 to 2007. Bush swore off email when he took office. But Almacy remembers that he’d sometimes get internal emails saying “Some people over here were wondering…,” knowing that some people and over here meant the president of the United States, sitting in the Oval Office.

But if Clinton wasn’t actively using email as part of her daily grind — and she’s said that there was just one email to a foreign peer, an official in the United Kingdom — that might raise more questions than answers. Clinton has since turned over to the State Department, she says, more than 30,000 work-related emails. Some of those are ones she simply received and could involve the lunch menu in the State Department cafeteria, for instance. But what of the rest?

In some ways, there’s little new under the sun here. “There’s a long history of secretaries of state not wanting their communications public,” says Nate Jones, the director of the Freedom of Information Act Project at George Washington University’s National Security Archive.

Indeed, while serving overlapping tenures as national security adviser and later secretary of state in the Nixon and Ford White Houses, Henry Kissinger amassed more than 15,000 transcripts of his telephone calls. Many are frank conversations with President Nixon or about the Vietnam War. He destroyed the original tapes, and after he left office in 1977, he claimed the written records as private papers. Some were later turned over the State Department and posted on State.gov, forming a treasure trove of insights into how that administration operated on matters big and small.

At 11:05 a.m. on Oct. 29, 1976, for example, Kissinger had a quick call with Soviet Ambassador Anatoly Dobrynin, one in a number of historic backchannel conversations, about computers that the U.S. was newly exporting to the USSR. Dobrynin believed that computers had considerable symbolic value in painting the Soviets as technologically advanced. Kissinger wanted to make sure his Soviet colleague knew what he was getting: something not quite on the cutting edge. “I wanted to tell you on the computer, we have sold you the same computer two years ago,” Kissinger told Dobrynin, adding later: “There is only a slight technical difference with respect to safeguards, which is of no practical consequence.”

Those “Kissinger telcons,” as they’re known, have enormous value for historians; in 2005, Walter Isaacson used them to write his “Kissinger: A Biography.” But Kissinger, during his life, was eager to maintain control over them. During the Carter administration, the Supreme Court ruled that while the 1966 Freedom of Information Act applied, the 1950 Federal Records Act — limited as it was to the work of federal agencies —dictated that only his records compiled in his duties as secretary of state had to be released. (It wasn’t until the post-Watergate Presidential Records Act that presidential papers would formally shift from being the personal property of the president of the United States to belonging to the United States.)

And the fight over the Kissinger papers goes on. On March 4, just as the Clinton email story was breaking, the National Security Archive sued the State Department for delaying the release of some 700 remaining transcripts — 38 years after Kissinger left office.

Today, knowing that all executive branch emails might one day be housed in a searchable, online archive raises concerns about whether such a practice would have a chilling effect on internal debate. David Almacy, the Bush-era White House Internet director, says that the prospect of being read by future audiences was always in the back of his mind. He recalls making sure to record his positions in emails during the Bush administration’s mistake-filled response to Hurricane Katrina.

That was one part making sure that generations to come had a historical record to study for lessons, he says, and one part, he admits with a laugh, covering his posterior for posterity.

In 2012, the Obama White House issued new rules for federal record-keeping, saying, “Records protect the rights and interests of people, and hold officials accountable for their actions. Permanent records document our nation’s history” It’s part of an ongoing effort to make sure those rules keep up with the digital age and an increasingly online government.

Clinton, though, has argued that the laws in place when she was in office allowed what she did. The long-standing Federal Records Act operates in part on a good-faith basis, requiring that the head of each agency preserve a public record “containing adequate and proper documentation of the organization, functions, policies, decisions, procedures, and essential transactions of the agency.” But Clinton allies have argued that it wasn’t until 2014 that the rules were adjusted to specifically include electronic records, including emails.

There’s certainly a lot of wiggle room, and the federal government’s official record-keepers haven’t yet gotten onto firm footing on what to do about emails and other electronic records. The National Archives, for example, still uses a print-to-file system, though since 2005 it was been working on getting its Electronic Records Archives up and running at a federal ballistics lab in Rocket Center, West Virginia. In 2013, the Archives launched Capstone, an optional system that will help agencies archive by focusing on those officials whose emails are most likely worth saving. By 2017, the Obama White House has said, all emails must be stored as electronic records. But the powers-that-be are still struggling to cope with the practical considerations of saving what federal archivists calls “the overwhelming volume of email that Federal agencies produce.”

And in the meantime, say archivists, complying with just the letter of the law isn’t enough. Clinton’s people have argued that to abide by the rules, “it was Secretary Clinton’s practice to email government officials on their ‘.gov’ accounts, so her work emails were immediately captured and preserved.”

No biggie then, right? Not so, says the National Security Archives’ Nate Jones.

To understand why, you have to understand how Freedom of Information Act requests generally work. When a member of the public or the press submits a request to an agency’s FOIA office, he or she is asked to be as specific as possible about the information being hunted. Often requesters are asked to “perfect a request” by naming the senders or recipients involved. And whereas the expectation laid out in the 2014 law cited by Clinton defenders (even though the law formally applies only to presidential staff) is that you’re forwarding a copy to yourself, Clinton, instead, fractured her email trail, scattering it across the email caches of dozens, if not hundreds, of staffers. That has the effect of adding an extra dash of secrecy — not to mention difficulty — to an already challenging process.

"The FOIA shop," says Jones, "would have to do some real sleuthing. If they can't search her email, they would have to search the records of everyone she emailed."

Bear in mind, too, that until very recently, the State Department — like other federal agencies — had no system in place that allowed the automatic archiving of emails . Document-by-document decisions on what required archiving in order to comply with record-keeping lawswere left up to the individual staffer. As Attorney General Eric Holder has told federal employees, "FOIA is everyone's responsibility."

That means that Clinton, even if she had used a State.gov address, would have been the official responsible for deciding which of her files to preserve. But what Clinton did was effectively shift the burden of manually archiving those records to her staff, pulling them into the mix and exposing them to potentially unexpected congressional oversight. Rep. Trey Gowdy, the South Carolina Republican leading a committee investigating the 2012 death of a U.S. ambassador in Benghazi, Libya, announced last week that he had subpoenaed the email records of "a number of individuals within the State Department, other than Secretary Clinton."

Could a good K Street lawyer make the case that Clinton broke no laws on the books nor expressly violated in-house rules? Yes, most likely. But some in the good-government world argue that that's a pitiful standard.

John Wonderlich is the policy director at the nonpartisan D.C. transparency group called the Sunlight Foundation. "Terms like 'illegal' are not always helpful," he says, arguing that an agent of government can fail to meet the expectations of her position even if she doesn't break any laws. Says Wonderlich, "What she did was the opposite of the spirit of the law."

The spirit of the law isn't one of perfection. Incidental use of personal accounts is, generally speaking, no major offense, the same way that you might use your company's fax machine to send a permission slip to your kid's school. But that's something different from using it to launch a start-up. Anthony Clark is the author of the forthcoming book on presidential libraries called "The Last Campaign." And from 2009 to 2011, Clark was a legislative director for the Democratic side in the House of Representatives, running a series of congressional investigations on breakdowns in federal record-keeping.

"There are few people who have spent as much time thinking about this topic as I have," says Clark, and he's probably right. "And I know of no example of a federal official at any level who only used a personal email account."

One investigation Clark took part in had to do with a former U.S. deputy chief technology officer named Andrew McLaughlin who, in spring 201o, was reprimanded by the White House, for using a Gmail account in the course of his work.

"One of our employees recently fell short," John Holdren, director of the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy, wrote in a memo to staff members, adding and underlining for emphasis that "all OSTP-related email communications should be conducted using your OSTP email accounts."

It's not likely that Clinton didn't know she was similarly exposing herself to potential criticism, says Anthony Clark, the presidential library historian. It's that, having been subject to such extraordinary scrutiny throughout her public life, she made a calculation. “I don’t think it’s a coincidence that it was the former first lady and future presidential candidate who was the one Cabinet official that we know of who exclusively used personal email accounts. A person in that position is thinking about both legacy and viability.”

The state of digital democracy

If there’s a constant, multigenerational battle between politicians’ desire for privacy and the public’s desire to know what is being done in its name, the public is likely coming up short at the moment. And it’s difficult to see how that balance doesn’t get even more skewed as government gets even more digital. Email was invented in 1973, but it is only relatively recently that it has become a building block of governing. For every official presidential email archived by the William J. Clinton Presidential Library in Little Rock, Ark., there are a dozen held by the George W. Bush Presidential Library in Dallas. Indeed, the Bush Library stores 200 million email records — or a remarkable 68,ooo for every single day he was president. And those numbers will no doubt climb as so-called digital natives become national security advisers, chiefs of staff and presidents.

And if they have absolute control over the digital record, it will increasingly serve as absolute control of the historical record.

As for current Secretary of State John Kerry? Those around him report that he is frequent emailer, one who “primarily uses a State.gov account,” says that same State Department spokesperson. “Since around the time he started,” says the spokesperson, “he has had a system in place called ‘journaling’ to capture the emails he sends and receives.” An aide to Kerry regularly captures any personal emails that might have gone astray. But Kerry, too, seems to be among those who dismisses his predecessor’s email practice as a trivial concern.

Kerry was asked about it while in Saudi Arabia to discuss, among other topics, political instability in Yemen. “Let me check on that,” he deadpanned, “when I actually have time to pay attention to such an important issue when I get home.”

To the Sunlight Foundation’s John Wonderlich, the seemingly offhand remark encapsulated a reflexive sense of privilege on the part of a U.S. secretary of state that is both infuriating and depressing. “For him to minimize that is just so frustrating. This is about power. Who gets access to what information is about power.”

A few minutes later on in our conversation, Wonderlich searched for some way of summing up why Hillary Clinton’s emailing is something, regardless of Kerry’s dismissal, deserving of all the attention being paid to it. He eventually comes up with this: “What I keep thinking about is the State Department’s role in building democracy overseas — and how they never would recommend other countries doing things this way.”

Florida Tepid Toward Bush, Rubio runs (Public Policy Polling)

March 24, 2015

Public Policy Polling

Floridians aren't very excited about the prospect of either Jeb Bush or Marco Rubio running for President, and Hillary Clinton leads the entire field of potential GOP candidates in the state.

Only 37% of Florida voters think Jeb Bush should run for President, to 52% who say they think he shouldn't. The numbers for Marco Rubio on that front are almost identical- 35% say he should run to 51% who believe he should sit it out. The lack of enthusiasm for either Bush or Rubio making a White House bid is at least partially a function of their not being terribly popular. 45% of voters approve of the job Rubio is doing as a Senator to 40% who disapprove. Bush's favorability numbers are similar with 45% giving him good marks to 42% with a negative opinion. Their numbers aren't bad but they aren't that impressive either.

Hillary Clinton has leads of 2-8 points over all of the potential GOP contenders in the state. Rubio comes the closest at just a 48/46 deficit and Bush is down by a similar margin at 47/44. Rand Paul trails by 4 at 46/42, Mike Huckabee's down 5 at 49/44, Chris Christie and Ted Cruz each trail by 7 at 48/41 and 49/42 respectively, and Ben Carson (49/41), Rick Perry (50/42), and Scott Walker (49/41) all lag Clinton by 8 points.

Bush leads the Republican field in the state with 25% to 17% for Walker, 15% for Rubio, 12% for Carson, 7% for Huckabee, 6% for Cruz, 4% each for Christie and Paul, and 3% for Perry. Since PPP last did a Presidential poll in Florida last June, Bush has dropped by 5 points while Walker has seen his support increase by 10. Also seeing their stock decline in Florida are Paul whose support is down from 11% in June, Cruz who was previously at 9%, and Christie who was previously at 8%. Florida makes yet another state where Christie is under water with GOP primary voters- 35% rate him favorably to 40% with a negative view.

Even in his home state Bush lags a little bit with voters identifying themselves as 'very conservative,' trailing with 19% to Walker's 23%. But he has a commanding lead with moderates, getting 33% to only 10% for Walker, that's enough to help give him his overall advantage.

On the Democratic side Hillary Clinton remains dominant with 58% to 14% for Joe Biden, 10% for Elizabeth Warren, 3% for Bernie Sanders, 2% for Martin O'Malley, and 1% for Jim Webb. Clinton is polling over 50% with liberals, moderates, men, women, whites, African Americans, and voters within every age group.

Amongst Friends, Clinton Discusses Urban Renewal (Newsweek)

By Nina Burleigh

Newsweek

At the very hour when Texas Sen. Ted Cruz became the first candidate to formally confess his 2016 Presidential aspirations from the Jerry Falwell-founded Liberty University, the leading likely Democratic applicant for that same job was attending a different tent revival. Hillary Clinton was on a panel at the Center for American Progress, a progressive think tank helmed by longtime Clinton stalwart John Podesta who will likely take a leave his post soon to direct a presidential campaign.

In what was likely to be one of her last public events before her expected April announcement, Mrs. Clinton in that most Clintonian of fora—the roundtable discussion—discussed the needs of American cities. She gave a seven-minute speech and then stayed for an hour and half more, nodding and listening (another Clintonian gesture) to union leaders, businesspeople and two rising young Democratic political stars including HUD Secretary Julian Castro--who has been mentioned as a possible Hillary veep.)

Among the topics covered: the tale of two cities of Pittsburgh and Detroit, both blighted and failing at the same time, one now in bankruptcy and the other listed as one of the finest places to live in America; what to do about crumbling infrastructure, and how one STEM job in a tech alley spawns five more.

Almost everyone in the room agreed on and mentioned the need to demolish the “silo”—the four-letter word du jour in government and management-speak these days referring to fiefdoms within organizations that don’t collaborate.

Mrs. Clinton reminded the room that as the junior Senator from New York, she didn’t just represent booming New York City, but more economically troubled urban centers like Binghamton, Buffalo and Syracuse. She made three points in her three-minute presentation. She suggested that she’d do “a mapping” of cities crumbling infrastructure needs; do more in terms of “human infrastructure” with pre-K and job training; and encourage social mobility which is akin to encouraging kindness—easier said than done.

Labor leaders Randi Weingarten (American Federation of Teachers) and Lee Saunders (AFSCME) joined Mrs. Clinton for the panel which guaranteed a less-than-combative session. They discussed public-private partnerships, job training and, yes, tearing down “silos” to revitalize urban areas like Detroit.

“There is a tragedy going on in our urban centers,” said Saunders. His union of 1.6 million government employees is a reliable power base for Clinton is also under heavy assault in states with Republican governors .

Mrs. Clinton praised the Clinton Global Foundation twice which is not entirely shocking. CGI was “the convenor,” she said, for a large job training program run by the AFT that Mrs. Clinton said “retrofit tens of thousands of people to do jobs.” She also praised the CGI’s “Job One” program for aiming at youth unemployment. Mrs. Clinton announced the program last June, which procured commitments from 16 businesses like Microsoft, J.P. Morgan and Gap to mentor, train and hire out-of-work youth.

Mrs. Clinton’s celebrity was almost dimmed for a minute by Compton Mayor Aja Brown, the youngest mayor in America,. Aformer urban planner, she gave a succinct recounting of how she’d hosted 50 gang members and coaxed them to make peace, dropping the city’s legendary crime rate by 40 percent, and shuttering rent-by-the-hour motels that are a den of underage prostitution.

After Brown spoke, Mrs. Clinton suggested the California mayor might be back in Washington holding higher office. “Mayor, don’t be surprised if you get a call. And maybe we will start not too far from here, in a beautiful domed building.”

“I love sessions like this,” Clinton said in her concluding statement. “It’s nice to get back into an evidence-based discussion about what works and to try to learn from examples that can teach us all a lot of lessons.” She mentioned, en passant, the need to end “unproductive discussions” in “ideological bunkers.”

With that, the participants and presumptive front running Democrat filed out of her liberal silo and back into the pigpen of American politics.

Citizens United files new lawsuit for Clinton records (Politico)

By Josh Gerstein

March 24, 2015

Politico

The conservative group Citizens United filed its second lawsuit in a little over a week Tuesday, heading to court to demand photos, videos and hotel bills of former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's travels during her four years as America's top diplomat.

The lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court in Washington (and posted here) complains that the State Department has taken no action for months on separate requests the advocacy group filed for all official photos of Clinton, all videos State made of her and for hotel invoices and other records relating to 10 foreign trips she took as secretary from 2010 through 2012.

A State Department spokesperson declined to comment on the newly-filed suit.

Last week, Citizens United filed suit seeking emails and other correspondence between top aides to Clinton and consulting firm Teneo, which was founded by one of President Bill Clinton's top aides, as well as correspondence relating to the Clinton Foundation.

The conservative group was already suing State in yet another case over a failure to respond to a request for manifests of travelers on Clinton's official trips. Earlier this month, a judge set deadlines for the agency to begin rolling disclosures of records responsive to that request, but she did not rule that any specific information must be disclosed.

Clinton, who's expected to announce a presidential bid in the next couple of weeks, is currently enmeshed in a controversy about her decision to use only a private email account during her tenure as secretary. She said she did so for convenience, but the practice may have put thousands of emails beyond the reach of Freedom of Information Act requests.

In December, Clinton turned over 55,000 pages of emails from that account to the State Department at its request. State spokespeople have said the agency is processing those messages for release under FOIA rules. Officials have predicted that process will take several months but have not committed to a specific deadline.

Hillary Clinton Moved Her Head, According To Crack Campaign Reporters (Huffington Post)

By Jason Linkins

March 24, 2015

Huffington Post

Presumptive Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton was a featured guest Monday at the Center for American Progress' "Expanding Opportunity in America's Urban Areas" conference in Washington. According to the liberal think tank's website, the event "[brought] together a small group of public, private, philanthropic, and nonprofit leaders to discuss challenges that our metropolitan regions face, as well as emerging solutions, laying the foundation for a vision of a thriving urban America that supports national prosperity."

Clinton's participation in the event offers a hint as to what her own economic policy priorities might be, and to whom she might turn for help in crafting a presidential platform. As Bloomberg's Melinda Henneberger put it: "For the many progressives who wonder where exactly Clinton stands on a number of issues, including trade, Wall Street reform and how she'd address income inequality, inspiring the feeling that they are being heard as she's still sketching out the policy particulars of her expected presidential run is no small thing."

Except it was a small thing, at least to Henneberger, who used the better part of her word count to inform readers that Clinton successfully made gestures and said some things, including fairly uncontroversial remarks about how the middle class is good and kids should be able to go to school and stuff. Per Henneberger, Clinton "nodded vigorously" and "took copious notes" and did so "with great enthusiasm." And like, you also had to listen to the notes she wasn't playing: "In a way, the message [Clinton's] body language sent was perfect: I'm here. I'm listening more than I'm talking. And I am even willing to go to school."

Yes, in a way. In another way, there was this whole policy conversation going on about how to improve urban economies. Henneberger caught snatches of this conversation and arranged them in a pastiche. Here's a taste:

When [Clinton] did speak on Monday, she talked about investing in infrastructure, including human infrastructure. Among the most pressing questions, she said, are, "What do we do to better equip our people to be able to take the jobs? And how do we keep middle-class families in cities where they want to stay? They don't want to leave, but they're being priced out."

Several unconnected instances of Clinton dialogue follow. In a way, the message that Henneberg's report sends is perfect: "I was here. I listened more than I talked. And I did the bare minimum to prove that to my credulous editor."

Clinton's remarks accounted for just a few minutes of the hourlong session, in which multiple politicians, advocates and policymakers offered their thoughts on how to address the (very important, and very daunting!) problems that face American cities. One of the more interesting points, and one that came up again and again, was that many of the assembled experts see urban economic renewal as something that begins at the local level -- something conceived among community stakeholders, municipal and regional governments, and private or philanthropic investors. In other words, Monday's roundtable was no festival of top-down, let-the-federal-government-take-the-lead policy ideas. So one might wonder: How, exactly, would Hillary Clinton, or any other president, facilitate this sort of change from the Oval Office?

I mean, when I say "one" might wonder, it's shorthand for "one substantively invested in a presidential election." But probably what most people want out of their political coverage is an Instagram video of Hillary Clinton nodding her head. Good news, then, because that's what The New York Times' official Hillary Clinton chronicler, Amy Chozick, got out of the session.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If you're into the whole "policy ideas that could affect people's lives" side of this story, the Center for American Progress has listed a bunch here, along with links to other reports they've written that deal more specifically with things like lessening the burden of people with criminal records as they move back into the productive economy, facilitating the establishment of "anchor institutions" in underserved communities, clearing out some of the regulatory impediments to infrastructure construction and expanding access to credit among distressed consumers.

But, if you prefer, here once again is that crackerjack video of Clinton nodding, because with 21st-century political coverage, you are there.

Hillary Clinton seeks clean slate with press (Politico)

By Dylan Byers

March 24, 2015

Politico

Weeks after being dogged by accusations of secrecy, Hillary Clinton told journalists Monday that she wanted “a new relationship with the press.”

Speaking at a dinner in honor of veteran Washington Post correspondent Dan Balz, the all-but-certain presidential contender acknowledged that her “relationship with the press has been at times, shall we say, complicated.”

But Clinton said she was “all about new beginnings.... A new grandchild. A new hairstyle. A new email account. A new relationship with the press. No more secrecy, no more zone of privacy … After all what good did that do for me?”

Clinton has spent nearly three decades in the public eye, the great majority of which have been notably contentious. Her most recent dismissal of the media’s obsession with her private email account seemed to portend another antagonistic spell in Clinton-press relations.

In an appeal to journalists, Clinton praised Robin Toner, the former New York Times correspondent and namesake of the evening’s prize, saying we need “more Robin Toners” to “get us out of the echo chambers we all inhabit.”

“We need more than ever smart, fair-minded journalists,” she said.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS, HOST: And the author of "Clinton Clash," Peter Schweizer, joins us now.

Thank you for joining us this morning, Peter.

You know, I was looking at the book jacket right here and you say that, here in the book jacket that your reporting raises serious and alarming questions about judgment of possible indebtedness to an array of foreign interests and ultimately, a fitness for high public office.

So how does your reporting show that Hillary Clinton may be unfit for the presidency?

PETER SCHWEIZER, AUTHOR, "CLINTON CLASH": Well, I think the real question here, George, is when you ever have an issue of the flow of funds to political candidates, whether that's to their campaigns, whether that's to private foundations, whether that's to their spouse, is there evidence of a pattern of -- of favorable decisions being made for those individuals?

And I think the -- the point that we make in the book is that there is a troubling pattern.

There are dozens of examples of that occurring.

Some people, I think particularly the Clinton camp, would say that these are all coincidence. I don't think, when you're talking about 12 instances, you're talking coincidence. I think you're talking trend.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But you take it pretty far. You write that, "The pattern of behavior is troubling enough to warrant further investigation by law enforcement (INAUDIBLE)."..

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Do you have any evidence that a crime may have been committed?

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think it's -- if you look at a couple of recent examples. For example, Governor McConnell down in Virginia, or you look at Senator Menendez , in these cases, you didn't have evidence of a quid pro quo. What you had was funds flowing to elected officials, some of them gifts, some of them campaign contributions and actions that were being taken by those public officials that seemed to benefit the contributors.

Certainly, I think it warrants investigation. What that investigation will reveal, we'll see.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But a criminal investigation?

SCHWEIZER: Well, we'll see. I mean that's what the Governor McConnell has faced and that's what Menendez has faced.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the...

SCHWEIZER: And I think the evidence here is far more widespread in terms of repeated action than there were in those two instances.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the Clinton campaign says you haven't produced a shred of evidence that there was any official action as secretary that -- that supported the interests of donors.

SCHWEIZER: Well...

STEPHANOPOULOS: We've done investigative work here at ABC News, found no proof of any kind of direct action. And an independent government ethics expert, Bill Allison, of the Sunline Foundation (ph), wrote this. He said, "There's no smoking gun, no evidence that she changed the policy based on donations to the foundation."

No smoking gun.

Is there a smoking gun?

SCHWEIZER: Yes. The smoking gun is in the pattern of behavior. And here's the analogy I would give you. It's a little bit like insider trading . I wrote a book on Congressional insider trading a couple of years ago and talked with prosecutors.

Most people that engage in criminal insider trading don't send an e-mail that says I've got inside information, buy this stock.

The way they look at it, they look at a pattern of stock trades. If the person has access to that information and then they do a series of well-timed trades. That warrants investigation.

I think the same thing applies here.

By the way, what's important to note is it was confirmed on Thursday, both by "The New York Times" and "The Wall Street Journal ," that there are multi-million dollar, non-disclosed donations that were made to the Clinton Foundation that were never disclosed by the Clintons.

This is a direct breach of an agreement they suggested with the White House.

STEPHANOPOULOS: That -- that is an issue for them, but it's not a criminal -- it's nothing that would warrant a cmii.

So let's look at some of the specifics behind your pattern.

SCHWEIZER: Sure.

STEPHANOPOULOS: A lot of focus on the sale of a company, Uranium One, to a -- to a Russian company. Of course, Frank Drisdra (ph), who had committed, what, a $130 million, a pledge to the Clinton Foundation back in 2006, had had an interest in this company.

But he actually sold it.

SCHWEIZER: Well, he sold his stock, but his firm, Endeavor Financial, continued to do finance deals well after that. And the individuals involved in the book, as you probably read, there are nine -- count them, nine major contributors to the Clinton Foundation who were involved in that nuclear deal.

The two individuals who were the financial advisers on the deal of the sale to the Russians, they're both major Clinton Foundation supporters. The chairman of that Foundation, Ian Telfer, whose donations were not disclosed, campaign -- and sorry, Clinton Foundation contributor. And there are others.

So this is not just about Frank Giustra. This is multiple layers (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: OK, but you didn't disclose in your book that he had sold the interest.

SCHWEIZER: Yes.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Beyond that, this deal was approved by a -- a board of the government called the CFIUS Board.

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: This actually chaired by the secretary of the Treasury...

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- not the secretary of State.

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Eight other agencies on board, the secretary of State, Homeland Security, Defense, Commerce...

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- Energy, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission...

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- signed off on it. And even though the State Department was one of nine agencies to sign off on it, there's no evidence at all that Hillary Clinton got directly involved in this decision.

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think it warrants further investigation. And there's a couple of things that need to be clarified.

Number one, she was one vote -- or the State Department was one vote on CFIUS. But any agency has veto power. So it needs to be unanimous. So they had to support this agreement.

The second thing that I would say is that in the midst of all of this, Hillary Clinton was in charge of the Russian reset. She was in charge of -- in -- of the A123 nuclear agreements with the Russians. She was the one that was meeting with Lavrov. There were four senior congressmen on national security issues that raised concerns about this issue...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But wait a second. There were nine different agencies...

SCHWEIZER: Sure.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- who approved it.

Doesn't that suggest that that was because there was no national security concern, not because of some nefarious influence by Hillary Clinton?

SCHWEIZER: But -- but look at the nine individuals that were on the CFIUS committee, the nine agencies represented.

Who was, by far, the most hawkish on CFIUS issues in the past?

Hillary Clinton. She was big on rejecting the Dubai ports deal. She was big on other issues. She sponsored legislation when she was in the Senate to straighten CFIUS.

This was a signature issue for her and this is totally out of character...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the assistant secretary who sat -- the assistant secretary of State who sat on the committee said she never intervened on any CFIUS issue at all.

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think that deserves further scrutiny. I would question that.

To argue that (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But based on what?

Based on what?

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think based on her (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Do you have any evidence that she actually intervened in this issue?

SCHWEIZER: No, we don't have direct evidence. But it warrants further investigation because, again, George, this is part of the broader pattern. You either have to come to the conclusion that these are all coincidences or something else is afoot.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And that -- that is that -- the Clintons do say it's a coincidence. As they say, you have produced no evidence. And I still haven't heard any direct evidence and you just said you had no evidence that she intervened here.

But I do want to ask a broader question.

It's been reported that you -- you briefed several Republicans on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, including the chairman, Bob Corker.

Did you offer any briefings for Democrats?

SCHWEIZER: No, but I'd be glad to give them before the book is released. This was a -- a friend that asked me. He thought it would be a good idea to talk to these individuals. This was the committee that confirmed her.

And I was glad to meet with them. They did not get copies of the book. They did not get any material. It was simply a verbal briefing.

And I'd be glad to brief any Democrats before May 5th, when the book comes out.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the Democrats have said this is -- this is an indication of your partisan interest. They say...

SCHWEIZER: Well...

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- you used to work for President -- President Bush as a speechwriter. You're funded by the Koch brothers.

How do you respond to that?

SCHWEIZER: Well, George, what did I do when this book was completed?

I went to the investigative unit at "The New York Times," the investigative unit here at ABC. I went to the investigative unit at "The Washington Post." And I shared with them my findings, OK. These are not cupcakes. These are serious researchers and investigators.

And they are confirming what I've reported. So people can look at the facts and...

STEPHANOPOULOS: They haven't come -- they haven't confirmed any evidence of any crime.

SCHWEIZER: Well, but -- but it's not up to an author to prove crime. I mean do you think that when people first started looking at Governor McConnell or they started looking at Menendez, that they immediately had evidence?

You need subpoena power. You need access to records and information. You need access to e-mails.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There's all sorts of things that you can do. You can't leave it up to an author to say that an author has to prove a criminal case.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Finally, Bloomberg News is reporting that you're going to be looking into Jeb Bush's business dealings, as well.

Is that true?

What have you found?

Where and when will you publish?

SCHWEIZER: We've been working on it for about four months. We've been looking at land deals. We've been looking at an airport deal. We've been looking at some financial transactions involving hedge funds based out of the UK.

We have already reached out to several media outlets and we're going to adopt a similar model that we have here, which is to share that information with investigative journalists at established news outlets, share with them that information.

And I think that people will find it very, very interesting and compelling.

Peter Schweizer, thanks very much.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Thanks for having me, George.

Up next, the roundtable on this Hillary book and augways (ph) from the campaign trail.

Plus, same-sex marriage coming to the Supreme Court this week.

Bruce Jenner's big announcement puts transgender issues in the spotlight. We debate the next frontier in civil rights.

And we're back in just two minutes.

POLITICO:
"Michele Bachmann lecturing on foreign policy makes Sarah Palin sound like Dean Acheson," said Adrienne Elrod, a spokeswoman for the pro-Clinton group, Correct The Record. "Hillary Clinton is one of the most admired and respected public figures throughout the world, who continues to prove her knowledge and intellect on foreign policy matters. There is simply no comparison."

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON AND SYRIA

BACKGROUND: In a panel discussion with CNN's Sanjay Gupta at the Clinton Global Initiative recently, Hillary Clinton discussed the situation in Syria and the current steps being taken to address the threat of terrorist groups in the region.

KEY POINTS:

As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton was an early advocate of arming the moderate Syrian opposition. She "believed, at the time, they would be overwhelmed by Assad's military force and that they would open up the door to extremists coming in."

- Clinton has said there is no way to predict if arming the rebels early on would have worked, but she believed it was the best of the options available at the time, a point she reiterated this week when she stated, "I can't sit here today and tell you if we had done what I had recommended we would be in a very different position."

Recently, Hillary Clinton emphasized the importance of the current steps being taken to address the threat of ISIL and other terrorist groups in the region, stating: "It's something the president is right to bring the world's attention to and say, whatever the debates might have been before, this is a threat to the region and beyond."

ELEVEN THINGS YOU SHOULD KNOW ABOUT HILLARY

Secretary Clinton helped restore America's leadership and standing in the world during a time of global challenges and changes. Secretary Clinton worked tirelessly to revitalize American diplomacy and strengthen alliances by traveling nearly a million miles for hundreds of meetings with foreign leaders in 112 countries. As America's lead diplomat, Secretary Clinton understood the importance of engaging the public and took diplomacy directly to people around the world. Just as she was as a senator, Secretary Clinton was a workhorse, often taking on difficult challenges and addressing them directly around the world.

Secretary Clinton built and maintained a coalition to enact the toughest sanctions in Iran's history. Secretary Clinton helped impose the toughest sanctions in Iran's history by getting Russia and China on board. Even the Wall Street Journal editorial board noted that, "Clinton surely pulled out every stop to get Russia and particularly China…on board." And as Howard Dean recently told CNN , "Hillary Clinton cranked up the sanctions for the first time under President Obama that actually made the Iranians come to the table."

Secretary Clinton played an integral role in the New START Treaty with Russia. Secretary Clinton played an active role in reaching a missile reduction agreement with Russia, working to push it through the Senate and securing more than the necessary two-thirds majority. She entered the treaty into force in Munich with her Russian counterpart. As a result of the treaty's passage, there will be fewer nuclear missile launchers . Simply put, the world is safer.

Secretary Clinton supported the raid that brought Osama bin Laden to justice. As NBC's Brian Williams reported on his website, "Secretary of Defense Robert Gates recommended an air strike with no forces on the ground. CIA Director Panetta supported a raid by Special Forces and so did Secretary of State Clinton."

Secretary Clinton helped avert all-out war in Gaza by negotiating a cease-fire between Israelis and Palestinians. In November 2012, after eight days of violence, Secretary Clinton negotiated a Gaza cease-fire with Egyptian president Mohamed Morsi. In an article titled "Hillary Clinton scores Gaza cease fire success," Politico noted that, "Secretary of State Hillary Clinton got a Gaza cease-fire right at the moment hope seemed dead for a rapid end to the violence…"

Secretary Clinton played a role in bringing one war to an end and planning for the end of another. Working closely with Department of Defense colleagues and as part of the President's national security team, Secretary Clinton played a role in the end of war in Iraq and in beginning a transition in Afghanistan, with all NATO allies having agreed to stand-up a post withdrawal support plan. As President Obama told 60 Minutes , it was "all a consequence of the great work that Hillary did and her team did and the State Department did in conjunction with our national security team."

Secretary Clinton was critical in America's "pivot to Asia" strategy. As Martin Indyk of the Brookings Institute wrote in Foreign Policy, "The 'pivot' to East Asia will probably be Obama's most lasting strategic achievement… [but] it is Clinton's too. She laid the groundwork, built the relationships, and developed the complex architecture of the new strategy — and she turned up at that pivotal moment in Vietnam in July 2010 to declare the U.S. commitment to the region." Secretary Clinton earned praise for her work in opening up Burma, a place that had not been visited by a Secretary of State in 50 years.

Secretary Clinton worked to build the coalition to oust Qadhafi and stop massacres in Libya. As the Washington Post reported upon the end of NATO operations in Libya, "U.S. officials and key allies are offering a detailed new defense of the approach and Clinton's pivotal role – both within a divided Cabinet and a fragile, assembled-on-the-fly international alliance. What emerges from these accounts is a picture of Clinton using her mixture of political pragmatism and tenacity to referee spats among NATO partners, secure crucial backing from Arab countries and tutor rebels on the fine points of message management."

Secretary Clinton engaged in economic statecraft. Secretary Clinton's focus on economic engagement resulted inincreased investment through three new free trade agreements (Colombia , Panama and South Korea) and 15 Open Skies agreements including with Japan, Brazil, Saudi Arabia and Israel.

Secretary Clinton brought the State Department into the 21st Century. Secretary Clinton helped the State Department adapt to emerging issues such as cyber security by creating the Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications to combat Al-Qaeda's growing influence online. She recognized the important role of energy in U.S. foreign policy and helped create the Bureau of Energy Resources to protect our energy infrastructure and influence how nations move to cleaner fuel.

Secretary Clinton elevated the cause of women's rights to new heights. Secretary Clinton recognized women's rights as a major foreign policy issue. It is, according to Newsweek, the area of "hardships faced by women and girls across the world–that her impact has been most profound." Hillary convinced the White House to allow her to create a new position at the State Department: Ambassador-at-Large for Global Women's Issues. Newsweek continued, "Across the world, in diverse and deeply reactionary cultures, Clinton and [Ambassador-at-Large] Verveer have spoken and fought to liberalize attitudes on women's role in the economy, girls' schooling, women's health, domestic violence, issues arising from war and conflict, and myriad other concerns."

GMF Experts — January 4, 2016

2015 was a tumultuous year for the transatlantic partners. The refugee crisis, terrorist attacks, Russian aggression, and economic issues dominated discussions on both sides of the Atlantic in ways that would have been difficult to predict at the start of the year. What will 2016 bring? More of the same? Or are new issues lurking in the wings, waiting to make an appearance on the transatlantic stage?

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton Takes Questions Again and Addresses Emails // NYT // Jess Bidgood - May 23, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton took questions for reporters Friday for the second time in a week, commenting on the State Department's disclosure of emails related to the 2012 attack on the American diplomatic compound in Benghazi, Libya.

"I'm glad the emails are starting to come out," Mrs. Clinton said at a campaign event in Hampton, N.H. "This is something that I've asked to be done, as you know, for a long time. And those releases are beginning. I want people to be able to see all of them."

The State Department made public 296 emails related to the attacks, which had been stored on Mrs. Clinton's private email server. Republicans have attacked Mrs. Clinton's use of personal email during the time she was secretary of state, suggested she was trying to hide her correspondence.

Mrs. Clinton has been publicly calling for the release of her emails by the State Department, and said on Friday that she'd like them to be released even faster. She noted that one of the emails was just declared classified. The email, forwarded to her by her deputy chief of staff, Jake Sullivan, involved reports of arrests in Libya of possible suspects in the attack, and was not considered classified at the time.

At the event in New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton said, "I'm aware that the FBI has asked that a portion of one email be held back. That happens in the process of Freedom of Information Act responses. But that doesn't change the fact that all of the information in the emails was handled appropriately."

Mrs. Clinton made the remarks at the Smutty nose Brewing Company, where she led a round-table discussion on American small businesses.

As the event wound down, reporters crowded around Ms. Clinton when she posed for selfies with those in attendance. And then, to the surprise of some who have grown accustomed to Ms. Clinton keeping her distance from the press in her nascent campaign, she took questions.

In response to a question about Iraq, Mrs. Clinton said she agrees with American military strategy there and she did not allude to recent victories by the Islamic State in Ramadi, Iraq, and Palmyra, Syria.

"I basically agree with the policy that we are currently following, and that is American air support is available, American intelligence and surveillance is available, American trainers are trying to undo the damage that was done to the Iraqi army by former Prime Minister Maliki," Mrs. Clinton said. She added, "There is no role whatsoever for American soldiers on the ground to go back other than in the capacity as trainers and advisers."

And she had a curt response to a question about whether Americans trust her on Benghazi:

"I'm going to let Americans decide that," said Mrs. Clinton, before aides whisked her away.

The emails siphoned attention from the intended theme of the day. During her small-business roundtable, which lasted about an hour, Mrs. Clinton discussed economic opportunities for the middle class, declaring at one point, "I want to be the small business president."

Mrs. Clinton also used the event to highlight her support for the Export-Import bank, which guarantees loans for American exports and which faces opposition from congressional Republicans – including some of the presidential candidates – as it nears a deadline for reauthorization.

"It is wrong that Republicans in Congress are now trying to cut off this vital lifeline for American small businesses," said Mrs. Clinton. "It's wrong that candidates for president who really should know better are jumping on this bandwagon."

She also, briefly, seemed to lose track of where she was. "Here in Washington, we know that, unfortunately, the deck is still being stacked for those at the top," Mrs. Clinton said.

Mrs. Clinton has a long history in New Hampshire — she won the 2008 primary here before going on to lose the Democratic nomination to Barack Obama — and some audience members arrived here carry ing relics from trips Mrs. Clinton made to the state in the 1990's during her husband's candidacy and presidency.

David Schwartz, an 58-year-old attorney, had in his pocket a photograph of himself and Mrs. Clinton that he said was taken by Bill Clinton when he was a presidential candidate in 1992. Mr. Schwartz, who works with lenders, is a Republican, but said he would consider supporting Mrs. Clinton because the issue of small business loans is important to him.

Mr. Schwartz compared his photograph to a framed one held by Lincoln Soldati, 66, a defense lawyer. The image showed Mr. Soldati in conversation with Mrs. Clinton when she paid a visit to the University of New Hampshire at some point in the 1990s, and he said he was thrilled that she has returned.

"I don't believe there's ever been anybody running for president that is more qualified than she is," said Mr. Soldati, who is a Democrat.

On policy, Clinton plays it safe // Politico // Annie Karni - May 23, 2015

HAMPTON, N.H. — Hillary Clinton's approach to policy, so far, has been as risk-averse as her media strategy.

On the trail, she prefers the safe hav en of the controlled roundtable setting, and for the most part avoids taking questions from the press. And when it comes to the issues she wants to talk about, Clinton sticks with those that are either so broadly popular as to present no threat to her brand or general-election prospects, or so small-bore as to carry little chance of backlash.

On Friday in New Hampshire, Clinton spoke with a passionate, progressive voice, pounding away at Republicans for "jumping on the bandwagon" to kill the Export-Import Bank, whose authorization in Congress is set to expire June 30. It was a safe call, to say the least: House Democrats support the bank. Moderate Democrats such as Sen. Chuck Schumer support the bank. A liberal like Sen. Elizabeth Warren? She's pro-bank, too.

"It is wrong that Republicans in Congress are now trying to cut off this vital lifeline for American small businesses," said Clinton, at the SmuttyNose Brewery in Hampton. Republicans, she said, would threaten the livelihoods of American workers rather than "stand up to the Tea Party and talk radio. It's wrong, it's embarrassing."

Weighing in forcefully on an issue where her outlook matches that of the majority of her party was right in line with Clinton's posture on many policy issues during this first phase of her campaign.

In her month and a half on the trail, Clinton has spoken in broad terms that give her the appearance of sometimes channeling Sen. Elizabeth Warren and championing the left — in the case of her appearance at SmuttyNose Brewery, sticking up for small businesses and bashing the GOP.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She sounds like she's wrapping her arms around the progressive wing of her party while alienating few. She uses rhetoric that sounds Warren-esque ("The deck is still stacked in favor of those at the top") while being vague about details of how precisely she would address the problem.

One Democratic strategist described Clinton's positioning as a "head fake, making the general audience of the left think she's one of them."

The risk is that Clinton plays into the stereotype that she is a cautious and poll-driven politician more inclined to appease rather than lead. In an op-ed in the Portsmouth Herald Friday, Sen. Marco Rubio knocked Clinton for playing it safe and feeling no pressure to "offer new ideas."

Clinton campaign advisers, meanwhile, argue that her positioning is not a strategy at all, but rather a sincere reflection of her record of fighting for the middle-class.

"The campaign is built on that record and consistent with the values Hillary Clinton has always championed," spokesman Jesse Ferguson said. "It's not about left or right, it's about the values Hillary Clinton believes in and the fight she is continuing to wage."

But the issues her advisers cite tend to be broadly accepted Democratic chestnuts. Clinton has said same-sex marriage should be a constitutional right; the minimum wage should be raised; the Supreme Court's Citizens United decision should be overturned to remove big money out of politics; community college should be free; police departments should be equipped with body cameras; what works in Obamacare should be extended and the high cost of prescription drugs should be lowered; paid family leave should be instituted; effective treatment should be provided for those who suffer from mental health and substance abuse problems.

Some of her stances, such as that on same-sex marriage, represent an evolution from where she has been in the past. But overall, Clinton has not supported progressive positions where she would have to stick her neck out from where the majority of her party is.

Moderate Democrats have taken note. "She's being smart by checking the boxes on progressive issues that have wide appeal across the party, but keeping her general election powder dry by not going too far to the left," said Jonathan Cowan, president of Third Way, a think tank started by former Clinton administration staffers.

Nonetheless, she's succeeded in giving the impression of moving to the left.

The right-wing America Rising PAC has already accused Clinton of "staking out far-left positions that are outside of the mainstream of most Americans." Even some of her biggest donors claim they see a shift.

"I think she is moving a little bit to the left and I think that's fine," hedge fund manager Marc Lasry, who recently hosted a fundraiser for Clinton, said in a television interview with Bloomberg. "People who are giving money to her understand that."

But supporting universal pre-k and reforming student loans are hardly bold positions for Democrats in 2015 — instead, Democratic strategists argued, they act as liberal stalking horse issues that allow a candidate to appear boldly progressive while risking little.

A real sign that Clinton was tacking left would be a call for a single-payer healthcare system, or a promise to break the country's large banks, or returning to a higher income-tax rate on everyone making more than $1 million a year. Clinton is unlikely to take those positions, and so far has not offered those kinds of specifics.

Indeed, as Vox.com's Jonathan Allen pointed out, 91 percent of voters said they favored police officers wearing body cameras, according to a Pew poll from last year. An NBC/Wall Street Journal poll from April showed that 58 percent of respondents favor legalizing same-sex marriage. And 57 percent of voters support a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants who live in this country, according to a CBS/New York Times poll from earlier this month.

On those issues that could be potentially costly to her — like weighing in on President Obama's trade deal or the Keystone XL Pipeline— Clinton has notably refused to weigh in.

"Her strategy: alienate no one," said Democratic strategist Hank Sheinkopf. "Give the left of the Party no reason to criticize. Rhetoric works better than detail. Rhetoric you can change or edit. Details are difficult to erase."

Details, such as how much she would like to raise the minimum wage, have yet to be shared. Even on immigration, where Clinton surprised many of the immigration activists who in the past had protested her speeches, some are still waiting eagerly for specifics. Clinton has yet to outline how, legally, she would be able to institute any policy that would go beyond where Obama went with an executive action to let millions more undocumented immigrants gain protections and work permits.

"Everything we hear now is words on the campaign trail, but the proof is in the pudding," said Javier Valdes, co-executive director of Make the Road Action Fund. "We appreciate that she's pushing the envelope. But the details will matter. We're happy to hear that she's taking that stance but we need to hear a little bit more."

The hope, Democrats said, is that Clinton will soon add specifics to the outlines of policy she has only traced so far.

On Thursday, the campaign announced its big kick-off rally, where Clinton will address thousands of supporters with a big-picture speech about her candidacy and her vision for the future.

Hillary Clinton in Seacoast: 'I want to be small business president' //Seacoast Online // Erik Hawkins - May 23, 2015

HAMPTON — Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, a former first lady, U.S. senator and secretary of state, began her day in the Seacoast Friday at Smuttynose Brewery, playing to the crowd of small business leaders gathered for the occasion.

"I want to be the small business president," Clinton said. "Let's make 'middle class' mean something again."

Before she sat down at the forum, Clinton took a 20-minute tour of the brewery with owner Peter Egleston. Clinton called the brewery "impressive."

When Egleston noted his beer is served even in Dublin, Ireland, Clinton said, "It's a small world story."

Clinton received a warm reception in the crowded warehouse stacked high with kegs as the strains of Miles Davis played and she joined Egleston and Joanne Francis, owners of Smuttynose Brewing, along with five other area business owners for a discussion on making small businesses successful.

Clinton's remarks were brief. She said although the national economy is "out of the ditch," the country still has to "stand up and get running again."

Clinton said small business owners' hard work and investments should pay off, and they should feel secure in saving for their children's college and their own retirement.

"The big businesses have a lot of advantages that you don't," she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton also called for regulations to be loosened on community banks to ease lending to small businesses.

Francis, the brewery 's co-owner, said it had been a "white-knuckle ride" securing loans and other money to start the brewery and open a new operations facility in 2014. "It was terrifying, to be honest with you," Francis said.

Panelist Charlie Cullen, of The Provident Bank, in his closing words with Clinton asked her to "please soften (the Dodd-Frank bill) just a little bit," then added, "I think now it's time for a Smutty!"

There were a few eyebrows raised when, while standing in front of prominently placed Smutty nose signs, Clinton began a remark by saying, "Here in Washington ..." The apparent gaffe went unremarked on at the time, though it began circulating quickly online through social media and news reports.

After greeting supporters and taking several brief questions from the press, Clinton departed for Exeter's Water Street Bookstore, for a grassroots organizing meeting.

When asked about the recent release of her State Department emails, Clinton said she was glad the emails from her controv ersial private server were being released, albeit slowly.

"It has been my request from the beginning that they release as many as possible," she said. "I also understand that there is a protocol being followed."

When asked her position on the Trans-Pacific Partnership currently being negotiated by President Obama, which has drawn criticism from the political left and perceived to be conceived in secrecy, Clinton was not prepared to take a firm stand.

"I have some concerns about protecting American workers and a level playing field, as well as currency manipulation ... as I've said before, though, I will make up my mind — I will judge this when I see exactly what's in it," she said.

Clinton also said regarding the conflict in Iraq and the setbacks in the fight against Islamic State militants that, "at the end of the thought process, this has to be fought and won by the Iraqis. There is no role whatsoever for American troops on the ground bey ond training the Iraqis."

At Water Street Bookstore in downtown Exeter, Clinton joined owner and town Selectman Dan Chartrand, along with other local Democratic activists and representatives including state Reps. Alexis Simpson and Marcia Moody , Selectwoman Nancy Belanger and Selectwoman Julie Gilman to continue her discussion of concerns facing small businesses.

Water Street filled quickly with supporters, including a group of Phillips Exeter Academy students, who said they were missing a scheduled sports photo in order to catch a glimpse of Clinton. Across the street, a handful of Clinton opponents gathered for a brief time holding signs that read, "Clinton Lied. Four heroes died," and Tea Party slogans, but appeared to disperse quickly.

Chartrand said after the event that Clinton's message about expanding access to capital for small business owners resonated strongly with him, and that although he only truly became politically active in 2012, he was "now a canvasser, through and through."

"Tv e fallen in love with campaigning," he said.

"What I love specifically is that she has a real focus in her economic plan for leveling the playing field for small businesses and community banks," he added. "That's a huge part of the reason I'm supporting her."

Hillary Clinton has been an official candidate for president for five weeks, and she still hasn't done the thing most candidates do on day one: give a speech laying out her vision for America. Nor is she planning on doing so anytime soon. Politico reports that Hillary's "why I'm running for president," speech, initially scheduled for May, has now been delayed until June, or even later.

There's a reason for that: The speech is unlikely to be very good. Soaring rhetoric and grand themes have never been Hillary's strengths. That's one reason so many liberals found her so much less inspirational than Barack Obama in 2008. And it's a problem with deep roots. In his biography, A Woman in Charge, Carl Bernstein describes Hillary, then in law school, struggling to articulate her generation's perspective in an address to the League of Women Voters. "If she was speaking about a clearly defined subject," Bernstein writes, "her thoughts would be well organized, finely articulated, and delivered in almost perfect outline form. But before the League audience, she again and again lapsed into sweeping abstractions."

Team Clinton appears to understand this. And so it has done something shrewd. Instead of talking vision, Hillary is talking policy, which she does really well.

The Many Measures of Hillary Clinton

If Hillary's struggles with vision go back a long time, so does her passion for wonkery. As a student government leader at Wellesley, Bernstein notes, Hillary developed "a better system for the return of library books" and "studied every aspect of the Wellesley curriculum in developing a successful plan to reduce the number of required courses." In 1993, she took time off from a vacation in Hawaii to grill local officials about the state's healthcare system. In his excellent book on Hillary's 2000 Senate race, Michael Tomasky observes that, "In the entire campaign, she had exactly one truly inspiring moment" but that, "over time it became evident to all but the most cynical that she actually cared about utility rates."

Hillary's handlers have played to this strength. On April 29, she devoted the first major speech of her campaign not to her vision for America, but to something more specific: race and crime. She began with a graphic and harrowing description of the young black men recently killed by police:

Walter Scott shot in the back in Charleston, South Carolina. Unarmed. In debt. And terrified of spending more time in jail for child support payments he couldn't afford. Tamir Rice shot in a park in Cleveland, Ohio. Unarmed and just 12 years old. Eric Garner choked to death after being stopped for selling cigarettes on the streets of this city. And now Freddie Gray. His spine nearly severed while in police custody.

She recounted advocating for prisoners while director the University of Arkansas' legal-aid clinic. She noted the parallels between race and class, observing that life expectancy is declining not only for many African Americans, but also for white women without high-school degrees. And she made the crucial point that because government currently treats drug addiction and psychiatric disorders primarily as criminal rather than public-health problems, "our prisons and our jails are now our mental health institutions."

The speech was not merely substantive. It was authentic. It showcased the real Hillary Clinton: A woman who, whatever her faults, hates injustice and knows what she's talking about when it comes to government.

A week later in Las Vegas, Hillary gave another impressive speech, this one on immigration. In a media environment where "pro" and "anti" immigration often refers merely to how many people America lets in, Hillary turned the conversation to how America treats immigrants once we do. First, she talked movingly about her childhood memories of the migrant farm workers who worked in the fields around Chicago. Then she attacked the idea, common in "pro-immigration" Republican circles, that America should legalize undocumented immigrants without allowing them citizenship. "Today not a single Republican candidate, announced or potential, is clearly and consistently supporting a path to citizenship," she declared. "Not one. When they talk about "legal status," that's code for "second-class status." America, Hillary insisted, must see the undocumented not merely as workers, but as human beings.

Sooner or later, Hillary will have to move from policy to philosophy. It may be a rocky transition. And if the Republicans nominate Marco Rubio (which at this point looks like a decent bet), she will face a candidate who interweaves personal biography and national aspiration better than she does. But if Hillary stumbles, these opening weeks of her campaign may offer a template for how she regains her footing. She's at her best talking about America not abstractly, but concretely. She's most inspiring when talking not about what she believes, but about what she wants to do. And she most effectively humanizes herself by being true to who she is: knowledgeable, passionate, and vaguely obsessive about making government work. Against Rubio, or any other likely Republican challenger, that identity should provide an excellent contrast.

Va. Democrats hope to use Clinton mojo to improve their own position // WaPo // By Rachel Weiner – May 24, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton needs Virginia Democrats next year. But they need her now.

In what is expected to be a heav ily competitiv e presidential battleground in 2016, Democrats have a more pressing challenge this fall: trying to gain control of one of the state legislature's two Republican-held chambers.

Democrats are within one seat of taking the state Senate. But low turnout in off-year elections tends to favor Republicans, and there is little evidence so far that voters are engaging with unusual enthusiasm.

That's one reason organizers think a little Clinton excitement could help.

That dynamic was on full display on a recent weeknight night in Arlington, when a couple of hundred Clinton enthusiasts gathered at a second-floor sports bar for one of the first campaign meetings in the state.

"Hillary is all about building up the Democratic Party ," Susan Johnson told the crowd, many of whom knew each other from previous campaigns. "What she wants us to do is make sure our Democratic candidates in the state Senate, in the House of Delegates, get elected."

Ginning up grass-roots excitement during off-y ear state elections helps Clinton, too, by starting to build the organization she'll need to win the battleground state next y ear and earning favor with Democrats who might think she is taking her nomination for granted.

Johnson, a elementary school teacher turned full-time political activist, is the one paid Clinton staffer in the state. Since the Clinton campaign launched in mid-April, Johnson has been working to build up a network of v olunteers aimed at sustaining momentum until the real staff comes in. She's held similar events in Annandale and Richmond. Three more are scheduled for Newport News, Ashburn and Roanoke.

Clinton is "extremely supportive of us in Virginia to take this opportunity, while we're building the grass roots for her, applying that grass roots immediately and getting Dems elected this year," Johnson said.

A visit by Clinton in June is being promoted heav ily as a chance to refill depleted state party coffers. Democrats are expecting so large a crowd that the annual Jefferson-Jackson event is no longer being called a "dinner" — the party hopes for so many attendees that a sit-down meal would be challenging.

A spokesman said Clinton will "earn every vote" in Virginia's primary and is "committed to strengthening Virginia Democrats so they win elections across the board in this year and beyond."

Democratic control of the state Senate would be a boon for a close friend of Clinton's, too: Gov. Terry McAuliffe (D). It would give the governor a bulwark against the Republican-dominated House in his final two y ears in office. It would show his clout as a Democratic leader on the national stage. And it would help build momentum in crucial areas of the state for

Clinton, whose campaign he chaired in 2008.

“The best way y ou can help Hillary is to help elect Democrats to the state Senate,” said Brian Zuzenak, who leads the governor’s political action committee.

The Democrats’ path to that mutual victory won’t be easy, though they need to take only one Republican seat to create an even split in the Senate. (That would give Democratic Lt. Gov. Ralph Northam the power to break any tie votes.) Republicans are already mobilizing.

“We’re expecting our targeted races to make thousands of voter contacts each week now, and if they’re not we’re having some real heart-to-heart conversations with them,” said Republican Senate Caucus Chairman Ryan T. McDougle (Hanover).

In only one of the districts Democrats are hoping to flip hav e they consistently won the past few statewide elections. That seat is held by retiring Sen. John C. Watkins (R-Powhatan). Watkins represents both Demo¬cratic Richmond voters who Clinton will be looking to turn out in droves and ¬Republican-leaning suburban areas where she will need to be competitive.

Other top Democratic targets may be harder to win, but they are in swing territory that will be critical in 2016 — Loudoun and Prince William counties, Hampton Roads.

Arlington is now solidly Democratic, but it’s where some of the party ’s most dedicated and well-connected members are based.

Northern Virginia is “the top of the swing, the base of the tsunami that’s going to roll down south and turn the entire state blue,” Johnson told the crowd to cheers.

But the cheering was far more muted when she turned to this year’s races. How many eager Clinton volunteers will turn out, as she urged, at the “awesome parade” in Falls Church on Memorial Day?

Democrats hope many of them will be like Arman Azad, a voluble 17 -year-old who can’t yet v ote but has been volunteering for Democrats for y ears. He took the Metro from Tysons Corner to Arlington by himself and quickly gravitated toward the few other teenagers in a room of 20-to-5 0-something professionals.

Azad got inv olved with the Arlington County Democratic Committee when he was looking for a school community service project. Soon he was a convert, trudging through the snow to help elect state Sen. Jennifer T. Wexton (Loudoun) in a hotly contested special election last year.

Growing up, he says, “I always perceived Virginia as this conservative Southern state.” When he started pay ing attention to politics, gay marriage was banned in the state and the government was embroiled in controv ersy ov er transv aginal ultrasounds for women seeking abortions.

Now, the marriage ban has been overturned in court after the state attorney general refused to defend it.

Some friends, he said, agree that progressiv e political activ ism is now “cool.” Others are persuaded that it will look good on their college applications.

Maurice Champagne, 34, is way past college. He just finished graduate school. When he saw Clinton’s announcement video, he laughed, because the first story was his own. Like the woman in the video, his mother moved from Pittsburgh to Falls Church so he could go to a school where a 7-year-old wouldn’t get jumped in the halls.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He volunteered for the Obama campaign in 2008 but was too busy with his dissertation in 2012. The Clinton event Tuesday was his "first step to get back into the real world."

Asked whether he would keep volunteering from now through 2016, however, he was skeptical.

"Until I find a job," he said.

The Real Democratic Primary: Hillary Versus the Media // The New Republic // Suzy Khimm -May 22, 2015

Beth Lilly, 29, remembers the first time she felt like the media was doing Hillary Clinton wrong: It was in 1992, when she was just about six years old, and remembers that people weren't happy about Hillary's chocolate-chip cookie recipe.

The incident was actually one of the most infamous moments of the 1992 campaign. "I could have stayed home and baked cookies and had teas, but what I decided to do was fulfill my profession," Hillary said. The comment prompted a media firestorm—and an invitation from "Family Circle" magazine to pit her cookie recipe against Barbara Bush's. "The press coverage was just so absurd," recalls Lilly, who's now a policy attorney in Washington, D.C.

It was Lilly's very first memory of Hillary. Twenty-three years later, Lilly sees the Hillary pile-on is happening yet again, and she'll be there to support her. "So her foundation took money. It's kind of what foundations do," she tells me at a recent happy hour for Clinton supporters in Arlington, Virginia.

To the irritation of her biggest devotees, the controversial donations to the Clinton Foundation—and the efforts to tie them to Hillary's policymaking at the State Department—have loomed over the early weeks of her official campaign. Jack Bardo, a young Democratic activist from Arlington, believes "the media is missing the mark" by focusing on such issues. "I wasn't surprised—that's what you'd expect in this media landscape," says Bardo, who supported Clinton in the 2008 primary.

The lack of competition in the Democratic primary has left Hillary's most ardent supporters with the strange task of having someone to root for, without having someone to root against. Her Republican opponents are a distant challenge; the other Democratic candidates are mere speed bumps in the polls. Instead, the most visible threat to Hillary is her own public image, leaving her early supporters with the dual mission of ginning up enthusiasm for her campaign—and pointing fingers at the media for trying to drag her down.

Just a few Metro stops from the White House, the northern Virginia corner of Hillaryland is particularly well suited to the task of flacking for Clinton, full of political junkies, yellow-dog Democrats, media-savvy consultants, grad students, wannabe Hillary campaign staffers, and other ambitious professionals who are old enough to have grown up with Hillary but too young to have been burned out on anti-Clinton mudslinging.

Nate Maeur, 29, remembers seeing Hillary for the first time on TV when he was young. She was advocating for children's rights in Africa. "I remember being glued to the TV as a really little kid, watching her, almost being entranced by what she was saying, what she believed in, because it was exactly what my mother was saying," says Maeur, who runs a workforce development organization. "I'm surprised I didn't confuse my mom for her, and say—'Oh, there's Mom right there.'"

For Clinton's younger supporters—many of whom, like Maeur, were Barack Obama campaign volunteers—their memories of the scandals and pseudo-scandals of the Clinton years are hazy at best, filtered through the soft focus of childhood. In sharper relief for them are the accomplishments that Hillary has racked up since then—U.S. senator, 2008 candidate, secretary of state—which her young Arlington supporters quickly rattled off when asked why they were backing her. "She's going down in history whether people like it or not," says Renzo Olivari, 19, a political science major at James Madison University who hopes to run for office one day. He was still in middle school during the 2008 campaign but remembers watching her speeches at age 12 and getting "emotionally invested" in the Clinton campaign even then.

In Clinton, young supporters see someone who's risen up through the political establishment on her own merits: the ultimate Washington success story. What they missed earlier in the '90s was what Josh Marshall describes as the "Vince Foster moment" that the Clintons had to overcome first:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For those of you not familiar with Vince Foster, his tragic suicide or the years-long right-wing clown show it kicked off, it is probably best described as the '90s version of Benghazi...It's never enough for the Clintons' perennial critics to be satisfied with potential conflicts of interest or arguably unseemly behavior. It's got to be more. It always has to be more. There have to be high crimes, dead people, corrupt schemes. And if they don't materialize, they need to be made up. Both because there is an organized partisan apparatus aimed at perpetuating them and because there is a right-wing audience that requires a constant diet of hy perv entilating outrage from which to find nourishment.

Hillary's older supporters remember those days all too well and are quick to point out the larger machinations of the anti-Clinton apparatus. "You think of all this dirt that gets thrown out at her every day. There are what, 30 organizations that have been founded to throw crap at her?" says Allida Black, 63, a historian and long-time Hillary supporter who co-founded the Ready for Hillary SuperPAC.

The Clinton Foundation story is almost perfectly designed to polarize Clinton's supporters and opponents along traditional lines. Critics say donations from foreign governments and business interests with a stake in administration policy raise conflict-of-interest questions, but even the conservative author leading the charge on the issue, Peter Schweizer, acknowledges there's no "direct evidence" linking Clinton to any specific quid pro quo deal. Whether you believe there's more to the story than just bad "optics" mostly depends on whether you see it as merely the latest in a long line of trumped-up Clinton scandals that didn't pan out or the newest example of those ruthless and corrupt Clintons flouting the rules for personal gain.

But like many of Hillary 's young supporters gathered in Arlington, Oliv ari doesn't blame Republicans or a "vast right-wing conspiracy." Instead, he faults the media itself for driving the controversy ov er the Clinton Foundation, the Libya intervention, and Clinton's use of her personal email at the State Department. (The New York Times broke the story on her personal email, going off a tip from an unidentified source.) "The media—they're bringing these allegations and these scandals up to see if anyone else in the Democratic side will emerge as a strong candidate and they can go head to head," says Olivari, who hopes to run for office one day. He adds: "That sells, if you put that out, it sells. It's them trying to tailor the election to their own needs, rather than what the election is."

Hillary herself has been keeping the media at an arm's length, taking only a handful of questions from the press in the early weeks of the campaign. And that control—otherwise known as campaign "discipline"—has ev en extended to the upstairs bar in Arlington where her early supporters gathered on Tuesday . I try to talk to Nalini Pande, a health policy consultant who had organized the happy hour in Arlington as a more casual alternative to the traditional house party. But a Clinton grassroots organizer in Virginia offers herself up for comment instead.

Obama's own campaign had a similarly defensive attitude toward the media, but also pioneered new ways to bring his own message directly to supporters without the press. And that's ultimately what the Clinton campaign is try ing to draw on as well: Growing its own grassroots network of support—online and on the ground—that doesn't need external news outlets to carry her message. And ultimately, the need for that ground-lev el enthusiasm that will be a far biggest obstacle for Clinton to overcome than Clinton Foundation-palooza.

The Clinton campaign has been organizing similar grassroots events with paid staffers in all 50 states. It's building not only a base of volunteers for Hillary's campaign, but also a way to push back against the barrage of negative attention in the media that Clinton's early supporters are so frustrated with. "Every day I meet people who are so happy about this in a way that's different," says Black. "This is what you want to get done, not about what y ou're against." After everyone goes home, Pande keeps the cheering squad alive on Twitter: "So excited that the Hillary Happy Hour I planned in Arlington,VA had an awesome turnout! It looked like we had about 200 people!#Hillary2016."

Clinton's NH appearance draws ardent supporters, curious onlookers // Concord Monitor //Casey McDermott - May 23, 2015

The windows were papered over from the inside, and on the door of the Water Street Bookstore in the middle of Exeter, a sign informed customers: "We are closed from 12-3 p.m. today due to a private ev ent. We apologize for the inconvenience!"

For those who hadn't seen the candidate arriv e firsthand, these clues — and the steadily growing crowd of onlookers waiting on the sidewalk outside of the bookstore — were enough to attract dozens and dozens more as the afternoon wore on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Hillary Clinton is inside the bookstore,” one young woman, who waited well over an hour outside of the store yesterday afternoon, assured a friend on the other end of her cell phone. “I’m not kidding . . . I’m sure it’s Hillary Clinton, dude.”

Indeed, dudes, Clinton was there inside greeting an audience of about 5 0 supporters — taking questions and signing books before ev entually emerging to an enthusiastic group. It was her second stop on her second trip to New Hampshire in her second bid for the Democratic presidential nomination, and one that attracted the largest audience of onlookers of any of the events she’s held so far this year.

Earlier in the day, Clinton toured Smuttynose Brewery in Hampton and hosted a roundtable to talk about the challenges facing small businesses. Later in the day, her schedule included a stop for ice cream at Moo’s Place in Derry and more time spent in private events with supporters.

Inside the bookstore, the group included a mix of those invited by the campaign and by the owner. Outside, the group was even more v aried: plenty of ardent supporters, others who were somewhat supportive but not entirely sold on Clinton’s latest bid for the White House, some students from nearby Phillips Exeter Academy, and lots who wanted to meet (or, at the very least, take a picture of) the presidential candidate. One woman held a handmade sign that declared, “We (heart) Hillary!”; another man held a less-enthusiastic sign that played off of Clinton’s supporters’ “Ready for Hillary” rallying cry, “I’m Ready for Oligarchy.”

Two of the students who were waiting outside, Ariana Patsaros and Nicole Don, will be v oting in their first presidential election next year. Both 18 years old, they were drawn to the chance to see the candidate up-close — but they held different sentiments toward Clinton.

Patsaros, who said she’s been active in her school’s Democratic Club, was already a big fan and is hoping to soon intern with the candidate. She only arrived about 15 minutes before Clinton exited the store, but she still lucked out with a good spot.

“Some tall person let me in front of him, and I ended up getting a selfie with her,” she said, adding, “She’s my idol, to be honest. I’m so glad that I had this opportunity .”

Don, meanwhile, is still making up her mind. She said she’s socially liberal, but economically more conservativ e, and she’s paying close attention to candidates’ foreign policy positions.

“I’m torn,” Don said after the event, as the crowd had mostly disappeared and the street returned to normal. “Still torn.”

Unlike her friend, she didn’t get a chance to see Clinton up-close. She picked a spot on the other side of the store, and the candidate was farther out of view.

“I know it’s totally random what happened,” Don said. “Still, it hits you in the gut when you wait an hour and a half.”

Laura Lunardo was passing through town when it seemed like things were buzzing outside of the bookstore. The Exeter resident didn’t stick around with the rest of the crowd, but she said she would hav e liked to see more face-to-face interaction from Clinton on the campaign trail.

“I think there should be more public events. I think she needs to be accessible, and people want to hear some answers,” said Lunardo, who hasn’t yet committed to Clinton but tends to lean toward Democratic candidates. “People who hate her are going to hate her. People who want to try and support her, just tell us what’s going on. And the reporters, let the reporters talk to you.”

Martha Kies was picking up her daughter, Solveig, at school up the street when she saw the gathering on the sidewalk. Luckily for the two of them, they managed to get a place right next to a Secret Service officer and had a prime spot to wave to Clinton when she left the store. Kies, who also leans Democrat, said she’s still “waiting to hear a bit more” before making her mind up on who to support for the 2016 presidential race. In any case, she thought it would be great for her young daughter to see the candidate up close.

“If she wins she’ll be the first woman to win,” Kies said. “So we talked about that. It’s exciting for young girls to see that possibility .”

Overall, Kies was grateful to hav e the chance to see Clinton. Still, she said, “It would have been great to have her talk, rather than just sort of make an appearance” outside before leaving.

One of those inside the store with Clinton was Nancy Richards-Stower, whose long history of campaign work in New Hampshire includes an active role in Bill Clinton’s 1992 bid for president. Earlier in the day, Richards-Stower was stationed at the bottom of the hill at Smuttynose Brewery — balancing a giant “Hillary” campaign sign against a tree while holding another handmade sign supporting her.

As she waited to giv e the candidate a warm welcome ahead of the brewery tour, Richards-Stower said there’s no question in her mind about supporting Clinton this time around.

“They’re issue people,” she said of the Clintons, recalling how impressed she was with Hillary during her time campaigning for her husband two decades ago. “They’re issue people and loyal friends, and that’s what I love.”

Now, as Clinton takes on another campaign of her own, Richards-Stower said she doesn’t think the focus on roundtables and priv ate events, over more public ones, will be a problem in the long run.

“There’s being president, and there’s being a campaigner. So which do y ou care more about — that she’s going to be a fabulous president or a fabulous campaigner?” she said. “This is her opportunity — it sounds so trite, but it’s true — to really hear what the struggles are of the normal person. And you can’t get that if you’re standing in front of a thousand people in a big auditorium. You have to get that in a small group. Now, how does Hillary Clinton get to be in a small group? It has to be organized.”

Hillary Clinton says more em ails will be released // Boston Globe // Chris Cassidy -May 23, 2015

HAMPTON, N.H. — Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton said she wants more of her private emails as secretary of state to come out faster as she faced the press y esterday just minutes after the State Department released nearly 300 of her messages, many of them on the Benghazi attack.

“I’m glad the emails are starting to come out,” Clinton told reporters. “This is something I’ve asked to be done for a long time. Those releases are beginning. I want people to be able to see all of them.”

Among the highlights of the 896-page email treasure-trove:

• One of her emails about the Sept. 11, 2012, Benghazi attack was upgraded from unclassified to “secret” with 23 words of a November 2012 message redacted at the FBI’s request.

• Clinton appears to mistakenly refer to one of the Benghazi attack victims as “Chris Smith,” though it’s unclear whether she’s referring to diplomat Sean Smith or Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens — who both died. The email asks whether the State Department should announce the death that night or in the morning.

• Clinton asked to “pls print” an article called “Benghazi Was Obama’s 3AM Call,” a headline referencing Clinton’s famous attack ad against then-Sen. Barack Obama during the 2008 Democratic primary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

• As Clinton recovered from health issues, including a concussion that forced her to miss a congressional hearing, she wrote to two State Department officials attending in her place: “I’ll be nursing my cracked head and cheering you on as you ‘remain calm and carry on!’ ” In a follow-up email, she wrote: “What doesn’t kill y ou makes you stronger (as I have rationalized for years), so just survive and you’ll hav e triumphed!”

Clinton hardly seemed defensiv e about the emails yesterday.

“I would just like to see it expedited so we can get more of them out more completely,” she said.

Clinton held a tightly controlled small business roundtable at the Smuttynose Brewery and answered five questions from the mob of reporters — but none from the 50 people gathered at the inv itation-only event.

Arrows printed on paper were hung up to guide Clinton through her brewery tour, and an event organizer repeatedly ordered a Herald reporter to push back to arbitrary places on the warehouse floor to prev ent any unplanned interaction between the candidate and a member of the press.

“I wouldn’t want you to jump out at her,” one of the organizers warned.

Afterward, Clinton spoke to campaign supporters in Exeter and Amherst, and stopped at Moo’s Place in Derry, where she greeted customers and ordered a “kiddie”-size chocolate peanut butter and fudge sundae with a cow-shaped cookie on top.

Question foreshadows Hillary Clinton’s biggest fear // Boston Globe // Joe Battenfield - May 23, 2015

Only once did Hillary Clinton’s armor show signs of cracking — just enough to rev eal a glimpse into what her cruise control campaign fears the most.

On the floor of a New Hampshire brewery, surrounded by kegs and cases of porter and IPA, Clinton easily batted away media questions until this one got through:

Clinton didn’t wait for the finish to shoot back: “Well, I’m going to let the Americans decide that.”

Just one word, “Americans,” but the annoyance was audible. Clinton, of course, already knows voters will pick her. A remnant from the arrogant White House days.

But here’s the problem: If Clinton is so sure voters are behind her, why is she mostly avoiding them in her visits to New Hampshire? Not a single town hall meeting with unscreened questions.

Clinton is just mailing it in right now, and she really doesn’t hav e to do much more.

During her visit to Smutty nose Brewery, where the general public was kept far away by campaign aides and Secret Service, Clinton didn’t even have to demand “equal pay for women.” One of the invited guests at the “small business” roundtable, Smuttynose co-owner Joanne Francis, did it for her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The other co-owner of the brewery, Peter Egelston, who sat on the other side of Clinton, is a stalwart Democratic donor, records show. And FYI, Hillary, he liv es in Maine, not New Hampshire.

It's not uncommon for candidates to pack their ev ents with ringers, but all the others have subjected themselves to sometimes unpleasant questions at town hall meetings.

Not Clinton, yet. She did make a quick stop for ice cream yesterday, posing for photos. And she's finally starting to answer questions from the press — yesterday mostly national reporters who know her. She walked over to NBC's Andrea Mitchell first.

But on those new rev elations that she used her private server for emails in the aftermath of Benghazi, Clinton stuck to script. She wants the State Department to release those gosh darn emails as quickly as possible, of course.

Those answers won't suffice when the campaign gets more heated and more details about the emails surface. That's not even counting potentially more damaging questions about donations to the Clinton Foundation and Hillary and Bill raking in huge corporate pay checks for speeches.

Republicans will get their chance soon in debates to hone their attacks on Clinton, and the most skilled one will probably get the nomination.

And luckily, "Americans" who aren't in the tank will eventually get their chance. And sav vy Granite Staters will probably want to know one thing from Hillary Clinton.

Just what are you afraid of?

Hillary Clinton responds to released emails while in N.H. // WHDH // Byron Barnett - May 23, 2015

EXETER, N.H. (WHDH) -

Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton received information on her private email server that has now been classified about the deadly attack on U.S. diplomatic facilities in Benghazi.

The email in question, forwarded to Clinton by her deputy chief of staff Jake Sullivan, relates to reports of arrests in Libya of possible suspects in the attack.

The information was not classified at the time the email was sent but was upgraded from "unclassified" to "secret" on Friday at the request of the FBI, according to State Department officials. They said 23 words of the Nov . 18, 2012, message were redacted from the day's release of 296 emails totaling 896 pages to protect information that could damage foreign relations.

Because the information was not classified at the time the email was sent, no laws were v iolated, but Friday's redaction shows that Clinton received sensitive information on her unsecured personal serv er.

No other redactions were made to the collection of Benghazi-related emails for classification reasons, the officials said. They added that the Justice Department had not raised classification concerns about the now-redacted 1 1/2 lines when the documents were turned over to the special House committee looking into the Benghazi attack in February. The committee retains a complete copy of the email, the officials said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is at the end of a chain of communication that originated with Bill Roebuck, the then-director of the Office of Maghreb Affairs, that pointed out that Liby an police had arrested several people who might have connections to the attack. The redacted portion appears to relate to who prov ided the information about the alleged suspects to the Liby ans. A total of five lines related to the source of the information were affected, but only the 23 words were deleted because the FBI deemed them to be classified.

Roebuck's email was sent to a number of senior officials, including the former assistant secretary of state for near eastern affairs, Elizabeth Jones, who then sent it to Sullivan with the comment: "This is preliminary, but very interesting. FBI in Tripoli is fully involved."

Sullivan then forwarded the email to Clinton with the comment: "FYI."

There was no immediate indication that Clinton herself forwarded the email.

While touring the Smuttynose Brewery in Hampton, New Hampshire, the main focus of Clinton's visit was promoting small businesses. She addresses the State Department releasing her emails and said she was "glad" the emails are beginning to come out.

"I'm aware that the FBI has asked that a portion of one email be held back," said Clinton. "That happens in the process of Freedom of Information Act responses. But that doesn't change the fact that all the information in the emails was handled appropriately."

Clinton participated in a roundtable discussion at the brewery, where she said she wants to be the "small business president." She also criticized the Republican presidential candidates for supporting measures to cut government funding that helps small businesses.

What the resurfacing of Sidney Blum enthal says about Hillary Clinton //Vox // Jonathan Allen - May 23, 2015

Old Clinton hands don't fade away. They always resurface.

That's the case with Sidney Blumenthal, the Clinton scandal veteran and purveyor of opposition research who turned up in a trove of Hillary Clinton e-mails at the center of the House Benghazi Committee's investigation into the attack that killed four Americans in Liby a in 2012.

As the New York Times first reported, Blumenthal sent Clinton a big batch of memos about the situation on the ground, many of which she forwarded to other State Department officials and many of which were deemed off-base by the agency 's own experts. According to the Times, Blumenthal was, at the same time, adv ising associates who were trying to win business from the transitional Libyan government Clinton had helped install by pushing for a coalition war to oust Qadhafi.

His pet theories included a warning that the Al Qaeda affiliate in North Africa would use American weapons to retaliate against the U.S. for the raid that killed Osama bin Laden.

The emails, which were released Friday as part of a larger disclosure by the State Department, don't provide much texture to Clinton's decision-making on Libya or how she assessed the situation in Benghazi in real time. The real question is what was in the emails Clinton destroyed after determining unilaterally that they did not deal with government business. But the emails released by State do show that Blumenthal, who had no connection to the U.S. government, acted as an unofficial adviser to Clinton on Libya — and that she sent her own aides to chase down his leads, no matter how implausible.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

More saint than sinner

Blumenthal's ability to access her when she was secretary of State is a reminder that it's damn near impossible to be ex-communicated from Clinton's orbit, especially if one has been bloodied defending her and her family in Washington's political wars.

Even after President Obama promised to let Clinton pick her own team at State, the White House drew a line at hiring Blumenthal. That's because they suspected him of peddling the nastiest "opposition research" about Obama during the 2008 Democratic primary.

But he's seen much more as a saint than a sinner in a Clinton world that values loy alty abov e all other traits. That's why his proximity to Clinton didn't come as a shock to people in her inner circle.

He was among her most ardent and v icious defenders during the Clinton White House y ears. Back then, his aggressive tactics included digging into reporters and was frequently accused of pushing negative story lines about officials who investigated Bill Clinton. As a former reporter, he could be counted on to have a view of how to manipulate the press, and, in the emails released Friday, he appeared to take credit for placing a story by Craig Unger in Salon in an email to Clinton.

He's a walking reminder of the bloodsport politics that defined the Clintons in the 1990s.

Longtime Clinton advisers say one her great strengths and weaknesses is that she seldom casts anyone aside. That means she gathers information from a vast array of sources. But it also means political players like Blumenthal who have burned through their good will with many other Washington figures can still gain influence through her.

Blumenthal, who wrote a book about his years as a White House defender called "The Clinton Wars," stands out because he's well known in Washington and because he was e-mailing Clinton about Libya and Benghazi, the very topics at the center of Republican inquiries into Clinton.

The State Department

Some of the dozens of emails Blumenthal sent Clinton on Libya and the Benghazi attack.

But former advisers frequently send Clinton long memos on all manner of issues, from politics and communication to policy. She likes to absorb it all. In that way, and perhaps only in that way, her communication with Blumenthal is orthodox for Clinton. And there's nothing wrong, per se, with him sending her memos. That said, she kept her longtime adviser working for her, against the will of the Obama White House, while he worked for the Clinton Foundation.

Why Clinton won't cast him aside now

Now, there's even more reason for her to hold Blumenthal close: He will appear before the Benghazi Committee. If she cut him loose, he might be less inclined to keep her best interests at heart when testifying.

Clinton gave him a vote of confidence during a Tuesday press conference.

"He has been a friend of mine for a long time. He sent me unsolicited e-mails which I passed on in some instances," she said. "When you're in the public eye, when you're in an official position, I think you do have to work to make sure you're not caught in the bubble and you only hear from a certain small group of people. And I'm going to keep talking to my old friends, whoever they are."

It is increasingly clear that Hillary Clinton will have to overcome a number of serious voter concerns about her to win the presidency. These challenges have been complicated by the unprecedented position in modern times of not having a real challenger from within her own party.

Though the latest polls continue to show her leading the modest field of announced and potential Democratic candidates, they also show significant declines in her favorability rating and concerns about her honesty and trustworthiness. One of the most troubling findings for her in recent national surveys is that while she leads most Republican candidates in head-to-head match-ups, she runs about even with Sen. Rand Paul and is not that far ahead of several others.

Her strategic problem is that, absent a strong Democratic challenger to duke it out with, questions about various Hillary controversies, her age and the "Bill factor" will hang there to be resolved in the general election against a Republican candidate who has been on the road addressing his or her own image weaknesses.

Meanwhile, the press, which would ordinarily be covering a full set of Democratic candidates, has and will continue to turn its undivided attention to Hillary. And that has a downside. Note, for example, recent criticisms over Clinton not taking press questions for 21 days, getting speaking fees from lobbying groups, the income she and Bill have earned in recent years, and so on. While media attention is a positive for a candidate, being its almost sole focus on the Democratic side has not been easy.

And this could well serve to demoralize Democratic voters. There are already signs of that in the national polls. The Pew Research Center found Democrats far less engaged in the presidential race than they were eight years ago, while Republicans are not. A March survey found just 58 percent of Democrats saying they had given a lot or some thought to the presidential candidates, compared to 71 percent back in 2007. There was no significant falloff in Republican campaign interest.

Indeed, according to the latest Pew survey, Republicans are more positive about the GOP field than they were at nearly comparable points in the past two presidential campaigns: 57 percent rate it excellent or good. In contrast, fewer Democrats (54 percent) are positive about the current group of candidates than felt the same way in September 2007 (64 percent). Not surprisingly, then, an April Gallup poll found 54 percent of Democrats saying a number of strong candidates competing for the nomination would be better for the party, while only 40 percent thought it would be better for a single strong candidate to emerge early.

In the end, Hillary's problems are not with Democrats, who will ultimately back her if she is the nominee, but with the broader electorate. And recent polls showed the impact of the latest round of Clinton controversies.

Gallup found her unfavorable rating climbing steadily—from 39 percent in March to 46 percent in mid-May—which virtually matches her unfavorable rating in Pew's May survey (47 percent). And the April Wall Street Journal/NBC poll added that 50 percent of its respondents gave her a negative rating when it comes to being "honest and straightforward."

The good news for Hillary is that she recovers well. Her favorable ratings have dipped into the 40s in the Gallup rating on a number of occasions over the past 20 years, only to strongly recover into the 60s for significant periods of time. And while voters worry about her honesty, they give her a positive rating for being knowledgeable and having the experience to handle the presidency (51 percent, according to WSJ/NBC) and having strong leadership qualities (65 percent, CBS/New York Times).

From this vantage point, Clinton would be well served at this stage by having other Democratic candidates to absorb some of the torrent of press scrutiny to which she has been subjected. On the Republican side, only Jeb Bush has received anything close to the same focus. At this pace, one can only wonder about the condition of her public image when she starts to take on the Republican nominee.

Miss Uncongeniality // Free Beacon // Matthew Continetti - May 23, 2015

There it was—the classic Hillary charm. Close to a month had passed since the Democratic frontrunner answered questions from the press. So this week, when reporters were invited to gawk at the spectacle of Clinton sitting with "everyday Iowans," Ed Henry of Fox wanted to know: Would the former secretary of state take a moment to respond to inquiries from non-stage-managed reporters?

Before Henry was able even to finish his sentence, however, Clinton interrupted him, tut-tutting his impertinent shouting and raising her hand, empress-like, to quell her subject. After a few seconds of talking over each other Clinton must have realized that she had to give Henry an answer. Whereupon she said, slowly and sarcastically: "I might. I'll have to ponder it." What a kidder.

After the photo-op was over, Clinton did take six questions from reporters—raising the total number of media questions she has answered since announcing her candidacy in April to a whopping 26. She committed no gaffes, but unleashed the full blizzard of Clintonian misdirection, omission, dodging, bogus sentimentality, false confidence, and aw-shucks populism. Voting for the Iraq war was a "mistake," like the kind you make on a test; she and Bill are lucky people (that's one way of describing them); Charlotte needs to be able to grow up in an America where every little boy and girl has the chance to go from public office to a foreign-funded slush fund; and family courtier and dirty trickster Sid Blumenthal is just an "old friend" who sent her emails about Libya, where he had business dealings, so that she could get out of her "bubble."

Not much for an enterprising reporter to go on. And for all we know, the ice caps will have melted before Clinton submits to more questions. It's part of her strategy: limiting press availabilities also lessens the chances of another "dead broke" moment, of giving answers that raise more questions. Clinton is busy—raising money, positioning herself on the left to thwart a liberal insurgent, doting on Iowa so as not to repeat her defeat there in 2008. Talking to reporters would be a distraction or, worse, an error. Everyone knows who she is. And interviews leave exposed the most vulnerable part of her campaign: herself. Nor is it like she doesn't have anything to hide. She has a whole lot to hide: her record, her emails, her charity, her brothers, and her friends. Why risk it?

This strategy of press avoidance worked for Clinton pal Terry McAuliffe in 2013 when he was elected governor of Virginia. McAuliffe rarely if ever spoke to reporters, and instead visited with carefully selected businesses and interest groups and sob stories to whom he would nod sympathetically and explain, in the vaguest of ways, how he would make the commonwealth a better, more progressive place. McAuliffe's campaign manager was Robby Mook, who now performs the same job for Clinton. The lesson he must have drawn from his Virginia experience was that the press, at best, is a nuisance and irrelevant to the outcome of an election. Strategic communications, lots of money, television advertising that defines one's opponent as extreme, and the Democratic "coalition of the ascendant" are enough to win.

At least it's enough to win Virginia in a—surprisingly close—off-year election. But treating the press with contempt may not work at the presidential level. On the contrary: It could backfire. Not because voters care about how the press is being treated; they don't. But because the media are exactly that: the medium through which a candidate is presented to the public. Disturb the medium, tic off its individual components, and the presentation may begin to change.

Slowly and subtly, a candidate may find herself shown to be inaccessible, aloof, conniving, manipulative, privileged, elusive, dishonest. The questions she faces might grow more hostile; the investigations into her wealth might widen; interest in her husband's friendship with Jeffrey "Lolita Express" Epstein might sharpen. The message she wants to communicate could be displaced by a media-driven caricature.

Republicans know what I'm talking about. They live with it every day: rising stars that go into eclipse, hidden behind media cartoons. Dan Quayle, Clarence Thomas, Dick Cheney, Sarah Palin, Ted Cruz. The latest target is Tom Cotton—see how a Harvard-educated combat veteran is being labeled an amateur, out of his depth, disruptive because of his efforts to stop the nuclear deal with Iran. Our media are fickle, sensationalistic, anxious, insecure, and petty. They're surprising me with their tough coverage of the Clinton Foundation. Imagine what might happen if Hillary really begins to annoy them.

The assumption has been that the mainstream press will guard Clinton like they did Obama in 2008—avoid damaging lines of inquiry, play up the gender angle just as they played up the racial one. I don't see it happening yet, however. Clinton can't be happy with the way her candidacy has been portrayed in the media, from her speaking fees to her email server to the family foundation. You can't ascribe this treatment to the conservative press alone—though we've happily played our part.

Since Bill first became president the Clintons have held a suspicious attitude toward the media, an attitude the media seem to have reflected back at them. Obama was new, cool, postmodern, suave; Clinton is old, a grandmother, clumsy, a millionaire many times over who has been one of the most famous people in the world for more than two decades. She has none of Obama's edge, his antiwar bona fides, the quasi-mystical importance his followers bestowed on him. No one would have written a story about Obama like the one McClatchy wrote about Hillary on Thursday: "Clinton campaigning in a bubble, largely isolated from real people." That's why she has Sid.

The press will no doubt take a different approach once the Republicans choose a nominee, who can then be written off as primitive or corrupt or inexperienced or stupid. I'm not expecting a revolution here, a paradigm shift in the way the media establishment conducts itself. But I am surprised at the way in which Hillary and her supporters dismiss media complaints as extraneous. Bad press hurts campaigns—ask Al Gore, John Kerry, or Mitt Romney. It can hurt Hillary Clinton too. Saturday Night Live is already portraying her as a power-mad robot; think of the damage that could do to perceptions of her over time. And there's plenty of time.

By not talking to the press Clinton has made a strategic choice, as valid as any other. But it may be the wrong choice—in fact it probably is the wrong choice, because most of the choices Hillary Clinton has made since 2006 hav e been bad. She lost the Democratic nomination, she was the top foreign policy official for a president who is widely seen to hav e bungled foreign policy , she joined the ethically murky Clinton Foundation and gav e high-pay ing speeches to business groups despite knowing she'd soon be running for president.

It's the same lack of judgment and mismanagement that would cause her to vote for Iraq, then oppose the surge, then support the troop withdrawal; to do Obama's bidding on Russia, Israel, Iran, Libya; to keep up the pen pal correspondence with Blumenthal; to act unlike any presidential candidate in recent memory. Maybe I'm dreaming, but the press could respond by taking someone who's likable enough—and making her not likable at all.

Silda Wall Spitzer hosts Hillary fundraiser // Politico // Annie Karni - May 23, 2015

Call it the wronged political wives club.

Former New York Gov . Eliot Spitzer's ex-wife, Silda Wall Spitzer, is hosting a $2,700-a-head fundraiser for Hillary Clinton on June 1 in Manhattan, from 12 to 2 p.m., billed as "a conv ersation with Hillary Clinton."

In 2008, Silda Wall Spitzer drew notice for standing stoically by her husband's side when he resigned from office after it was rev ealed that he was caught up in a prostitution ring scandal.

The "Hillstarter" event is notable as the former governor — who ran unsuccessfully for New York City comptroller in 2013 and now ov ersees his family 's real estate firm — has ties to Team Martin O'Malley. O'Malley , the former governor of Mary land, is expected to announce his candidacy for president on May 30 in Baltimore, Md., and Spitzer has been in a long-term, committed relationship with O'Malley's spokeswoman, Lis Smith, for close to two years. But Spitzer is now said to be completely out of politics and not expected to donate to either Democratic candidate.

Silda Wall Spitzer has kept a low profile since her divorce from the former governor was finalized last year, when she reportedly receiv ed a $7 .5 million pay out, including the former couple's Fifth Avenue home. She has been a stalwart Clinton supporter, giving $5,000 to the independent Ready for Hillary super PAC in 2013.

On the same day as the Manhattan event, Clinton is also scheduled to hit up a fundraiser in Queens, N.Y. and a fundraiser at the home of longtime supporters Mindy and Jay Jacobs in Laurel Hollow, N.Y., according to a copy of the email invitation obtained by POLITICO.

On June 5 , Clinton will attend a fundraiser at the home of philanthropists Carolyn and Malcolm Wiener in Greenwich, Conn.

Hillary Clinton to Hold Fund-Raiser Hosted by Spitzer's Ex-Wife // NYT // Maggie Haberman - My 23, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Rodham Clinton will hold a string of fund-raisers on June 1, including one hosted by the ex-wife of Eliot Spitzer, the former governor of New York who resigned amid scandal in 2008.

The event for Mrs. Clinton, one of three New York-based events that day, will be hosted by Silda Wall, according to the invitation.

The hosts of Mrs. Clinton's fund-raisers this cycle haven't been particularly noteworthy — most have been longtime supporters, and Ms. Wall is no exception. But Ms. Wall is also the ex-wife of Mr. Spitzer, who resigned after he was caught up in an investigation into a prostitution ring.

Mr. Spitzer is in a long-term relationship with Lis Smith, a well-known Democratic operative who is also a longtime spokeswoman for Martin O'Malley, the former governor of Maryland who is expected to begin his 2016 presidential campaign on May 30. The fund-raising event was first reported by Politico.

Some of Mrs. Clinton's allies still recall with frustration the Democratic presidential primary debate in October 2007 in Philadelphia, when she stumbled over a question about a plan by Mr. Spitzer to allow driver's licenses for unauthorized immigrants. That stumble was seen as contributing to her downward spiral in the polls. Mr. O'Malley has frequently talked about his support for such driver's licenses.

Mr. O'Malley is seen as a potential vessel for more left-leaning Democrats looking for a challenge to Mrs. Clinton within the party. He has been ratcheting up his populist oratory, drawing comparisons to Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, a vocal proponent of curtailing Wall Street excesses.

Yet that language is also very similar to how Mr. Spitzer carved out a role on the national stage; he became known as the "sheriff of Wall Street" when he was the New York attorney general. Mr. O'Malley has hired Jimmy Siegel, a Madison Avenue ad-maker whose first political campaign was Mr. Spitzer's run for governor in 2006, and who subsequently worked for Mrs. Clinton's 2008 campaign.

Mr. O'Malley's aides, meanwhile, have grown sharper in drawing a generational contrast with Mrs. Clinton, who will be 69 on Election Day 2016.

Mr. O'Malley, 52, was a strong supporter of Mrs. Clinton in her 2008 presidential campaign. But in recent days, his aides have signaled that they will point to him as a more future-looking candidate than she is.

Asked about the fact that some Maryland elected officials, such as Senator Ben Cardin, have been backing Mrs. Clinton, and her team's aggressive efforts to corral support in Mr. O'Malley's home state, one of Mr. O'Malley's aides, Haley Morris, gave a statement to the Baltimore Sun that used the word "old" twice.

"The establishment backing the establishment is the oldest story in politics," Ms. Morris said. "If Governor O'Malley runs for president, he'll bring new leadership — not old-guard establishment thinking — to the race."

Mrs. Clinton is holding more than a dozen fund-raisers in different cities ahead of her June 13 campaign kickoff rally.

Elizabeth Warren and Democrats should be down with TPP // WaPo// Johnathan Capehart - May 23, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now that the Senate has passed a Trade Promotion Authority (TPA) bill that would fast-track passage of the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) trade deal, the action moves to the House where my hope for cooler Democratic heads will surely be dashed. And we will hav e Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) partially to thank for it. The leader of the progressive wing of the Democratic Party has whipped into a frenzy members of Congress who insist on fighting the last war.

Warren was dead set against TPA, which is basically a broad, congressionally approved outline that sets the parameters for the TPP that President Obama is negotiating with 11 other nations. Her steadfast opposition to TPP on behalf of American workers who believe global trade shipped their jobs overseas is understandable. I just wish Warren were telling the truth.

During an interview with Peter Cook of Bloomberg News on May 19, Warren trod her usual path to slam a trade deal she strongly believes is detrimental to the American people. “We’re being asked to grease the skids for a deal that’s basically done but is being held in secret until after this vote,” Warren said in a double-play diss of TPA and TPP. Here’s the thing: nothing’s secret.

Yes, it is secret from you and me. As Ruth Marcus correctly explained, “This is not secrecy for secrecy’s sake; it’s secrecy for the sake of negotiating adv antage. Exposing U.S. bargaining positions or the offers of foreign counterparts to public view before the agreement is completed would undermine the outcome.” But TPP is not secret to Warren. She has read it.

“Hav e you been able to read the deal,” MSNBC’s Rachel Maddow asked Warren during an April interview. “Yes,” Warren replied. She went on to explain that any member of Congress can do so. That is true. The voluminous and changing deal sits in a basement room in the Capitol where members and staff with security clearances can read it. Any member of Congress who wants to be briefed on the emerging agreement or ask questions about what they are reading can call the offices of the United States Trade Representativ e (USTR). According to the folks at USTR, there have been more than 1,700 in-person briefings on the deal. In fact, Ambassador Michael Froman, who is the USTR, has personally briefed Warren on various aspects of TPP.

Now, about Warren’s assertion that TPA “grease[s] the skids for a deal that is basically done.” She used that phrase six times in the 10-minute Bloomberg interview. And she makes it sound like Congress has no and has had no input whatsoever into TPP. Not true. Warren conveniently neglects to mention that every proposal in the deal is and has been previewed with Congress. Or that members of Congress can offer and hav e offered proposals of their own to USTR.

Again, the concerns about the effect another trade deal will have on the American worker are real. The opposition roaring out of the House Democrats is understandable. After 21 years, the bitter aftertaste of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) remains. Shuttered factories and the lost jobs that ensued led many Americans, Democrats and Republicans, to turn inwards to protect their livelihoods. That’s why Rep. Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio) said in a statement last month that past trade deals “put the American Dream out of reach for countless working families.” Even the president acknowledges that “past trade deals haven’t always lived up to their promise.”

United States Trade Representative Michael Froman (Andrew Harnik/The Washington Post)

But as I read and do my own reporting on TPP, I keep coming back to a reported conversation between Obama and the late Apple maestro Steve Jobs. According to the New York Times, at a 2011 dinner in Silicon Valley, the president asked Jobs why iPhones couldn’t be made in the United States?

Mr. Jobs’s reply was unambiguous. “Those jobs aren’t coming back,” he said, according to another dinner guest.

Froman told me the United States has three options with regard to TPP. The first option is the status quo. That’s the state of play we have now where “those jobs aren’t coming back,” as Jobs said. It’s also a state of play where large companies may see greater benefits to moving operations abroad and smaller ones face a hill too steep to export. And let’s not even talk about the existing trade deals between some of our biggest trading partners that put U.S. firms at a competitive disadv antage.

The second option is implementing TPP. Froman and the administration have argued consistently that unprecedented labor requirements (minimum wage, the right to collective bargaining) and environmental standards (protections for endangered wildlife and oceans) would “level the playing field” for American workers to compete with their counterparts in what would be the largest free-trade zone in the world. “With open markets there, you give U.S. companies an incentiv e to keep manufacturing here and ship goods ov erseas,” Froman said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The third option, Froman said, was for the U.S. to sit back and let China set the rules in the region with its own trade deals with nations in the region. China would lov e nothing more than for TPP to fail. According to a story from MarketWatch, China's State Council is "panicky" over the trade deal. The report points out that the Council believes, "Implementation of the TPP will 'further impair China's price adv antage in the exports of industrial products and affect Chinese companies' expansion' abroad...."

"They are working to carve up the market," Froman told me. "Would you rather a world where the Chinese set the rules of the road or we set the rules of the road?" The latter option is unacceptable. With its polluted air and controlled economy that has a seemingly endless supply of controlled workers, Beijing couldn't care less about labor, the environment or any of the other values forming the foundation of TPP. In addition, the geopolitical benefit of the deal is a stronger U.S. presence in the region as a counterweight to China.

No trade deal is perfect. The U.S. won't get everything it wants in the negotiations, but it's getting pretty darned close. And the people's representativ es in Congress have and have always had the ability to see and shape the forthcoming agreement. Once completed, its terms will be seen by all and debated at the Capitol. That's as it should be. But this nation cannot pretend the world and the global economy hav en't changed since 1994. And Democrats cannot pretend that a progressive president who has championed the cause of the middle class and who they have supported for the last six years would negotiate "a bad deal" that further put American workers at risk.

The House needs to pass TPA so that TPP can be completed and move towards final passage. It's not "greasing the skids." In the 21st century global economy, it's a necessity.

7 ways Bernie Sanders could transform America // Salon // Mathrew Rozsa - May 23, 2015

Say what y ou will about the presidential candidacy of Sen. Bernie Sanders (D-Vt.), but if nothing else, it has certainly introduced some interesting ideas into America's political debate. Considering that the most recent polls show Hillary Clinton with a nearly five-to-one lead over her nearest rival, this can only be viewed as a positive thing.

As Reddit's favorite politician, Bernie Sanders has enormous influence on our political discourse, and his recent policies have been making huge headlines on the Internet. Here are seven way s in which our national discussion on a wide range of issues could be transformed by the Sanders campaign.

1) Guaranteeing free college

In a press conference on Monday, Sanders advocated that the gov ernment fund tuition at four-y ear public colleges and universities through a so-called Robin Hood tax on Wall Street, one that would set a 50 cent tax on every $100 of stock trades on stock sales, as well as lesser amounts on other financial transactions.

More from The Daily Dot: "This death metal band fronted by a parrot is real and it's amazing"

While Sanders' critics are expected to denounce the plan as socialistic, the Vermont Senator is quick to point out that similar proposals are already in effect and successful elsewhere. "Countries like Germany, Denmark, Sweden, and many more are providing free or inexpensive higher education for their y oung people," Sanders points out. "They understand how important it is to be investing in their youth. We should be doing the same."

Although Obama promised free community college for students who qualify, Bernie Sanders' proposed policy shows that with America's burgeoning debt crisis, we need to go ev en further.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2) Addressing income inequality

In an interview with the Associated Press confirming his presidential run, Sanders cited America's growing income inequality as one of the chief motivators behind his campaign, a well-timed stance given the recent #FightFor15 on Twitter.

"What we have seen is that while the average person is working longer hours for lower wages, we have seen a huge increase in income and wealth inequality, which is now reaching obscene levels," Sanders argued. "This is a rigged economy , which works for the rich and the powerful, and is not working for ordinary Americans."

Sanders has proposed a number of reforms to solve this problem, from legislation that would close corporate tax loopholes to raising the minimum wage above $7.25 an hour, a rate Sanders describes as a "starvation wage." For the working poor, getting by continues to be a daily struggle, and Sanders is fighting to change that.

ADVERTISEMENT

3) Regulating Wall Street

If you think Sanders' free college plan has Wall Street concerned, you can only imagine how they feel about Sanders' proposed bill for breaking up banks that are considered "too big to fail." In fact, polls show 58 percent of likely voters agreewith his basic argument that "if an institution is too big to fail, it is too big to exist," indicating that merely denouncing Sanders as a radical won't necessarily work for this measure.

What's more, banking lobbyists are concerned that anti-bank sentiment within the Democratic grassroots could push Clinton to the left on this issue. "The prospects of it becoming law are nil," reported one banking lobbyist to the Hill. "But we care about whether this impacts Hillary and whether she'll try to pander to the far left."

More from The Daily Dot: "'The Crow' is recasting its supervillain as a woman"

But for the millions who continue to be affected by the 2008 crash and the effects of the American banking bubble on our Great Recession, it's not just about pushing Hillary to the left. It's about pushing America forward.

4) Legalizing marijuana

Although Sanders told Time magazine that he doesn't consider marijuana legalization to be "one of the major issues facing this country ," his sympathies on the subject are pretty clear.

"If y ou are a Wall Street executive who engaged in reckless and illegal behavior which helped crash the economy leading to massive unemployment and human suffering, your bank may have to pay a fine but nothing happens to you," heexplained in an AMA session on Reddit. "If y ou're a kid smoking marijuana or snorting cocaine, you may end up in jail for years."

He also supports increased use of medical marijuana and takes pride in the fact that no one was arrested for marijuana possession or use when he was mayor of Burlington, Vt. Given the negative impact of three decades of the War on Drugs on incarcerating urban residents at disproportionate rates, particularly black men, this is a policy that is long ov erdue.

Although Hillary has vowed to fight the prison-industrial complex, Sanders shows he's already ready to take the first steps.

5) Fighting free trade

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There is another issue in which Bernie Sanders may push Clinton to the left: free trade.

Although hardly a trending topic, Sanders is a longstanding opponent of international trade agreements like NAFTA that he believes work against the interests of average American laborers. His current target is the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which is being pushed by the Obama administration despite the fact that its provisions have not been made public.

"It is incomprehensible to me that the leaders of major corporate interests who stand to gain enormous financial benefits from this agreement are actively involved in the writing of the TPP," Sanders wrote in a letter to the Obama White House, "while, at the same time, the elected officials of this country, representing the American people, have little or no knowledge as to what is in it."

6) Confronting climate change

Sanders' has made no secret of his contempt for global warming deniers. To embarrass anti-science Republicans, he introduced a "sense of Congress" resolution in January that simply acknowledged man-made climate change was real and needed to be addressed. By voting in favor of the measure, Congress would do little more than place itself "in agreement with the opinion of virtually the entire worldwide scientific community."

More from The Daily Dot: "People are freaking out over this photo of a woman being walked around on a leash"

Although the amendment was tabled by a mostly party-line vote of 56-42, Sanders' reputation as an unwavering advocate of pro-environmental policies when dealing with climate change hasn't gone unnoticed. Climate Hawks Vote, a super PAC dedicated to addressing global warming, ranked Sanders as the number-one climate leader in the Senate.

7) Criticizing Israel

If elected in 2016, Sanders would be America's first Jewish president, and that makes his willingness to criticize Israel all the more significant. During a town hall event last year, Sanders got into a shouting match with constituents who were angered by his statement that Israel "overreacted" in its military campaign against Hamas and was "terribly, terribly wrong" for bombing UN facilities.

His stance on Israel could hardly be described as blindly pro-Palestinian, however. In the same town hall meeting, he acknowledged that Israel was in a tricky situation because Hamas was firing rockets from populated areas, but he has no love for Israel's right-wing Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, distinguishing himself as the first Senator to openly refuse to attend Netanyahu's speech to Congress.

Regardless of whether one agrees with Sanders' views on these issues, the odds are still far greater than not that he won't receive the Democratic nomination next year. In addition to being on the far left in his own party, Sanders is a septuagenarian from a minority background who hails from one of America's smallest states.

At the same time, he is still giving voice to a series of positions that deserve a more prominent place in our political debate. When all is said and done, this can only be a good thing.

Kaine's quest for war legitimacy // WaPo // George F Wil - lMay 23, 2015

The Revolutionary War and the Civil War ended in Virginia, which was involved, by the 9/11 attack on the Pentagon, in the beginning of today's war with radical Islam. Now a senator from Virginia is determined that today's war shall not continue indefinitely without the legitimacy conferred by congressional involvement congruent with the Constitution's text and history .

Tim Kaine, former Richmond mayor, former Virginia governor and former national chairman of the Democratic Party, represents the distressingly small minority of legislators interested in crafting an authorization for use of military force (AUMF). This is easier vowed than accomplished.

George F. Will writes a twice-weekly column on politics and domestic and foreign affairs. He began his column with The Post in 1974, and he received the Pulitzer Prize for Commentary in 1977. He is also a contributor to FOX News' daytime and primetime programming.

Kaine's interest in Congress's role in the making of war quickened in October 2002, when President George W. Bush, on the eve of midterm elections, sought an AUMF regarding Iraq, even though the invasion was not imminent. The Univ ersity of Virginia's Miller Center released the report of the National War Powers Commission , co-chaired by former secretaries of state James Baker and Warren Christopher. It recommended a new codification of the allocation of war powers between the president and Congress.

On Sept. 7, President Obama said he was going "on the offensive" against the Islamic State. In August, he had gone beyond the protection of threatened consular staff at Irbil, an emergency presidential responsibility requiring no congressional authorization. When, however, he unilaterally undertook, also in August, military action to protect a dam about 80 miles from Irbil, Congress, with the lassitude of an uninvolv ed spectator, did not express itself. Instead, it recessed unusually early , seven weeks before the 2014 elections.

Such dereliction of duty, Kaine says, is as unacceptable as pretending that the AUMF of Sept. 18, 2001, suffices to regulate presidential war-making discretion in the current context. Lacking both temporal and geographic limits, it authorized force "against those nations, organizations, or persons" who "planned, authorized, committed, or aided" the 9/11 attacks "or harbored such organizations or persons." The Islamic State did not exist then and today is a hostile riv al to al-Qaeda. Even while the twin towers and Pentagon still smoldered, Congress rightly rejected language authorizing force "to deter and pre-empt any future" terrorism or aggression.

While now claiming to need no authorization beyond that of 2001, Obama suggests an AUMF that would permit military action against the Islamic State and "associated forces," which would include any group, anywhere, seeking a charisma injection by claiming adherence to the Islamic State.

Because the definitions of today's enemy and the nature of today's war are blurry, perhaps any new AUMF must be extremely elastic. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) suggests one authorizing "whatever steps are necessary to defeat ISIS. Period." To at least partially immunize the future from today's paralyzing ambiguities about the executive's and legislature's respective war-making responsibilities, Kaine and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) propose legislation essentially incorporating the National War Powers Commission recommendations, as follows:

Unless Congress declares war or otherwise authorizes any "significant armed conflict" ("lasting more than a week"), it must, within 30 day s of the beginning of such a conflict, vote on a joint resolution of approval. This protects presidential power by reversing the presumption of the 1973 War Powers Resolution that inaction by Congress suffices to establish congressional disapproval.

The Kaine-McCain legislation would, howev er, constrain presidents by institutionalizing consultation: The joint resolution would be proposed by a permanent Joint Congressional Consultative Committee made up of the House speaker and Senate majority leader, the minority leaders of both bodies and the chairs and ranking members of the four most germane committees of both (Armed Services, Foreign Relations, Intelligence and Appropriations).

Demographic and geographic factors hav e driv en Kaine's interest in foreign and military policies. When he was born in 1958, 1 in 100 Virginians was foreign-born; today, 1 in 9 is. From its south, with the world's largest naval base (Norfolk), to its north, with Quantico (where Marine Corps officers train) and the Pentagon and associated military contractors, Virginia is, he says, "the most militarily connected state."

As Obama's war strategy collapses, he should welcome company during his stumble through the gathering darkness. As always, however, his arrogance precludes collaboration with Congress. And Congress, knowing that governing involves choosing, which always involves making someone unhappy, is happy to leave governing to him.

When Kaine began running for the Senate, he says he was warned that he would join "the unhappiness caucus" composed of senators who previously had experienced the pleasure of exercising executive power. He is, however, finding satisfaction, of sorts, reminding the national legislature that the fault is not in the stars but in itself that, regarding the most solemn business, it is an underling.

Democrats' Vanishing Future // National Journal // Josh Kraushaar - May 21, 2015

One of the most underappreciated stories in recent years is the deterioration of the Democratic bench under President Obama's tenure in office. The party has become much more ideologically homogenous, losing most of its moderate wing as a result of the last two disastrous midterm elections. By one new catch-all measure, a party-strength index introduced by RealClearPolitics analysts Sean Trende and David Byler, Democrats are in their worst position since 1928. That dynamic has manifested itself in the Democratic presidential contest, where the bench is so barren that a flawed Hillary Clinton is barreling to an uncontested nomination.

But less attention has been paid to how the shrinking number of Democratic officeholders in the House and in statewide offices is affecting the party's Senate races. It's awfully unusual to see how dependent Democrats are in relying on former losing candidates as their standard-bearers in 2016. Wisconsin's Russ Feingold, Pennsylvania's Joe Sestak, Indiana's Baron Hill, and Ohio's Ted Strickland all ran underwhelming campaigns in losing office in 2010—and are looking to return to politics six years later. Party officials are courting former Sen. Kay Hagan of North Carolina to make a comeback bid, despite mediocre favorability ratings and the fact that she lost a race just months ago that most had expected her to win. All told, more than half of the Democrats' Senate challengers in 2016 are comeback candidates.

On one hand, most of these candidates are the best choices Democrats have. Feingold and Strickland are running ahead of GOP Sens. Ron Johnson and Rob Portman in recent polls. Hill and Hagan boast proven crossover appeal in GOP-leaning states that would be challenging pickups. Their presence in the race gives the party a fighting chance to retake the Senate.

But look more closely, and the reliance on former failures is a direct result of the party having no one else to turn to. If the brand-name challengers didn't run, the roster of up-and-coming prospects in the respective states is short. They're also facing an ominous historical reality that only two defeated senators have successfully returned to the upper chamber in the last six decades. As political analyst Stu Rothenberg put it, they're asking "voters to rehire them for a job from which they were fired." Senate Democrats are relying on these repeat candidates for the exact same reason that Democrats are comfortable with anointing Hillary Clinton for their presidential nomination: There aren't any better alternatives.

For a portrait of the Democrats' slim pickings, just look at the political breakdown in three of the most consequential battleground states. Republicans hold 12 of Ohio's 16 House seats, and all six of their statewide offices. In Wisconsin, Republicans hold a majority of the state's eight House seats and four of five statewide partisan offices. In Pennsylvania, 13 of the 18 representatives are Republicans, though Democrats hold all the statewide offices. (One major caveat: Kathleen Kane, the Democrats' once-hyped attorney general in the state, is under criminal investigation and has become a political punchline.) These are all Democratic-friendly states that Obama carried twice.

If Strickland didn't run, the party's hopes against Portman would lie in the hands of 30-year-old Cincinnati Councilman P.G. Sittenfeld, who would make unexpected history as one of the nation's youngest senators with a victory. (Sittenfeld is still mounting a long-shot primary campaign against Strickland.) Without Feingold in Wisconsin, the party's only logical option would be Rep. Ron Kind, who has regularly passed up opportunities for a promotion. Former Milwaukee Mayor Tom Barrett already lost to Gov. Scott Walker twice, and businesswoman Mary Burke disappointed as a first-time gubernatorial candidate last year. And despite the Democratic establishment's publicized carping over Joe Sestak in Pennsylvania, the list of alternatives is equally underwhelming: His only current intra-party opposition is from the mayor of Allentown.

In the more conservative states, the drop-off between favored recruits and alternatives is even more stark. Hagan would be a flawed nominee in North Carolina, but there's no one else waiting in the wings. The strongest Democratic politician, Attorney General Roy Cooper, is running for governor instead. And in Indiana, the bench is so thin that even the GOP's embattled governor, Mike Pence, isn't facing formidable opposition. Hill, who lost congressional reelection campaigns in both 2004 and 2010, is not expected to face serious primary competition in the race to succeed retiring GOP Sen. Dan

Coats.

Even in the two swing states where the party landed young, up-and-coming recruits to run, their options were awfully limited. In Florida, 32-year-old Rep. Patrick Murphy is one of only five House Democrats to represent a district that Mitt Romney carried in 2012—and his centrism has made him one of the most compelling candidates for higher office. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee quickly rallied behind his campaign (in part to squelch potential opposition from firebrand congressman Alan Grayson). But if Murphy didn't run, the alternatives would have been limited: freshman Rep. Gwen Graham and polarizing Democratic National Committee Chair Debbie Wasserman Schultz being the most logical alternatives.

In Nevada, Democrats boast one of their strongest challengers in former state Attorney General Catherine Cortez Masto, vying to become the first Latina ever elected to the Senate. But her ascension is due, in part, to the fact that other talented officeholders lost in the 2014 statewide wipeout. Democratic lieutenant-governor nominee Lucy Flores, hyped by MSNBC as a "potential superstar," lost by 26 points to her GOP opponent. Former Secretary of State Ross Miller, another fast-rising pol, badly lost his bid for attorney general against a nondescript Republican. By simply taking a break from politics, Cortez Masto avoided the wave and kept her prospects alive for 2016.

This isn't an assessment of Democratic chances for a Senate majority in 2017; it's a glaring warning for the party's longer-term health. If Clinton can't extend the Democrats' presidential winning streak—a fundamental challenge, regardless of the political environment—the party's barren bench will cause even more alarm for the next presidential campaign. And if the Democrats' core constituencies don't show up for midterm elections—an outlook that's rapidly becoming conventional wisdom—Democrats have serious challenges in 2018 as well. It's why The New Yorker's liberal writer John Cassidy warned that a Clinton loss next year could "assign [Republicans] a position of dominance."

By focusing on how the electorate's rapid change would hand Democrats a clear advantage in presidential races, Obama's advisers overlooked how the base-stroking moves would play in the states. Their optimistic view of the future has been adopted by Clinton, who has been running to the left even without serious primary competition.

But without a future generation of leaders able to compellingly carry the liberal message, there's little guarantee that changing demographics will secure the party's destiny. The irony of the 2016 Senate races is that Democrats are betting on the past, running veteran politicians to win them back the majority—with Clinton at the top of the ticket. If that formula doesn't work, the rebuilding process will be long and arduous.

Ben Carson wins SRLC straw poll // Politico //Alex Isenstadt - May 23, 2015

OKLAHOMA CITY — Ben Carson won the straw poll at the Southern Republican Leadership Conference Saturday, demonstrating his popularity among conservative activists at one of the party's traditional presidential cattle call events.

Carson, a former surgeon who formally launched his underdog campaign this month with an appeal to the GOP's tea party wing, finished first with 25 percent. He was followed by Scott Walker, who received 20 percent, and Ted Cruz at 16 percent. Chris Christie and Rick Perry tied at 5 percent, with Jeb Bush narrowly behind. Marco Rubio tied with Bobby Jindal and Rand Paul at 4 percent.

The straw poll victory doesn't necessarily represent a breakthrough for Carson. Carson and Cruz, both middle-of-the-pack candidates in the early 2016 polls, mounted serious efforts to win the straw poll but most candidates did not compete. They hoped it would give them badly needed momentum as they compete against a sprawling field of better known and better funded rivals. Four years ago here, Mitt Romney notched a narrow, one-vote win over Ron Paul.

The announcement of the results brought an end to a three-day event that has become a mainstay of the party's nominating contest. It drew 2,000 or so activists from around the South, organizers said, with 958 casting votes in the straw poll. It also drew many of the 2016 Republican hopefuls, all of whom used 25-minute speeches at the downtown Cox Convention Center to throw out red meat to the conservatives gathered.

Rubio and Cruz, who were originally scheduled to make appearances, had to cancel as a result of the ongoing negotiations in Washington over renewal of the Patriot Act.

The three front-runners for the party's nomination — Bush, Walker, and Rubio — did not have a major presence in the halls. Privately, their advisers said they saw little point in investing time and resources in winning a contest without any electoral implications. None wanted to be seen as seriously competing for a straw poll, which would have little upside and could result in an embarrassing loss.

Cruz and Carson, however, decided to participate in a big way. Both candidates had supporters who manned booths, where they passed out literature, took down information from prospective supporters, and encouraged them to cast votes in the straw poll. Carson backers, wearing blue "I'm with Ben" stickers, crowded the halls and invited attendees to take pictures with a life-size cardboard cut-out of the candidate.

"He has a large contingency here," Steve Fair, Oklahoma's Republican national committeeman, said of Carson.

For Cruz — who was initially slated to be the keynote speaker at a Friday night dinner but had his father, Rafael, substitute for him — the organizing surrounding the straw poll was nearly a month in the making. Weeks ago, his top advisers developed a projection of which activists would be most likely to attend the conference and set out to contact them. The campaign would end up calling about 2,000 people throughout Oklahoma, northwest Louisiana, North Texas, and western Arkansas — all areas likely to be heavily represented at the event — and encouraged them to come and register their support for the Texas senator.

The cost of the effort was low — Cruz's advisers estimate they spent only around $1,800 — but they saw a return in competing. By doing so, they made contact with thousands of conservatives across the South, a constituency that could be inclined to support the Texas senator. Several of Cruz's top aides spent the conference roaming the halls and talking to activists and party leaders in hopes of increasing his support.

Republicans are grappling with a similar discussion over whether to compete in the Iowa Straw Poll in August, a traditional measuring stick that has been seen as an early barometer of a candidate's strength in the critical first-caucus state. Earlier this month, Bush said that he wouldn't be competing, saying that it's not relevant. Mike Huckabee also announced earlier in the week that he would skip the Iowa Straw Poll. Walker, the current front-runner in Iowa, has yet to say whether he will participate. For both, a loss in the Iowa event — which carries more political cachet than the SRLC poll — would be seen as a black eye.

The SRLC represents one of the party's major events of the pre-primary season, bringing together activists from the most reliably Republican region in the nation. The 2016 hopefuls who trekked to Oklahoma City, a hub for oil and gas interests, came to speak but also to court influential local political leaders and donors with private meetings. Walker, Bush and Rick Santorum all organized get-togethers in the Devon Tower, the 50-story skyscraper that towers above the city. Christie, meanwhile, held an event for a super PAC that's been set up to to support his anticipated candidacy.

Some Southern leaders are looking to increase the region's influence in the nominating process by altering the primary calendar. A number of states, including Alabama, Texas, and Virginia, have announced plans to hold their contests on March 1 and create an "SEC primary," a reference to the NCAA Southeastern conference. In recent presidential election years, Southern states had their primaries on different dates.

As the conference wrapped up on Saturday, a number of candidates were expected to formally launch their campaigns in the coming days. Santorum is set to launch his bid next week in Pennsylvania, with Perry and Lindsey Graham the week after. Christie, Bush and Walker, meanwhile, are expected to formally launch their candidacies later in the summer.

Chris Christie: The strong, loud type // CBS News // John Dickerson - May 22, 2015

OKLAHOMA CITY--Chris Christie doesn't give speeches so much as engage in performance art. How he speaks is as much a part of his message as what he says. At the Southern Republican Leadership Conference on Friday, after explaining his plan to manage the growth of entitlements, the New Jersey governor said he knows that Social Security is a "third rail of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

American politics," but that's why he's meddling with it. "I just grabbed it and hugged it, everybody, because that's what leadership is."

Every Republican candidate has a strong suit he thinks will get him to the presidency. Sen. Marco Rubio says he represents the future, Sen. Ted Cruz says he's the purest conservative, Sen. Rand Paul is Mr. Liberty, former Gov. Rick Perry is running on his Texas record, and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush is positioning himself to be the general election candidate. Christie's route to relevance will be based on the show he puts on for voters.

Christie faces a steep hill to climb with Republicans. In the latest CBS News poll, 42 percent of Republicans said they would never vote for him. That's higher than any other candidate. What makes matters worse is that Christie is among the most well-known candidates in the field. That means unlike Gov. Scott Walker, who is still making a first impression with many primary-goers, voters already have opinions about Christie.

As Mom told us, it's hard to get a second chance to make a first impression. Christie is trying a variety of gambits anyway, including informing voters about his record, using the word conservative a lot, and unveiling policy proposals. But all of it is less important than the way he conveys the information.

Christie starts his remarks in his typical stump speech by talking about his bluntness, the product of his Irish and Italian parents. He tells the story of his mother, who instructed bluntness and truth-telling from an early age. This could be defensiveness--Jeb Bush starts by talking about his father and brother to clear the air, proclaims his love of family but also his independence, and moves on--but Christie has designed his speech and his entire performance around this bluntness. "I didn't run for governor of New Jersey to be elected prom king," said Christie in New Hampshire last month. "I'm not looking to be the most popular guy in the world. I'm looking to be the most respected one."

The message isn't just what you see is what you get, but what you see is what you want. On no issue is this clearer than national security, where Christie, like all Republican candidates, is preaching strength as the antidote to the weakness President Obama has shown. When Christie makes his strength pitch, it's not about his plan for destroying ISIS, restoring U.S. influence in Asia, or countering Vladimir Putin with a stronger NATO. It's about how he talks. "People say lots of different things about me, but they never say that I'm misunderstood, and they never say that I'm unclear. And no one around the world will doubt the resolve of the American people, doubt our strength ... because I will say it directly, whether I'm saying it to a friend or an adversary." In the strength in foreign policy contest, Christie hopes that showing is better than telling.

Will Christie's rhetorical feats of strength work? It was working on some of the members of the audience who listened to him on Friday. "I wasn't fond of him when I came into the room, and he changed my opinion," said Ben Ross, 67, of Oklahoma City. "I didn't like the way he responded to the tragedy of Hurricane Sandy. That hit me the wrong way, but these wounds healed, based on what he said." Dane Trout of western Oklahoma stood outside the convention hall after Bush spoke and compared the two men: "Chris Christie had further to go with me than Jeb Bush, and he did that."

Christie's performance is pleasing to the crowd in a party craving strength after the Obama years, but the question is whether any of the conversions he performed on voters are permanent. If so, those grim poll numbers can be improved. Then he's got to find a way to get himself in front of every possible voter he can.

At the end of his strong-man act, Christie returned to the story of his mother. On her deathbed she told him that because they had been frank with each other their whole lives, there was nothing left to say, and he should go back to work. Strong stuff.

A Rubio campaign blueprint, for all the world to see // WaPo // Dan Balz - May 23, 105

It isn't often that a presidential campaign blueprint comes packaged between covers and available in bookstores and online for all to see. But that's the inescapable conclusion from looking through the pages of the book entitled, "2016 and Beyond," by Republican pollster Whit Ayres.

Ayres is one of his party's leading analysts. He also happens to be the pollster for Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.). The new book is subtitled, "How Republicans Can Elect a President in the New America." If not exactly the strategy memo for a Rubio campaign, it's a good proxy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Dan Balz is Chief Correspondent at The Washington Post. He has served as the paper's National Editor, Political Editor, White House correspondent and Southwest correspondent.

Ayres's demographic analysis looks at the issue of a changing America from the perspective of the growing minority population (and his party's weaknesses there) and the majority white population (and his party's strengths and limitations there). His argument is straightforward: To win the White House, Republicans must systematically improve their performance among minorities while maintaining or even improving their support among white voters.

In an electorate in which the white share of the vote was 72 percent, President Obama won reelection in 2012 despite losing the white vote by a bigger margin than any winning Democrat in the past. The white share of the electorate in 2016 will be a point or two smaller.

Based on estimates of the composition of the 2016 electorate, if the next GOP nominee wins the same share of the white vote as Mitt Romney won in 2012 (59 percent), he or she would need to win 30 percent of the nonwhite vote. Set against recent history, that is a daunting obstacle. Romney won only 17 percent of nonwhite voters in 2012. John McCain won 19 percent in 2008. George W. Bush won 26 percent in 2004.

Sen. Marco Rubio, who's running for president in 2016, is known for his stances on immigration and tax reform. Here's the Florida Republican's take on Obamacare, the Islamic State and more, in his own words.

Put another way, if the 2016 nominee gets no better than Romney's 17 percent of the nonwhite vote, he or she would need 65 percent of the white vote to win, a level achieved in modern times only by Ronald Reagan in his 1984 landslide. Bush's 2004 winning formula — 26 percent of the nonwhite vote and 58 percent of the white vote — would be a losing formula in 2016, given population changes.

Ayres also points out that the GOP's support among whites is not evenly distributed across the country. He notes that Romney won "overwhelming margins" among whites in conservative southern states, but won fewer than half the white vote in northern states such as Maine, Vermont, Iowa, New Hampshire and Oregon. More importantly, Romney won fewer white votes than he needed in Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin and Minnesota.

To Ayres, this isn't an either-or choice for the GOP. As he puts it, "For Republicans to become competitive again in presidential elections, Republican candidates must perform better among whites, especially in the overwhelmingly white states of the upper Midwest, and much better among minorities."

The coming Republican nomination contest will test the appeal of the candidates with both groups of voters. Is there any one candidate who can raise the share of the nonwhite vote and attract more white votes in the Midwest?

When I put that question to Ayres, he said yes, with this caveat: "If that candidate can relate to people who are struggling economically and relate to people who have been disadvantaged by a remarkably changing economy."

Ayres addresses immigration at length, seeking to debunk those in his party who say Hispanics will always vote overwhelmingly for Democrats or those who say there are more than enough white voters who stayed home in 2012 to make up the deficit by which Romney lost.

He lists any number of GOP candidates who have won significant portions of Hispanic voters in state races and includes an interesting table that shows that, even if all the "missing white voters" had turned out in 2012, and Romney had won them all, "he still would have lost the election."

Much of Ayres's book is an examination of public opinion on a range of issues. His conclusion is that, on the key issue of the role and size of government, the country is center-right, not center-left. On debt and deficit, he argues that a Republican candidate is on solid ground talking about both, as long as he or she doesn't make it all about the numbers and instead links it to policies to stimulate more economic growth.

He sees cultural hot buttons of abortion and same-sex marriage as separable. On abortion, he argues that Americans are and will remain “torn about the morality” of the issue and sees no particular downside for the GOP to remain the antiabortion party, as long as candidates talk about it with sensitiv ity.

On same sex marriage, he concludes that the political debate is over, that public opinion has made a decisive shift. But he acknowledges that changing the party ’s position will be wrenchingly difficult and sketches out some do’s and don’ts for those opposed, including not advocating federal interv ention to ov erturn same-sex marriages adopted through referendums or legislative action.

Ayres urges Republicans to set aside their satisfaction over their big victories in 2010 and 2014 and focus on the reasons they have fallen short in the past two presidential campaigns. He reminds them that deepening their hold on state and local offices in red states is no indicator of their presidential prospects.

In one example, he looks at the dominance of the Republican Party at the state level in states that Romney won in 2012. The party holds between 53 percent and 87 percent of the state senate seats in those places, according to Ayres’s calculations. Some Republicans, he argues, look at those numbers and say, what’s the problem? But Ayres notes that those states still leav e the Republicans short of the 270 electoral votes needed to win the presidency.

Ayres said he wrote and published the book before Rubio made a final decision to run for president and said he hoped it would be a blueprint not just for Rubio but for any of the candidates running in 2016. What the party needs, he said, is a candidate who will prompt people who have not voted for the Republicans in the past to consider doing so in 2016 rather than one who offers modifications in message.

“It’s more a matter of not nominating a candidate who looks like the same old, same old, but who looks like a fresh start for the party century,” he said in a phone interview Friday. “It’s bigger than this position or that position. Republicans have got to nominate a transformational candidate because the country has changed more than most of us realized, even in the last 12 years.”

Rubio will choose to run as he sees fit, but the similarities between what he already is saying and doing and what Ay res lays out in his book are striking. The interest in a Rubio candidacy clearly exists within the party for the reasons Ayres outlines. But there is a large leap from the pages of a pollster’s book to the rigors of a presidential campaign. Ayres has offered the road map. Now comes the road test of whether the candidate can deliver.

Rick Santorum’s got a point: Nothing helps poll numbers like winning // WaPo // Philip Bump - May 23, 2015

When Fox News announced on Wednesday that it would limit participation in the first debate of the Republican calendar to the top 10 candidates in national polling, it was instantaneously obv ious that there would be friction.

And sure enough, within 24 hours Rick Santorum (who would not make the top-ten cut, if it were today) offered a complaint. But a good one.

"In January of 2012," he said at a conference in Oklahoma, "I was at 4 percent in the national polls, and I won the Iowa caucuses. I don't know if I was last in the polls, but I was pretty close to last."

He was not last in polls. He was indeed close to last -- at least in Real Clear Politics' polling average.

2012 was different in a lot of ways. (For example, Santorum would have been included in a debate using Fox's rules at that point.) But the more interesting point is: Look what happened to his poll numbers afterward. Within day s, he shot up over 15 percent support, and never fell below that level again. Later in the campaign, though, his numbers jumped again -- this time after winning majorities in the Colorado and Minnesota primaries.

From Jan. 3, the date of the Iowa caucus, to March 3, the last contest before Super Tuesday, the winner of each contest went into the next one doing better in the polls.

That makes sense, certainly . Losing candidates drop out and support moves around, for one thing. But also, people gravitate toward candidates they think might actually win. Before Iowa, most people probably wouldn't have included Santorum. Afterward, they would.

Santorum's immediate point was, expand the univ erse of participants in the debates, because you nev er know. But he actually did more to undermine his point. Santorum was in all of the debates and still only polled at 4 percent. The debates didn't do much. It took winning to actually make his mark on those numbers.

Kasich May Miss Cut in Ohio Debate // RCP // Rebecca Berg - May 22, 2015

The 10-candidate cap set by Fox News for the first Republican debate has raised the awkward possibility that a state's sitting governor could be excluded from a forum held on his home turf.

The Aug. 6 debate will be in Cleveland's Quicken Loans Arena, the same venue that will host the Republican National Convention in July 2016. But only the candidates who rank in the top 10 in national polling will be invited to the Fox News forum, the network announced Wednesday — meaning Ohio Gov. John Kasich might not make the cut.

In public, Kasich's allies are expressing confidence that he will meet the threshold come August.

"We believe that if Gov. Kasich decides to run, he will be on the stage in Cleveland," said Chris Schrimpf, a spokesman for the Ohio Republican Party.

But Kasich, who is thought to be laying the groundwork for a campaign, although he has not announced his candidacy , currently scores just 2 percent in the RealClearPolitics national polling average, putting him outside of the top 10 candidates.

Now, behind the scenes, it is his political team's "top focus to try and get him in the debate," said a Republican operative with ties to Kasich.

"It would just be flat-out embarrassing if he didn't meet the top 10 threshold in his home state," the operativ e said.

That objective poses an unusual strategic challenge. Normally , candidates focus their spending during the primary solely on winning the key states on the path to the party's nomination. But national polls can be influenced by purchasing ads on national television — and candidates on the bubble for debates will need to decide whether to splurge on that advertising.

Kasich is not the only candidate who may face this dilemma: Texas Gov. Rick Perry, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina, former New York Gov. George Pataki, former Sen. Rick Santorum and Sen. Lindsey Graham could also be vying for the tenth slot come August.

But the stakes are perhaps more personal for Kasich, who lobbied hard to bring the Republican National Convention to Cleveland — and now might be blocked from debating in the very venue that will later host the convention.

In spite of the potential awkwardness and the obstacles the debate format will present to lower-tier candidates, the Republican National Committee has nevertheless thrown its full weight behind Fox's decision.

“We support and respect the decision Fox has made, which will match the greatest number of candidates we have ev er had on a debate stage,” RNC Chairman Reince Priebus said after Fox announced its criteria.

The RNC decided it would leave it to each debate’s host to decide the threshold candidates must meet to participate, meaning each debate will be handled differently. While Fox News will limit its August debate stage to 10 candidates, CNN will divide its September primary debate into two stages: the first for the top 10 candidates and the second for the remainder.

“They asked for input and ideas,” said Steve Duprey , a New Hampshire committeeman and chairman of the RNC’s 2016 debate committee. “Our input was to make the debates as inclusiv e as you can.”

Although Kasich has not yet commented publicly on the Fox News debate configuration, other Republican candidates who might be left out have begun to make noise

Santorum, who barely registered in national polling at the start of the 2012 Republican primary contest, but went on to place second to Mitt Romney, told the National Journal on Thursday that the debate thresholds are "arbitrary" and "not legitimate."

“Hopefully they put it out there and they're going to listen to what the comments are, and factor those in, and determine what is the right way,” Santorum said.

In a conciliatory gesture, Fox News host Greta Van Susteren invited those candidates who do not make the network’s debate to appear on her show that same evening.

But then, Kasich would giv e up his a home-field advantage for a smaller stage — an outcome his team will be working to avoid.

Ten Is Too Few // Weekly Standard // Jay Cost - June 1, 2015

Last week, Fox News announced its guidelines for the first debate among presidential contenders endorsed by the Republican National Committee (RNC). The network plans to inv ite the top 10 candidates, with the ranking determined by an average of the five most recent national opinion polls before the August 6 ev ent. This is similar to the approach it has taken in previous cycles.

Following historical precedent is often smart. In addition, using a hard-and-fast metric, like a candidate’s poll position, is better than subjective criteria to determine whether a candidate is “serious.”

However, Fox has adopted the wrong approach, and the RNC is wrong to endorse it. Several problems stand out:

* The “margin of error” in polling does not disappear when one averages polls together. For instance, five polls with 750 respondents apiece would still y ield a margin of error of about 1.5 points. That may not seem like much, but it could be trouble early in the cycle. What if the candidate in 10th place is polling at 4 percent on average, while the 11th-place candidate is at 3.5 percent? Statistically speaking, there is no difference between the two, yet one would be included while the other would be left out.

* Polls have been misbehaving of late. They were wildly wrong in Britain and Israel, and they were wide of the mark in our 2014 midterms. Worse, there has been evidence of what Harry Enten of Fiv eThirtyEight calls “herding”: pollsters producing results that closely mimic one another, but not what is happening in the real world.

* Polls simply do not tell us v ery much so early in the cycle. Voters are hardly pay ing attention, which means their opinions can be arbitrary and easily changed. We saw this in both the 2008 and 2012 GOP nomination battles, where the primary debates rapidly moved public opinion. Why should pre-debate polls carry any weight?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

* There is no meaningful separation between the candidates yet. The Real Clear Politics polling av erage has Jeb Bush in first place, with 15 percent, and John Kasich in 11th place, at 2 percent. A 13-point gap is insubstantial in the early days of a presidential campaign cycle. Just ask President Barack Obama. At one point in 2007 , he trailed Hillary Clinton by 26 points in the RCP average.

* It is not the business of Fox News or the RNC to determine the range of acceptable choices for Republican voters. If this were a typical cycle, with maybe a half-dozen serious candidates, a threshold such as this would make sense. It is the only way to exclude obviously nonserious or fringe candidates. But this is not a typical cycle. If we used the current RCP polling averages, the proposed threshold would exclude John Kasich, Carly Fiorina, Bobby Jindal, and Lindsey Graham from the first debate. These are all serious candidates—two sitting governors, a sitting senator, and a former Fortune 5 00 CEO. Moreover, the RNC has talked a good game about how to grow the party. Does it make sense to exclude a woman, the son of immigrants from India, and the governor of a must-win purple state? Neither Fox News nor the RNC should take it upon itself to decide that such candidates are unworthy of consideration. That task is best left to the voters.

There is no doubt that the RNC faces a logistical challenge with these debates. It is simply not practical to include more than 10 candidates in a single session (and even 10 will be a stretch). However, excluding serious candidates based on statistically meaningless poll positions so early in the cycle is a terrible solution.

There has to be a better way. For instance, CNN intends to hav e two debates, one with “first tier” candidates, and another with “second tier” candidates pulling in at least 1 percent apiece. But this approach still creates an arbitrary and meaningless distinction between who participates in which debate.

Both Fox and CNN should hold more two (or even three) debates, with the candidates divided up by some random selection, including all candidates who meet some basic threshold like 1 percent in the polls or a minimum sum of money raised. It makes sense to apply more stringent criteria later in the cycle; however, there should be a maximally inclusive approach in the early day s of the campaign, without discrimination between candidate “tiers.”

The GOP electorate would surely appreciate this. A recent Pew poll found that Republicans are more excited about this field than their choices in the previous two cycles. It is an easy bet that primary voters would eagerly watch multiple debates.

In fact, the RNC should insist on inclusion. The only way to produce the best candidate to defeat Hillary Clinton is to examine all the credible contenders carefully. This means they all should be included in the debates, even if this means two or three-tiered debates in the early going.

Reform Conservatism Is An Answer To The Wrong Question // The Federalist // Robert Tracinski - May 22, 2015

In less than a year, the agenda of the Republican Party will be pretty much fixed by the selection of its presidential nominee, whose policies we will all feel pressured to get behind, because they will probably be better than the prospect of Hillary Clinton selling the Oval Office furniture to the highest bidder.

So there is a certain urgency for those who are fighting over what that agenda should be. Hence the renewed push by those who call themselves “reform conservativ es.” An examination of their agenda featuring The Federalists‘s Ben Domenech led to an insightful roundtable from some of our contributors. I talked with Ben about it yesterday on the Federalist Radio Hour, and we covered a lot of interesting ground, including the curious way that “reform conservativ es” feel like a bunch of think-tank elites trying to draft a populist platform. This explains some of the disconnect between the ambitious goal of making the agenda of the right more appealing to the common man—and the result, which is a laundry list of technical policy tweaks.

What struck me most of all is that “reform conserv atism” looks a lot like a rebranding of neoconservatism—not the neoconservative foreign policy that everyone has been talking about for the past decade, but the neoconservative domestic policy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I remember way back in 1993 opening the editorial page of the Wall Street Journal—we read things on paper back then—and seeing an op-ed by Irving Kristol (which seems to be reprinted here) calling for "a conservative welfare state." His starting point was that it was going to be impossible ever to roll back the welfare state and the middle-class entitlements: "the welfare state is with us, for better or worse." So we might as well make it for better by redesigning "a welfare state consistent with the basic moral principles of our civilization and...our nation."

In practice, this meant that the "conservative welfare state" should provide greater incentives for the moral values conservatives like, such as work and marriage, and it should be made more efficient by introducing "free-market" elements, which usually ends up meaning some form of vouchers or tax credits in place of a centrally administered welfare program. This is pretty much what the "reform conservatives" are offering now as if it were a new idea.

More to the point, this doesn't really count as a reform of conservatism or of the Republican agenda. Offering more efficient and responsible management of the welfare state is the Republican agenda of the past thirty years. That isn't a reform. That's what needs reforming.

Offering more efficient and responsible management of the welfare state is the Republican agenda of the past thirty years. That isn't a reform. That's what needs reforming.

The key premise of this non-reforming "reform conservatism" is the idea that it's impossible to really touch the welfare state. We might be able to alter its incentives and improve its clanking machinery, but only if we loudly assure everyone that we love it and want to keep it forever.

And there's the problem. Not only is this defeatist at its core, abandoning the cause of small government at the outset, but it fails to address the most important problem facing the country.

"Reform conservatism" is an answer to the question: how can we promote the goal of freedom and small government—without posing any outright challenge to the welfare state? The answer: you can't. All you can do is tinker around the edges of Leviathan. And ultimately, it won't make much difference, because it will all be overwhelmed in the coming disaster.

America's real problem is that we have entrenched a set of middle-class entitlements that are about to yawn wide open and swallow the economy. They've already swallowed the federal budget. Non-defense discretionary spending—the stuff left over after entitlements and the military—has been whittled down to insignificance and is about to disappear altogether. Defense spending is still quite large, but not much larger than the deficit. What this means is that most of the money the federal government actually raises in taxes is immediately spent on entitlements, and we have to borrow huge sums of money to pay for anything else.

America's real problem is that we have entrenched a set of middle-class entitlements that are about to yawn wide open and swallow the economy.

It's only going to get worse as the Baby Boomers age and drop out of the workforce at the same time that they massively increase the load on Social Security and Medicare. Greece is the harbinger of our future, as we hurtle toward the point when we've borrowed so much money—and need to keep on borrowing, just to keep cutting the entitlement checks—that it becomes doubtful we can ever pay it all back. Then our creditors start to clamp down and the whole house of cards collapses.

So tinkering on the edges isn't an adequate response. The question we need to be asking is not: how can we reform the welfare state without challenging it? The question is: how can we convince the American people to start rolling back the welfare state? How can we wean the nation off entitlements?

How we can do that is a big topic, and I don't pretend to have any easy answers. But it is at least the right question to ask.

It's also true that this might not give us much guidance for how to win elections in the short term. But that's not what this discussion is supposed to be about, is it? It's not about the crude opportunism of "rebranding" the GOP for the next election cycle. It's about finding a long-term agenda that can help the right define and achieve its goals. "Reform conservatism" looks to me like a great plan for rearranging deck chairs on the Titanic. What we need is a plan to show everyone the iceberg, point to the clear waters in the other direction, and turn the boat around.

The question is: how can we convince the American people to start rolling back the welfare state?

More broadly, we need a program that would achieve the real, fundamental moral reform this country needs: a rediscovery of personal responsibility, private initiative, and self-reliance. Do you know how you encourage individuals to take the reins of their own lives and make their way in the world, instead of sitting back and waiting for a government handout? You let them do it.

The defeatism is really quite astonishing. We are a people who crossed mountains and cultivated prairies, who built farms and steamships and steel mills, who created astonishing new technologies that altered every aspect of life. That's the story of two centuries of our history. By contrast, the cradle-to-grave welfare state is an upstart experiment that only really took hold in the last thirty to fifty years. Yet we're supposed to act as if that is the permanent, unchangeable, immovable part of our society—while the American as builder, creator, and self-made man is a vision that no longer has any power to stir the soul.

I think that's a short-range, self-defeating approach. It doesn't really reform anything, and the only thing it conserves is the welfare state.

The power grab that destroyed American politics: How Newt Gingrich created our modern dysfunction // Salon // Paul Rosenberg - May 23, 2015

In rolling out his proposal for a progressive agenda, New York Mayor Bill de Blasio has repeatedly referenced Newt Gingrich's "Contract with America." On one level that makes sense, since the "Contract with America" is arguably the only example most people can think of where a national political platform of sorts did not come from a presidential campaign. It also played a significant—though sometimes poorly understood—role in altering the trajectory of American politics, and thus it makes sense to reference it when setting out to alter that trajectory again.

A lot of what people remember about the Contract just isn't so, and a lot of what was so is forgotten. It was not a conservative document so much as it was a targeted GOP play for the support of Ross Perot voters (as described in the book "Three's a Crowd: The Dynamic of Third Parties, Ross Perot, and the Republican Resurgence" by Ronald Rapoport and Walter Stone), and despite its poll-driven nature (touted by Gingrich at the time), its late release indicated it was less a play for broad political support than it was for shaping elite political discourse after an election Republicans knew they would win. At its core, it was the very essence of political gamesmanship, even as it paraded itself as a populist attack on the establishment.

In contrast, de Blasio's agenda clearly is a progressive document, and brings together a range of similarly themed aspirations to create a fairer, more inclusive future. His 13 points are organized under three broad headings,"Lift the Floor for Working People," including points like raising the federal minimum wage to $15/hour and passing comprehensive immigration reform; "Support Working Families," including passing national paid sick leave and paid family leave, and making Pre-K, after-school programs and childcare universal; and "Tax Fairness" including closing the carried interest loophole and ending tax breaks for companies that ship jobs overseas.

Aside from referencing Gingrich's Contract, other statements de Blasio has made reinforce a very different picture of the core political processes as well as the end goal that he has in mind, as Amanda Terkel reported:

"Obviously the Washington dynamics are broken for all intents and purposes, and history has shown us that a lot of the greatest success I think we've ever seen in the history of American government, in terms of dealing with economic crisis, is the New Deal," he said. "That arrived largely from actions that were already started at the state and local level and were developed into national policies. I think we're in a similar paradigm right now. The local level is way ahead of the federal level in terms of addressing these issues."

While de Blasio's intention is continue and expand the New Deal heritage, Gingrich was opposed to it. Yet, he did nothing to change the basic structure of American political attitudes, which embody broad support for maintaining or expanding social spending programs in practice, even while fitfully deploring it in theory—a "schizoid" state first documented by Lloyd Free and Hadley Cantril in their 1967 book, "The Political Beliefs of Americans." They found that two-thirds of the population qualified as operationally liberal, supporting an activist federal government when asked about specific programs or responsibilities, while half the population qualified as ideological conservatives, based on questions about government interference and individual initiative. Half of all ideological conservatives even qualified also as operational liberals. For all the effort he expended, Gingrich did nothing to change this basic situation. What he did do was to significantly aggravate this disconnect, intensifying America's political dysfunction.

The story surrounding how that happened is best told by Rapoport and Stone in "Three's a Crowd." They find a direct relationship between Perot vote share in 1992 and the chances of a GOP House pickup two years later. "Only 2.2 percent of Democratic districts where Perot received 10 percent or less of the district vote flipped to the Republicans in 1994, while 42 percent of Democratic districts where Perot ran most strongly in 1992 switched to the GOP," they write. How much did this matter? A lot: "Had Perot won the same popular vote [in 1992] as he captured in 1996 (8.4 percent, less than half of what he actually received in 1992), we estimate that the Republicans would have picked up about twenty-nine seats over what they held in 1992, leaving Democratic control intact." That's only three seats more than the average number of seats lost by the president's party between 1946 and 1990—a negligible difference. Thus, Perot's 1992 showing was absolutely crucial to GOP success in 1994—the "Contract with America" was merely the primary means for tapping into that potential.

Looking back to 1992, Perot's affinity with the Democrats appeared stronger, once Clinton was nominated. He even withdrew from the race for a time. After the election, however, Clinton alienated Perot and his supporters, most dramatically by pushing through NAFTA, with Vice President Gore publicly debating Perot on NAFTA and treating him disdainfully in the process. Despite the fact that more Republicans than Democrats voted for NAFTA (with Gingrich playing a key role), Clinton's leadership was key, and the disrespect shown to Perot personally was emotionally most resonant. At the same time Clinton/Gore were treating Perot with contempt, Republicans were viewing him like a gold mine:

As the dynamic of third parties suggests, after Perot identified and mobilized a large constituency, both major parties bid for its support in subsequent elections. The Republicans, as the party out of power in both houses of Congress and the presidency, had the greater opportunity and incentive to appeal aggressively to the Perot constituency. Beginning with the February 1993 Republican post-election retreat, a group of Republican leaders, spearheaded by Newt Gingrich and John Kasich, established close ties with Perot and his UWSA organizations. Despite initial reluctance from other party leaders, including Bob Dole and Haley Barbour, Gingrich and his colleagues brought the Republican Party into line behind a Perot-base strategy. Most impressive in this effort was the Contract with America, which reflected both the form of Perot's checklist for candidates at the end of his book "United We Stand America" and many of the same issue priorities of Perot and his supporters, while ignoring issues—such as abortion and free trade—where differences between the GOP base and the Perot movement were sharp.

Although there were some real affinities between Republicans and Perot voters, three sharp differences are particularly illuminating in terms of fundamental deceptions that the Contract embodied. Each involves a matter of principle for Perot voters, which Gingrich and the Republicans adopted purely as matter of political expediency—and even then, not too convincingly. First was the call for term limits. As the minority party, out of power for four decades, it was an easy call for Republicans to adopt this Perot position, except when it came down to actual cases, as reported at the time:

And for some GOP incumbents the contract presents awkward contradictions. Gingrich, for instance, finds himself advocating that no House member be allowed to serve more than six terms–even as he runs for his ninth.

Asked to explain the apparent double-standard on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Sunday, he declined to say directly whether he would step down if the term-limits proposal became a reality.

"The notion that everybody who's for something has to offer to commit suicide in order for you to think they're sincere, I think is fairly outrageous," Gingrich said.

There was a similar strategic logic to adopting the Perot call for a balanced budget. It was, after all, Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush who had exploded the deficit like never before, so why not stick a Democratic president with the job of fixing their mess? Especially since it would mean getting Democrats to do Republican's dirty work for them? (Which some had seen as the point all along.) In this case, the hypocrisy wasn't quite so self-evident in advance. That would come after Clinton left office, and George W. Bush quickly plunged the government deeply into deficits once again.

The third point was the matter of congressional reform, two items in particular: the first to "cut the number of House committees, and cut committee staff by one-third," and the second to limit the terms of all committee chairs. While Perot supporters saw such measures in terms of making Congress more accountable to the people, Republicans had a much more clear-eyed view of things: it would make Congress more dependent on special-interest lobbyists, who would become significantly more important in the process of drafting legislation.

But for Gingrich personally, there was an additional pay off: it got rid of knowledgeable congressional staffers who readily saw through his grandiose BS. As I've noted before, this has been pointed out by Bruce Bartlett, a top economic adviser to presidents Reagan and Bush I, in a piece titled "Gingrich and the Destruction of Congressional Expertise," where he explained:

He [Gingrich] has always considered himself to be the smartest guy in the room and long chafed at being corrected by experts when he cooked up some new plan, over which he may have expended 30 seconds of thought, to completely upend and remake the health, tax or education systems.

Because Mr Gingrich does know more than most politicians, the main obstacles to his grandiose schemes have always been Congress' professional staff members, many among the leading authorities anywhere in their areas of expertise.

To remove this obstacle, Mr Gingrich did everything in his power to dismantle Congressional institutions that employed people with the knowledge, training and experience to know a harebrained idea when they saw it. When he became speaker in 1995, Mr Gingrich moved quickly to slash the budgets and staff of the House committees, which employed thousands of professionals with long and deep institutional memories....

In addition to decimating committee budgets, he also abolished two really useful Congressional agencies, the Office of Technology Assessment and the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. The former brought high-level scientific expertise to bear on legislative issues and the latter gave state and local governments an important voice in Congressional deliberations."

Of course, the GOP had decades of no-nothing history before Newt Gingrich came along. But his evisceration of congressional expertise was something without parallel in American history. Regrettably, when the Democrats did briefly regain control of the House, they did nothing significant to reverse the damage Gingrich had done. The kind of expertise that Gingrich eliminated is precisely what America needs to make sound policy decisions—on everything from WMDs in Iraq to climate change, financial regulation, community-based policing and drug policy reform. In its absence, we've had an endless parade of committees investigating Benghazi, and various other forms of clownish behavior.

Such is the extreme end result of the Contract with America. As I said above, Gingrich did nothing to change the basic structure of American political attitudes, the "schizoid" state described by Free and Cantril. Instead, he merely aggravated the schizoid disconnect. But even with that disconnect, landslide majorities still support robust social spending—the exact opposite of what our political classes have decided on. Where Gingrich aimed to confound the majority will, de Blasio aims to liberate it, by bringing together existing movements and synergizing their power to restore what still remains the dominant popular political outlook in the nation at large—a belief that government should be an instrument of the popular will, enabling us to achieve together what we cannot achieve on our own.

While this view has been present throughout our history, it achieved its modern formulation during the New Deal, and knowledge of this is reflected in de Blasio's core understanding of what he's up to, as refected in Amanda Terkel's reporting cited above. It's reflected in de Blasio's timing as well. As already noted, Gingrich's Contract was unveiled less than two months before the 1994 election, on Sept. 27, leaving no opportunity to forge any organic popular foundation. But de Blasio's announcement provides an 18-month lead time, plenty of time to build support, dialogue, revise, and forge alliances for post-electoral action.

In contrast to the Contract's evolution as a carefully calculated political document, de Blasio's 13-point agenda is much more driven by the actual content of the proposals and movements it seeks to encompass. Salon's Joan Walsh was certainly right to call attention to key missing pieces:

De Blasio was flanked by big placards supporting debt-free college and expanding Social Security, two demands that have rocketed to the top of the progressive agenda thanks to strong movements behind them. But those issues haven't yet officially made the 13-point list. A bigger omission was any mention of criminal justice reform.

If, like Gingrich's Contract, de Blasio's lead time were less than two months, this could prove fatal. But an 18-month lead time allows for these omissions to be addressed via a much more organic process of consultation. The greater challenge will be shaping a cohesive narrative whole. As Walsh also noted, the logic of de Blasio's agenda is supported by a more detailed analysis in the Roosev elt Institute report "Rewriting the Rules of the American Economy: An Agenda for Growth and Shared Prosperity," advancing the arguments that "Inequality is not inevitable: it is a choice we make with the rules we create to structure our economy." And this bedrock insight—that the economy is a structured human creation, which can be reshaped by structuring it differently—is the foundation on which the struggle for America's future needs to be waged.

There is nothing particularly new or radical in this view. Almost 240 years ago, in "The Wealth of Nations," Adam Smith did not blindly assume that the "inv isible hand" of the market automatically produced the best outcome, as many mistakenly believe. Smith was quite aware that markets reflect the rules built into them, which in turn reflect underlying power. Hence, he wrote: "Whenev er the legislature attempts to regulate the differences between masters and their workmen, its counsellors are always the masters. When the regulation, therefore, is in fav our of the workmen, it is always just and equitable; but it is sometimes otherwise when in favour of the masters."

Yet, the free market fantasy of a primordial pristine state has a powerful hold on the American imagination, and it plays a key role in shaping the views of ideological conservatives, which brings us back to "The Political Beliefs of Americans" again. In the last section of their book, Free and Cantril noted that "the principles according to which the majority of Americans actually behave politically have not yet been adequately formulated in modern terms," and argued that "it is only because the American system has demonstrated such flexibility and such a capacity to accommodate to new situations that this schizoid state has not more seriously impeded the operation and direction of government."

Two points are worth making here. The first is that what they wrote in 1967 has remained true ever since. Decades of polling, particularly the "attitudinal measures" in the General Social Survey, show slow cyclical variations, but no overall erosion of these attitudes. As noted above, broad support remains for maintaining or expanding social spending programs, even among conserv atives, and Gingrich's Contract did not destroy that support.

The second point is that what Gingrich did do was to significantly impair the American system's flexibility and capacity to accommodate to new situations. Although Gingrich's narrow power-grabbing agenda quickly failed, and he left Congress only a few years later, the heightened impairment to the system's flexibility and adaptability lived on, furthering the negativ e consequences of the underlying schizoid state. Things have now reached such a crisis state that even the most basic, broadly supported, non-ideological forms of government spending are being crippled: spending on infrastructure, education and scientific research, spending that even the wealthiest Americans support.

Free and Cantril also said:

There is little doubt that the time has come for a restatement of American ideology to bring it in line with what the great majority of people want and approve. Such a statement, with the right symbols incorporated, would focus people's wants, hopes, and beliefs, and provide a guide and platform to enable the American people to implement their political desires in a more intelligent, direct, and consistent manner.

Something along these lines is the long-term task that progressiv es have before us. Building movements, and drawing them together—as de Blasio and others are working hard to do—are necessary precursors. But for the long haul, we will need to go even deeper than Free and Cantril imagined, even changing the language we use to talk about economy—as the rule-governed human creation it actually is, not as something natural that's best left alone—as cognitive linguist Anat Shenker-Osorio explains in her book "Don't Buy It: The Trouble with Talking Nonsense about the Economy" (my review here). Ultimately, what's needed is a fundamental reorientation in how we see ourselv es as a people and a country, as well as how we see the economy . We need a new, inclusive vision, and a language that reflects the fact that America is what we make it, together: E pluribus unum.

"The party of white people": How the Tea Party took over the GOP, armed with all the wrong lessons from history // Salon // David Sehat - May 23, 2015

There was an emerging disagreement among conservativ es, one that grew out of differing dispositions, if not principle. The Tea Party mov ement possessed an almost centrifugal force in which ideas gravitated from the center to the margins. On the anti-intellectual fringe, the narrative about the Founders was taken up by absolutists and paranoids who supported citizen militias and the like. Yet even those not on the fringe supported the radical rhetoric. It was, in some sense, built into the movement. The logic of their argument—that conservatives were losing the country, that it had fatally departed from the Founders' intentions, that the republican experiment required periodic revolutions to renew old values—suggested that extreme and uncompromising measures were necessary to restore the nation to the old ways.

The Republican leadership, by contrast, was made up of realists. Though establishment politicians had used similar revolutionary rhetoric often enough—since at least the time of Ronald Reagan—when it came to governing they recognized the limits of their power and the importance of incremental change. But with the Tea Party revolution, the rhetoric became harder to control. The conservative base had slipped its leash. The new Tea Party activists, who rejected incremental change as part of the same old pattern that slouched toward tyranny, had begun speaking of revolution in sometimes the most literal sense.

As early as August 2009, David Frum, a speechwriter for George W. Bush, warned that conservatives were playing with fire. "All this hysterical and provocative talk invites, incites, and prepares a prefabricated justification for violence," he wrote during the angry summer recess. "It's not enough for conservatives to repudiate violence, as some are belatedly beginning to do. We have to tone down the militant and accusatory rhetoric."

His warning turned out to be tragically prescient two days after the 2011 legislative session began, when Representative Gabrielle Giffords was shot in the head at a constituent event in Arizona. All told, nineteen people were shot. Six of them died, including a federal judge who was present. Reporters quickly discovered that Giffords had been on Sarah Palin's target list. The police had been called when a man dropped a gun at one of her summer events in the infamous 2009 summer recess. And she had been one of the representatives to receive police protection after her affirmative vote on Obamacare. In retrospect, it was clear that she had been in danger for some time. Now she lay in a medically induced coma with the surgeons uncertain about the extent of her injuries.

Some commentators wondered if perhaps the Republicans had foolishly tried to ride the Tea Party tiger. It had been clear for some time that the Tea Party combined legitimate outrage over Democratic policies with more disreputable elements that tended toward extreme directions, a dialectic that the conservative columnist Matthew Continetti called "the two faces of the Tea Party." One side sought to repair various "deformities" in American politics. The other, according to Continetti, was "ready to scrap the whole thing and restore a lost Eden." One side was reformist. The other was revolutionary. One was responsible. The other was dangerous. It was really important, Continetti believed, to encourage the one side and suppress the other.

But when Continetti first began worrying about how to separate the responsible side from the reactionaries, other commentators had argued that it was impossible to draw such a line. Over at the National Review, Jonah Goldberg suggested that these two faces were actually marching in lockstep, as they had always done. Like Goldwater and Reagan in an earlier era, the two sides were really differing dispositions. One was more strident. The other was sunnier. One sometimes drifted into apocalyptic pronouncements. The other maintained a more realistic position while offering the hope of change. But both shared a policy vision, he argued, and both rejected the twentieth-century welfare state as a betrayal of the Founders' idea of self-reliance. If the strident faction seemed to be ascendant at the moment, as it had since 2009, Goldberg was not particularly worried. Tea Party zeal would only catalyze conservative momentum that could eventually be channeled toward legislative success.

But after the shooting, things looked different. With Giffords lying in a coma and half a dozen people dead, it became much more important to distinguish the hysterical faction from the responsible one. Republican leaders would need to contain the more unruly components of the Tea Party revolution, while nevertheless harnessing its energy to accomplish Republican purposes.

Unfortunately for the Republican leadership, the Tea Party seemed barely interested in governance. Tea Partiers wanted, above all else, a confrontation with the president regardless of the wisdom of the conflict. And because the 2010 freshman class was so large, Speaker John Boehner did not have a functional majority to pass bills without Tea Party support. That dynamic made Republican attempts to convert the posture of rage into actual policy initiatives difficult if not impossible.

The problems began straightaway. By early spring, it became apparent that the U.S. debt ceiling would need to be raised, a regular occurrence since the spiraling debts under the George W. Bush administration, now exacerbated by the Great Recession and the Democrats' stimulus package to combat it. Republican leaders decided that they would resist all increases to the debt ceiling until they received sufficient concessions that would, they hoped, force a fundamental change in course.

The tactic was not new. Fights over the debt ceiling had been occasional going back to the exploding deficits of the Reagan administration. But what was new was the unbending posture of the Tea Party. In the past, when the opposition party threatened not to raise it, there was no real risk that the ceiling would not be raised. Refusing to do so was simply a way of extracting concessions. Everyone understood that actually going through with the obstruction would put the U.S. government into default—not a live option.

But what the Tea Party–led Republicans demanded—a massive cut to spending that would increase over time, a balanced-budget amendment that would permanently limit spending in the future, and the promise that these aggressive cuts would somehow balance the budget rather than creating recession and larger budget deficits—was unprecedented. There was no way that Obama could give even half of what the Tea Party faction demanded. So what would otherwise have been a routine maneuver in public credit of the United States. The Tea Party threatened to burn down the house in order to "save" it.

As the standoff lasted through the summer, many old-guard Republicans began to grow nervous. Even those not known for their moderation began to appeal to the Tea Party faction for a sense of perspective. Under the headline "Ideals vs. Realities," the conservative pundit Thomas Sowell reminded his allies that they needed to keep in mind the course of the Founders in the American Revolution. Just as George Washington retreated from British troops to find a more strategic ground, Sowell argued, so the Tea Party might find a different place than the debt limit to begin the quest for smaller government.

But the Tea Party members remained firm. They were engaged in a revolution, and a revolution demanded, above all else, extreme commitment. They would continue to the bitter end. As former House majority leader Dick Armey had said at a Tea Party rally, they needed to follow the Founders and the Constitution without thought or equivocation—"This ain't no thinkin' thing," he said.

Once the Treasury commenced extraordinary measures to put off default, more business-minded Republicans became frantic. The Wall Street Journal published an editorial denouncing the self-destructive extremism of the Tea Party faction under the title "The GOP's Reality Test." The editorial board was now convinced that the Republican Party had been taken over by a bunch of lunatics who were unhinged from the actualities of economics and governance.

The future was now clear. The Tea Party movement was determined to follow their vision, even if it was self-stultifying. They professed to want to shrink government to unleash the capitalist system and they argued that not raising the debt ceiling would be a first step. But a default would have plunged the nation's economy back into recession, which would have lowered tax receipts and massively increased the debt. And the default would have further raised the cost of borrowing, which would then further increase the debt. So not raising the debt ceiling as a first step in stopping the debt cycle would have, in fact, massively increased the deficit, added enormously to the debt, and thrown the nation's economy into chaos.

As the radicalism of the new freshman class became apparent, Sam Tanenhaus of the New York Times wondered if perhaps the Tea Party could learn from Jefferson, their idol. Jefferson was the originator of the antistatist tradition in American politics. He had invented many of the rhetorical postures that the Tea Party now adopted. But like the Tea Party, Jefferson had found his ideology and his posturing challenged by reality, as had many anti-statist politicians who crusaded to shrink government. In fact, by the measurement of actually accomplishing their goals in office, Tanenhaus wrote, "Jefferson and his heirs have been abject failures." But by learning once in office and by adjusting to the realities before him, Tanenhaus believed, Jefferson succeeded in governance.

Could the Tea Party do the same? The answer was no. Unlike Jefferson, who proved to be supple in adjusting his ideology to reality, the Tea Party faction was determined to remain consistent to the bitter end. Their failure was not merely one of political thought, but grew instead out of an intellectual and rhetorical style that substituted paranoid sloganeering for actual policy analysis. Tea Partiers assumed, as Reagan, Goldwater, and others before them had done, going all the way back to Jefferson, that principles and values naturally cohered without trade-offs. Those principles had been handed down from the Founders, were betrayed at some point in the past, and now needed to be reapplied or else the people would find themselves under a federal despot. Given those stakes, the niceties of economics, the actual numbers by which decisions are made, and the policy considerations that guide choices and trade-offs were all beside the point. Total resistance was the only option.

It would be a long next few years.

SECESSION IS AN AMERICAN PRINCIPLE

“Is the Tea Party Over?” the columnist Bill Keller asked hopefully at the start of the 2012 election season. After the near miss with the default, Keller was not alone in wishing for a reprieve. But it was not to be.

Because of Republican gerry mandering after the 2010 election, the party leadership could not abandon the Tea Party radicals. Since many conservatives were in safe seats, the only credible challenge that they could face would be from the right. To ignore the Tea Party faction or to sideline their political interests would only cause a challenge to the seat. “You have to kowtow to the Tea Party,” a spokesman for Richard G. Lugar of Indiana said, summarizing the view of many Republican politicians. And because of the Tea Party’s unbending radicalism, the Republican Party was, in effect, being driv en by its most extreme faction.

The resulting environment was not hospitable to moderate Republicans, especially coming up on a presidential election cycle. After seeing the radicalism of the moment, many v iable Republican governors decided to sit out the 2012 race. Nav igating the way through a Republican primary required too many bows to Tea Party orthodoxy and an almost willful detachment from basic budgetary math. As Jacob Weisberg observed, the new Republican orthodoxy expected all candidates “to hold the incoherent view that the budget should be balanced immediately, taxes cut dramatically, and the major categories of spending (the military , Social Security, Medicare) left largely intact.” “There is no way to make these numbers add up,” Weisberg concluded, a fact that had been pointed out numerous times by nonpartisan sources. But the Tea Party required the incoherent litmus test nevertheless, which had the effect of winnowing the field.

As more responsible Republican governors bowed out of the race, the resulting crowd of candidates was filled with minor and often eccentric figures who hewed to Tea Party orthodoxy. The primary season itself unfolded with an unseemly chaos. Each Tea Party–supported candidate—Michele Bachmann, Newt Gingrich, Herman Cain, Rick Perry, Rick Santorum—took a turn in the lead before making a gaff, losing a crucial primary, or exposing his or her basic ignorance of public affairs. At that point, a new candidate would begin to rise to the top.

Tea Partiers remained cool to Romney, even after it became apparent that he was to be the nominee. To energize the base, Romney decided to add some Tea Party flair to the ticket, choosing as his running mate Paul Ryan, a Tea Party darling and architect of the 2012 Republican budget that, among other things, promised to convert Medicare into a voucher sy stem and to cut taxes (again) on the wealthy. Ryan had strengthened his already robust Tea Party credibility when he rehearsed the standard-issue Tea Party rhetoric during his 2011 Republican response to Obama’s State of the Union address. Warning that the nation was “reaching a tipping point,” Ryan called the nation back to its anchor “in the wisdom of the founders; in the spirit of the Declaration of Independence; and in the words of the American Constitution.”

Ryan seemed the perfect choice. But it turned out that the Tea Party and the American electorate had begun to div erge. Although Ryan’s place on the ticket energized Tea Party conservativ es, in a time of economic stagnation the Tea Party rhetoric did not sell with the wider public. The Romney -Ryan ticket was stuck in the mud, unable to pull ahead in what many Republicans had anticipated would be an easy contest. After the late-summer conventions, polling suggested a close race. But some pollsters, most notably Nate Silver of the New York Times, were predicting Obama’s reelection.

Still, many conserv atives went into election night expecting to win. “I just finished writing a victory speech,” Romney told reporters on his campaign plane. And a concession speech? “I’v e only written one speech at this point,” Romney said.

Yet as the election returns came in, it became apparent how out of touch Republicans had become. Obama won in decisive fashion, 332 electoral votes to Romney’s 206. Even more disturb-ing—at least for Republicans—was the demographic composition of those who voted from Romney versus those who voted for Obama. Romney lost nearly every important demographic with one exception: 88 percent of Romney voters were white. In a nation that was turning increasingly brown, those numbers suggested crisis.

Watching the agony unfold, Sam Tanenhaus, one of the keenest of political observers, came to a disturbing conclusion: the Tea Party–led GOP was headed to the most extreme Jeffersonian position, that of John C. Calhoun prior to the Civil War. According to Tanenhaus, Calhoun’s position had been built into the conservative movement from the beginning. At William F. Buckley’s National Rev iew, for example, Calhoun was “the Ur-theorist of a burgeoning but outnumbered conserv ative movement, ‘the principal philosopher of the losing side.’ ” Through the fervent embrace of such early conserv atives, Calhoun’s v iews on federal power and the Tenth Amendment became central in the emergence of the newly conserv ative politics.

But problems had begun to set in by the 1990s and only intensified during the Bush administration. Although Bush was reelected, it had become obvious that the Jeffersonian-Calhounian rhetoric ceased to mobilize the electorate in the same way as the nation became less white and as conservative policy goals failed to pan out. By 2009, the conservativ e movement hit crisis. “In retreat,” Tanenhaus argued, “the nullifying spirit has been revived as a form of governance—or, more accurately, anti-governance.” Led by the Tea Party, Republicans stumbled into a series of unwinnable fights over the budget, the debt ceiling, and Obamacare, each justified, according to Tanenhaus, “not as a practical attempt to find a better answer, but as a ‘Constitutional’ demand for restoration of the nation to its hallowed prior self.”

But now that approach had come to its logical endpoint after the 2012 election. The Jeffersonian argument about maintaining founding principles had degenerated into a Calhounian vision of state-sponsored nullification and retrenchment. “Denial has always been the basis of a nullifying politics,” Tanenhaus believed, but after the election it was obvious that “modernity could not be nullified.”

How would Republicans now respond? They could either abandon their form of antigovernance—with its genuflections toward the Founders, its simplistic solutions to complex problems, and its general tendency toward obstruction. Or the party would remain, Tanenhaus predicted, “the party of white people.”

After Senate vote, NSA prepares to shut down phone tracking program // LAT // Brian Bennett and Lisa Mascaro - May 23, 2015

Hours after the Senate balked at reauthorizing the bulk collection of U.S. telephone records, the National Security Agency began shutting a controversial program Saturday that senior intelligence and law enforcement officials say is vital to track terrorists in the United States.

The Senate had debated into early predawn hours Saturday but failed to reach a deal to reform the program or extend its life beyond May 31, when the law used to authorize it is set to expire. Lawmakers then left on a weeklong recess, vowing to return at the end of it to try again in a rare Sunday session.

Administration officials said later that they had to start the lengthy procedure of winding down the counter-terrorism program in anticipation that Congress failed to act and a full shutdown was required.

“That process has begun,” an administration official said Saturday.

Intelligence officials warned of a precipitous gap in data collected if Congress did not come up with a plan before May 31 to either expand the NSA's authority — which is unlikely — or replace the program in an orderly way over several months.

The start of the wind-down process marks the most significant step the Obama administration has taken to limit the data collection since former NSA contractor Edward Snowden leaked documents in 2013 showing the government was siphoning and holding millions of so-called toll records of domestic phone calls.

The data include the number dialed, duration, date and time for most telephone calls made by Americans. The information is then searched for connections to the phone numbers of known or suspected terrorists. About 300 such searches were made in 2014.

Opponents of the program, including presidential candidate Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), are concerned that the massive database could invite abuse by future administrations that want to probe how citizens are connected to each other, stifle dissent or crack down on political enemies.

“The Bill of Rights is worth losing sleep over,” Paul wrote on Twitter on Friday night after he sent the Senate into overdrive by running the clock on procedural steps. “Continuing to filibuster against NSA bulk surveillance.”

Paul won praise from his supporters for his unrelenting stand against the surveillance program. Two Republican lawmakers from the House came to the late night Senate session to support the Kentucky senator. But elsewhere in the Capitol, his maneuver drew grumbles from fellow senators in his party who viewed it as a campaign stunt.

The program, which relies on siphoning data directly from phone companies into U.S. databases, is complex and requires several days to shut down, officials said. Intelligence officials said they had to start taking steps now in order to stay within the bounds of the law, particularly after a federal circuit court ruling this month found the NSA program to be illegal. The decision invalidated the legal analysis of the Patriot Act that NSA lawyers used for years to justify large-scale collection and storage of call records.

The standoff in Congress also puts in jeopardy some lesser-known parts in the Patriot Act, which was passed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

One of them allows the FBI to collect business records, such as credit card and banking data, for use in terrorism investigations. Another authorizes “roving wiretaps,” which permit the FBI to eavesdrop on every phone used by a suspected terrorist without seeking separate court warrants for each one.

And another helps the FBI track a “lone wolf,” an individual suspected of planning a terrorist attack, even if he or she has no known link to a terrorist group. If the provisions lapse, the FBI could continue using the “roving wiretap” and “lone wolf” authorities in existing cases only.

“We better be ready next Sunday afternoon to prevent the country from being endangered by the total expiration of the program,” Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said as he left the Capitol.

Senators had rejected two bills that would have continued the program, including one overwhelmingly approved by the House and backed by the White House that would put limits on the government’s ability to acquire phone data.

The House bill gave the NSA six months to shift from collecting and holding the raw call data itself on government servers to a program that requested the records from telephone companies on a case-by-case basis. It fell just three votes short of advancing. Many view it as the most viable compromise.

Proposals from McConnell to continue the program as is, with no reforms, for as little as one extra day, also fell short.

Paul objected to those measures, as did two Democrats, a further sign of bipartisan opposition to extending the program without changes. Paul, who has made shutting down the NSA program a focus of his presidential bid, engaged in a 10½-hour talk-a-thon this week to delay proceedings.

“It’s not about making a point, it’s about trying to end bulk collection,” Paul said. The debate has been difficult for Congress, and especially McConnell, the Republican leader who backs Paul for president but disagrees with his fellow home-state senator on this issue.

In a sign of the growing political consensus for changes, Senate Republican leaders had reversed course earlier Friday and signaled that upon returning from the holiday recess they were willing to consider legislation to reform how the NSA searches U.S. telephone records.

Legislation promised by Sen. Richard M. Burr (R-N.C.), chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, is expected to include many elements of the House-passed USA Freedom Act, which would impose limits on the NSA surveillance program.

Fearful of allowing a counter-terrorism program to close on their watch, some senators suggested an agreement could still be reached before May 31. “We don’t want a dark period,” Sen. Dan Coats (R-Ind.), a member of the Intelligence Committee, said before lawmakers adjourned.

Others expressed hope that if record collection were interrupted, the impact on the NSA would not be dire.

“What would happen during that time period, they just wouldn't be scraping data, but they still would be carrying out other parts of the program,” said Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.), the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

But more hawkish lawmakers oppose elements of the compromise approach. They want to keep the program in place as is until they are certain the alternative methods being pushed by privacy advocates will work.

“The way you determine it doesn’t work is when the bomb goes off, and all of a sudden people say, ‘Hey, it didn’t work,’” Coats said. “That’s why holding it at current lev el is, we think, necessary until it’s prov en that, yes, we can do this.”

Administration officials are urging Congress to act quickly and comprehensively. A stopgap measure to extend the program past May 31 would not satisfy the court order, they say, and thus would not stop the dismantling of the phone record collection effort.

McConnell's NSA gambit fails // The Hill // Jordain Carney and Julian Hattem - May 23, 2015

Mitch McConnell staged an epic gamble over U.S. spying powers — and lost.

The Republican leader pledged to keep senators in Washington through the weekend to finish work on expiring provisions of the Patriot Act, but Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky .) called his bluff.

Instead, when the smoke cleared in the early hours of Saturday morning, the 2016 presidential contender was the one with bragging rights.

The battle between the two Kentucky Republicans spilled over on the Senate floor, with Paul using procedural tactics to force the chamber into an early Saturday vote. He then used his leverage to kill off McConnell’s repeated attempts to reauthorize the expiring National Security Agency (NSA) programs — first for two months, then for eight days, then for five, then three, then two.

McConnell and the Republican leadership team had appeared confident even into Friday ev ening that they could kill the House-passed USA Freedom Act. They had planned to force the Senate into accepting a “clean” reauthorization of the provisions — set to expire at the end of the month — at least for a short while.

But Paul and other opponents of the “clean” renewal held firm, forcing McConnell to kick the can and adjourn the Senate without a clear path forward on how to prevent a shutdown of the NSA programs.

Leaving the Capitol, Republicans seemed confused on what their leader’s next steps would be.

“That's a really good question,” Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah) said, when asked what would change between Saturday and when senators return to Washington for a rare Sunday session on May 31.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) seemed equally unsure if Paul would accept a deal before returning to Washington.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I don’t know. I don’t know. I don’t know. They march to a different drum,” the Armed Services Committee chairman said, adding that he was sure Paul’s tactics were “a great revenue raiser.”

Even Paul himself appeared non-committal on whether or not he would accept a deal.

“We'll see,” he told reporters as he left the Capitol. "It depends, sometimes things change as deadlines approach."

The junior senator from Kentucky wants votes on two amendments, and said that he didn’t understand why McConnell wouldn't let them pass by a simple majority threshold.

Supporters of the USA Freedom Act appeared bolstered by the amount of support the House-passed legislation received, coming three votes shy of the 60 needed to overcome a procedural hurdle.

Lee said he suspects McConnell will try to work out a deal over the recess, adding that “I hope that whatever that is, is going to be built on... the House-passed USA Freedom Act.”

Sen. Ted Cruz, who is competing against Paul for his party’s presidential nomination, said he was “hopeful” that McConnell would see the light on the reform bill, which passed the lower chamber in an overwhelming 338-88 vote.

"Sometimes the Senate takes some time for debate and consideration,” the Texas Republican said. “I think we'll take a week and come back and cooler heads will prevail."

Cruz, while acknowledging that he disagreed with Paul, refused to criticize his hardball tactics, saying that he’s “a big fan” of the libertarian favorite.

McConnell didn’t respond to a barrage of questions from reporters as he left the Capitol, and has given no sign of what his next step would be.

McConnell and Paul have been allies of late. Paul endorsed McConnell last year in his reelection bid, and McConnell is backing Paul's White House run.

But the Republican leader appeared to be caught off guard by his fellow Kentuckian’s resolve, and had previously brushed aside Paul’s filibuster threat.

“Well, ya know, everybody threatens to filibuster. We’ll see what happens,” McConnell told ABC’s “This Week.” “This is the security of the country we’re talking about here. This is no small matter. We see it on display on almost a weekly basis.”

Sen. John Cornyn (Texas), the Republican whip, suggested that Republicans would be able to find a way out of the current standstill, telling reporters after the votes that, "yeah, we'll fix it. I am confident."

Even with path to a deal unclear, the spy brawl had one clear winner — Paul's political ambitions.

He has staked much of his presidential campaign on his civil libertarian bone fides. The stalemate, as well as his filibuster earlier this week, has helped him, and his presidential campaign, dominate the media this week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul showed no sign early Saturday morning of letting go of that spotlight.

"The Senate has refused to reauthorize bulk data collection. I am proud to have stood up for the Bill of Rights," he tweeted from his campaign's account on Saturday. "But our fight is not over."

"The Senate will return one week from Sunday," he added. "With your help we can end illegal NSA spying once and for all."

But he also flatly rejected that his hardline on the Patriot Act provisions was part of a campaign stunt, telling reporters, "I think people don't really question my sincerity."

States quietly consider ObamaCare exchange mergers // The Hill // Sarah Ferris - May 23, 2015

A number of states are quietly considering merging their healthcare exchanges under ObamaCare amid big questions about their cost and viability.

Many of the 13 state-run ObamaCare exchanges are worried about how they'll survive once federal dollars supporting them run dry next year.

Others are contemplating creating multi-state exchanges as a contingency plan for a looming Supreme Court ruling expected next month that could prevent people from getting subsidies to buy ObamaCare on the federal exchange.

The idea is still only in the infancy stage. It's unclear whether a California-Oregon or New York-Connecticut health exchange is on the horizon.

But a shared marketplace — an option buried in a little-known clause of the Affordable Care Act — has become an increasingly attractive option for states desperate to slash costs. If state exchanges are not financially self-sufficient by 2016, they will be forced to join the federal system, HealthCare.gov.

"What is happening is states are figuring out the money is running out," said Jim Wadleigh, the director of Connecticut's exchange, hailed as one of the most successful in the country. "At the end of 2016, everyone has to be self-sustaining."

Other states are being driven to consider the idea by the King v. Burwell case, in which the Supreme Court will decide whether subsidies are allowed in states that didn't set up their own health exchanges.

If the court rules against the Obama administration, millions of people in states across the country will lose subsidies.

Some of those states could be interested in joining with other states that have their own ObamaCare exchanges.

"It's absolutely being driven by the court case," said Joel Ario, the former director of the federal government's Office of Health Insurance Exchanges.

Most Republican state leaders have avoided talking about how they would respond to a decision against the use of subsidies on the federal exchange. Behind the scenes, however, many are anxiously contacting states that run their own exchanges.

"In the last seven business days, I've probably had seven to 10 states contact me about contingency plans," Wadleigh said, though he declined to disclose the names of states he's been talking to. "You can imagine the political backlash that would be if the names got out."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wadleigh, who became the CEO of Connecticut's exchange last fall, said he has been in conversations with many states — some using the federal exchange and some running their own exchanges — about possible partnerships.

"Clearly, we can't sell the code, which was paid for by federal dollars, but what we can do is have collaborations like joining exchanges, if that's feasible," Wadleigh said.

His office met recently with officials from Vermont and Rhode Island to talk about ways to collaborate. A few weeks earlier, the directors of all state marketplaces met in Denver to discuss ways to share services.

That same group will come together again in late July at a conference hosted by the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS).

By most accounts, creating a multi-state marketplace would be a logistical nightmare.

It's unlikely that states could ever merge the full responsibilities of a marketplace, such as regulating plans and managing risk pools.

But even with a simpler model, like a shared call center or website platform, there are big questions about how states could share those costs and duties.

Jennifer Tolbert, a state health expert with the Kaiser Family Foundation, said "one of the trickiest issues" would be determining a governing structure for multi-state exchanges.

"I don't know how that would be resolved," she said.

These hurdles have been big enough to thwart multiple states from moving forward with their plans. Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, which commissioned a study on the option in June 2013, have all dropped the idea.

What is more feasible, experts believe, is a technology-sharing system, where multiple states all hire the same private contractor. States could also create a regional call center or outreach team.

"There's lot of states that are trying to crack this sustainability problem, and there have been times when they've talked about regional solutions, but it's really been very early on in those discussions," said Pat Kelly, the director of Idaho's health exchange, Your Health Idaho.

He said sharing some services, particularly technology, could bring big benefits to states, though his own state couldn't do so because it used federal dollars for the contract.

"Is it possible and is it a good idea? Absolutely," he said. "Every time you can share the costs, it's going to be more efficient."

Eventually, it could also involve states that are already on the federal exchange, though that kind of transition would likely take years, said Ario, who has served as the state insurance commissioner for both Oregon and Pennsylvania.

"I think if King goes against the government, there will be a flurry of activity," added Ario, who is now the managing director at Manatt Health Solutions. "Otherwise, it will be more of a gradual transition."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He said it could be possible for states in some regions — like the Great Plains, where the politics and populations are similar — to leave HealthCare.gov in fav or of their own, more autonomous system.

"You can imagine an SEC exchange," he said, referring to states participating in the Southeastern Conference college football league. "Maybe they could run an exchange really well."

The idea is becoming more attractive as more and more states are facing dwindling budgets.

Already, Oregon and Nevada have been forced to scrap their own systems and move to the federal exchange. Hawaii is now nearing a shutdown of its program after lawmakers rejected a last-ditch $10 million funding request.

The costs of running Vermont's ObamaCare exchange are expected to rise to $200 million this y ear, while California has made major cutbacks after seeing lower-than-expected enrollment figures. Its latest budget, released last week, scales down the budget for advertising, outreach budget and technology services.

For all states, technology is the biggest cost item and the biggest barrier for states to set up their own exchanges.

The Obama administration, which has given $5 billion in grants to help launch exchanges, has already pushed back the deadline for state marketplaces. Exchanges were initially told to be self-sufficient by 2015.

Still, while forming larger exchanges could make financial sense for the states, it could risk a political backlash.

The state-based exchanges were included in the Affordable Care Act to calm fears that the law would lead to a new, national system for obtaining insurance similar to a "public option."

Kevin Counihan, the CEO of HealthCare.gov, said earlier this month that he has been encouraging to share "best practices" among state marketplaces that are struggling.

"Our role is to do everything we can ... to help those states succeed," Counihan told a group at the Health Insurance Exchange Summit earlier this month.

Wadleigh, who will speak at the CMS-sponsored July conference, said officials have been "very supportiv e" about his discussions with other states, including multi-state partnerships.

A spokesperson from the CMS declined to answer questions about the exchanges.

Ireland legalizes gay marriage in historic vote // USA Today // Kim Hjelmgaard - May 23, 2015

DUBLIN — Ireland became the first country Saturday to legalize same-sex marriage by national referendum, a result that highlights the dramatic pace at which this traditionally conservative Catholic nation has changed in recent times.

Just 22 years after decriminalizing homosexuality, 62.1% of v oters approved the measure changing the nation's constitution to allow gay marriage, according to official results by Ireland's referendum commission. National turnout in Friday's poll was 60.5% of 3.2 million eligible voters.

"With today's vote we have disclosed who we are: a generous, compassionate, bold and joyful people," Prime Minister Enda Kenny said, welcoming the outcome Saturday, according to the Associated Press.

Emily Neenan, a physics student at the Dublin Institute for Adv anced Studies, was holding a large rainbow-colored umbrella in the forecourt at Dublin Castle, where "Yes" supporters gathered to celebrate outside the Irish government complex.

"I am absolutely thrilled and I didn't think it would pass with such a resounding yes," she said. "Even in more traditional rural areas, it looks like we have done a lot better than we thought we would."

As Neenan spoke on an unseasonably warm and sunny day in Ireland, an occasional cheer rose up from the crowd as Irish politicians who spearheaded the "Yes" campaign passed close by on their way to be interviewed by Ireland's domestic broadcasters.

"You know, it's about time Ireland did this," she said. "It's time Irish society better understands what it looks like, and needs."

Before official results were released, both sides confirmed the outcome earlier Saturday as v otes were tallied.

"We're the first country in the world to enshrine marriage equality in our constitution and do so by popular mandate," Leo Varadkar, Ireland's health minister who revealed he was gay during the campaign, told state broadcaster RTE. "That makes us a beacon, a light to the rest of the world of liberty and equality . It's a very proud day to be Irish."

David Quinn, the director of the conservative Iona Institute, a leading figure behind the "No" campaign, tweeted: "Congratulations to the 'Yes' side. Well done. #MarRef."

Quinn said Friday that the movement to secure equal marriage rights for same-sex couples in Ireland appeared to be insurmountable. For months, polls indicated the majority of Irish v oters were in fav or of the change.

But in the days leading up to the vote, Ireland's government — which supports the measure — warned that attitudes may have been hardening and that victory wasn't certain.

Campaigners on both sides said the high turnout, buoyed by strong engagement from y ounger members of the electorate as well as the many Irish expatriates who returned home to cast their votes, contributed to the "Yes" result.

The referendum is seen as an especially complex one for Ireland, where about 85 % of the population still identify as Roman Catholic even though church attendance has been steadily declining for a few decades. The church's moral authority has been questioned in the wake of a series of sexual abuse scandals and cov erups inv olving children.

The country has been slow to follow a path of social liberalization that has taken root across Europe. Except in cases where a mother's life is perceived to be in danger, abortion is still illegal in Ireland. A prohibition on div orce was repealed only in 1996 following a national referendum.

Dublin's storied pubs were fuller than usual Saturday, and rev erie spilled out onto streets all across the capital. Many were carrying balloons, flags and other accessories highlighting an issue that for some in that gay and lesbian community seemed almost too good to be true.

"It's an incredible day that ev en two years ago we could not have dared to imagine," said Panti Bliss, a well-known Irish transvestite who appeared at a rally at Dublin Castle.

"I think (outsiders) are still hung up on the idea that Ireland is some sort of very conservative country ruled by the Catholic Church," Panti, whose real name is Rory O'Neill, told journalists.

Around the world, 18 countries have approved gay marriage nationwide, the majority of them in Europe. Others, such as the United States and Mexico, hav e approved it in certain regions. In the United States, 37 states have approved gay marriage and the Supreme Court is currently weighing the issue.

"This is a joy ous day for Ireland and for LGBT people and our allies ev ery where," Sarah Kate Ellis, president and CEO of GLAAD, a U.S.-based gay-advocacy group, said in a statement. "We are thankful for the leadership of the Irish people, and we hope that many countries, including the United States, follow suit by extending marriage to all their citizens."

Visitors to St. Patrick's Cathedral — founded in 1191 to honor Ireland's patron saint — in central Dublin on Saturday afternoon appeared mostly wrapped up in their appreciation of the building's impressive stonewall facades.

"It is good that Ireland is approving this legislation," said Michael Lendhofer, a tourist visiting from Hanover, in northwestern Germany.

"But I also think that there are some things about the gay community that I don't agree with. For example, I think they should be more private," he said, without elaborating.

ISIS Gains Mom entum With Palmyra, Assad Squeezed on Multiple Fronts // NBC News // Cassandra Vinograd - May 23, 2015

ISIS' conquest of the ancient city of Palmyra marked the latest in a series of setbacks for the Syrian regime, but analysts say not to count out President Bashar Assad just yet.

This week's capture of the so-called "Venice of the Sands" and its Roman-era ruins marked what appeared to be the first time ISIS directly seized a city from Syrian military and allied forces.

French President Francois Hollande said the fall of Palmyra showed Assad was significantly diminished and called for a new push to broker a deal for his ouster.

"With a regime that is clearly weakened, and with a Bashar Assad who cannot be the future of Syria, we must build a new Syria which can be rid, naturally, of the regime and Bashar Assad but also, above all, of the terrorists," he said Friday.

NBC News reported in December that ISIS and Assad's forces were mostly ignoring each other on the battlefield, focused on eliminating smaller rivals ahead of a possible final showdown.

The Assad regime was focused on stamping out the moderate and weaker opposition — and knew ISIS was doing so too. Now both are starting to engage in a "much more concerted way" because "there isn't much of a moderate left," according to Matthew Henman, head of IHS Jane's Terrorism and Insurgency Center.

However, there is still one large, well-funded and well-armed obstacle acting as a thorn in both sides: the Army of Fatah, a coalition which includes the al Qaeda-linked Nusra front and recently seized control of Idlib from pro-government forces.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Analysts say the Army of Fatah also poses a longterm threat to ISIS as a competitor. Rumors are rife that the coalition is receiving funding from a variety of external actors — Saudi Arabia, Turkey and even Qatar — and Assad has had to rely on Hezbollah fighters for help in the Qalamoun Mountains to beat back the rebels.

"The Assad gov ernment now is being squeezed between these two groups who are still competing with each other," Henman said.

In a rare public appearance earlier this month, Assad downplayed recent setbacks in Idlib as a normal part of any war.

"Psy chological defeat is the final defeat and we are not worried," the Syrian leader said at the time, explaining that amid his army's relentless war there were occasions when the fighters had to "retreat back when the situation warrants."

With other Islamist groups like the Army of Fatah taking the fight directly to the Assad regime — particularly in the northwest of the country —ISIS has "clearly felt a need to respond to that," according to Henman.

Seizing Palmyra looks like a solid way of doing so: It put ISIS back in the headlines as a force capable of snatching territory away from Assad and positioned the group along a key highway network well-situated for further gains.

The British-based Syrian Observatory for Human Rights said Friday that ISIS had seized the last border crossing between Syria and Iraq controlled by Assad's forces, situated in Homs province. The monitoring group also has said with the capture of Palmyra, ISIS now controls more than half of all Syrian territory .

That doesn't mean that ISIS necessarily outsmarted pro-government forces for Palmy ra, according to analysts. Instead, it appears that ISIS found a way to "take advantage of the situation," Henman said.

"The opportunity was right to strike at Palmyra ... while the government is v ery busy elsewhere fighting," he added.

Analysts said that while the Assad regime certainly is facing a number of challenges — including an overstretched military — it would be premature to interpret Palmyra's fall as a sign of its impending collapse.

Failing to put up a big fight for Palmyra actually could have even been a strategic move on Assad's part, according to Ayham Kamel, the Eurasia Group's Middle East & North Africa director.

While previously the regime tried to maintain at least nominal control in each of Syria's prov inces, Kamel said the losses of Palmy ra and Idlib show that "the former strategy is no longer working."

He said that with fights on so many fronts it simply has become "unsustainable" for the military to devote equal resources in all locations — quite possibly forcing the regime to literally pick its battles.

"Palmyra is a national treasure but it is not key to the regime's fate," he explained. Instead, the regime might be calculating that troops are needed elsewhere in more strategic locations for long-term v iability.

While the regime is "definitely " weaker than six months ago, it's not necessarily weaker than two months ago, Kamel said.

"We've seen very clearly that in the war, the pendulum sway s in both directions," he added. "The current balance of power on the ground is not necessarily permanent."

39 die in Mexico police shootout with suspected cartel members // LAT // Deborah Bonello - May 23, 2015

gunfight between Mexican police and suspected criminals in the cartel-dominated western state of Michoacan left at least 39 people dead Friday , according to authorities and news reports.

The firefight occurred in Tanhuato on Michoacan's border with Jalisco state. The region has seen intense drug-related violence in recent months, at least in part because of the approaching midterm elections June 7.

Controversial former top cop shot in Mexico's Ciudad Juarez

Early reports Friday suggested that the Jalisco New Generation cartel, Mexico's fastest growing criminal group, might have been behind the attack in Tanhuato. Details about who died in the gunfight were not immediately available.

Tension between the Jalisco New Generation cartel and the Mexican government has been high since members of the cartel shot down a police helicopter with a rocket-propelled grenade early this month, killing six soldiers. The army was in pursuit of a cartel conv oy when the copter was downed.

After the attack, the national security commissioner, Monte Alejandro Rubio, told Mexico's Televisa network that "the full force of the Mexican state will be felt in the state of Jalisco."

In early April, Jalisco New Generation ambushed and killed 15 members of the federal police, the largest death count in an attack on state forces here since 2010.

Tanhuato is minutes from Yurecuaro, where a political candidate was fatally shot last week during a campaign event. The slay ing of Enrique Hernandez of the left-leaning Movement for National Regeneration, or Morena, party prompted authorities to reinforce security along the state line between Michoacan and Jalisco, which also forms part of a region known as Tierra Caliente, or hotlands.

Tierra Caliente is a center of drug production and trafficking in Mexico and has been a focus in President Enrique Peña Nieto's security strategy . Civ ilians began to rise up in arms there about two years ago to defend themselves against the criminal groups that kill, kidnap and extort money from residents.

On Thursday, three bodies were found near Chilapa in Guerrero state, where at least 16 people went missing this month when the town was taken over by armed, masked men for five days.

The bodies were not immediately identified, but the leader of the federal police, Enrique Galindo, on Friday made his second trip to Chilapa to speak to the families of the missing.

The Mexican government has moved quickly over the last few days in an attempt to take control of the situation. Peña Nieto and his administration want to avoid a new scandal involving mass disappearances after international condemnation last year over the abduction of 43 college students.

The students vanished in September after being detained by local police in the city of Iguala,about a three-hour drive from Chilapa. The federal gov ernment initially gave jurisdiction for the incident to Guerrero's state government, for which it was heavily criticized.

Since then, clandestine graves containing about 100 bodies have been discov ered in the hills around Iguala; the remains of

Weary of Relativity // NYT // Frank Bruni - May 23, 2015

SAY anything critical about a person or an organization and brace for this pushback: At least he, she or it isn't as bad as someone or something else.

Sure, the Roman Catholic Church hasn't done right by women. But those Mormons have more to answer for!

Yes, there are college presidents with excessive salaries. But next to the football and basketball coaches on many campuses, they're practically monks!

Set the bar low enough and all blame is deflected, all shame expunged. Choose the right points of reference and behold the alchemy: naughty deeds into humdrum conformity. Excess into restraint. Sinners into saints.

Arkansas into Elysium.

I mention Arkansas because of a classic bit of deflection performed last month by one of its senators, Tom Cotton. He was rationalizing a so-called religious freedom bill that would hav e permitted the state's merchants to deny services to people based on their sexual orientation. And he said that it was important to "have a sense of perspective."

"In Iran," he noted, "they hang you for the crime of being gay."

I see. If you're not hauling homosexuals to the gallows or stoning them, you're ahead of the game, and maybe even in the running for a humanitarian medal.

Like I said, y ou can set the bar anywhere you want.

And you can justify almost any thing by pointing fingers at people who are acting likewise or less nobly.

Naturally, this brings us to the current presidential campaign.

Earlier this month Hillary Clinton not only made peace with the "super PACs" that will be panhandling on her behalf, but also signaled that she'd do her vigorous part to round up donations for one of them, Priorities USA.

She did this despite much high-minded talk previously about taming the influence of money in politics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She did this without the public hand-wringing of Barack Obama when he reluctantly embraced his super PAC, which happened at a later point in his 2012 re-election effort.

She did this because Jeb Bush and other potential Republican rivals were either doing or poised to do this.

And she did this, no doubt, because of the Koch brothers and their political network's stated goal of raising and spending nearly $1 billion on behalf of Republicans during this election cycle. For Democrats, "the Koch brothers" is at once a wholly legitimate motivation and an all-purpose exoneration, a boogey man both real and handy, permitting all manner of mischief by everybody else. True, I'm vacuuming up money like an Electrolux on Adderall. But in a Koch-ian context, I'm a sputtering Dustbuster.

Democrats tell themselves that they have a ways to go before they sink as low as Republicans do. Republicans tell themselves that none of their machinations rival the venal braid of conflicting interests and overlapping agendas in the Clintons' messy world.

The Clintons tell themselves that their assiduous enrichment since the end of Bill's presidency still doesn't put them in a league with the fat cats whom they've met and mingled with, and that they earned their wealth rather than inheriting or shortchanging shareholders for it.

Other politicians tell themselves that if the Clintons are lapping at the trough so rapaciously, surely they 're entitled to some love and lucre of their own.

When it comes to money , almost everybody looks up — not down or sideways — to determine how he or she is doing and what he or she might be owed. There's always someone higher on the ladder and getting a whole lot more, alway s someone who establishes a definition of greed that you fall flatteringly short of.

One titan's bonanza becomes the next titan's yardstick, and the pay of the nation's top executives spirals ever further out of control.

In the warped context of their compensation packages, the $8.5 million that Richard Lev in, the former president of Yale University, received as an "additional retirement benefit" after he strode out the door in 2013 probably struck some of the enablers who gave it to him — and perhaps Levin himself — as unremarkable.

Never mind that Yale is a nonprofit institution or that the values of higher education are supposed to diverge from those of Wall Street. Now Lee Bollinger, the current president of Columbia, can feel modest about the nearly $3.4 million package that he received for one recent year.

THAT magnitude of compensation didn't dissuade him from musing last week about how completely content he and his wife were back when their apartment hosted roaches and dinner was Lipton noodle soup. He recalled that distant past in remarks to graduating seniors, whom he urged, without any evident irony, to address "persisting inequalities, especially of wealth."

And if Bollinger can feel modest, Drew Faust, the president of Harvard, can feel positively ascetic: She makes less than a third of what he does. Of course she supplements that by sitting on the corporate board of Staples, an arrangement that some Harvard students and faculty have understandably questioned and quibbled with.

Then there's the moral jujitsu that American voters have become especially adept at in these polarized times. Many of them unreservedly exalt their party's emissary — and inoculate him or her from disparagement — simply because he or she represents the alternative to someone from the other side. Being the lesser of ev ils is confused with being virtuous, though it's a far, far cry from that.

President Obama stumbles or falls and is pardoned by all-or-nothing partisans on the grounds that he's not George W.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush. Those same partisans wave off any naysaying about his foreign policy by bringing up the invasion of Iraq. And the bungled rollout of Obamacare? A mere wisp of inconvenience in comparison with the botched response to Hurricane Katrina. Everything's relative.

Except it's not.

There are standards to which government, religion and higher education should be held. There are examples that politicians and principled businesspeople should endeavor to set, regardless of whether their peers are making that effort. There's right and wrong, not just better or worse.

And there's a word for recognizing and rising to that: leadership. We could use more of it.

Echoes of Iraq war sound in 2016 presidential race // LAT // Mark Z. Barabak - May 23, 2015

Every war casts a long shadow, from the heroism of the Greatest Generation to the dark ambiguities of Vietnam. It was inevitable, then, that the 2016 presidential candidates would be confronted with the war in Iraq.

Twelve years on, the broad questions raised by the invasion — about trust in Washington and its leaders, about faith in dubious overseas alliances, about the best ways to fight terrorism and how to bring peace to the Middle East, if that's even possible — have not gone away.

If anything, the politics have grown more fraught for members of both parties.

Kentucky Republican Rand Paul seized the Senate floor Wednesday for a 101/2 -hour speech aimed at ending the domestic surveillance program that grew out of the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 — part of President George W. Bush's justification for war.

The accusations of government overreach have been a centerpiece of Paul's presidential bid and made him a champion to privacy advocates and the libertarian-minded. But it also sets him against Republicans eager to portray the freshman lawmaker as feckless and too quick to drop the nation's guard.

In a mocking speech, New Jersey's Republican Gov. Chris Christie laced into those he called "civil liberties extremists," who he said were trying to convince Americans "there's a government spook listening in every time you pick up the phone or Skype with your grandkids."

"They want you to think that if we weakened our capabilities, the rest of the world would love us more," Christie told a New Hampshire audience on Monday. "Let me be clear: All these fears are exaggerated and ridiculous."

The challenge for candidates like Christie and others in the GOP field is to sound tough — certainly tougher than President Obama is perceived — without appearing belligerent or too eager, as some now fault Bush, to go to war.

Familial ties make that balance all the more acute for his brother, Jeb Bush, should he emerge as the Republican nominee, which is why his ham-handed performance last week — seemingly for the Iraq war before he was against it — was so unexpected and potentially damaging.

The former Florida governor spent days calibrating and recalibrating a series of statements before flatly declaring that, in retrospect, the invasion should never have occurred. "Knowing what we know now, I would not have engaged," Bush said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I would not have invaded Iraq.”

The question could not, or at least should not, have caught him by surprise, raising doubts about Bush's campaign faculties after a years-long layoff; several GOP rivals were quick to align themselves with popular sentiment, saying they would never have gone to war given the knowledge they possess today.

“I don't know how that was a hard question,” said former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, turning the knife.

Bush, however, was not alone among Republicans. On Sunday, in a convoluted Fox News interview, it was Florida Sen. Marco Rubio's turn to weave and stumble about the issue, defending President Bush's decision to invade Iraq, given his thinking at the time, while suggesting it was a mistake he would not wish to repeat.

For the Democratic candidates, familiar divisions surrounding the war have also begun to emerge.

Some on the left have never forgiven the party's favorite, Hillary Rodham Clinton, for backing the war as a United States senator in 2002, and they are once more calling her judgment into question. The former New York lawmaker and secretary of State has expressed regret for her vote many times since, including again this week.

Clinton's sole announced challenger, independent Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, said in an interview during a March swing through Iowa, a state with a broad pacifist streak: “I think the war in the Mideast, how we got into it and how we're going to address the current problems, are issues that every American should be concerned about.” He opposed the Iraq war, he tells audiences, from the start.

Since 2003, when the Iraq war began, every presidential campaign has been shaped to some degree by the U.S. invasion, its faulty pretense — weapons of mass destruction that were never found — and the war's vexing aftermath.

President Bush might not have been reelected in a close 2004 race but for voters' reluctance to replace him in the throes of the conflict.

His successor, President Obama, would probably not be in office today had his antiwar position not given him the traction in 2008 to take on Clinton, who was then — as now — the overwhelming favorite for the Democratic nomination.

But politically it is no longer as simple as being for or against the Iraq invasion.

After the withdrawal of U.S. troops under Obama, after the drawing of red lines in Syria and the violent birth of the terrorist group Islamic State, critics can no longer blame Bush for all that torments the region.

“In 2008 and 2012 there was only one narrative, and that benefited Democrats,” said Peter Feaver, a Duke University expert on war and public opinion.

“In 2016 there is another narrative, which says President Obama inherited an Iraq that was stable and headed on a trajectory to success and then, through choices of his own, destabilized the situation and so bears responsibility for what happened,” said Feaver, who served on the National Security Council in Bush's second term.

Ultimately, though, the debate comes back to Bush and his decision to send U.S. troops to topple dictator Saddam Hussein, a move he said would leave the world a better, safer place.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It's a generational pivot point,” said Matthew Dowd, a onetime member of Bush's inner political circle, who was chief strategist for the president's 2004 reelection campaign before souring on the war in Iraq.

At a cost of $2 trillion and more than 4,000 American lives, the war's legacy “affects everything,” Dowd said. “What do we do in Syria? What are we willing to do in Iran? How do we pay to fix our railroads and pay for our kids' college loans?”

“All of this stuff ripples,” he said, and will be debated by presidential candidates for many years to come.

Obama has a strategy for fighting ISIS -- one that isn't working // LAT // Doyle McManus - May 23, 2015

Obama administration critics often charge that the president has no strategy in the war against Islamic State, but that's not true.

Eight months ago, after Islamic State's army swept across northern Iraq, President Obama's national security aides drew up a plan to reverse the militants' gains. It began with airstrikes, to stop their advance. It also included a series of steps to enable Iraq to defeat the invaders without using U.S. combat troops.

First, the United States planned to push Nouri Maliki, the stubborn Shiite prime minister, out of office. Then it would help a new government rebuild the country 's security forces, set up a "national guard" of local militia units, and arm Sunni tribesmen who wanted to fight Islamic State. Once those steps were underway, a strengthened Iraqi army would march north and retake Mosul, the country 's second-largest city.

So Obama does have a strategy — but for the most part it hasn't worked.

U.S. pressure helped shove Maliki out of the prime minister's office last fall, but his successor, Haider Abadi, hasn't succeeded in making most of the other changes the administration sought.

Some 3,000 American military advisors are in Iraq, but they couldn't prevent Iraqi army units from abandoning the western city of Ramadi to Islamic State last week.

Abadi's government drafted a law to set up the national guard, which would allow Sunni military units to defend Sunni provinces, but Shiite politicians have blocked the bill in parliament.

As for arming the Sunni tribes, U.S. officials say the Iraqi government has budgeted money and weapons for 8,000 fighters in Anbar, the largest Sunni prov ince — but most of the aid hasn't been delivered. "The weapons have all been approv ed," a U.S. official said last week. "We just have to get them to the site and get them to the guy s."

And the Iraqi recapture of Mosul, which some officials rashly predicted could happen this spring? It's been postponed several times — most recently because aides hav e concluded that retaking Ramadi must come first.

U.S. officials say the Iraqi government has budgeted money and weapons for 8,000 fighters in Anbar, the largest Sunni province -- but most of the aid hasn't been delivered.

Obama's reaction to these reversals has been to counsel patience, reaffirm faith in his strategy — and blame the Iraqis. "If the Iraqis themselves are not willing or capable to arrive at the political accommodations necessary to govern, if they are not willing to fight for the security of their country, we cannot do that for them," he told Jeffrey Goldberg of the Atlantic magazine last week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A large portion of the blame clearly does belong in Baghdad — especially to the Shiite factions that have blocked Abadi's attempts to do more.

But plenty of pro-American Iraqis and Americans who have spent time in the country believe the Obama administration could do more, too — without putting U.S. troops in ground combat.

"America can help," Rafi Issawi, a moderate Sunni leader and former deputy prime minister, said during a visit to Washington this month. He called on the Obama administration to set up "joint committees" in Sunni provinces to get aid and weapons flowing. "Direct financing from the American side encouraged people to defeat Al Qaeda in 2006 and 2007," he noted.

"The administration's strategy is a good strategy — but it only gets done if you actually do it," Ryan C. Crocker, the former U.S. ambassador in Baghdad, told me. "There hasn't been enough political engagement at the top level. Where are the visits [to Iraq] by the secretary of State and the secretary of Defense? Where are the phone calls from the president? It's not happening."

Crocker said he met with Iraqi politicians in exile last week — "guys who usually want to kill each other" — and heard a common refrain: "Where is America?"

"They're all realistic; they understand we are not going to do boots on the ground," he said. "But they all think we can do more than we're doing now."

Part of the problem, he warned, is that Abadi is under increasing criticism from both sides, Sunni and Shiite. "He's being seen as weak — and in Iraq, weakness is death," he said.

What more could the United States do? There are several options, some already under consideration by the administration, officials say.

The United States could send more advisors and trainers to Iraq to expand the relatively small force already there and allow them to work with more Iraqi units, or even accompany Iraqi forces onto the battlefield.

Although the administration has already increased military aid to the Iraqi army, it could be tougher in demanding that Baghdad's defense ministry implement its promises to arm Sunni forces before more aid arrives.

The U.S. could also consider arming Sunni forces directly. That step, however, could undermine Abadi and accelerate Iraq's division into sectarian camps.

Finally, Obama probably needs to take steps to bolster Abadi — which could include more economic aid and even a symbolic visit or two.

If Iraqi attitudes don't change, the war against Islamic State won't be won. And Iraqi attitudes don't appear likely to change without more pressure from the United States — whether it comes from Obama or, 20 months from now, his unlucky successor.

Is the Ex-Im Bank Doomed? // NYT // Joe Nocera - May 22, 2015

It’s looking pretty grim for the Export-Import Bank of the United States.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Over the last few months, the bank, which extends loans and government guarantees to help American companies export their goods and thus create jobs, has been under intense assault from conservative Republicans opposed to its very existence. Almost every day I get at least one email blast from a conserv ative think tank denouncing the bank for its "crony capitalism" and "corporate welfare."

Conservative economists keep pounding away at their belief that, in macroeconomic terms, the Ex-Im Bank's job creation is illusory; whatever jobs might be gained when one company starts exporting are lost at another company, they say. Most of the Republican presidential candidates are falling all over themselves to declare their opposition to the agency , which is set to die unless Congress reauthorizes it by June 30.

In the House of Representativ es, Jeb Hensarling, the Texas Republican who is chairman of the House Financial Services Committee — and is an implacable foe of the bank — has made it plain that he is eager to see the bank die, casting the issue as one of free markets versus "business interests." He has made no mov es to introduce a reauthorization bill.

In the Senate, Mitch McConnell, the majority leader, who is also against the bank, has grudgingly agreed to allow a vote on a reauthorization amendment, which supporters hope to attach to a future must-pass bill that would then go to the House.

But don't get your hopes up. "Just because the Senate votes on a piece of crap doesn't mean we have to vote for it," retorted Representative Mick Mulvaney, a House Republican from South Carolina, according to Roll Call, a newspaper on Capitol Hill. In a news conference this week, Hensarling said that "the momentum is in our favor." He's right.

There are dozens of countries that have so-called export credit agencies like the Ex-Im Bank. They all do the same thing. They help finance some of their country's exports. Some countries, like China, use a variety of other techniques to push their exports. Guess how many of those countries are following America's lead in trying to wind down that assistance? You guessed it: none. On the contrary, they're rather enjoying watching the U.S. cut off its nose to spite its face.

The conservative opposition is rooted in ideology , of course. Conservatives argue, for instance, that the gov ernment has no business guaranteeing loans if the private sector isn't willing to make them. But this defies reality. In the real world, there are plenty of perfectly good loans that the private sector won't make. Small companies that want to expand abroad have a terrible time getting loans. Big companies often need a government guarantee just to compete for a major contract. After the financial crisis, the Ex-Im Bank increased its financings precisely because the banks were gun-shy. Now that the priv ate sector is making more loans, the agency has backed off.

Another conservativ e argument I've heard recently is that the big companies that use guarantees from the Ex-Im Bank, such as Boeing, General Electric and Caterpillar, have years of back orders, so they can afford to lose a little business if the agency dies. "Boeing has a backlog of $441 billion in back orders," said Diane Katz of the Heritage Foundation. (It's now up to $495 billion, according to Boeing.) "They can't keep up with all the work." She can't really mean to say that it's O.K. if Boeing, America's largest manufacturing exporter, loses business, can she?

Nocera: "Over the last half-dozen years, Republicans hav e done many things that have hurt the American economy and the American worker,...

For goodness' sake! This continent's colonization was founded on government assistance. How have fiscal conservativ es become so short...

Mr. Nocera asks and answers the key question we should all be worried about: "Guess how many of those countries are following America's...

A third argument is the macroeconomic one: that ultimately the Ex-Im Bank does not create net new jobs. "Whenever y ou subsidize a U.S. company, you are ignoring the fact that other U.S. companies could have made that same sale" without the subsidy , said Daniel Ikenson, the director of trade policy studies at the Cato Institute and a leading proponent of this theory.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But I wonder. Reuters this week reported that General Electric will lose a $350 million deal to build locomotives for Angola without the Ex-Im Bank's assistance. The winner won't be another American company , though; it will be a Chinese company, which will hav e export credit financing. The Times wrote about another G.E. deal, this one a $668 million public water project, done in partnership with a second company, that relied on Ex-Im loan guarantees. Without the bank, the second phase of the project will again be lost to a Chinese riv al. The Wall Street Journal recently told the story of Air Tractor, "a maker of crop-dusting and firefighting aircraft in the rural West Texas town of Olney" that will lose a quarter of its business without the Ex-Im Bank. How is that a good thing?

Over the last half-dozen y ears, Republicans have done many things that hav e hurt the American economy and the American worker, including the debt-ceiling crisis of a few years ago. If they succeed in eliminating the Ex-Im Bank, you'll be able to add that to the list.

End Ex-Im Bank, the government's Enron // Washington Examiner // Rep. Bill Flores and Senator Mike Kee - May 21, 2015

Congress has a choice to make, with a deadline of June 30. It can either renew the authorization of the Export-Import Bank — a taxpayer-backed credit agency that picks winners and losers in the marketplace — or let it expire and begin the bank's orderly winding-down.

As conservativ es, we believe that one of Congress' top responsibilities is to protect taxpayers from corruption, waste and mismanagement. That is why we support letting Ex-Im expire. Congressional ov ersight has revealed that the bank is broken, ignores opportunities for reform and proves a financial liability to American taxpayers.

Originally, Ex-Im was conceived to help small American businesses compete with the Soviet Union. It has evolved from a Cold War relic to become a prime example of the perils of Washington's "government knows best" philosophy.

The bureaucrats who run the bank believe that government can outwit markets and help some businesses at the expense of others. We know, however, that America can compete in a modern global economy without interference from bureaucrats. In fact, the best thing Washington can do to help our economy thrive is to enact common-sense tax reforms, unleash America's energy production and lower the barriers for international trade.

Past, present and potential future presidential candidates will fill political talk shows Sunday.

The Senate will instead reconvene in an unusual Sunday session next week to try again.

Unfortunately, Ex-Im is more than an outdated agency — it is fundamentally broken. And it should come as no surprise that when such an agency wields the heavy hand of governmental power, mismanagement, misconduct and corruption become the norm. It is a modern day "Enron" of the federal government.

Take, for instance, the case of former Ex-Im official Johnny Gutierrez, who pleaded guilty just last month to accepting nearly $79,000 in bribes. On 19 separate occasions between 2006-13, Gutierrez accepted cash in return for recommending the bank approve certain unqualified loan applications.

This example is not isolated. At a recent congressional hearing on Ex-Im, House Financial Services Chairman Jeb Hensarling, R-Texas, pointed out that Ex-Im has seen an ov erall increase in criminal charges since President Obama appointed Chairman Fred Hochberg to head it six years ago. According to the chairman, the supposedly small bank's rap sheet is impressive: "Sixty-five matters hav e been referred to prosecution, 31 arrest warrants, 85 indictments, 48 criminal judgments, decades of combined prison time, a quarter of billion in fines, restitution and forfeiture."

Those numbers may soon rise even higher — at the same hearing, Ex-Im's inspector general testified that there are at least 31 open fraud investigations involving Ex-Im that could lead to future indictments.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ex-Im's employee misconduct is a symptom of a larger problem. The bank has simply proven itself incapable of reform. Congress, the General Accountability Office and the bank's own inspector general have made numerous recommendations to "fix" Ex-Im, which its officials have boldly ignored. After y ears of repeated warnings, the bank has made clear that they have no interest in changing their troubling and irresponsible practices — and they are putting taxpay ers at risk in the process.

According to Ex-Im's IG, the bank does not subject borrowers to the same level of scrutiny that private lenders do, and it has no robust and systematic process for keeping an eye on borrowers. The standards for underwriting loans are also decentralized and potentially subjective, as well. In 2010, the Bank's board of directors authorized certain officials to approve loan applications under $10 million, raising concern that the bank was no longer doing its due diligence or applying a uniform standard for loan approval. The IG recommended Ex-Im improve its credit underwriting process, but there is no indication these changes have been implemented.

Ex-Im has also ignored recommendations to manage its risk, as wise private investors do, by diversifying its portfolio geographically and by sector. As a result, its portfolio is too heavily concentrated in a handful of industries. If a sector of the economy heavily subsidized by Ex-Im — like aerospace, for example — were to suffer, taxpayers could be on the hook for billions of dollars in bad loans.

We have paid for such bad decisions before. The painful lessons of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac should not go unheeded. Congress made it clear that Ex-Im needs to reform the way it does business, but Ex-Im has made it clear it will not change. Ex-Im is at risk of becoming another Enron — that legendary corporate example of mismanagement and misconduct, which itself once benefited from Ex-Im financing.

The government should not be in the banking business to begin with, but a government bank that defies the government's elected representatives is ev en more inappropriate. We are both determined to let Ex-Im begin what will likely be a 20-year process of winding down its operations in order to protect taxpayers and pave the way for a freer, more prosperous economic future.

Banks as Felons, or Crim inality Lite // NYT // Editorial Board - May 22, 2015

As of this week, Citicorp, JPMorgan Chase, Barclays and Royal Bank of Scotland are felons, having pleaded guilty on Wednesday to criminal charges of conspiring to rig the v alue of the world’s currencies. According to the Justice Department, the lengthy and lucrative conspiracy enabled the banks to pad their profits without regard to fairness, the law or the public good.

Besides the criminal label, however, nothing much has changed for the banks. And that means nothing much has changed for the public. There is no meaningful accountability in the plea deals and, by extension, no meaningful deterrence from future wrongdoing. In a memo to employ ees this week, the chief executive of Citi, Michael Corbat, called the criminal behavior “an embarrassment” — not the word most people would use to describe a felony but an apt one in light of the fact that the plea deals are essentially a spanking, nothing more.

As a rule, a felony plea carries more painful consequences. For example, a publicly traded company that is guilty of a crime is supposed to lose privileges granted by the Securities and Exchange Commission to quickly raise and trade money in the capital markets. But in this instance, the plea deals were not completed until the S.E.C. gave official assurance that the banks could keep operating the same as always, despite their criminal misconduct. (One S.E.C. commissioner, Kara Stein, issued a scathing dissent from the agency’s decision to excuse the banks.)

Barclay s was one of the banks that pleaded guilty to federal crimes in a currency manipulation case. Credit Mike Segar/ Reuters

Also, a guilty plea is usually a prelude to further action, not the “resolution” of a case, as the Justice Department has called the plea deals with the banks.

To properly determine accountability for criminal conspiracy in the currency cases, prosecutors should now investigate low-level employees in the crime — traders, say — and then use information gleaned from them to push the investigation up as far as the evidence leads. No one has thus far been named or charged. Nor has there been any explanation of how such lengthy and lucrative criminal conduct could have gone unsuspected and undetected by supervisors, managers and executives. The plea deals leave open the possibility of further investigation, but the prosecutors’ light touch with the banks makes it doubtful they will follow through.

An argument has been made that the S.E.C. was right not to revoke the banks' capital-market privileges because doing so might disrupt the economy. That is debatable. What is not debatable is that bringing criminal charges against individuals and even sending some of them to jail would not disrupt the economy. To the contrary, holding individuals accountable is all the more important in instances of wrongdoing by banks that, for whatever reason, have been exempted from the full legal consequences of their criminal behavior.

If I walk into the local bank, demanding the teller hand over X dollars, I would immediately get tackled and hauled off to jail. If I used...

Bribes become acceptable when they have enough 0s.

We all know exactly where the NYSE floor is. Nothing is stopping private citizens from waiting outside and putting the fear of god into...

The plea deals mimic previous civil settlements. In all, the banks will pay fines totaling about $9 billion, assessed by the Justice Department as well as state, federal and foreign regulators. That seems like a sweet deal for a scam that lasted for at least five years, from the end of 2007 to the beginning of 2013, during which the banks' revenue from foreign exchange was some $85 billion.

The banks will also be placed on "corporate probation" for three years, which will be overseen by the court and require regular reporting to the authorities as well as the cessation of all criminal activity. And the banks are also required to notify customers and counterparties that may have been directly affected by the banks' manipulation of the currency markets.

The Justice Department intended the criminal pleas to look tough. Instead, they reflect at bottom the same prosecutorial indulgence that has plagued the pursuit of the banks in the many financial scandals of recent years.

Why Obamacare makes me optimistic about US politics // Vox // Ezra Klein - May 22, 2015

Five years after its passage, Obamacare stands as a monument to much that's wrong with American politics. But it also, increasingly, is evidence of much that's right with it, too.

First, the bad news. Obama isn't just as bitterly polarizing as ever — it's also as confusing as ever. The media has covered the law and its implementation more thoroughly than perhaps any other law in recent American history. But according to a national poll conducted by PerryUndem for Vox, only 18 percent of Americans say they know enough about what's in the Affordable Care Act. And it's not clear that more information would do much good: only 19 percent of Americans think what they hear in the news about Obamacare is even "mostly true."

Much of what Americans know about Obamacare is simply wrong. A plurality, for instance, think the law is costing more than originally estimated. Only 5 percent know it's actually costing quite a bit less:

The result is that opinions on the law are pretty much the same as the day it passed: 83 percent of Americans say their view of Obamacare hasn't shifted over the past five years.

But the good news is, well, really good. Obamacare's premiums are much cheaper than anyone expected, and a new study by the Kaiser Family Foundation shows most enrollees are happy with their health insurance, happy with the value they're getting for their money, and happy with their choice of doctors and hospitals:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In total, a new Rand study estimates that Obamacare has gotten 16.9 million people insured. And all this is happening amidst the most profound slowdown in national health-care costs in decades.

More information won't save American politics

Obamacare is an example of a depressing fact of American politics: more information doesn't change minds.

Social scientists have tested this again and again. The more information partisans get, the deeper their disagreements become. When it comes to politics, people reason backward from their conclusions. Politics makes smart people stupid.

Consider how much we've learned about Obamacare in the past five y ears — and how few elected officials have changed their minds about it. We know how many people it's covering and how much its premiums are costing and how badly Healthcare.gov was designed and how high the deductibles are and how narrow the networks are becoming and how happy people are with their insurance.

Yet no congressional Democrats have watched Obamacare's progression and turned against the law. No congressional Republicans have noticed the law cov ering tens of millions of people with cheaper-than-expected premiums and decided maybe it's not such a disaster after all.

If anything, the opposite has happened. In a last-ditch effort to wound Obamacare by wrecking it in Republican states, conserv atives have begun dev eloping a bizarro-Earth history of the law — one in which Congress built federal exchanges for the sole purpose of ruining insurance markets in recalcitrant states. Five y ears later, it is not just opinions on Obamacare's worth that have diverged. The two sides can't even agree on what the law say s or the history of how it was passed.

Among these elites, the problem is not too little information, nor too little trust in the information. It is too much information that confirms their priors, and too much trust in arguments and "facts" that suit their ends. But the result is much the same. If Americans sometimes seem to disagree on Obamacare because they know too little, Washington's bitter divide is the result of knowing too much.

This is a good place to stop for a moment and be clear about my priors, though they are already quite obvious: I think the evidence is, at this point, overwhelmingly on the side of the law. Obamacare is nowhere near perfect, but it's doing pretty much what it said it would do, at a lower cost than anyone thought. The law can and should be improved, but the simple fact is that the federal government is cov ering millions of prev iously uninsured Americans and spending less on health care with Obamacare than it expected in 2010 to spend without Obamacare. That's remarkable.

Some readers might see my side of this argument as convincing. Some might see it as deluded. In some ways, that's the point. My counterparts and I are drowning in Obamacare data and are no closer to agreement than we were five years ago. More information is just giving both sides more way s to confirm what they already believe.

Washington can't reason. But it can govern.

The state of the Obamacare debate is depressing. But the state of the law is encouraging across pretty much every metric you can find.

Despite a terrible start — the mess that was Healthcare.gov will be used to scare public administration students for generations to come — the law is working pretty well.

The Congressional Budget Office estimates that Obamacare will cut the ranks of the uninsured by 17 million in 2015 — and will cost more than $100 billion less than originally thought. Enrollees are quite happy with their coverage. And, nationally, America's health-care spending is growing more slowly than it has since the 1960s — a trend Obamacare can't take full credit for, but that it hasn't interrupted and is likely helping along.

Obamacare's biggest problem is that the Supreme Court let states opt out of the Medicaid expansion — and dozens did.

But a few years in, a majority of states have signed up, and even the reddest locales are slowly but surely coming around. Right now, Kansas and Utah are thinking about joining Obamacare's Medicaid expansion even while Obama remains in office. It's a pretty safe bet that once Obama leaves, and some of the polarization around his signature law leaves with him, all or nearly all states will eventually participate in the law.

And this is, more broadly, the bright spot for American politics as a whole. Even as it is often irrational for elected officials to look at the facts and come to a conclusion that puts them at odds with their party, it is rational for them, when in power, to come to conclusions that will help them govern well.

This was evident even when the Democratic Party first passed and implemented Obamacare. The law was unpopular by the time it passed — and one reason was that Democrats had actually made it fiscally responsible legislation, adding hundreds of billions in spending cuts and tax increases. Healthcare.gov was a mess on the day it launched, but the White House fixed it quickly — even as some liberals downplayed the severity of technical problems, the Obama administration knew its legacy depended on the law actually working.

This is true across policies. Democrats may broadly support tax increases, but Democratic presidents worry about the distortionary effects of high taxes. Republicans may want to drown the government in a bathtub, but they know better than to get voters too wet. That isn't to say either party governs perfectly, or even always rationally. But governing has feedback loops that press releases don't. Parties that want to stay in power — and they all do – have an incentive to do a good job.

In that way, voters discipline the system even if they don't know much about individual policies, and even if they don't regularly update their opinions on how various laws are working. Most people aren't experts on politics, but they are experts on their lives and the lives of their loved ones. If the economy is tanking, or their health insurance is being yanked away, or their cousin was just wounded in an unnecessary war, they eventually punish the politicians they think responsible.

It's not a perfect system — sometimes elected officials end up paying for the sins of their predecessors, or can pass legislation where the bill will be sent to their successors — but it's better than we sometimes give it credit for.

For all the rhetoric, imagine what would happen to, say, President Jeb Bush if he sought to uproot Obamacare entirely. Tens of millions of Americans would lose their health insurance overnight. Any search for a coherent replacement would spark a brutal political war within the Republican Party. Republicans would suddenly be on the wrong end of the "if you like your health care, you can keep it" promise. Remember that for all the energy congressional Republicans spent in the 1990s trying to cut Medicare, Bush's brother, once in the White House, ended up massively expanding it. The incentives of governing are very different from the incentives of politicking.

The Islamic State is entirely a creation of Obama's policies // WaPo // Ed Rogers - May 22, 2015

As reported by Robert Costa in The Washington Post, Republicans are blaming the president not only for allowing the Islamic State to develop as a terrorist organization in the first place, but also for failing to effectively combat the group as it has grown. Yet there appears to be some objection to Republicans calling President Obama out on his lack of a foreign policy strategy. Well, yeah. The Islamic State is 100 percent a creation of Obama's policies. Plain and simple.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Iraq security forces withdraw from Ramadi, the capital of Iraq's Anbar province, 115 kilometers (70 miles) west of Baghdad, Sunday, May 17, 2015. Suicide car bomb attacks killed over 10 members of Iraqi security forces Sunday in Ramadi, which now is largely held by the Islamic State group, authorities said. Last week, the militants swept through Ramadi, seizing the main government headquarters and other key parts of the city. It marked a major setback for the Iraqi government's efforts to drive the militants out of areas they seized last year.

By his own admission, Obama announced the "end" of the Iraq war, standing in front of returning troops at Fort Bragg, N.C., on Dec. 14, 2011. In that speech, he said the United States was leaving behind "a sovereign, stable, and self-reliant Iraq, with a representative government." There was no Islamic State threat at that time. Fast forward to this month, when the president said in an interview with the Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg the day after Ramadi, Iraq, fell to Islamic State fighters that, "No, I don't think we're losing." I wonder what this administration thinks "losing" looks like? This isn't a "technical setback." The losses in Iraq and the splintering of Syria are a direct result of at least three key Obama decisions.

First, Obama let the sectarian Nouri al-Maliki form a government in Iraq, even after Maliki failed to win the Iraqi parliamentary elections in 2010. Second, Obama folded in 2011 and did not ensure that an American fighting force remained in Iraq. Third, Obama refused to identify and groom an allied force fighting against President Bashar al-Assad in Syria. To be clear, Obama is completely to blame for the Islamic State — the "JV team," in his words — and its rapid consolidation of territory in western Iraq and through half of Syria. We are paying the price for the president's dithering and his refusal to cultivate and equip an allied force that could shape events inside Syria and western Iraq. As your Insider said on May 18, "A 'Sunni-stan' is being created in front of our eyes."

And since all Insiders readers know that bad gets worse, we can assume the march of the Islamic State will continue unless the president acknowledges some new realities. That doesn't seem likely, as White House Press Secretary Josh Earnest is incredibly still claiming that the Obama administration's strategy against the Islamic State is "overall" a success. So there is virtually no chance the president will acknowledge that the borders of the nation called Iraq, ruled from Baghdad, no longer exist; or that the nation called Syria, with its current borders, will not continue to be ruled from Damascus.

Anyway, I have always accused this White House of lacking insight and being incapable of being self-aware — much less self-critical — so despite the urgent nature of world events, the prospect of a wholesale revision of our foreign policy objectives and policies is unlikely.

This lack of insight — the denial, delusion and downright, jaw-dropping inability to deal with the world as it is — was on display Wednesday during Obama's remarks at the U.S. Coast Guard Academy commencement ceremony. Given the realities of America's decline and retreat from the global stage and the growing threats to our country, the president thought the most important thing he could say to a U.S. military force was, "Climate change constitutes a serious threat to global security, an immediate risk to our national security ... And so we need to act — and we need to act now."

Since the president has been wrong about almost everything else concerning our national security, perhaps he's wrong about the threat he sees in global warming. These are serious matters, but it's hard not to ridicule what the president said at the academy. Perhaps if global warming persists at the pace the president desires, maybe it could actually improve America's strategic positioning. Maybe global warming will work to America's advantage since Obama cannot. Maybe global warming will cause the islands China is creating to flood. Maybe warm weather will strain the air conditioners in the North Korean laboratories where scientists are miniaturizing nuclear weapons. Maybe another Russian sinkhole will open up and swallow Vladimir Putin, making it impossible for him to continue to humiliate the president. Maybe a drought will somehow inhibit the Islamic State and keep it from murdering the few allies we still have in the Middle East.

Anyway, the Republican voices seeking to replace Obama need to speak with urgency so that the rest of the world will take notice. Even if Obama continues to be a befuddled pushover on the world stage, perhaps their forceful statements — combined with those of our GOP congressional leaders — will send the message that our enemies and competitors should temper their ambitions because a new sheriff is only 20 months away.

The Art of Avoiding War // The Atlantic // Robert D. Kaplan - May 23, 2015

The Scythians were nomadic horsemen who dominated a vast realm of the Pontic steppe north of the Black Sea, in present-day Ukraine and southern Russia, from the seventh century to the third century b.c. Unlike other ancient peoples who left not a trace, the Scythians continued to haunt and terrify long after they were gone. Herodotus recorded that they "ravaged the whole of Asia. They not only took tribute from each people, but also made raids and pillaged everything these peoples had." Napoleon, on witnessing the Russians' willingness to burn down their own capital rather than hand it over to his army, reputedly said: “They are Scythians!”

The more chilling moral for modern audiences involves not the Scythians’ cruelty, but rather their tactics against the invading Persian army of Darius, early in the sixth century b.c. As Darius’s infantry marched east near the Sea of Azov, hoping to meet the Scythian war bands in a decisive battle, the Scythians kept withdrawing into the immense reaches of their territory. Darius was perplexed, and sent the Scythian king, Idanthyrsus, a challenge: If you think yourself stronger, stand and fight; if not, submit.

Idanthyrsus replied that since his people had neither cities nor cultivated land for an enemy to destroy, they had nothing to defend, and thus no reason to give battle. Instead, his men harassed and skirmished with Persian foraging parties, then quickly withdrew, over and over again. Each time, small groups of Persian cavalry fled in disorder, while the main body of Darius’s army weakened as it marched farther and farther away from its base and supply lines. Darius ultimately retreated from Scythia, essentially defeated, without ever having had the chance to fight.

Killing the enemy is easy, in other words; it is finding him that is difficult. This is as true today as ever; the landscape of war is now vaster and emptier of combatants than it was during the set-piece battles of the Industrial Age. Related lessons: don’t go hunting ghosts, and don’t get too deep into a situation where your civilizational advantage is of little help. Or, as the Chinese sage of early antiquity Sun Tzu famously said, “The side that knows when to fight and when not will take the victory. There are roadways not to be traveled, armies not to be attacked, walled cities not to be assaulted.” A case in point comes from the ill-fated Sicilian Expedition of the late fifth century b.c., chronicled by Thucydides, in which Athens sent a small force to far-off Sicily in support of allies there, only to be drawn deeper and deeper into the conflict, until the prestige of its whole maritime empire became dependent upon victory. Thucydides’s story is especially poignant in the wake of Vietnam and Iraq. With the Athenians, as with Darius, one is astonished by how the obsession with honor and reputation can lead a great power toward a bad fate. The image of Darius’s army marching into nowhere on an inhospitable steppe, in search of an enemy that never quite appears, is so powerful that it goes beyond mere symbolism.

Your enemy will not meet you on your own terms, only on his. That is why asymmetric warfare is as old as history. When fleeting insurgents planted car bombs and harassed marines and soldiers in the warrens of Iraqi towns, they were Scythians. When the Chinese harass the Filipino navy and make territorial claims with fishing boats, coast-guard vessels, and oil rigs, all while avoiding any confrontation with U.S. warships, they are Scythians. And when the warriors of the Islamic State arm themselves with knives and video cameras, they, too, are Scythians. Largely because of these Scythians, the United States has only limited ability to determine the outcome of many conflicts, despite being a superpower. America is learning an ironic truth of empire: you endure by not fighting every battle. In the first century A.D., Tiberius preserved Rome by not interfering in bloody internecine conflicts beyond its northern frontier. Instead, he practiced strategic patience as he watched the carnage. He understood the limits of Roman power.

The United States does not chase after war bands in Yemen as Darius did in Scythia, but occasionally it kills individuals from the air. The fact that it uses drones is proof not of American strength, but of American limitations. The Obama administration must recognize these limitations, and not allow, for example, the country to be drawn deeper into the conflict in Syria. If the U.S. helps topple the dictator Bashar al-Assad on Wednesday, then what will it do on Thursday, when it finds that it has helped midwife to power a Sunni jihadist regime, or on Friday, when ethnic cleansing of the Shia-trending Alawites commences? Perhaps this is a battle that, as Sun Tzu might conclude, should not be fought. But Assad has killed many tens of thousands, maybe more, and he is being supported by the Iranians! True, but remember that emotion, however righteous, can be the enemy of analysis.

So how can the U.S. avoid Darius’s fate? How can it avoid being undone by pride, while still fulfilling its moral responsibility as a great power? It should use proxies wherever it can find them, even among adversaries. If the Iranian-backed Houthis are willing to fight al Qaeda in Yemen, why should Americans be opposed? And if the Iranians ignite a new phase of sectarian war in Iraq, let that be their own undoing, as they themselves fail to understand the lesson of the Scythians. While the Middle East implodes through years of low-intensity conflict among groups of Scythians, let Turkey, Egypt, Israel, Saudi Arabia, and Iran jostle toward an uneasy balance of power, and the U.S. remain a half step removed—caution, after all, is not the same as capitulation. Finally, let the U.S. return to its roots as a maritime power in Asia and a defender on land in Europe, where there are fewer Scythians, and more ordinary villains. Scythians are the nemesis of missionary nations, nations that obey no limits. Certainly America should reach, but not—like Darius—overreach.

The Notorious R.B.G . // National Journal // Editorial Board - May 22. 2015

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg’s more florid admirers sometimes refer to her as “The Notorious R.B.G.,” as though notoriety, which she seems intent on courting, were a virtue for a justice of the Supreme Court. On the matter of same-sex marriage, Justice Ginsburg long ago stopped behaving like a judge and started behaving like a member of a political campaign. She talked up the prospects of same-sex marriage earlier this year — Bloomberg headlined the story , not inaccurately, “Ruth Bader Ginsburg Thinks Americans Are Ready for Gay Marriage” — and declared that Americans’ acceptance of a federal redefinition of family life, should five of nine Supreme Court justices demand it, “would not take a large adjustment.” Other than the jettisoning of state marriage laws and a few thousand y ears of social ev olution, that is. Ginsburg is a bit of a freelance advocate of Democratic policies and priorities, having praised, among other things, the so-called Affordable Care Act, the constitutionally questionable provisions of which she voted to uphold.

Likewise, her public call for Congress to undo the effects of the Lilly Ledbetter case and her implausible, poorly reasoned dissent in the Hobby Lobby case speak to political rather than legal priorities.

Justice Ginsburg’s bare political activ ism is unseemly, a reminder that the Court, like any other institution, is corruptible. Last week she presided at a same-sex wedding, not her first — the two gentlemen strolled down the aisle to the accompaniment of “Mr. Sandman” — during which, the New York Times reports, she put a theatrical weight upon the word “Constitution,” with a “sly look and special emphasis,” as Maureen Dowd put it. And that, of course, is one of the questions before the Supreme Court: whether the 14th Amendment, unbeknownst to its 19th-century architects, has all along contained within it a provision mandating the nationwide enshrinement of same-sex marriage as a matter of fundamental rights. “Bring me a dream,” indeed.

But Justice Ginsburg’s admirers are not troubled by that — far from it, in fact: They want what they want, and their conception of government is that it exists to give them what they want. Principle? Limitation? Separation of powers? For the infantile, nothing is able to stand against the great “I want.”

Justice Ginsburg might be expected to have a more sophisticated understanding of the architecture of our constitutional order. That she does not is both an intellectual and a moral indictment of Justice Ginsburg, and an indictment by extension of her sy cophants in the press and the legal establishment. It is further evidence that there is something other than the law at work in the rulings of the Supreme Court, indeed that the law may be considered an obstacle by justices seeking to satisfy political appetites. And this appears to be especially the case when it comes to same-sex marriage, an issue where legal reasoning has consistently taken a back seat to political advocacy. If this really were a legal proceeding, subject to standard principles of recusal, Justice Ginsburg’s open support for one side of the litigation would create a moral obligation for her to recuse herself. But an honest interpretation of the 14th Amendment is not what is going on, and Justice Ginsburg’s own comments are evidence of it: Whether the country is “ready” for same-sex marriage is, of course, irrelevant to whether it is a constitutional command. This is a ward-heeler’s approach to the Constitution. She really should be notorious.

Gramm Stands by Recession Comments (Washington Post blog 7/10/08)
By Jonathan Weisman and Perry Bacon Jr.
Former senator Phil Gramm -- under fire for saying the United States has "become a nation of whiners" -- said in an interview today that he meant the nation's leaders were whiners, not its citizens.

McCain Disagrees With Adviser 'Whiners' Remark (AP 7/10/08)
By LIZ SIDOTI
Republican John McCain distanced himself from an economic adviser who dubbed the United States "a nation of whiners" in a "mental recession" as Democrat Barack Obama turned the remarks against his rival.

McCain campaign originally stood by Gramm's comments. (ThinkProgress 7/10/08)
Earlier today, Sen. John McCain's (R-AZ) presidential campaign tried to distance itself from top economic adviser Phil Gramm's claim that America is a "nation of whiners" by claiming Gramm's words were "not representative" of McCain's views. But as Huffington Post's Sam Stein reports, the McCain campaign originally had a different response, in which a campaign official told Politico that Gramm was "simply saying that we are laying out the economic plan this week":

The Candidates Speak Off the Cuff, and Trouble Quickly Follows (NYT 7/11/08)
By LARRY ROHTER
At this rate, both John McCain and Barack Obama may want to rethink their fondness for town-hall-style meetings. Both have embroiled themselves in controversies this week as a result of departing from scripted campaign speeches and speaking off the cuff.

Candidates Are Slow to Identify 'Bundlers' (NYT 7/11/08)
By MICHAEL LUO and CHRISTOPHER DREW
Senators Barack Obama and John McCain have long been among the most outspoken critics of the influence of money in politics. Yet records show that in their presidential campaigns, neither has lived up to his promise to fully disclose the identities of his top money collectors who bundle millions of dollars in campaign contributions.

Time to relaunch an important debate on missile shield (Detroit Free Press 7/10/08)
Iran's test-firing of a missile capable of striking Israel reignites an issue for the presidential campaign: Should the United States stay on track with Bush administration plans to build a $3.5-billion missile defense system in Eastern Europe to contain any threat from Iran? Republican candidate John McCain says yes, Democrat Barack Obama is less enthused, and Russia is bitterly opposed, even hinting at military action against such a U.S. installation.

Despite all his fearmongering, McCain admits he doesn't know 'the nature of the threat' from Iran. (ThinkProgress 7/10/08)
Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) regularly hypes the threat posed by Iran, saying they are "intent on acquiring nuclear weapons" and even attacking Democrats for allegedly not recognizing "the threat posed by an Iran with nuclear ambitions." But when ABC's Charlie Gibson asked McCain yesterday if an Israeli strike against Iran would be "jusified" in light of Iran's recent missile tests, McCain said that he couldn't determine "the nature of the threat" from Iran:

McCain's Taxing Tax Attacks (TIME blog 7/10/08)
By Michael Scherer
The latest version of the new-and-improved candidate McCain sticks to a message. And this week, the message is the economy, with a big subset devoted to taxes, specifically the idea that Republicans cut taxes and Democrats raise taxes, making Republicans better for a nation in distress. The problem is that McCain's rhetoric on taxes often skirts the truth of the tax debate.

Why John McCain is So Awful (Atlantic Online 7/10/08)
By Matthew Yglesias
...Some good points are made, but I think most of these posts wind up implicitly overstating the extent to which McCain was an effective politician at some point in the past and has only recently become crappy. The reality is that he's been coasting for his entire political career, and his toughest race -- the 2000 GOP presidential primary -- was won where he lost badly.

This fall, Hillary Clinton crisscrossed the country campaigning on behalf of Democrats and speaking out for women's rights and opportunity. I cannot think of anyone better to speak on our behalf than the one who paved the way for the rest to follow.

Clinton will forever be known for taking opportunities to expand the roles of women and for not resting until everyone is given the opportunity to succeed.

As secretary of state, Clinton showed her ability to lead as a woman on the global stage. In an increasingly challenging and changing world, Clinton's leadership helped make the planet a safer place and created opportunities for millions in underdeveloped countries.

Throughout her career, Clinton has successfully paved a path in a traditionally male-dominated world.

Here are just a few examples of her many accomplishments that have left her poised, qualified, and ready to potentially become the first female president of the United States.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

First lady of Arkansas: During her time in Arkansas, Clinton became a lifelong advocate for families and creating opportunity for all. Even before her time as first lady, Clinton worked to expand early childhood education to low-income families.

As first lady, Hillary Clinton brought the Home Instruction for Parents of Preschool Youngsters program to Arkansas to expand early childhood education. And as chairwoman of the Arkansas Education Standards Committee, Clinton helped develop new education reform standards that were eventually adopted statewide.

Clinton understands the value of education. Here in East Hartford, we too know the value of education and we celebrate our excellent schools. Education is the greatest tool for creating opportunity, economic security, and building greater family and community engagement.

First lady of the United States: As First Lady of the U.S., Clinton continued to change the role of women in politics. Clinton demonstrated that, in a role once only thought of as “the wife to the president,” she could become an effective powerhouse, forever changing the direction of our country.

The moment I knew that Clinton would forever change the role of women was when she famously declared in China, circa 1995, that “human rights are women’s rights, and women’s rights are human rights.”

Clinton continued to be a trailblazer, working to improve the lives of children and families throughout the country. Clinton was instrumental in the creation of the State Children’s Health Insurance Program, which increased health coverage to millions of children in low-income and working families, continuing to provide a vital lifeline to millions of families today.

U.S. senator: As a senator, Clinton fought for those who put their lives on the line every day to protect our country — our service members. Clinton helped expand access to health care for our National Guard and reservists, and secured funding to help first responders recover from the 9/11 attacks.

Clinton also fought for hardworking Americans by consistently advocating for equal pay for equal work, expanding access to early childhood education and health care, and working to raise the minimum wage.

Secretary of state: By the time Clinton was appointed secretary of state, she had already forever changed the role of women, serving as an example to millions. But she didn’t stop there. Clinton became one of our most successful secretaries of state, improving our country’s leadership and standing in the world, while working to empower women and girls across the globe.

“The highest, hardest glass ceiling”: We do not yet know what is in store for Clinton’s future, but we do know that the futures of millions of girls will forever be brighter and more promising, thanks to her leadership and dedication to creating opportunities for others.

I know I would not be where I am today if it were not for Hillary Clinton.

The Hill blog: Briefing Room: “Clinton: Women should have larger role in national security”

By Peter Sullivan

December 3, 2014, 12:16 p.m. EST

Hillary Clinton called for women to have a larger role in national security issues in a speech at Georgetown University on Wednesday, saying women "are agents of peace and agents of change."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While Clinton was not giving a speech especially themed on U.S. politics, her expected presidential campaign means politics are never far away. Even as she spoke, Republicans pointed to the empty seats in the hall as evidence of a lack of enthusiasm for Clinton.

"Women are not victims of conflict," Clinton said. "They are agents of peace and agents of change."

Clinton made women's rights on the domestic front a centerpiece of her midterm campaigning for Democrats, touting issues like equal pay and paid leave. As first lady in 1995, she famously said in Beijing that "women's rights are human rights."

She touted women defense ministers on Wednesday, saying they prove that they can they can "defend their countries as well as any man."

Asked about Ukraine, in a session after the speech, Clinton called on the Ukrainian military to "make it at least possible for women to be in positions of military and civilian authority in defending their country."

As Ukraine deals with a conflict with separatists in the east and Russia's annexation of Crimea, Clinton called for the United States to support Ukraine's military building back up.

"I hope other European countries, the United States will be there as they undertake this defense buildup," she said.

Some Republicans have called on the U.S. to provide arms to the Ukrainian military, but Clinton did not weigh in on this debate.

On Syria, an issue where Clinton sparked controversy in August by referring to President Obama's "failure" to arm the rebels, Clinton steered clear of larger U.S. policy and said the situation was dire enough that as far as women and security, a "protective, humanitairan approach" is what is needed.

She said "we should do what we can" to support Kurdish women who are fighting ISIS militants.

While Clinton was speaking, another issue was generating buzz: the empty seats in front of her.

The balcony and some of the seats lower down were empty in Georgetown's Gaston Hall, which the University says is an "over 700-seat hall."

America Rising, a conservative PAC, linked to photos of the empty seats with the title "Guess who's #ReadyforHillary! Empty chairs!!!"

A lack of enthusiasm for Clinton among students would speak to fears that some Democrats are not excited about a Clinton candidacy.

Avery Jaffe, who works for Ready for Hillary, the pro-Clinton group, posted on Twitter, "In fairness to Georgetown students, it is finals prep week."

MSNBC: “Hillary Clinton plays it safe with ‘smart power’ speech”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Alex Seitz-Wald

December 3, 2014, 1:22 p.m. EST

It was the right topic at the right venue for Hillary Clinton Wednesday morning at Georgetown University, but the timing was off. Poor weather and impending finals kept students from filling up the ornate Gaston Hall, and her wonky foreign policy remarks left many disappointed who are hungry for something more from the likely presidential candidate.

It was just over a month ago when Clinton last visited Georgetown's Institute for Women, Peace and Security, which was founded by a close friend and former aide of Clinton's, and where Clinton herself serves as honorary chair.

"When I told my husband this morning that I was going to Georgetown, he said, you've been to Georgetown more in the past two years than I have," the former secretary of state joked as she took the stage. Bill Clinton is a Georgetown alum.

On October 30, when she last appeared at Gaston Hall, decorated with elaborate wood-carved beams and religious frescos, it was to talk about women's role in the economy.

It was also in this room that she, in her first year as secretary of state, launched the the country's first "action plan on women, peace, and security." Melanne Verveer, who now runs the Georgetown institute and who moderated the discussion Wednesday, served as Clinton's Ambassador-at-Large for Global Women's Issues.

This time, when Clinton came to Georgetown to partake in a conference on "smart power," the topic was as close to her heart as any. It was her guiding philosophy at State.

Clinton defined the term Wednesday as "using every possible tool and partner to advance peace and security," while "showing respect" for other countries and actors on the world stage – "even for one's enemies."

She also spoke about women, noting they often "bear the humanitarian load" of conflicts more than men. But she added, "Women are not just victims of conflict, they are agents of peace and agents of change." She referenced the Northern Ireland Peace process, where women took a lead.

After Clinton concluded her remarks, Norway's 38-year-old female Defense Minister, Ine Eriksen Soreide took the stage. She told a story about how the then-secretary of state inspired Soreide to have the confidence to take on the chairmanship of the foreign policy committee in her Parliament.

Soreide also said Russia "violated fundamental … international law" in Ukraine. Clinton nodded in agreement. Later, the former secretary of state called the comments "very strong."

The themes are all well-known to those familiar with Clinton's work, but felt somewhat vintage for a former secretary of state who has been increasingly moving away from her foreign policy safe zone into economic and other domestic issues, like immigration.

And there was little room for spontaneity or commenting on news of the day.

Questions from students were submitted ahead of time and reviewed by a committee of faculty and students before being read by Verveer. At the start of the program, an announcer declared that interruptions to the program "will not be permitted."

The questions Clinton was asked focused on women's roles in the conflicts in Ukraine and Syria, something Clinton spoke about another time she visited Georgetown.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Meanwhile, as she speaking, an entirely different theme was being pushed by Republicans operatives, who filled reporters' inboxes and Twitter feeds with pictures showing empty rows of seats in the hall.

The university said the hall seats over 700 people, but that only 400 turned out. The entire balcony was empty, save reporters, while there were several empty seats downstairs.

Clinton regularly gives speeches where she's paid up to $300,000 by groups to hear her remarks. Tickets were offered free to every student.

The university and students sympathetic to Clinton pointed out that many students were busy studying for upcoming finals. The rainy weather also may have kept some students indoors, and made Clinton run about 30 minutes late for her speech, which Verveer blamed on "weather delays."

NBC News: "Hillary Clinton Lauds Female Leaders As 'Agents of Change'"

By Carrie Dann

December 3, 2014, 11:55 a.m. EST

Hillary Clinton appeared at Georgetown University Wednesday to laud the contributions of female leaders globally, saying that women are important catalysts for change throughout the world.

"Women leaders, it has been found, are good at building coalitions across ethnic and sectarian lines and speaking up for other marginalized groups," the former secretary of state told attendees at a Georgetown University conference entitled "Smart Power: Security Through Inclusive Leadership."

"It's important to underscore this overriding fact: women are not just victims of conflict," added Clinton, who is widely viewed as a potential first female president if she chooses to run in 2016. "They are agents of peace and agents of change."

During her remarks at the conference, some Republicans took to Twitter to gleefully point out empty seats at the event.

Washington Post blog: Post Everything: Sally Kohn: "The Republicans hating on Hillary Clinton's speaking fees are hypocrites"

By Sally Kohn

December 3, 2014, 8:50 a.m. EST

Hillary Clinton makes a lot of money when she speaks. This is, somehow, offensive to the Republican Party.

Let that sink in for a moment. The Republican Party, which wants to keep women and minimum wage workers (the majority of whom, incidentally, are also women) severely underpaid while trust fund families and Wall Street execs pocket more — this crowd is attacking Hillary Clinton for being

In a hum-drum effort to vet the hum-drum presumptive 2016 Democratic presidential candidate, news outlets have been reporting on Clinton's speaking fees and contract requirements. Most recently, the Washington Post revealed Clinton's terms for a speech at the University of California Los Angeles.

For the speech, Clinton's team made such ludicrous requests as a "pitcher of room temperature water, water glass, and lemon wedges." Why can't she settle for cold water? Plus she wanted, nay demanded, that backstage there be "diet ginger ale, crudité, hummus and sliced fruit." How dare Hillary Clinton demand healthy snacks? For this, she was paid $300,000 — a sum, like all her speaking fees, which Clinton donated to the Clinton Global Foundation.

The Washington Post story comes on the heels of June reporting about a speech to the University of Nevada Las Vegas Foundation, for which Clinton was paid $225,000. Anti-Hillary conservatives have taken this reporting and run with it:

America Rising PAC @AmericaRising: Hummus: $5 Crudité: $19 Speaking fee: $300,000 Making students pay for it: Priceless http://gph.to/1vPxHa6 cc @ClintonCosts @HillaryClinton [11/26/14, 8:29 p.m. EST]

First, the facts. Neither the UCLA speech or UNLV speech were paid for with student tuition dollars. The UCLV Foundation is a private non-profit separate from the university; the UCLA speech was paid for as part of a separately endowed lecture series. More pertinently, though, both speeches raised money for the universities and their students. For instance, the UNLV event raised more than $350,000. But shame on Hillary, speaking at events that raise money for public universities!

It's ironic that, after a 2012 election spent complaining about how Mitt Romney was attacked for being successful, Republicans now find themselves trying to attack success. And that's just the tip of the irony iceberg.

On the occasion of Clinton's UNLV speech, the Republican National Committee put out a statement saying, "Hillary Clinton's speaking fee at UNLV is more than 4 times what the average Nevadan makes in a year." Raising the minimum wage would sure help those Nevada families way more than cutting Hillary Clinton's speaking fee. But Republicans are the ones blocking a minimum wage hike nationwide.

Conservatives also complained that Clinton accepted six figures to speak at a public university about, among other things, the challenges of mounting student debt. They pounced on calls by some students for Clinton to donate her speaking fees back to defray scholarships and rising tuition costs.

But if conservatives are so outraged about the rising cost of college and run-away student debt, why have they blocked legislation to refinance student loans and proposed massive cuts to Pell grants?

Certainly, Clinton has stumbled in finding a populist way to talk about her finances, as when she said she was "dead broke" when she and Bill left the White House (they had two houses). The New York Post wrote that Clinton's "diva routine could hurt her chances of campaigning as a champion for the middle class." Sure, but you know what else hurts a party's reputation as a middle class champion? Repeatedly opposing policies like paid sick leave and investments to fix roads and schools that help the middle class—which Republicans routinely do.

Selective outrage sure works for fanning the flames of Twitter trolls, but when Election Day rolls around, Republicans won't be able to paint Hillary Clinton as an out-of-touch elitist if their party is a still a worse example of that which they seek to condemn.

There is plenty in Hillary Clinton's speaking schedule actually worth scrutinizing. Since leaving the State Department, Clinton has given paid speeches to Goldman Sachs, Fidelity, the Carlyle Group, the National Association of Realtors and other business interests. "This is a great way for a company to get access to her, to hear what she's thinking, to be remembered if and when she does run for office," Campaign Legal Center policy director Meredith McGehee told Mother Jones. This might also seem like the perfect thing to attack given the problems with Clinton's coziness with Wall Street in a post-Occupy political era increasingly focused on the crisis of inequality. Curiously, conservatives aren't even mentioning these speeches—just the ones Clinton has given at fundraisers for public universities.

Of course, why would Republicans ever critique big business, even if big business is courting the potential Democratic frontrunner for 2016?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While conservatives might rhetorically feign a defense of public colleges and the middle class, they would never, ever hint at attacking big business. Which reveals the deepest irony of all — Republicans regularly say that government should get out of the way and let "market forces" handle everything from pay inequity to healthcare. But market forces are precisely what have made Hillary Clinton the second best paid political speaker in America (after her husband, Bill) — she's simply more popular, by leaps and bounds, than any potential Republican challenger. By drawing attention to how much Hillary Clinton is being paid to speak, Republicans are merely pointing out how in-demand Clinton is—presumably not just on the stage but in the voting booth in 2016.

Mediaite: "Politico Demands Hillary Put It out of Its Own Misery"

By Evan McMurry

December 3, 2014, 8:34 a.m. EST

For the twenty-one months, Hillary Clinton has daily disappointed the political press corps by not actually being a presidential candidate. In not holding any office nor actively campaigning for one, Clinton left political publications and cable news shows to endlessly pick over the non-ness of her non-campaign. It's as if every science publication were forced by invisible decree to incessantly debate whether the cat is still alive.

On Wednesday Politico's Roger Simon had enough. Chiding her non-campaign for "insufficiently" arguing her qualifications for the office for which she's not yet running, Simon all but demanded that Clinton put everybody out of their misery. "Not since Hamlet first strode upon the stage circa 1599 and dithered over 'To be, or not to be' have so many held their collective breath for an answer," he wrote.

Not for nothing, the subhead suggests who this "so many" is:

[SCREENGRAB OF HEADLINE: "HILLARY SHOULD STOP DITHERING"]

Simon even cites "his own publication's" coverage — just in the past week — as proof that Clinton's non-campaign is failing. He could go back further: a search of Politico's archives reveals 1,064 mentions of "Hillary Clinton 2016″ since February 2013, when Clinton left the State Department. Even allowing for peripheral mentions, that's more than article a day. No wonder Politico's exhausted, though it should be pointed out that nobody forced the Beltway media to cover a campaign that didn't exist.

The New Republic: "Poll: Obama's Immigration Plan Could Help Hillary Clinton Win Latino Voters"

By Danny Vinik

December 3, 2014

President Barack Obama's executive action protecting more than four million undocumented immigrants from deportation isn't just good policy. It's also good politics for the Democratic Party.

A new poll from Latino Decisions asked 405 Latino voters if they were more or less likely to support Hillary Clinton for president if she said she would extend the executive action. The results were clear: 85 percent of respondents were likely to support Clinton in such a situation, with just 11 percent saying they were unlikely to support her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton announced her support for the executive action soon after Obama announced it, so it's hard to imagine her discontinuing it as president.

Of course, a backlash among non-Hispanic voters could hurt Clinton. But given party polarization today, there are few voters left in the middle who could be disheartened with her over her support for Obama's plan. In other words, this move allows Clinton to consolidate her support among Hispanic voters while her risk of losing many non-Hispanics is low. That's a good position to be in.

Washington Post blog: Post Partisan: Stephen Stromberg: "Hillary Clinton's insulting silence on Keystone XL"

By Stephen Stromberg

December 3, 2014, 11:51 a.m. EST

Did Hillary Clinton learn enough from 2008? She still seems to be self-defeatingly guarded.

Several recent articles have called Clinton out for refusing to say where she stands on the Keystone XL pipeline. In fact, reporters should be asking her whether she has changed her mind on the issue now that environmentalists have made it into a purity test — because she had sensible things to say about Keystone XL four years ago, before she adopted her strategic silence.

Here is Clinton in 2010, then secretary of state, speaking at San Francisco's Commonwealth Club:

We haven't finish[ed] all of the analysis. So as I say, we've not yet signed off on it. But we are inclined to do so and we are for several reasons — going back to one of your original questions — we're either going to be dependent on dirty oil from the Gulf or dirty oil from Canada. And until we can get our act together as a country and figure out that clean, renewable energy is in both our economic interests and the interests of our planet — (applause) — I mean, I don't think it will come as a surprise to anyone how deeply disappointed the president and I are about our inability to get the kind of legislation through the Senate that the United States was seeking.

Now, that hasn't stopped what we're doing. We have moved a lot on the regulatory front through the EPA here at home and we have been working with a number of countries on adaptation and mitigation measures. But obviously, it was one of the highest priorities of the administration for us to enshrine in legislation President Obama's commitment to reducing our emissions. So we do have a lot that still must be done. And it is a hard balancing act. It's a very hard balancing act.

Clinton was responding to a question about the Alberta Clipper, a pipeline that began transporting tar sands oil to Wisconsin in 2010. But the State Department subsequently clarified that she was speaking about Keystone XL. Her remarks were on the right track: The Keystone XL decision will not determine the future of oil use here or abroad, and there are much more important factors that will. Policymakers should focus on those instead of trying to micromanage decisions on energy supply infrastructure, angering our allies in the process.

Does Clinton still hold to those principles? If so, why won't she admit it? If not, what changed her mind? Clinton is not officially running yet, so she is not under the high obligation to square with the public that candidacy brings. But she isn't free of obligation; she led the State Department when it considered the issue.

Continuing evasion only communicates one thing: insulting caution. As was often the case in her 2008 run, she gives the impression that she is unwilling to tell you what she really believes, at least not until Mark Penn or some other purveyor of political pablum has sliced it up and served it to the public in its maximally inoffensive — and least interesting — form. That's infuriating for those who would agree with her — particularly for those who want pro-environment leaders to guide people toward issues that really matter — because she knows better and won't stick up for their side. It's patronizing to environmentalists because she is trying to pander to them by refusing to engage them like adults. Clinton's political calculation is good sign that she's running for president — but not an indication that she will do a better job than she did in 2008.

People: "Mia Love, the First Black Republican Congresswoman-Elect, Says Hillary Clinton Should Stand Down"

By Sandra Sobieraj Westfall

December 3, 2014, 7:45 a.m. EST

It seems there is little in the way of sorority when it comes to glass-ceiling shatterers.

Last month Utah's Congresswoman-elect Mia Love sent shards flying when she became the first black woman Republican – not to mention, first Haitian-American – to be elected to the House of Representatives.

Her victory was noted as a milestone even by political opponents, such as Democratic strategist Donna Brazile, who said, "Black women no longer have to fit in a bracket."

But asked if she would like to see Hillary Clinton run in 2016, Love responded, in her first at-home interview since her election, "Nope."

Asked to elaborate, the normally outspoken conservative had nothing more to say.

PEOPLE sat down with Love and her family – husband Jason, daughters Alessa, 14, and Abi, 12, 7-year-old son Peyton and even the rambunctious family dog Xander – at their Saratoga Springs home to get better acquainted with the woman arguably poised to be the most high-profile member of the new Congress being sworn in Jan. 6.

Once a fine arts major who dreamed of a musical theater career, Love, 39, gave up that path when her 1998 wedding date conflicted with a Broadway audition.

After that she became a flight attendant, a call-center manager, and a fitness instructor before finding her calling in politics when an insect infestation in her community motivated her to organize – successfully – against a home developer.

After six years on her city council, and one term as mayor of her small Utah town, Love finds herself headed to Washington, and into the history books for changing the face of the Republican party.

But making history, she says, "wasn't important to me – it's certainly not why I ran. I wasn't elected because I'm female or because I'm a certain color. We wanted to make sure we were focusing on issues."

The Hill: "Benghazi panel to meet in lame duck"

By Martin Matishak

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

December 3, 2014, 1:01 p.m. EST

The House Select Committee investigating the 2012 Benghazi attack announced Wednesday that it will meet again before the year is out.

The hearing on Dec. 10 will feature two State Department officials and serve as a follow-up to the panel's inaugural September meeting on security measures surrounding American diplomats overseas.

The lame-duck session meeting's tone could be less restrained than the House panel's first hearing, when Chairman Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.) stressed the neutral, fact-finding nature of the committee's mission.

Committee Republicans could look to use the hearing to chastise Hillary Clinton, who was secretary of State at the time of the deadly strike in Libya.

Republicans have repeatedly attacked Clinton's handling of the episode, with several suggesting it should bar her from seeking the presidency in 2016.

The hearing also comes after the House Intelligence Committee released a report last month that cleared the Obama administration of GOP charges that it covered up the circumstances of the attack and intentionally misled Congress.

Many Republicans, including Sens. Rand Paul (Ky.), Ted Cruz (Texas) and Marco Rubio (Fla.), all of whom could run for the White House in two years, have lambasted the report, charging the panel with whitewashing its conclusions to protect the intelligence community.

They, along with other Senate Republicans, want the upper chamber to join the investigation.

Appearing next Wednesday will be Greg Starr, the assistant secretary for diplomatic security, who testified in September, along with Steve Linick, the State Department's inspector general.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Ready for Hillary holding events in O'Malley's home state"

By Peter Sullivan

December 3, 2014, 12:49 p.m. EST

Ready for Hillary is holding events this week in the home state of Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D), a potential presidential rival to Hillary Clinton.

The group, which is not formally affiliated with Clinton but has gained welcome among her advisers, will hold a fundraiser at a Potomac, Md. home on Thursday. That follows an event held at Goucher College in Baltimore on Monday.

The events are featuring a number of top Democratic figures in Maryland who support Clinton, ahead of a possible 2016 presidential run.

Sen. Barbara Mikulski (D-Md.) told the Monday gathering that the state would provide a "groundswell of grassroots" support for Clinton, according to the Baltimore Sun.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Seth Bringman, a spokesman for Ready for Hillary, said about 100 people attended the event, mostly young professionals giving $20.16 each.

The Thursday event's host committee includes Attorney General Doug Gansler, state Treasurer Nancy Kopp, state Senate President Mike Miller, and other members of the legislature.

O'Malley says he is weighing a bid and has been laying the groundwork for a run with visits to early states like Iowa and New Hampshire.

He has also gone to Clinton's left on some issues, warning President Obama not to send unaccompanied children back across the border this summer, and urging the rejection of the Keystone pipeline.

O'Malley faced a possible setback to a presidential run on Election Day, when his lieutenant governor, Anthony Brown, lost the governor's race to a Republican, Larry Hogan.

Asked by the Washington Blade last month whether the loss would hurt his chances, O'Malley said "Don't know, don't care."

The Hill blog: Briefing Room: "Elizabeth Warren gets a new slogan"

By Kevin Cirilli

December 3, 2014, 12:46 p.m. EST

Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) has a new slogan: "The best senator money can't buy."

Those are the words plastered across a new T-shirt that is now for sale on the senator's campaign website.

The merchandise could stir fresh speculation that Warren is considering a run for the White House in 2016 despite her repeated denials. Warren is not up for reelection in the Senate until 2018.

The T-shirt plays up the senator's independent streak, something liberals have seized on while declaring themselves members of the "Warren wing of the Democratic Party."

Groups on the left have praised Warren for her populist, anti-Wall Street rhetoric, with some pleading for her to mount a challenge to Hillary Clinton in 2016.

The grassroots of the Democratic Party has long been suspicious of Clinton, recently criticizing her for making paid speeches to Wall Street banks.

Earlier this week, The Winnipeg Free Press reported that Clinton will speak at the Winnipeg Convention Center in January at an event sponsored by the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

Republicans, meanwhile, have sought to portray Clinton as out of touch with Americans as she collects hefty paychecks, some of which have

Subject: U.S. Intelligence Failure in Georgia

Denis,

I have it on good authority that the DNI was completely caught off guard by the Russian invasion. He was, according to my information, watching CNN with his mouth wide open.
This is a collosal failure of U.S. intelligence.

The word inside the community is that overhead and other resources were so fully tasked on Iraq and Afghanistan that little was left for the South Caucuses. That indicates that the security costs presented by the Iraq occupation are even more profound than believed by many of us who worried about that issue.

But even that explanation is insufficient to explain how the Russians could have prepared for such an operation and executed it without our being alerted. They clearly constrained radio and telephone communications, covered their efforts to raise unit readiness and set a carefully planned manuever into motion without tripping a single trigger of U.S. information collection--all this despite the fact that we had U.S. military forces in the target country.

The fact that we had so little monitoring raises serious questions about whether the administration was exercising an appropriate level of scepticism about Russian intentions. Their desire to recover their lost possessions in the region--at least Georgia and Azerbaijan--have been widely known and pre date Putin.

For more than four decades the Republican party has cast itself as heirs to the traditions of Wiston Churchill and cast Democrats as naive about our enemies and unwilling to use the force necessary to protect the nation's interest. The administration's performance with Russia indicates that they more closely approximate Neville Chamberland than we do.

Our nation was founded on two self-evident truths...

That All of us are created equal.

And that we are endowed by our Creator with the rights to Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

With these words, the American dream began.

No fine print. No expiration date.

All of us are included.

Women and men.

Black and white people.

Irish Americans, Asian Americans, Latino Americans, Native Americans. Jewish, Christian, and Muslim Americans.

Young and old. Rich and poor. Workers and Business owners. Gay, Lesbian, Transgender and straight Americans.

Every person is important, each of us is needed.

In our idea of country, there is no such thing as a spare American.

There is, however, a growing injustice in our country today.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is the gap between the strong and just country our children need for us to be ... and the country we are in danger of becoming.

For today in America, 70 percent of us are earning the same or less than they were 12 years ago. This is the first time that has happened this side of World War II.

Today in America, family owned businesses and farms are struggling to compete with ever larger concentrations of corporate power,...

Fifty years ago, the nation's largest employer was GM. An average GM employee could pay for a year's tuition at a state university with two weeks' wages.

Today in America, with dreams of college, a decent paying job, and a secure retirement slipping beyond the reach of so very many,... the American Dream seems to be hanging by a thread.

And yet, for America there is always a yet.

The final thread that holds us just might be the strongest.

It is the thread of the generosity, the compassion, and the love of one another that brings us together as One American People.

For over 200 years we've been the architects of our own future. And now we must build anew today.

My father and mother, Tom and Barbara O'Malley, were born to the Great Depression and grew up as part of that great generation that won the Second World War. My dad flew 33 missions over Japan in a B-24 Liberator, and went on to college only because of the GI Bill.

My mom, herself, flew in the Civil Air Patrol at the age of seventeen.

They raised their children -- the six of us -- to a middle class future secured largely by the sacrifices and better choices of their generation.

But they would never accept the notion that somehow theirs was the "greatest generation." For they believed and they taught us that every generation of Americans has the ability -- and the sacred responsibility -- to become great.

And so we must. No matter how long the odds, no matter how large the challenge, and no matter how tough the fight.

This is the urgent work calling us forward today: to rebuild the truth of the American Dream for ALL Americans. And to begin right now!

Baltimore/Economy

Last month, television sets around the world were filled with the anger and the rage, and the flames of some of the humblest and hardest hit neighborhoods of Baltimore.

For all of us who have given so much of our energies to making our city a safer, fairer, more just and more prosperous place, it was a heartbreaking night in the life of our City.

But there is something to be learned from that night, and there is something to be offered to our country from those flames.

For what took place here was not only about race…not only about policing in America.

It's about everything it is supposed to mean to be an American.

The scourge of hopelessness that happened to ignite here that evening, transcends race or geography.

Witness the record numbers of young white kids killing themselves with heroin in suburbs and small towns across America.

The hard truth of our shared reality is this: Unemployment in many American cities and in many small towns across the United States is higher now than it was eight years ago.

Conditions of extreme and growing poverty, create conditions for extreme violence.

We have work to do…

Our economic and political system is upside down and backwards and it is time to turn it around.

What happened to our economy -- what happened to the American Dream -- did not happen by chance.

Nor was it merely the result of global forces somehow beyond our control.

Powerful, wealthy special interests here at home have used our government to create -- in our own country -- an economy that is leaving a majority of our people behind.

An economy that has so concentrated wealth in the hands of the very few that it has taken opportunity from the homes of the many.

An economy where a majority of our people are unheard, unseen, un-needed, and left to conclude that their lives and labors are literally worth less today than they were yesterday,... And will be worth less still tomorrow...

We are allowing our land of opportunity to be turned into a land of inequality.

Main Street struggles, while Wall Street soars.

Tell me how it is, that not a single Wall Street CEO was convicted of a crime related to the 2008 economic meltdown. Not. A. Single. One.

Tell me how it is, that you can get pulled over for a broken tail light in our country, but if you wreck the nation's economy you are untouchable.

This is not how our economy is supposed to work!

This is not how our country is supposed to work!

This is not the American Dream!

And it does not have to be this way!

This generation still has time to become great.

We have saved the world before and we must save our country now – and we will do that by rebuilding the American Dream!

The Agenda

As I look out here this morning over the original "land of the free and the home of the brave," I see the faces of people who have done so much for so many in our City and our State.

Together, we made our City a safer, healthier and better place for kids.

Together, we made our city believe again. We invented a new and better way of governing called CitiStat, and we got things done.

Together, we made our State's public schools the best in the United States. We made college more affordable for more families.

We led our people forward through a devastating national recession. We took greater care to protect our land, our air, and the waters of the Chesapeake Bay.

We passed Marriage Equality and we passed the DREAM Act.

Together, we raised the minimum wage and we sustained the highest median income in America. We achieved top rankings for innovation, entrepreneurship, and minority and women's business development.

Yes, understanding precedes action.

And it took new leadership. New perspectives. And new approaches.

But we believed in the dream,...together we took action to make it real,... and that is exactly what we must do as a nation today.

Our economy isn't money, our economy is people—all of our people.

We measure success by the growing prosperity and security of our people–all of our people.

A stronger middle class is not the consequence of economic growth -- a stronger middle class is the cause of economic growth.

Together, as one nation we must build an American economy that works again for all of us.

That means good jobs and wage policies that allow hardworking families to actually get ahead. That means a higher minimum wage, overtime pay for overtime work, and respect for the rights of all workers to organize and collectively bargain for better wages.

If we take these actions…the dream will live again.

Climate change is real. We must create an American jobs agenda to build a new renewable energy future.

We must launch a new agenda to rebuild America's cities as places of Justice and Opportunity for all.

And if we take these actions… the dream will live again.

For the sake of our country's security, and our country's well-being, and our country's economic growth, we must also bring 11 million of our neighbors out of the shadows by passing comprehensive immigration reform.

Because the enduring symbol of our nation is not the barbed wire fence,... it is the Statue of Liberty.

We are a nation of immigrants. We are a compassionate and generous people. And if we act according to our principles--and the better angels of our nature—if we return to our true selves, the dream will live again.

Make no mistake about it -- our ability to lead the world and be safe in this world depends on the strength of the American Dream here at home. The challenges we face in the world today are different from the challenges we faced in the 1990s.

Together, we must construct a New National Security Strategy and build new alliances that are forward-seeing and forward-acting.

The center of this new strategy must be the reduction of threats. Fast-evolving threats -- from violent extremism, pandemic, cyber attacks, nuclear proliferation, nation-state failures, to the drought, famine, and floods of climate change.

Together, we must craft a New Foreign Policy of Engagement and Collaboration. We must join with like-minded people around the world -- especially with nations here in our own hemisphere -- for the cause we share of a rising global middle class.

We must put our national interest first, we must put America first.

But we cannot rebuild the American Dream here at home by catering to the voices of the privileged and the powerful.

Let’s be honest. They were the ones who turned our economy upside-down in the first place. And they are the only ones who are benefiting from it.

We need to prosecute cheats, we need to reinstate Glass-Steagall, and if a bank is too big to fail without wrecking our nation’s economy…then it needs to be broken up before it breaks us…again.

Goldman Sachs is one of the biggest repeat-offending investment banks in America. Recently, the CEO of Goldman Sachs let his employees know that he’d be just fine with either Bush or Clinton.

I bet he would...

Well, I've got news for the bullies of Wall Street --

The presidency is not a crown to be passed back and forth by you between two royal families.

It is a sacred trust to be earned from the people of the United States, and exercised on behalf of the people of the United States.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The only way we are going to rebuild the American Dream is if we re-take control of our own American government!

Conclusion

The poet laureate of the American Dream, Bruce Springsteen, once asked:

Is a dream a lie, if it don't come true?…

Or is it something worse?

Whether the American dream becomes a lie, or becomes an ongoing truth that our children can enjoy, can build upon, can live, is really up to you and me.

It is up to all of us.

It's not about Wall Street, not about the big five banks, it's not even about big money trying to buy our elections.

It's about U.S.

It is about whether, together, We the People still have the will to become great Americans.

I believe we do.

My decision is made.

Now you will all have a vital choice to make next year, for the good of your families, and for the good of the country you love and carry in your hearts.

It is a choice that people will ask you about for years to come.

And so, when a child with a world of learning ahead asks who you voted for, I want you to be able to tell that child, "I voted for you."

When you see a dad sweating through another long shift in order to give his daughter a better future, I want you to be able to tell him, "I voted for you."

When you see a mom working long hours at two jobs for the dream of sending her son to college, I want you to be able to tell her, "I voted for you."

When you see a young father who hungers for a decent job to support his family, I want you to be able to tell him, "I voted for you."

The story of our country's best days is not found in a history book, because this generation of Americans is about to write it!

And that is why today, to you -- and to all who can hear my voice -- I declare that I am a candidate for President of the United States….and I'm running for YOU.

May God Bless you and may God Bless the United States of America.

Russia Blamed, US Taxpayers on the Hook, as Fracking Boom Collapses

Ben Ptashnik, Truthout: As Congress removes restrictions on taxpayers bailing out the too-big-to-fail banks, the right is blaming environmentalists and Russia for the demise of the fracking boom. In reality, the banks' junk bonds and derivatives have flooded Wall Street, and now the fracking bubble threatens another financial crisis.

Global Energy Forum: Revolutionary Changes and Security Pathways

The international energy system is going through revolutionary changes. Oil and natural gas production is growing in the United States and elsewhere in response to new technologies. Geopolitics face several inflection points, from a turbulent Middle East to increased Russian pressure in Europe, and Chinese pressure in East Asia. Furthermore, new pathways must be developed to advance global energy security at a time of revolutionary change. The system must be more resilient, as energy trade is vulnerable to interruption, and as strategic petroleum reserves need to be modernized. Up to and beyond the next climate change conference (COP-21) in Paris, national security, energy and climate goals need to be better integrated in future policies.

Hi John-

Here's the policy background Trevor Houser sent over for the Ben Gemen interview. Policy memo attached and at the bottom in plain text. All printed for you in the office as well in case you're able to make it in.

Thanks,
Milia

Note From Trevor Houser:

"Not sure if comms gave John background, but the reporter has been asking about HRC's process for a climate and enviro policy. Jake and the team felt now was an appropriate time to work with Ben Geman on that story in an effort to:

1) underscore how seriously she takes these issues;
2) Climate and Environment are top priorities for the campaign; and
3) The campaign is leading a deliberate and thoughtful policy process that has sought input from a large number of experts and key stakeholders in the environment, clean energy, and conservation communities.

The one other thing I would flag for John is that if Ben asks whether we would support a permanent extension of the PTC/ITC we need to hedge given out solar/renewable targets. Those imply a $10-$15 billion per year price tag by 2020 and $25-$35 billion per year by 2027 if extended at current levels. May need to call for "extending and improving" or something like that."

Secretary of State Record

As Secretary, Hillary fought hard to mobilize a global response to climate change. She immediately created the first high-level post at the State Department dedicated exclusively to climate diplomacy (the US Special Envoy for Climate Change)

She put climate squarely on the agenda during her first trip as Secretary to Beijing

Hillary worked to feature climate change in the annual US-China Strategic and Economic Dialogue meeting

She helped to hammer out the breakthrough that led to the Copenhagen Accord, which, among other things, was the first international agreement in which all of the major economies – including China – committed to reduce their greenhouse gas pollution.

In addition, she worked hard as Secretary to build new coalitions to combat emissions from methane and other super-pollutants that damage the climate, as well as to launch a clean cookstove initiative that is bringing not only health but climate benefits.

In pursuing these international agreements, and the leadership we are showing at home and abroad, the United States now has a much stronger hand to play in the upcoming negotiations in Paris.

Re: Energy, Climate and Environment Policy Platform

This memo provides a brief overview of our proposed energy, climate and environment policy platform. We have developed six major policy initiatives that together offer a comprehensive strategy for a) protecting American families from pollution, b) powering the economy of the future, c) delivering energy and climate security that lasts, and d) responsibly stewarding our country's natural bounty and beauty. We are finalizing separate white papers with more detail on each of the six initiatives.

Our platform is designed to make the US the clean energy superpower of the 21st century and a global leader in the fight against climate change, and to do so in a way that provides economic opportunity and security for all Americans. We will have half a billion solar panels installed across the country by 2020 and generate enough renewable energy to power every home in the country within 10 years. During that time we will reduce US oil consumption by 20% and partner with other countries bring global oil demand growth to a halt [note: this is a proposed target we haven't yet discussed as a group].

The next decade is critical if we are going to successfully transition to a clean energy economy, deliver security that lasts, and prevent catastrophic climate change. The following is an ambitious and achievable plan of attack.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1. Smart Standards

We will fight efforts to roll back environmental protections in favor of polluters. We will defend and extend common-sense standards that make our air and water cleaner, safeguard the health of our families, reduce energy waste, driven clean energy deployment and fight global climate change. This includes full implementation of the Clean Power Plan, extension of efficiency standards for cars, trucks, airplanes and appliances, better building codes, mandatory disclosure of fracking chemicals and methane regulations on oil and gas production.

2. Clean Energy Challenge

Standards set the floor, not the ceiling. We can and must go further. We will form a new partnership with states, cities and rural communities that are ready to lead, providing competitive grants to those that exceed federal guidelines, remove barriers to clean energy access and entrepreneurship, and invest in innovative solutions that reduce energy costs, protect public health and cut carbon pollution.

As part of this bargain, we will guarantee that every agency within the federal government is working in concert to ensure Americans have the tools and resources they need to succeed. That includes investing in new technologies, both in our labs and through our tax code, and ensuring that we are maximizing the clean energy potential of public lands and public buildings. We will expand successful innovation initiatives, like ARPA-e, cut those that fail to deliver results, and ensure that public R&D supports private sector entrepreneurialism, small business creation and employment growth.

3. Modernizing North American Infrastructure

We must improve the safety and security of existing energy infrastructure in North America and ensure that the new infrastructure we build is consistent with the clean energy economy we are seeking to create. We will launch a major initiative to repair, replace and better regulate our existing pipeline and rail network to protect our families, communities, and outdoor economy from the risk of oil spills and explosions and protect the climate from fugitive methane emissions. And we'll negotiate a North American Climate Compact with Canada and Mexico that guides future infrastructure investment on the continent through ambitious emission reduction commitments, coordinated policy action, and strong accountability mechanisms.

Security that Lasts

The recent growth in domestic oil and gas production provides important economic and geopolitical benefits, but it doesn't solve the energy-related security issues that have plagued our country for decades. US gasoline prices will continue to be set by the global market, no matter how much oil we produce, leaving our economy vulnerable to supply disruptions elsewhere in the world. In addition, the more oil and other fossil fuels we burn, the more risk we bear – both to our economy and our national security - from higher sea levels and increasingly devastating storms, heatwaves and droughts.

The only way to truly safeguard our country is to reduce the amount of oil consumed both at home and around the world and make our investments, our communities and our infrastructure more resilient to climate-related risks. We will take actions necessary to drive down oil consumption in the US, and will partner with other countries to halt the growth in global oil consumption within the next ten years. We will lead the world in combatting climate change, build resilient infrastructure and ensure American families, businesses and investors have actionable information on the kinds of risks they face.

Collaborative Stewardship

We are still developing the public lands/conservation leg of the platform, which will include the following components:

1. Royalty reform: Raise the on-shore oil and gas royalty rate on public lands to match that charged on private lands in Texas and other states and close the loophole in coal royalty policy that costs taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars per year.

2. Leasing: Take areas too sensitive for energy production, like the Arctic, off the table.

3. LWCF: Fully fund the Land and Water Conservation Fund

4. Outdoor economy: Support the growth of the outdoor economy by protecting national parks and forests and improving access to public lands for hunters and anglers and other types of recreation.

A Just Transition

As we build the energy economy of the 21st century, we cannot turn our backs on the workers and communities in the coalfields who kept the lights on and factories running during the 20th century. We will ensure that the retirement benefits of coal miners and their families are secure, invest in carbon capture, utilization and sequestration technology, and launch a major workforce and local economic development initiative for coalfield communities from Central Appalachia to the Powder River Basin.

We will also address the legacy costs fossil fuel combustion in communities disproportionately impacted by the resulting air pollution. We will provide block grants to states, cities and rural communities that develop innovative economic development and public health solutions for vulnerable communities as part of their clean energy strategy, such as the SB 535 program in California.

Yes you are correct. David and Steve may want to give additional justification, but all of us agree that it is not in anyone's interest to engage with or respond to purposefully inaccurate right wing bloggers as it will only result in additional rounds of stories that will do nothing to correct the record. Our internal digital analysis has shown that this story line has flatlined over the last several days and we do not believe that inducing another spike in the online discussion will be beneficial.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

John Podesta, chair of Hillary's presidential campaign – and the same man who called the allegations of Peter Schweizer's Clinton Cash "conspiracy theories" – has a brother who runs a company, The Podesta Group, that lobbied the State Department on behalf of Uranium One while Hillary Clinton was Secretary of State and beyond.

Uranium One is, of course, the uranium firm that sent a "flow of cash" to the Clinton Foundation as the Russian government gained increasing ownership of the company; the State Department had to sign off on the Russians' encroachment into the American uranium market. The Clinton Foundation did disclose its relationship with Uranium One in Hillary's State Department disclosures. According to the Daily Caller, Uranium One "paid the Podesta Group $40,000 to lobby the State Department, the Senate, the National Park Service and the National Security Council for 'international mining projects,' according to a July 20, 2012 filing."

Hillary's relationship with John Podesta goes back to the first Clinton administration. During Bill Clinton's second term, Podesta acted as chief of staff. After leaving, he created the Center for American Progress, a Clinton-backed leftist think tank designed to forward the political goals of the Clintons. As the Christian Science Monitor reported when Podesta joined Hillary Clinton's campaign back in January:

Podesta is the guy people call on when the going gets tough: He served as Bill Clinton's chief of staff from 1998 to 2001, helping control a series of crises including Clinton's impeachment trial. The Obama administration brought him on to help the President steer a path through Congressional impasses and to avert embarrassments like the Affordable Care Act's botched rollout.

Podesta's relationship with the Clintons didn't waver during Hillary's time in the White House; his own ties with the Obama administration grew stronger when he became a senior advisor to the Obama administration in late 2013, before resigning this year to join Hillary's campaign.

Podesta isn't the only member of the Clinton team embroiled in Clinton Foundation corruption. Hillary's new top fundraiser is Dennis Cheng, the former chief development officer for the Clinton Foundation, which means he did all the fundraising for that organization. Cheng has not been asked any questions thus far about his relationship with the Clinton Foundation or the new Clinton 2016 campaign.

Just as President Obama magically transformed his campaign organization, Obama for America, into a political action group, Organizing for Action, to lobby for his preferred governmental policies, Hillary Clinton has transformed the Clinton Foundation and its constellation of allies into her 2016 campaign.

Netanyahu: Iran Deal Dangerous for the World, Will Allow Production of Nukes

The deal under negotiation between the six world powers and Iran would still leave it the capacity to produce dozens of nuclear bombs, Prime Minister Netanyahu warned on Monday. The agreement that is emerging now between the P5+1 countries - the United States, Russia, China, Great Britain, France and Germany - and Iran is unacceptable to Israel, Netanyahu said. It "is dangerous for Israel, the region and the world," he said as he explained that under its terms Iran would remain a nuclear threshold state. "It leaves Iran with the ability to produce the material needed to produce a nuclear bomb within a few months, and later, it could produce dozens of nuclear bombs," Netanyahu said.

Dermer: PM Has 'Sacred Duty' to Oppose Iran Nuclear Deal

Disavowing any disrespect towards President Obama or any intent to intervene in American politics, Israel's U.S. ambassador Ron Dermer says that Prime Minister Netanyahu has a "sacred duty" to speak up in Congress against the proposed nuclear agreement with Iran which, in Dermer's words, "could endanger the very existence of the State of Israel." In an address to an Israel Bonds gala dinner in Boca Raton, Florida, Dermer said "there may be some people who believe that the Prime Minister of Israel should have declined an invitation to speak before the most powerful parliament in the world on an issue that concerns the future and survival of Israel. But we have learned from our history that the world becomes a more dangerous place for the Jewish people when the Jewish people are silent."

Boehner: We Gave White House Heads Up on Netanyahu

US Speaker of the House John Boehner said Sunday night that he informed President Barack Obama that he'd asked Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to speak before Congress hours before the invite was made public. Boehner and Netanyahu agreed that the Israeli prime minister would speak in Washington on March 3 without consulting the administration — the customary policy on such things. But it gave rise to anger in Washington and to criticism in the media. Asked about the White House's statements that it had been blindsided by the plan, Boehner told CBS's "60 Minutes," "We gave them a heads up that morning."

Michael Oren Calls on Netanyahu to Cancel Congress Speech

Member of Kulanu and Israel's former ambassador in Washington Michael Oren has called for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to cancel his planned address to Congress. "The behavior over the last few days created the impression of a cynical political move, and it could hurt our attempts to act against Iran," said Oren. "It's advisable to cancel the speech to Congress so as not to cause a rift with the American government. Much responsibility and reasoned political behavior are needed to guard interests in the White House."

Rivlin Invited to Meet Obama During First US Visit as President

President Reuven Rivlin has rejected an offer to meet with US President Obama, a statement from his office said Sunday as he left on his first official visit to the United States, where he will address a UN session marking 70 years since the end of the Holocaust. His trip comes at a point of high tension between Israel and Washington after Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu accepted a controversial invitation to address a joint session of Congress in early March in a move which was not coordinated with the White House. Netanyahu defended the move on Sunday, saying it was his obligation to help Israel wherever he can.

Washington Officials: Netanyahu 'Playing Politics' at Expense of Israel-U.S. Ties

Senior U.S. officials continued over the weekend to harshly criticize Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu over the invitation from leading Republicans to address Congress in March. In background briefings to U.S. media outlets, administration officials said Netanyahu was "playing politics" at the expense of the U.S.-Israeli strategic relationship. The Washington Post quoted senior U.S. officials who attacked Netanyahu and Israel's Ambassador to the United States, Ron Dermer.

Netanyahu Attacks Media for Stories on Wife Sara: 'Leave My Family Alone'

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu lashed out at the media on Monday after reports emerged Sunday over his wife Sara's allegedly untoward behavior toward staff at the couple's official residence in Jerusalem. Netanyahu took to his Facebook page, accusing the media of taking its campaign against him to a new, personal level. "The media attack against my wife Sara is yet another low point for some leading memebrs of the Israeli media that will use any means to hurt me and my political path," Netanyau charged. "The 'Anyone but Bibi' campaign has become 'Anyone but Sara' - anything in order to defame, denounce, attack, to do all in their power to unseat the Likud under my leadership and pave the way for the Left," he said.

Hezbollah Says Israel Wants to Set 'New Rules' with Syria Raid

An Israeli attack which killed several prominent members of Lebanon's Hezbollah last week was an attempt by Israel to set "new rules" in the conflict between the two foes, Hezbollah's deputy leader said at a gathering to commemorate those who died. Sheikh Naim Qassem's comments were the first reaction from the group's leadership to the missile attack in the Syrian province of Quneitra near the Israeli border. Among those killed was an Iranian officer and the son of Hezbollah's late military chief. Israel has struck Hezbollah in Syria several times since the conflict there began, hitting weapons deliveries, but the group did not acknowledge these attacks.

A Great Gift to Iran

By Nahum Barnea

Over the weekend, my inbox was flooded with questions from American friends: Does he really intend to go? Yes, I replied. Despite all the terrible reactions here? Yes, I replied, despite them. And despite the fact that he knows that his trip is the greatest gift that the Iranian nuclear program could receive? Yes, I replied, despite that. It's unbelievable, they summed up.

The Americans—in the White House, in the political establishment, in the media—have spoken their piece. Netanyahu has found himself in the situation of the proverbial hapless person who ate the rotten fish and took a beating, but has not yet been banished from the city [referring to a Jewish parable about a slave who was given a choice of three punishments for a misdeed and ended up suffering all three—INT]. It is a classic dilemma: If he gives up on making the trip he will be perceived as a loser; if he insists, he will take a beating for the third time. Netanyahu has chosen, at least at this stage, to insist.

"I will go anywhere to present the State of Israel's position," he declared yesterday at the start of the cabinet meeting. Netanyahu has great faith in his powers of rhetoric. If you've given a speech you've done something, if you haven't given a speech you haven't done anything, that is the motto [allusion to his saying about the left wing that it only believes it has done something if it has removed settlements]. But even he does not believe that a speech, no matter how polished, can force the US president to act against what he views as his country's vital interests. Particularly since the speeches that Netanyahu is supposed to give there, and his visit in and of itself, are intended to attack, humiliate and diminish the only person that Netanyahu has to persuade. Persuasion by affront? There must be more successful methods to soften the president's heart.

The discomfiture is felt mainly there, in the United States. I will return to that soon. In the meantime, a few words about Netanyahu's trip and the elections in Israel. I am going in order to save the State of Israel from the Iranian nuclear program, not to steal the elections, Netanyahu says. I believe him, of course. Unfortunately, not everyone believes him. And so, to remove all doubt, Netanyahu should send a letter today to Central Elections Committee Chairman Judge Salim Joubran, and implore him to ban any coverage of his speeches in Washington two weeks before the elections. Zehava Galon submitted a similar request to the judge this week, but with all due respect to Galon, Netanyahu is closer to the matter. Without cameras, Netanyahu should demand from his hosts. Without applause. Without billionaires in the gallery. I have come to persuade, not to be photographed.

Back to the entanglement on the American side. At the end of the negotiations, Iran will be a nuclear threshold state. This is bad news for Israel and a stinging failure for our foreign policy, but the die has been cast. This is not because there is a hater of Israel in the White House, but because the majority of Americans refuse to get into a war with Iran at this point in history. The Republicans seize every opportunity to provoke Obama, but they do not want war either.

Netanyahu knows that there is no point to his trip, besides its theoretical contribution to the elections in Israel. The decision to cook up the trip behind the administration's back has not only put Netanyahu in opposition to the president and the secretary of state, but also to the Democrats in both houses of Congress and some of the Republicans. This means several things. Firstly, the chances have weakened for legislation that will intensify the sanctions (even if a majority is obtained, the president will impose a veto and the legislation will be overruled). Secondly, AIPAC has taken a blow. AIPAC achieved great influence in Washington thanks to its reliance on the majority in both parties. It must not lose the Democrats.

AIPAC is further discomfited by this affair: So as not to look as though it were meddling in the elections in Israel, its leaders have to invite Netanyahu's rivals, and first and foremost Herzog, and give him exactly the same stage as Netanyahu receives. Herzog has already been invited (Livni has also been invited, and will apparently give a negative reply). It would be best for [Herzog] to turn down the invitation; his arrival would give false legitimacy to Netanyahu's visit. But true to form, Herzog is deliberating.

Thirdly, the Jews. The overwhelming majority of the Jews are loyal to the Democratic Party and will continue to be loyal to it. They can take in stride a confrontation between the Israeli government and the White House (and enjoy the benefit of the efforts to mediate between them). They will not support an Israel that becomes a tool in the hands of the rival party.

Fourthly, and perhaps most seriously: Netanyahu has hurt American pride, the sense of patriotism, the immense respect for the institution of the presidency. It is no wonder that the broadcasters of Fox News, which is pro-Republican, have joined the attack on Netanyahu. The matter truly upsets them. In front of the cameras they prefer to attack him rather than John Boehner, their man in the US House of Representatives, who cooked this stew together with Netanyahu and his American patrons.

In Israel it is customary to think that Netanyahu is the boss and the billionaires work for him. This is a mistake. Now, when we know how difficult it is to work for the Netanyahus, we understand how ridiculous this thought is. As far as the relations with America are concerned, Netanyahu works for them and only for them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Perhaps the time has come to Netanyahu turn this part-time job into his full-time job and let others rehabilitate the relationship with the United States. More than a few people in Washington, Jews and non-Jews, friends and lovers of Israel, would accept the change gladly.

New York Times – January 25, 2015

Political Sabotage over a Deal with Iran

By Ellie Geranmayeh

America and Iran took a step toward a final nuclear deal on Jan. 18, but they should be making leaps. The negotiators have proposed some creative solutions but major political compromises are sorely needed, and soon.

If a framework agreement can't be reached in March, the talks could become mired in stalemate. Those who oppose any diplomacy between Iran and the West are already seeking to end the process altogether. With time, they will gain further ammunition.

Spoilers have been striking from Tehran, Washington and Tel Aviv. Some are trying to limit the ability of President Barack Obama (or whoever succeeds him) to deliver a reasonable sanctions-relief package to Iran. Others are seeking to corner Iran and force its government into knee-jerk reactions to regional flare-ups. Hard-liners in the United States and Iran see the nuclear negotiations as an opportunity to score points domestically and they are escalating their efforts to scuttle a grand bargain.

Although the Obama administration has dedicated itself to multilateral diplomacy with Iran, it has been under constant pressure from Congress. Powerful American legislators, influential lobby groups and the Israeli prime minister have repeatedly called for increased economic pressure on Iran to extract further concessions. Not only does this contradict America's interest in maintaining the freeze on Iran's nuclear program, but it also devalues the agreement brokered between Iran and France, Britain, Russia, China, America and Germany.

Threats by American lawmakers to impose further sanctions on Iran have already poisoned the spirit of the talks and created doubt among Iranians about whether the United States is able and willing to deliver on its promises. This has provoked hard-liners in Tehran to respond with their own threats that Iran would increase its enrichment capacity should new sanctions pass.

During his State of the Union address, President Obama made clear that he would veto any proposals for additional sanctions on Iran. And although officials in Tehran recognize this as a good faith gesture on the part of Mr. Obama, they also remember that a Congressional bill introduced in late 2013 nearly garnered enough support to withstand a similar veto threat. Iranian officials worry that the Obama administration is constitutionally unable to make a durable and ironclad promise of sanctions relief as part of a final deal. With a Republican majority in both chambers of Congress, and House Speaker John Boehner's invitation to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to address Congress for a third time, Iran fears that Mr. Obama's veto won't be enough.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the same time, Iran is at risk of losing the West's trust. There is a danger that Iran will damage its newfound reputation as a good faith interlocutor by retaliating for the presumed Israeli attack that killed Hezbollah operatives and an Iranian general in Syria last Sunday.

Iran believes the strike was a premeditated Israeli operation targeting a high-level Iranian official. Influential hardliners in Tehran's security establishment view it as an act of aggression by Israel and demand a direct response.

But any such retaliation, either overtly by Iran or covertly through Hezbollah, would likely prompt Israel's European and American allies to halt the nuclear negotiations altogether — especially if the retaliation involves attacks against civilians.

The Iranian government must decide how openly it wishes to involve itself in the inevitable Hezbollah retaliation while ensuring its tactics do not threaten Iran's long-term strategic objective of securing a nuclear deal. Iran prudently avoided any entanglement in the Gaza conflict over the summer — and it should continue to keep its distance.

If Tehran responds excessively, or if operations are carried out unofficially by Iranian hard-liners, this would escalate the Israeli-Iranian standoff and could derail the nuclear talks completely.

March will be an important month for all parties. The results of the Israeli elections could deflate Tel Aviv's fierce opposition to current negotiations with Iran. For Mr. Netanyahu, blocking any nuclear deal is a personal investment. Some of his political rivals do not necessarily share his fervor on the issue. They view a nuclear deal as less of a threat and place more value on maintaining Israel's strong alliances with European nations and the United States, all of whom seek a nuclear deal with Iran. If Mr. Netanyahu is defeated by a less hawkish opponent, the Obama administration will have an easier time reassuring Israel about any deal with Iran and there would also be less Israeli pressure on Congress.

March is also symbolic for Mr. Rouhani, who is eager to mark the Iranian New Year with a psychological shift on sanctions and engagement with the West. This would be a timely electoral boost for moderates seeking to strengthen their position in the upcoming parliamentary elections.

After the negotiations were extended for a second time in November, Mr. Rouhani appealed to the Iranian people, other political factions and Iran's Supreme Leader for hope and patience. They granted his request but they will not tolerate talks that continue to be extended indefinitely with no tangible sanctions relief in sight.

The extension of negotiations has prevented a return to hostile rhetoric between Iran and the West. But tepid progress without any major concessions is a blessing for spoilers, who will use the additional time to sabotage diplomacy.

Iran must not allow its short-term ideological pursuits in the region to jeopardize its overarching strategic objective: achieving a comprehensive nuclear deal that brings sanctions relief and provides Iran the option of having a functional relationship with the West.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Likewise, the United States must not allow a myopic and obstructionist Congress to derail a deal that is in Washington's long-term interest and strengthens global security.

Dear Mr. Podesta,

I am contacting you with a somewhat unusual request and the hope that you might be able to convey this wish by my children to an appropriate staff person for President Obama in spite of the short notice.

Thank you. And thank you so much for the work you have been doing. I hope you are able to encourage Hillary Clinton to come out strongly to address dangers from Climate Change.

Sincerely,
Pam Vergun, Ph.D., M.P.A.

Dear Mr. President,

I hear that you are coming to our hometown of Beaverton tomorrow down the street from where my children were in a two-way Spanish immersion public school. I know this is a long shot, but I would like to tell you about the work my children and I are doing to help you stop Climate Change in case you would like to meet them.

Also, months ago, my son, who is also one of your fans, asked me to invite you to his Bar Mitzvah. Although we just learned that you will only be in Beaverton during the morning, I'm sure you would like Isaac's D'Var teaching will be on taking even more serious action on Climate Change.

My son is African-American, my daughter was born in the Marshall Islands, and my husband and I are European-American, and together we are doing all we can to impact policies especially the ones most needed to protect our planet. My son has been talking with the City of Beaverton about his petition to Mayor Doyle regarding fossil fuels and nuclear power. The links below are to the little websites I made for their Mitzvah projects, so Miko and Isaac can speak for themselves. Netanyahu Rebukes U.N. Over Iran Accord

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu delivered a fiery address condemning the Iranian nuclear deal, largely unbowed in his opposition despite losing steep political ground to President Barack Obama over the issue this year. In his speech to the General Assembly, Mr. Netanyahu thundered that Iranian threats to destroy Israel have been met in the world body by "utter silence, deafening silence." He then stopped speaking for 45 seconds, panning the hall with a furrowed glare. "Perhaps you can now understand why Israel is not joining you in celebrating this deal," he said.

Israeli Couple Killed in West Bank Shooting

An Israeli couple was killed last night in a shooting attack in the West Bank. The two victims, Naama and Eitam Henkin, were shot while driving with their four children on the road between Itamar and Elon Moreh. The children suffered from shock but were not otherwise injured. IDF troops combed the area to find the attackers. Hamas sources praised the shooting and called for more such attacks.

West Bank Tensions Surge in Night of 'Price Tag' Attacks

Tensions escalated further in the West Bank Friday morning when, just hours after near Itamar, a Palestinian's vehicle was torched and a message of revenge was graffitied on a house nearby in Baytillu near Ramallah. "Revenge, Henkin," read the message on the wall in reference to Israelis Eitam and Na'ama Henkin who were killed in Thursday night's attack. Their four children were with them in the car at the time of the attack but were unharmed. Police requested that the owner of the house and vehicle file an official complaint so that investigations could begin to catch the culprits.

Senior Official Confirms: We Murdered the Couple

The "armed wing" of Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Mahmoud Abbas's Fatah faction initially claimed responsibility for Thursday night's brutal murder of a young couple right in front of their four children, but now a senior Fatah official has confirmed that claim. Senior Fatah official Mahmoud Al-Aloul, who is a member of the Fatah Central Committee, was revealed by Palestinian Media Watch (PMW) as having announcing responsibility the night before on Facebook for the murder of Rabbi Eitam and Naama Henkin outside Itamar in Samaria. The Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, the military wing of the Palestinian National Liberation Movement Fatah, accepted responsibility for the Itamar operation (i.e. the murder - ed.) carried out against settlers, leading to their deaths," wrote Al-Aloul in an open admission.

Pro-Israel Groups Targeting Palestinian Organizations in US

Pro-Israel organizations are increasingly targeting pro-Palestinian groups in the US, according to a report released by two legal advocacy groups on Wednesday. In a report co-authored with the Center for Constitutional Rights, legal group Palestine Legal said it was called in to respond to nearly 300 incidents of attempted suppression of pro-Palestine activism and rhetoric in the past 18 months. "These numbers aren't telling the full story," said Dima Khalidi, director of Palestine Legal. "They are really the tip of the iceberg with incidents that go unreported." The report found that, overwhelmingly, these incidents took place on university campuses, which have become the focus of the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) campaign in recent years.

Israel Mulls Authorizing Five 'Hilltop' West Bank Settlements

Israel is considering authorizing wildcat settlement outposts in the West Bank near a village where a firebombing killed an 18-month-old Palestinian boy and his parents, court documents showed Thursday. The government confirmed it was considering the authorization in a court document first made public by rights group Yesh Din, which has been involved in legal action against one of the outposts. The international community regards all Jewish settlements in the West Bank as illegal, but the Israeli government makes a distinction between those it has authorized and those it has not.

IDF Deputy Chief to Meet Russian Counterpart in Tel Aviv

The IDF Deputy Chief of Staff Maj.-Gen. Yair Golan will meet with his Russian counterpart, Col.-Gen. Nikolai Bogdanovski at IDF Headquarters in Tel Aviv this coming Tuesday. The meeting is the first by a joint working group set up between the IDF and Russian Armed Forces, to coordinate Syria-related activities in the aerial, naval, and electromagnetic arenas, and avoid inadvertent clashes. The announcement came a day after the Russian air force launched its first wave of air strikes on Syrian rebels, sparking alarm in the West, which has cast doubt on Russian claims that ISIS was the target. Bogdanovski will lead a Russian military delegation on a two-day visit to Israel, and will discuss regional coordination, the IDF said.

Egyptians Rank Israel Most Hostile Country

A public opinion survey of Egyptians published Tuesday placed Israel in first place in the category of hostile nations - frienemies at best. The Egyptian Center for Public Opinion Research (Baseera), published the results of the survey in media outlets associated with the regime, like Al-Ahram's website and the news agency al-Sharq al-Awsat. The survey assigned countries a rating ranging from 100 to -100, with the negative figures indicating hostility and the positive figures friendliness. Israel received -88 points in the survey, and is thus considered by Egyptians to be its most hostile nation.

Bombshell in the First Act

By Nahum Barnea

Only one person succeeds in creating a national consensus in Israel, a uniform front, from wall to wall. Only one person, and only once a year: Abu Mazen, in his annual speech at the UN General Assembly. Netanyahu tweeted from New York: A deceitful speech, which provokes incitement and trouble in the Middle East. "This was not a speech, it was a litany of ugly and false defamations by a person who instead of being a leader, acts like the worst of the inciters," tweeted Yair Lapid, also from New York. "Distorted statements," Yitzhak Herzog tweeted from Tel Aviv. "An incitement speech, filled with lies and fantasies," declared Tourism Minister Yariv Levin from the settlement Har Bracha, on the road to Nablus. According to his tweet, he was going [to Har Bracha] to celebrate the dedication of a day-care center.

And so on and so forth.

Indeed, a sharply-worded speech. In the way of propaganda speeches, it was filled with demagogic statements, historical distortions, exaggerations. Here and there it also included outright lies, the kind that insult one's intelligence. I have no interest in defending the PA chairman. He is not my leader.

But the trends illustrated by the speech pointed are deeply rooted, regrettably enough, in reality. It is not unnecessary, therefore, to examine his claims one by one.

"In Jerusalem," he said at the start of his speech, "the Israeli government is promoting a plan to have separate visiting times on the Temple Mount." This is a false statement: The Israeli government has not approved a plan that changes the existing situation on the Mount. The prime minister has repeatedly announced publicly that the status quo will be maintained.

But as every police officer in Jerusalem knows, the status quo is not maintained. A war is being waged on the Temple Mount between two messianic sects—one is Arab, founded by Sheikh Raed Salah, leader of the Islamic Movement's northern chapter, and the other is Jewish, inspired by rabbis from Judea and Samaria. Uri Ariel, a cabinet minister, is the prominent spokesperson of the Jewish sect. The war is being waged over territory: Each sect aspires to full control of the Mount—the Arabs wish to remove the Jews, and the Jews seek to destroy the mosques and build synagogues, and in the long term, a Temple. The basis on which Moshe Dayan established the rules of the game in 1967 has collapsed. The Arab street is no longer content with worshipping at el-Aksa Mosque—the entire area of the mount is now considered a mosque. Dayan created three circles of government on the Mount: The Wakf, Jordan and the Israel Police. The activists of the sect thumb their nose at all three.

A change that is no less dramatic has taken place among the Jews. Dayan relied on the rabbinic prohibition to visit the Temple Mount. That prohibition enabled him to divide control of the Mount. He did not imagine that a day would come in which many members of religious Zionism would exempt themselves from this prohibition. National messianism has intermingled with religious messianism, which has intermingled with curiosity, recklessness, challenging the limits, romanticism.

The Temple Mount is the Petra of the [hilltop] youth with curled sidelocks [in the 1950s Israeli hikers would tried to sneak into Petra as a challenge, this was considered a rite of passage for elite youth.] Minister Uri Ariel not only visits the Temple Mount, he also prays there, in a place that has been sanctified by the Muslims as a mosque. The Temple Mount is all ours, he declares on camera, and the prime minister does not reprimand him. It is no wonder that the Palestinians suspect that there is a deliberate intention here, that there is a plan.

Speaking of the Temple Mount, Abu Mazen warned that the national confrontation could turn into a religious confrontation. This is a well-placed warning. You are playing with fire, he says, and ignores his role in the game.

The Meaning of the Lie

The settlements and the settlers occupied a central part of the speech. This is a relatively new phenomenon in Palestinian rhetoric. Arafat, who used to say that he was the greatest expert on Israel politics, did not understand the importance of the settlements until his dying day. It took Abu Mazen time, but now he understands. In his view, the settlements are an effective propaganda instrument against Israel and are an almost insurmountable obstacle on the way to establishing a Palestinian state. There is a great deal of truth to both these assumptions.

When the Israeli government continues to build in the settlements, he says, it is violating international law, UN resolutions and the spirit of the agreements it signed with the Palestinians. The Israeli government is creating two types of regimes in the West Bank: an apartheid regime towards the Palestinians and towards their state on one hand, and a regime of privileges and protection for the settlers on the other.

Are these "ugly and false defamations," as Yair Lapid said? If only this were true. Every soldier in the territories who keeps his eyes open will testify otherwise. According to the Oslo Accords, Abu Mazen noted, Israel was supposed to pull back from the territories by 1999. The withdrawal stopped with 60 percent of the territory under Israel's full control. IDF troops and settlers also invade at will territories under PA control.

Factually speaking, he is right. He would have been more right had he mentioned the waves of Palestinian terrorism, which made a crucial contribution to freezing the situation on the ground.

Israel, he says, controls the natural resources in the Palestinian territories and strangles their economy. In doing so, it is violating the spirit of the Oslo Accords and the Paris Protocol. Unfortunately, this allegation is true. The ease with which Israel periodically stops the transfer of the Palestinians' customs and VAT funds to their destination is a good example. Water too: Many months passed until the Israeli government deigned to permit water to be supplied to the Palestinian city Rawabi. The settlers in the Likud Central Committee intimidated Yaalon and Shalom. The blockade on Gaza, which in the past included a prohibition on bringing in tampons, was only tenuously related to security, and so on and so forth.

"The occupation is brutal," Abu Mazen said. He accuses the Israeli government of turning a blind eye to the terrorist acts of settlers, including the torching of the family in Duma, and including price tag actions against mosques and churches. Are these "lies and fantasies," as Minister Levin says? I am not sure.

All this leads Abu Mazen to the conclusion: As long as Israel refuses to stop construction in the settlements, refuses to continue to release prisoners, and violates international law as he interprets it—the PA he leads will feel free to violate its commitments. "Either the Palestinian Authority will lead the Palestinian people from occupation to independence, or else Israel, the occupying power, will bear full responsibility," he said.

The National Heroes

Mohammed Deif, the Hamas figure from Gaza, and Marwan Barghouti, the Fatah figure from the West Bank, are the most two popular people on the Palestinian street today. In fact, they are the only two popular figures. Deif is considered a national hero because he survived five assassination attempts by Israel—a national record. In one assassination attempt he lost an eye, and in another he lost his hands and feet. Nevertheless, he continues to lead the Hamas military wing in Gaza. Deif gives the instructions and outlines the direction. Marwan Issa, his deputy, executes the instructions. The two do not obey the authority of the Hamas political leadership, in Gaza and

Barghouti was sentenced to five terms of life imprisonment. His standing as a national hero is derived from his incarceration. It is not out of the question that at some point the PLO will decide to choose him as Abu Mazen's successor. This will be a purely symbolic decision, a show of protest that is empty of content: no Israeli government will be in a hurry to release him from prison.

In other words, the Palestinians suffer from a leadership vacuum no less than we do. None of their senior politicians have a basis on the ground. Nasser al-Kidwa, Arafat's nephew and the former ambassador to the UN, who was considered a natural successor, suffers from a severe case of cancer; Jibril Rajoub has taken a blow since the FIFA affair; Mohammed Dahlan has been accused of corruption and is unpopular in the West Bank; Saeb Erekat is marginal; and Rami Hamdallah, the prime minister, wishes to return home to An-Najah University.

The Palestinian street is desperate. It is desperate because it has lost hope for a breakthrough. All the paths have been tried, all the paths have failed. The relative quiet did not bring about a change and terrorism did not bring about a change, the PA did not bring about a change and Hamas did not bring about a change. The alienation is so great that 14 percent of the residents of Gaza, according to the latest poll, support ISIS.

The confidence in Abu Mazen has hit rock bottom. In an attempt to regain something of the street's support, he promised to drop a bombshell in his speech at the UN. He even weighed the idea of announcing the dismantling of the PA. At that point, he saw the anxiety in the eyes of tens of thousands of Palestinians who are employed by the PA or work as its contractors. Palestine, like the pre-state ultra-Orthodox community in Jerusalem, subsists on the generosity of donors. If there is no Palestinian Authority, there will be no one to channel the funds, and there will be no means of livelihood.

He chose a middle-ground solution: He produced a bomb, but did not light the fuse. It is not certain that he will have control over the continuation: A bomb that is left on the table in the first act tends to explode in the third act.

The Palestinian account is interesting, but alongside it is the Israeli account. We are approaching a reality of one state between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea, a state that the world will see as an apartheid state. Herzog understands this, perhaps Lapid as well. When Obama says similar things to those said by Abu Mazen, Herzog and Lapid shower him with praise. When Abu Mazen says them, he is the worst of the inciters.

Russian Airstrikes in Syria Aim to Build Alawite Mini-State

Putin's military intervention does not target ISIS, but seeks to establish a solid strategic base for Russia in the Middle East. As Russia forges an alliance with Iran and Iraq, Israel's interests will be put at stake.

By Ely Karmon

Many Russian analysts maintain that Russia's intervention in Syria is driven by Vladimir Putin's desire to reinstate the status of the world's largest nation as a superpower and his genuine belief that the United States has deliberately seeded chaos in the region to secure its reign there. While this assessment may be accurate, it only reveals part of the Russian president's intentions.

Russia's military engagement in Syria comes on the backdrop of three major factors: a serious threat to the survival of President Bashar Assad's regime, Russia's old Middle Eastern client; Putin's success at securing the occupation of Crimea and expanding Russian territorial presence in Ukraine; and the evident weakness, even disarray, of the Obama administration in handling the war against Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL.

Two additional factors may have helped Putin make this risky decision now: Iran's strength in the region, following its success at securing a highly favorable nuclear deal; and the wave of Syrian refugees who threaten the unity and stability of Europe, thus mitigating its threat to Russian interests in Ukraine.

Aware of Assad's weakness (Putin mocked the Syrian military during his public meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu) and that even Iran and Hezbollah's support cannot ensure the Syrian president's survival, the Russian leader decided to upgrade his previous strategy of providing military and political support to the regime. For now, this upgrade is taking the form of building a territorial military presence in the Latakia area –including some 25 to 30 airplanes, several thousand troops, naval infantry brigades, modern T-90 tanks and artillery, according to Jeffrey White of The Washington Institute – which will permit the Russians to carry out airstrikes against rebel forces who threaten the regime's strongholds.

Russia seeks to secure an Alawite mini-state for Assad to control, and transform it into a solid strategic base in the region under Russia's umbrella. This scenario, based on the examples of Abkhazia, South Ossetia, Transnistria or Donetsk People's Republic, was already envisioned by Fabrice Balanche, probably the best expert on the Alawites, in 2012.

Few observers noticed Putin's reference to the Kurds in his address to the United Nations General Assembly this week, when he said no one other than Assad and the Kurdish militias are "truly fighting the Islamic State." Was he hinting at another potential client of the Alawite mini-state in Syria?

In "Time to put an Alawite state on the map" (Haaretz, March 20, 2013) this author proposed Israeli leaders lobby visiting U.S. President Barack Obama to work for a "grand bargain" with Russia to protect the Alawite minority in the face of the "inevitable collapse of the Assad regime," defend it against a massacre by the Sunni rebels and destroy Syria's chemical arsenal under international control. The main caveat to this agreement would be to prevent any Iranian/Hezbollah military or para-military presence in the future Alawite mini-state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The August 21, 2013 Syrian chemical attack that killed some 1,400 civilians triggered Russia's and Iran's decision to save the Assad regime from an American military strike and led to the September 2013 U.S.–Russia deal that removed most of the chemicals from Syrian turf.

A new coalition

Indeed, Putin has now found in Iran his best ally for building a coalition that includes "Assad's Syria," Hezbollah and Iraq, the next target in line. Even Egypt is inclined to work with the Russians.

It is in this framework that one must consider the intelligence cooperation agreement between Iran and Hezbollah, Iraq's decision to permit Russia to send military hardware through its air space and to create a coordination cell on the Islamic State, and Iran's purchase of $21-billion worth of Russian satellite technology and aircraft.

Nasrallah said last week that additional Russian forces and highly advanced weapons systems were arriving in Syria, and noted that while an official Syrian request for Russian intervention had not yet been made, one may be imminent.

Nasrallah was right: the first Russian airstrikes in Syria, which were conducted on Wednesday, had nothing to do with ISIS. Instead, they targeted moderate Syrian rebels in the strategic Homs area, which threatens the strategic road linking Damascus to the Alawite Coast.

Those in Israel who expressed careful optimism after the meeting between Netanyahu, Israel Defense Forces Chief of Staff Gadi Eizenkot and Putin yielded a "coordination agreement" between the two air forces have now witnessed an example of how the Russians "coordinated" their first airstrike in Syria with the Americans.

If the United States continues hesitantly zig-zagging on Syria, Israel should take into consideration that its hands will also be tied, as this will embolden Russia to undermine an important American ally in the region.

Will it be safe for Israel to give the Russians information before an attack on a vital strategic target of Hezbollah or Iran? What if Russia passes this intelligence on to Iran before such a strike? Putin has already said he is concerned about the Israeli attacks in Syria, hinting that Russia will clip Israel's wings over Syrian skies, as Haaretz's Amos Harel put it. The stronger and closer Russia's alliance with Iran and Hezbollah on the ground, the harder it will be for Russia to repress the desire to accommodate its friends.

Russia could also disrupt the Israeli military naval activity near the Lebanese and Syrian waters and possibly give Syria/Iran/Hezbollah information on our gas rigs if they compete with vital Russian economic interests. Some Turkish sources have recently claimed that a series of terrorist attacks on Turkish gas and oil pipelines by the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) served Russian interests "without any direct orders coming from Moscow."

The new situation in Syria and the region should provide Israel and the United States with an incentive to coordinate more closely on their political and military strategies concerning the Russian intervention. Israel has a lot to offer in the operative and intelligence field.

This could also trigger closer cooperation with the moderate Sunni states and even with Turkey, whose game plan for Syria could be ruined by the Russian intervention.

1) As you may have seen, ABC News reporting that Speaker Boehner and Republicans in Congress are pledging more investigation into Secretary Clinton on emails. Below are the key points we're sharing with Hill allies and TV surrogates this afternoon to get ahead of it and frame it as crazy GOP investigations AND GOP hypocrisy. We're trying to push folks to go after them.

2) Everyone asked on our last Comm call for more offense against GOP. While we can't do it perfectly before campaign is launched, we've had some success working with partners getting stories on Jeb and others. Clips attached.

POINTS

While it was permitted for Secretary Clinton to use one blackberry instead of two, looking back she's said it would have been better for her to use two. At the time, this just didn't seem like an issue. She's asked State Department to publicly release all of roughly the 55,000 printed pages of emails she provided them.

Secretary Clinton was the first and only former Secretary to respond to the Department's request last year, and was the only one to provide her work emails.

Secretary Clinton has asked the Department to make her work related emails publicly available, and just like every other Cabinet Secretary and U.S. government official, she gets to choose to keep her personal emails private.

Charlie Cook wrote that: "This is the classic kind of inside-the-Beltway, process story that politicos and reporters get in a lather over, but that resonates very little with average voters."

This isn't about emails, it's about Trey Gowdy furthering a partisan witch-hunt and Republicans in Congress distracting from their dangerous letter to the Iranian regime. There have been nine different Congressional committees that have held hearings on Benghazi . Secretary Clinton spent more than five hours testifying before the Senate and the House of Representatives and participated in briefings for Members.

Gowdy has been criticized for subpoenaing the State Department for emails already turned over to the Select Committee.

Gowdy and Republican have been caught numerous times trying to use the Benghazi investigation to fire up their base and raise money.

Republican Hypocrisy on Emails. They want to hold former Secretary Clinton to a different standard than they'd hold themselves.

Washington Post : "Jeb Bush used his private e-mail account as Florida governor to discuss security and military issues such as troop deployments to the Middle East and the protection of nuclear plants, according to a review of publicly released records." [Washington Post, 3/15/15]

Wall Street Journal : " But much like with Mrs. Clinton, the decision over which emails should be considered official and which remain private was made by Mr. Bush. It is unclear how many emails Mr. Bush withheld because he deemed them unrelated to state business. Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 06/18/08

Main Topics: Offshore Drilling, Terrorism and Guantanamo Back and Forth

Summary of Shift: Gas prices continue to rise and McCain's new stance on offshore drilling is attracting attention. While receiving the support of Bush and the recently converted Crist McCain is being attacked from the Democratic side for being environmentally irresponsible. Terrorism has also become a major battleground with the McCain camping calling Obama "naïve" and "delusional." The Obama camp shot back accusing McCain of trying to "frighten" Americans.

Rememberances of Russert continued today with coverage of his funeral. Much of Iowa remains underwater after the breach of the levees yesterday.

Highlights:

1. Offshore Drilling
   a. Sens. Boxer and McCaskill call McCain's position a flip-flop
   b. Dana Bash examines McCain's flip-flop on offshore drilling
   c. McCain's plan won't have an appreciable effect on gas prices

Boxer and McCaskill Call McCain out on Oil Flip-Flop (MSNBC 06/18/08 8:37am)
BARBARA BOXER: We can't keep on doing the same old same old. For example, they're no saying, drill, give them more leases . . . the oil companies already have 68 million acres already under lease they're not using. So why just give them more acres . . .?

CLAIRE MCCASKILL: In fact, I'm surprised Joe, you didn't mention as a Floridian, they wear a lot of flip-flops in Florida, we've got a giant flip-flop here on drilling offshore in Florida. The people of Florida do not want the incredible tourist industry spoiled by more offshore drilling . . . but what happens? John McCain flip-flops on this and your governor flip-flops on this. And you know what it is? It's the influence of big oil.

SCARBOROUGH: . . . when I was in congress, I was very, very conservative on economic issues, almost a libertarian but there is something about being surrounded by water that turns you into an environmentalist on these type issues. Also, the thing is talking about the environment, George Miller and I would always fight against royalty relief when we've actually got the federal government, basically subsidizing oil companies to drill in areas where Americans don't want them to drill.

BOXER: Right. And I want to put some dollar figures to it. You know, the unspoiled coastlines all over America, that's a $60 billion recreation and tourism industry and millions of jobs. So it's very shortsighted. Now we have the two oil men in the White House who've just been waiting to do this. And it was President Bush who said we're addicted to oil, remember that? . . . and what's the answer? More oil sometime in the future?

Dana Bash Examines McCain's Flip-Flop Reversal Over Off-Shore Oil Drilling (CNN 06/18/08 7:26am)
JOHN ROBERTS: The President's request for off-shore drilling comes less than 24 hours after Senator John McCain changed his stance on the issue. […] Dana, a lot of people changing their minds, John McCain, Gov. Charlie Crist out of Florida, what's this all about?

DANA BUSH: Well, what they're all saying […] from the White House, John McCain is basically saying the same thing, which is interesting because he's trying to distance himself from the President on climate change. But on this issue of off-shore drilling, he says he's looking for some way to ease voters pain at paying at the pump and that's not the only area his position on energy policy is evolving. In the heart of Texas oil company, John McCain went after Barack Obama for supporting a windfall profits tax on oil companies. […] Critical now, but just last month McCain said he was open to the idea. […] The change, proof of just how tricky gas price politics is for McCain. On the one hand, he's pushing green energy alternatives, like wind, solar, and bio-diesel. Pushing away from George Bush with this new ad. […] But in the face of voter outrage over high gas prices McCain is changing his position on an issue that helped define him as an environmentally conscious republican. He used to oppose lifting a federal moratorium on off-shore drilling. Now he wants to lift the ban. […] It's a risky reversal by a candidate trying to use the issue to appeal to independents. Especially in the battleground of Florida where many republicans, like Gov. Charlie Crist and Senator Martinez have long opposed off-shore drilling. But as McCain changes his position, so are they. […] Barack Obama accused John McCain of taking the politically expedient way out. Obama echoed what some environmental groups are saying about off-shore drilling, that it would really take 5 to 10 years to really get the oil exploration up and running and that's no short term fix.

McCain's Plan Won't Have an Appreciable Effect on Gas Prices (MSNBC 06/18/08 6:47am)
ALI VELSHI: John McCain was talking about energy and I wanted to chime in about that because what we've been waiting for is the third leg of the stool from the major presidential candidates in terms of an energy policy . . . both the candidates say they want to reduce the candidates dependence on foreign oil . . . except that the United States uses about 20 million barrels of oil a day, we produce about 5 million . . . we've been using a disproportionate amount of oil for very long. John McCain is talking about drilling for more oil . . . the concept here is the problematic one . . . the problem is that no amount of oil that we drill for is going to offset the worldwide demand for oil so it doesn't necessarily bring the price down. The concentration should probably be in reducing our reliance on oil.

McCain's Oil Position will Hurt Him in Costal States (MSNBC 06/18/08 9:06am)
TAMRON HALL: Yesterday . . . John McCain said that drilling was a step in the right direction but Barack Obama calls it a bad idea and a sign that McCain can't stick to his positions.

JAMES WARREN: . . . to suggest that this is just a matter of McCain inconsistency, I think is quite unfair . . . the situation in this country is getting more and more dire . . . the question is for McCain, politically, is does this hurt him or not? . . . in coastal states will gas prices go so high that folks who are naturally reluctant to support offshore drilling, will they have second thoughts?

TAMRON HALL: . . . we just showed that Quinnapiac poll where Sen. Obama leads Sen. McCain and this was before the plan . . . to lift the ban on offshore drilling. So when you look at the matchup without that conversation thrown in we know how Floridians feel about this. Now with the Gov. coming in on McCain's side, how does this affect the race in Florida?

LYNN SWEET: I think it will make it harder for McCain because what this really is is McCain tossing it to the states and President Bush tossing it to the states which will immediately trigger a big state campaign by the local environmental groups and forces who will probably line up to fight this . . . it will also create problems for Sen. McCain because one of the issues he was going to use to attract crossover Democrats was that he was different than President Bush; he does have an environmental record, he has recognized global warming. So what this decision does it triggers organizations organizing in critical states in the presidential campaign that might be against him on this issue. It just creates, I think, kind of a side headache. And nothing will happen this summer so fast anyway that will bring gas prices down before the election.

WJLA Links Bush To McCain On Piece Covering Their New Oil Drilling Policies (ABC-DC-WJLA, 06/18/08, 6:23am)
ALLISON STARLING: Well President Bush is on the same page as republican presidential candidate, John McCain, when it comes to energy relief. Today, Mr. Bush will call on Congress to lift the ban on off-shore oil drilling. This as energy policy moves to the top of the agenda for the presidential campaign. Viviana Ratato has the details.

VIVIANO RATATO: American's are paying more than $4.00 a gallon for gas, that's why President Bush will make a move today to support off-shore oil drilling. He's expected to call on Congress to lift the federal ban which currently prevents it. The current presidential candidates also weighed in. The likely republican nominee agrees with the President.

[McCain Off-Shore Oil Drilling Speech Shown]

But this represents a political U-Turn for John McCain, who in the past has opposed lifting the ban on drilling off the U.S. coast for oil. Barack Obama, who is against lifting the ban, calls his rival's position flip-flopping.

BARACK OBAMA: This is yet another reversal by John McCain in terms of his earlier positions. I think we could set up an interesting debate between John McCain 2000 and John McCain 2008.

RATATO: As rising oil prices continue to worry American families, a new ABC News poll shows more Americans trust Obama with America's energy future. Specifically, just over half of respondents trust Obama to do a better job than McCain handling energy policy. The President's announcement is intended to pressure Congress into lifting the ban on off-shore drilling. But with only a few months left before a new administration enters the White House, it's unclear how effective the President will be.

Richard Clarke Accuses McCain Campaign of Fear-mongering on Terror (MSNBC 06/18/08 6:17am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: Richard Clarke came out swinging for Obama, didn't he?

WILLIE GEIST: Richard Clarke, former terrorism czar under President Bush and a great critic of the Bush administration, responded to the McCain response to Obama . . .

RICHARD CLARKE: I'm frankly a little disgusted b y the attempts of some of my friends on the McCain campaign to use the same old tired tactics that have been used in the last several campaigns of trying to paint one party as weak on terrorism and, completely and utterly distorting the record of that party to frankly frighten Americans.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: And Joe, doesn't he have a point, looking back at the Bush presidency and what tactics were used or what sentiment of the voters might have been preyed upon a bit to get people to vote for President Bush and are we going to fall for it again?

John McCain's Changing Position on Guantanamo Detainees (MSNBC 06/18/08 7:24am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: Rudy Giuliani and a lot of Americans are asking the question, why should we give terror suspects . . . constitutional rights that no enemy combatant on foreign soil has ever had before last week?

SUSAN RICE: You should ask John McCain that, because back in 2003 The New York Times reported that John McCain wanted everybody in Guantanamo charged with a crime or released. That's what the administration wanted to do.

[. . .]

RICE: . . . that goes way, way beyond what the Supreme Court just said. The Supreme Court said habeas hearings. John McCain in 2003 said charge them or release them. Now he's flip-flopped for political purposes. This campaign, the McCain campaign is doing what George Bush tried to do in 2004, which is to stoke fear and blow smoke and confuse the American people.

SCARBOROUGH: It worked though, didn't it?

RICE: The American people are smart . . . they get that this has been a failed war on terrorism . . .

Giuliani Talks Counterterrorism, Pushes Offense (FNC 06/18/08 7:50am)
GRETCHEN CARLSON: We have been discussing all morning the rift now that has suddenly appeared yesterday between John McCain and Barack Obama about terrorism and how we should handle it. Now, here is what Barack Obama has said. […] do you have a problem with that statement?

RUDY GIULIANI: Well sure. What it says is something I've been saying along time. The democrats want to go back to a pre-September 11th view of terrorism. What I call being on defense. They want to treat it mostly as a criminal justice matter use grand juries, investigations. They seem to think that 1993 was a good example of how to do it. It turns out in retrospect 1993 was a mistake. It's was a mistake not to recognize it was more than a criminal act it was an act of terrorism. It was followed by attacks in Nairobi, in Darisalam, in Cobalt Towers, in U.S.S. Cole, a whole series of attacks and then ultimately the attacks of September 11th. The reality is we can't deal with this as solely a criminal justice matter. The things that I said and other republicans have said are no different than what Hillary Clinton said about Barack Obama's approach to dealing with terrorism. I think she described it as irresponsible or naive or some language like that. I'm not sure I would characterize it. I would describe it and say this is not a realistic approach. Time has proven that being on offense is better than being on defense.

BRIAN KILMEADE: Rudy, were things exposed in that trial of Yousef and others detrimental to the war on terror?

GIULIANI: In several of the trials, there have been things of interest that were passed on to bin laden. This disclosure of classified information, which sometimes comes out in these things. These are all dangerous things. I think the Supreme Court, quite respectfully I would say this, but I think the supreme court made a big mistake in extending rights to terrorists. Big mistake is to give terrorists rights they didn't have in the past. I don't understand for the life of me, why would you want to create new rights for terrorists at a time we are dealing with terrorism?

STEVE DOOCY: During the Clinton years, wasn't that law enforcement only?

GIULIANI: It was to a large extent there were responses to several of the bombings but they were for a day or two and they were not sustained. The whole difference that has happened since September 11th that I believe was at the core of keeping us safe is we now have a full response to terrorism. We're on offense. We're trying to anticipate it. in the criminal justice system you react to what happened.

Giuliani: Calling Obama Naïve is Just Quoting Hillary (MSNBC 06/18/08 7:24am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: Yesterday in a conference call members of McCain's campaign called Barack Obama naïve, they called him delusional. . .are the Republicans trying to tell Americans once again that electing a Democrat will make them and their families less safe?

RUDY GIULIANI: I think those Democrats are just repeating what Hillary Clinton said. Those are almost exactly the same words . . .

SCARBOROUGH: Do you think that Barack Obama is naïve? Do you think that he is delusional? Do you think that he's dangerous?

GIULIANI: It's an attitude that demonstrates his inexperience. . .

Giuliani Talks Oil Drilling and Fighting Terrorism (CNN 06/18/08 7:26am)
JOHN ROBERTS: Hey look, during the campaign you were for lifting the federal ban on off-shore drilling, but a lot of people saying this is nothing more than pandering to the oil and gas interests, this is going to do nothing to lower the price per barrel of oil in this country. Listen to what Barack Obama said about that yesterday.

[Barack Obama "Had it right the first time" Clip Shown]

As we mentioned Mr. Mayor, this is an about-face for Senator McCain, also an about change for Governor Crist who has about-faced on his position on off-shore drilling. Why all the change of heart here?

RUDY GIULIANI: Well, as you said, i believe it should be left to the states. That's the position I've always taken. I think the reality is it's just not correct to say it wouldn't affect the price of oil. anything you do to increase supply, actually, given the futures market, anything you do to suggest that you're going to increase supply in the future is going to reduce somewhat the price of oil. The reality is, Barack Obama opposes almost everything that could realistically reduce the price of oil. Expanding refineries. Expanding nuclear power, which is something that he doesn't embrace. so the reality is you can't look at this in isolation. if all you were doing is this, it would have a small impact on the price of oil. but if you're talking about thinking some of the things that have hurt us over the last 20 to 30 years, then that is truly taking us on a path toward energy independence. It includes liquid natural gas. It includes wind and solar. It includes hybrid vehicles. You have to do all these things. These all have to be opened up for discussion. Because we've been basically on hold for about 30 years now. We haven't built a new refinery in 30 years. we haven't licensed a nuclear power plant in 25 or 30 years. We're not exploiting responsibly our oil reserves. All these things have to now be opened up. We're in a crisis with regard to this. And the reality is the American people deserve some really tough political decisions about things that we've held back on in the past.

ROBERTS: Mr. mayor, in the past 24 hours you've really been lashing out at senator Obama over this idea of fighting the war on terrorism. it falls out of comments he made in an interview with abc in which he said regarding the supreme court decision on Guantanamo detainees, quote, we can crackdown on the threats to the united states but we can do so within the constraints of the constitution. For example, the first attack against the World Trade Center, we were able to arrest those responsible, put them on trial. They are currently in U.S. prisons, incapacitated. He says he wants to deal with terrorism within the frame work of the constitution. What's wrong with that?

GIULIANI: The reality is, no one is lashing out at him. The words that we use by some of the commentators are no different than hillary clinton said. she described the way he deals with terrorism, the way he proposed dealing with it. talking to people in some of these countries without preconditions. she described it as irresponsible. i'm not sure she used the word naive, it's the same word some of the republicans used. i haven't said that but what i do suggest is he doesn't have the experience to handle terrorism. it was a terrible mistake to deal with it in the '90s just as a criminal justice matter.

ROBERTS: Would you have dealt with the 1993 world trade center bombing in a different fashion?

GIULIANI: We should have. We should have recognized it was a terrorist attack.

ROBERTS: What should you have done?

GIULIANI: America should have gone on offense. America should have gone on offense against terrorism. We didn't. We had a muted response to the terrorist attacks that occurred right after that. Including the ones that occurred on the u.s.s. coal where we had no response. we saw it as the way senator Obama sees it. I call it a pre September 11th mentality that he wants to return to. The reality is the criminal justice system has limited application in this area of terrorism. when it can be used, it should be used. but you should not think of it as a criminal justice matter, as a grand jury is going to solve terrorism. and i guess the real objection that we have is trying to take the constitution and apply it all over the world. We never did that before. The constitutional decision last week by the supreme court is a creation of new rights for terrorists that did not exist before.

ROBERTS: Senator Obama says that the Guantanamo detentions haven't resulted in a lot of people being prosecuted for terrorist crimes and all its done is ruin America's credibility in the world. True or untrue?

GIULIANI: It may have also protected America. at least 30 of the people that were released from Guantanamo have engaged in battlefield activities or terrorist activities again. That'll give you some idea of what can happen if you decide to release those people from Guantanamo. So the reality is the people that are being held there may have something to do with safety. We haven't had a terrorist attack in the United States since September 11. I thank god for that. You keep thinking it could happen again and we've got to be prepared for that. The reality is, we've been safe. I don't know why we want to change the constitutional guarantees and give terrorists more constitutional guarantees than they have had over the last 200 years. Or at least enemy competence they've had over the last 200 years

Independent Voters Down, Split Between Candidates, But Like McCain Because He Is Different Than Bush (CNN 06/18/08 9:45am)

BILL SCHNEIDER: Independents hold the key to victory. Both contenders know it. […] Who's got the edge with independents? Two new polls have the same answer. Neither candidate. The Washington Post/ABC News poll finds independents split, so does the CNN poll by the Opinion Research Corporation, 45 percent for Barack Obama, 45 percent for John McCain. Independents remember have no brand-name loyalties. Bizarre as it may sound, they actually look at the candidates on the issues and then make up their minds. So what do they think of the candidates? Do they hate them both? Actually they like them both. McCain somewhat more than Obama. On the issues, however, independents are not happy at all. 78 percent think the economy is lousy. 72 percent oppose the war in Iraq. Which explains why independents are so down on the republican party. Only 33 percent have a favorable opinion on republicans. 53 percent like the democrats. Big difference. Obama's trying to sell change, which independents clearly want. […] If independents are so down on republicans, why do so many of them support McCain? Because most independents think McCain will be different than Bush. Otherwise McCain wouldn't have a chance. Independents don't like the republican brand, but they do like McCain. For independents the brand comes second, for partisans the brand comes first.

Fox News on Recipe Gate (FNC 06/18/08 8:59am)
GINA MOSE: John McCain's wife Cindy is getting battered over a cookie contest. […] "Serial Recipe thief" "Re-Heat Offender" "Cindy Bakes Another Waffer" screams the Huffington Post. Both Cindy McCain and Bill Clinton are feeling the heat, accused of recipe plagiarism. Every year FamilyCircle magazine holds a presidential cookie bake-off. Candidate spouses submit their favorite recipes and may the best cookie win. Readers are supposed to try the recipes then vote. […] Cindy McCain turned in a receipe she says she got from a good friend, but the Huffington Post says they found the exact same recipe on Hersheys.com. The recipe's are pretty identical. […] They're even in the same order! No comment from Mrs. McCain. This is the second time she's taken lumps for supposedly passing off recipes, the last time for recipes for passion fruit mousse, where described as family recipes on the McCain website then discovered elsewhere. That time Mrs. McCain blamed a campaign intern for posting the recipes. […] That's the way the cookie crumbles, they smell good, they smell like plagiarism.

second report Roberts did on this today); interviewed Alex Seitz-Wald; Seitz-Wald said there was no smoking gun; discussed Blumenthal; Seitz-Wald said he did not know who leaked the emails. MSNBC's Live With Thomas Roberts, 5.21.15

-- Report on The New York Times' publication of 349 emails from HRC's tenure as Secretary of State; reported the emails contain sensitive but not classified information; interviewed Alex Seitz-Wald; Seitz-Wald said the emails were lightly redacted; Seitz-Wald reported on the contents of the emails; Seitz-Wald said there was no smoking gun in the batch of emails. MSNBC's Live With Thomas Roberts , 5.21.15

-- Interviewed Maeve Reston about how 2016 candidates, including HRC, are struggling with how to answer questions about Iraq. CNN's Wolf , 5.21.15

-- Report on The New York Times' publication of nearly 400 pages of HRC's emails as Secretary of State; interviewed Mark Murray; Murray said these emails were not from the State Department's official release; Murray said much of what was in the release was already known; Murray said the release did not change the emails much; discussed the Bloomberg focus group with Democrats in Iowa; showed footage of the person saying HRC's honesty most concerned him; Murray said most Democrats he spoke to said they just want to win in 2016, and they say HRC is the best chance they have to win. MSNBC's News Nation With Tamron Hall , 5.21.15

-- Report on The New York Times' publication of nearly 400 pages of HRC's emails as Secretary of State; reported the State Department's response to the publication, that the documents were not as redacted as the agency would prefer; panel with Alex Seitz-Wald, McKay Coppins, and Jane Timm; Seitz-Wald said there was no smoking gun in the released emails; Seitz-Wald discussed Sidney Blumenthal. MSNBC's The Rundown With Jose Diaz-Balart, 5.21.15

-- Interview with Adam Smith; Smith said the Benghazi Committee left the topic of Benghazi long ago; Smith said now the Committee was all about HRC; said that we've had nine separate investigations of what happened in Benghazi; reported on The Washington Times' report that detailed an intelligence report that was circulated before the Benghazi attack; Smith said reports like that come in all the time; Smith said we did not provide proper security in Libya; Smith said what was next for the Committee seemed to be just hassling Hillary Clinton, called it a "partisan witch hunt." CSPAN's Washington Journal , 5.21.15

-- Brief report on Sidney Blumenthal's subpoena; regurgitated information from The New York Times story on Tuesday about Blumenthal. Fox News' Fox and Friends First , 5.21.15

-- During an interview with Mike Huckabee, Hasselbeck played footage from Mark Halperin's focus group with Iowa Democrats who could not name a single accomplishment of HRC as Secretary of State; Huckabee said HRC was in a leading position due to her celebrity not due to her accomplishments; Huckabee called HRC a known quantity who is hiding, afraid to face the press; Huckabee said O'Malley was being smart in challenging HRC. Fox News' Fox and Friends , 5.21.15

-- Discussion about the Bloomberg focus group; used footage of the focus group; one participant said he wished HRC would talk more about Benghazi; one person said he was most concerned about HRC's honest; one person said he was not concerned about WJC and HRC's speaking fees; one person said he thought it was silly that HRC used a gmail account for her server but that he understood wanting to keep some emails private; Halperin said focus group participants liked that HRC moved to the left; Halperin said the participants in the Democratic focus group bordered on cynical while the participants in the Republican focus group were more idealistic; Scarborough said Republicans were not being pragmatic enough; made the point that if the Republicans lose the White House then it will change the world forever. MSNBC's Morning Joe , 5.21.15

-- Discussed Pataki's comment that US ground troops should be sent to Iraq; Paul Begala briefly contrasted Pataki's remarks with HRC's remarks on Iraq; Begala said Americans were more in line with HRC's stance on Iraq than Petaki; host said HRC's plan does not work if ISIS decides to continue attacking America; Begala said ISIS was not attacking America; Begala pivoted to Jeb Bush without mentioning HRC; Chris Cuomo said HRC would have to give a clearer answer since she was one of the architects of foreign policy over the last six years. CNN's New Day , 5.21.15

-- Brief report on Mark Halperin's Bloomberg focus group of Iowa Democrats; showed footage of focus group participants struggling to come up with something HRC accomplished as Secretary of State; hosts said Democrats must be nervous given all of the scandals swirling around about HRC. Fox News' Fox and Friends , 5.21.15

-- Interviewed Mitt Romney; Romney said he would rather have Carly Fiorina than HRC; Romney said people wonder if they can trust HRC. Fox's Extra , 5.21.15

-- 10-minute segment on two focus groups, one of Republican likely caucus-goers and one of Democrat likely caucus-goers; the Republican group was more concerned with the general feeling about a candidate than specific ideology like Jeb Bush's positions on Common Core or Immigration; Republicans were more concerned than Democrats about political dynasties; the Democrat group was not very concerned about HRC's scandals; hosts argued that fear of Republicans drives Democrats to support anyone who can realistically win, which is HRC since there is not "sexy alternative." MSNBC's Morning Joe , 5.21.15 [Part Two]

-- Led with a segment about Bernie Sanders challenging HRC; jokingly compared Sanders and HRC; Stewart said HRC would crush Sanders; Stewart said nothing would stop HRC; led into news footage that said at least 180 Clinton Foundation donors lobbied the State Department while HRC was Secretary of State; Stewart joked about The Clinton Foundation forgetting to report foreign contributions; showed news coverage that said CVC gets paid as much as $75,000 per speech to talk about diarrhea; Stewart joked about CVC's interest in diarrhea; Stewart said the optics of the foreign donations were not good but there was no proof of quid pro quo; showed footage of HRC answering questions about quid pro quo from her Iowa stop on April 20. Comedy Central's The Daily Show With Jon Stewart, 5.20.15

-- Said HRC got testy with Ed Henry; Hannity bemoaned the HRC did not treat Henry better after he interrupted her event in Iowa; Henry talked about how long it had been since HRC spoke to the press; Henry said, regarding reporters, "we are not potted plants"; Henry said that HFA said HRC was taking questions from voters; showed footage of Howard Dean on MSNBC's Morning Joe; panel with Juan Williams and David Limbaugh; Hannity said if HRC wanted transparency then she wouldn't have had her own server; Williams pointed out Hannity was speculating; Williams said HRC had an ethical problem though; Williams defended HRC wiping her server free; Limbaugh said HRC snubbed and mocked Ed Henry; showed footage of Bloomberg's focus group with Democratic voters in which voters were asked to name an accomplishment of HRC's as Secretary of State; Hannity asked Williams for three accomplishments; Williams listed HRC's backing BHO's decision to go after Bin Laden, HRC repairing relationships abroad after the war in Iraq, and HRC was the one who backed additional troops in Afghanistan; Limbaugh said the press gave HRC a pass; Williams said the press was not giving HRC a pass, pointed to the New York Times and The Wall Street Journal stories this week. Fox News' Hannity , 5.20.15

-- Showed footage of Bill Burton from The Kelly File on Wednesday; led into discussion with Robert Zimmerman to discuss whether Fox News and the media were inventing scandals about HRC; Zimmerman said there was not a cloud of corruption following the Clintons at all; Zimmerman said scandal stories live and die with the facts; pointed to Amazon reissuing Clinton Cash due to major revisions due to inaccuracies; Kelly said the Clinton Cash story hasn't collapsed, is circumstantial; Kelly said there's no smoking gun but there's still a case to be made; Kelly brought up Ron Fournier's column, Blumenthal, private email servers, Clinton Cash, and Benghazi in one breath as creating a narrative that could lead people to distrust HRC; Zimmerman pointed to all of the Benghazi hearings that have already taken place, pointed to this investigation taking longer than Iran-Contra; Kelly pointed to a Quinnipiac poll that said HRC was not trustworthy; Zimmerman hit back with a Gallup poll that said HRC weathered the storm on the email scandal and a Pew poll that showed HRC with high approval ratings from Democrats. Fox News' The Kelly File , 5.20.15

-- Brief report on HRC's hiring of Lorella Praeli as Latino Outreach Director; led with DREAMers interrupting HRC's Maryland campaign stop in fall 2014 and an overview of DREAMer activism. MSNBC's All In With Chris Hayes, 5.20.15

-- Follow-up on Sidney Blumenthal; reported the Benghazi Committee subpoenaed Blumenthal; discussed Blumenthal's business interests in Libya; mentioned BHO banned HRC from hiring Blumenthal at State; panel with Andrea Tantaros and Nomiki Konst; O'Reilly said people hacked into Blumenthal's server to get access to emails that Blumenthal sent to HRC; Konst said the story doesn't look good but nothing reported was illegal; Tantaros mentioned that Blumenthal was an employee of both The Clinton Foundation and Media Matters, a 501(c)3, and questioned whether the FEC should get involved to see if campaign finance laws were being violated. Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor , 5.20.15

-- Report on HRC taking questions from reporters after talking to small-business owners; showed footage of HRC talking about economic issues from Iowa on Tuesday; reported on The USA Today story, "Why is Clinton running?"; panel with Howard Fineman, Susan Milligan, and Perry Bacon about why people ask HRC for her rationale for running and not Republicans; Milligan said the question is sexist; Fineman said HRC needs a narrative; Bacon mentioned HRC's four fights but said HRC has not clarified what her main theme is yet; used footage from the Bloomberg focus group; Milligan said most Americans could not name a success of any Secretary of State; Fineman said HRC was mostly running for a third term of BHO; Milligan said HRC would have a hard time being the candidate of the middle class having just made $25 million from speeches. MSNBC's Hardball With Chris Matthews, 5.20.15

-- Brief mention in a longer segment about Bin Laden's emails that Bin Laden criticized HRC's Libya policy, calling her "weak." Fox News' On The Record With Greta Van Susteren , 5.20.15

-- Speculation about how Iraq/ISIS would affect HRC if it becomes a focal point in the campaign; panel with Sara Murray and Jeff Zeleny; Murray said HRC would have to answer more questions about her Iraq War vote and differentiate herself from Republicans; Zeleny said HRC did not say what she would different from BHO on Iraq moving forward. CNN's Situation Room With Wolf Blitzer , 5.20.15

-- Report on HRC's hiring of DREAMer Lorella Praeli; showed footage of HRC's roundtable in Las Vegas; profile of Praeli; used footage of Al Sharpton's interview of Praeli in 2012; Sharpton lauded HRC's hiring of Praeli, morally and politically; showed breakdown of how Latinos voted in the last three presidential elections; panel with Clarissa Martinez-De-Castro and Erika Andiola; Martinez-De-Castro said Praeli's hire was a big get for HFA; Andiola said she hoped HFA listened to Praeli instead of just using her. MSNBC's PoliticsNation With Al Sharpton, 5.20.15

-- Report on how Republican candidates are attacking BHO and HRC for their foreign policy; main angle of the segment is on BHO, but included footage of Perry asking HRC whether she would have pulled the troops out of Iraq in 2011; reported that Huckabee said the fair tax could help woo minority voters from supporting HRC; led into Ed Henry segment about HRC defending The Clinton Foundation; led with HRC's fundraisers in Chicago on Wednesday; used footage from HRC's campaign stop in Chicago when she talked about CEOs making 300 times what their employees make; juxtaposed that comment with reports on the wealthy people hosting HRC's fundraisers; reported on the disparity between what Fred Eychaner's foundation donated to The Clinton Foundation and what The Clinton Foundation said Eychaner's foundation donated; used footage of HRC defending The Clinton Foundation on Tuesday; led into report about Cheryl Mills sometimes blocking FOIA requests at the State Department; reported the State Department dodged defending HRC; used footage of Marie Harf from the State Department briefing; shifted into HRC being pressured by Elizabeth Warren's disappointment that HRC did not weigh in on trade; reported that the Benghazi Committee sent two US Marshalls to Blumenthal's home to serve him a subpoena. The Stephen M. Silberstein Foundation: California Dreamin' of Social Democracy

By CRC Staff

July 1, 2014

By Jonathan Hanen

Foundation Watch

Summary: Stephen M. Silberstein, a member of George Soros's far-left Democracy Alliance, sheds light on the extent of Soros's socialist agenda for America. Silberstein's foundation backs a panoply of leftist groups that fight for higher taxes on the rich, wealth redistribution schemes, single-payer socialized medicine, burdensome regulation of energy markets, judicial activism designed to advance a radically egalitarian agenda, and the replacement of the linchpin of federalism, the Electoral College, with a national popular vote.

George Soros's secretive donor consortium, the Democracy Alliance, has been making news lately in the wake of a new plan set forth at its four-day conference entitled "A New Progressive Era?" which took place in Chicago at the end of April 2014. According to the Washington Post, "The plan, being crafted in private by a group of about 100 donors that includes billionaire hedge fund manager George Soros and San Francisco venture capitalist Rob McKay, seeks to give Democrats a stronger hand in the redrawing of district lines for state legislatures and the U.S. House." More specifically, the newspaper reports that "keeping Democratic control of the Senate" was of paramount concern to the donors. "There's a lot of anxiety about the midterms," admitted McKay, the outgoing chairman, "who said substantial investment this year will go to local and state minimum-wage campaigns that can help drive turnout for federal races." The new plan would shift significant resources away from the Alliance's typical focus on donating to left-wing media outlets and think tanks, such as Media Matters for America and the John Podesta-founded Center for American Progress. Assuming the reported shift occurs, the Alliance will try to engage in ground-level political campaigning by in effect acting as a bundling super PAC—an über super PAC—in order to prevent the expected GOP takeover of the Senate.

Over time it has leaked out that more than 100 billionaires and multi-millionaires belong to this shadowy philanthropic collective that Markos Moulitsas, founder of the influential leftist blog Daily Kos, has called "a vast left-wing conspiracy." Membership in Democracy Alliance comes by invitation only and requires donating a minimum of $200,000 per year to left-wing activist groups and think tanks endorsed by the Alliance. In addition to Soros and McKay, the Washington Post reports that hedge fund manager Tom Steyer of San Francisco (who is most famous in conservative circles for his self-interested opposition to the Keystone XL pipeline) and the trial lawyers Steve and Amber Mostyn from Houston are relatively new members (for more on Steyer, see Green Watch, January 2014). Other notable figures from the world of business have recently joined the ranks of this elite group: Adam Abram (insurance and real estate), Rick Segal (financial services), Paul Boskind (mental health services), Amy Goldman (real estate), and Henry van Ameringen (manufacturing). New School Professor Philip Munger, son of Berkshire Hathaway vice chairman Charles Munger, also became a member.

There has been a sizeable influx of labor leaders into Democracy Alliance. This may help to explain the group's strategic shift to make the minimum wage an issue in the 2014 mid-terms. Of course union contracts often have automatic salary increases triggered by increases in the minimum wage. New Alliance members include Noel Beasley, president of Workers United, a textile union affiliated with SEIU (Service Employees International Union), and Keith Mestrich, president of the union-owned Amalgamated Bank. Other new members are Larry Cohen, president of the Communications Workers of America (CWA); Randi Weingarten, president of the American Federation of Teachers; CWA senior director George Kohl; and Michelle Ringuette, Weingarten's assistant. Other individuals previously reported as members with ties to organized labor include former SEIU executive Anna Burger and National Education Association executive director John C. Stocks. SEIU President Mary Kay Henry is vice chair of the Alliance's board of directors. SEIU and the AFL-CIO are institutional members of the Alliance. (Around press time, the Alliance's website was updated to reflect that Stocks of the NEA has been named chairman of the group's board.)

Beyond the names listed in media coverage of Democracy Alliance, there are many rank-and-file dark money generals in this elite club who have not received much media scrutiny. The DA website says its mission is "a stronger democracy and more progressive America." It identifies four goals: "an open, vibrant democracy," "an opportunity-driven economy," "a dignity-based foreign policy," and "an independent judiciary." But the Alliance has been vague about the meaning of these terms. This report will profile a representative donor among the few known illuminati inside the group and examine his giving and political activities in order to see how he understands and pursues the Alliance's goals. Only then will we be in a position to surmise the full extent of the Alliance's social-democratic vision for America's future.

History

Stephen M. Silberstein, the founder of the private foundation that bears his name, is a key member of the Democracy Alliance. According to his bio at the website of the University of California Berkeley's Goldman School of Public Policy, where he sits on the board of advisers with U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), Silberstein earned a bachelor's degree in economics and a master's degree in library science from U.C. Berkeley, as well as a master's in econometrics from the University of Stockholm. Silberstein began his career as a computer programmer in the library at U.C. Berkeley, where he was responsible for the library's "total automation program," the project to computerize the entire card catalog which began in the early 1970s. The bio further states "Steve Silberstein co-founded Innovative Interfaces in 1978 and served as its first President. The company develops automated systems for libraries and now includes as its customers more than 1500 library systems around the world, including most of the campuses of the University of California and the California State University System, as well as large and small public city and county library systems."

Silberstein's computer company presumably generated the wealth that he used to found the Stephen M. Silberstein Foundation in Belvedere, Calif., in May 1998. It is not easy to research the foundation's activities. The foundation has no website, and a Google search reveals few to no publications or public speeches from Mr. Silberstein. The paper trail is almost non-existent.

One personal hobbyhorse does appear: Silberstein has in recent years jumped on the "inequality" bandwagon, urging higher taxes. As one law professor summarized Silberstein's idiosyncratic idea, Silberstein "would adjust the corporate tax rate based on the ratio of CEO pay to the average worker. A company with a ratio at the 1980 level of 50:1 would pay tax at the current rate of 35%, with the rate rising for companies with a higher ratio and lower for those with a narrower pay gap."

It is a bad idea for several reasons. It disincentivizes growth, thus hurting both job creation and the overall economy. It limits the profit motive, and therefore leads the best quality CEOs to look to other countries for work while simultaneously putting American companies at a disadvantage with their foreign competitors. Having no legal ceiling on CEO pay is the primary reason why the U.S. has the best CEOs in the world — along with our comparatively strong rule of law, private property, and free markets.

But as part of this crusade, Silberstein last year supported a documentary, Inequality for All, described in a friendly review as a "thorough, user-friendly documentary" in which "UC Berkley professor and columnist Robert Reich, aka the Conscience of Liberal America, restages the highlights of his 'Wealth and Poverty' class to explain how and why economic inequality is hurting everyone in the country…. One of the very best Outrage Docs, sure to galvanize debate among believers and detractors alike." Silberstein is credited as the movie's executive producer, which likely means he helped underwrite production.

Silberstein has also signed up with Patriotic Millionaires, a group formed in the 2010 electoral cycle and still active, which publicly asks that its members' taxes be raised. On its website it brags it has staged a debate with tax-reduction advocate Grover Norquist, "delivered a press conference with the President, and worked shoulder-to-shoulder with the White House to pass the 2012 American Taxpayer Relief Act." The group was set up by the Agenda Project, founded by Erica Payne, a political consultant, former senior official at the Democratic National Committee, and a speaker at the first organizational meeting of donors that led to the Democracy Alliance. Agenda Project is best known for producing the 2011 commercial that attacked Rep. Paul Ryan's (R-Wisc.) budget by showing a grandmother being thrown off a cliff. With greater subtlety, it also launched a project, "F*ck Tea," to attack the Tea Party movement.

Perhaps the best way to gain insight into Silberstein's thinking is to review the publicly available financial record and the spending pattern of his foundation, along with his political donations in California and nationally. From these data we can glean something of his vision of the role of government in a liberal democratic political order, and the extent to which he would extend the scope of government regulation into the free operation of markets and autonomous social institutions in order to advance the progressive agenda of subordinating the traditional American notion of justice—the equality of all citizens before the law—into the social-democratic ideal of justice as equality of results.

Finances and Spending

In its most recent reporting year ending December 2012, the Silberstein Foundation reported assets of $89,947,653 (book value) and net investment income of $2,540,027, with $4,877,175 paid out in gifts, grants, and charitable donations. In 2011, the foundation reported slightly higher assets of $91,609,664 and net investment income of $7,683,604, with total giving at $3,246,970. In 2010, it listed total assets of $86,577,155 and net investment income of $1,992,094 with total giving at $4,327,345. In a nutshell, the foundation fits the pattern of being a small, self-regenerating wellspring of cash that donates roughly as much as it earns each year to far-left causes.

The foundations ranks 1,321st in the FoundationSearch top 10,000 U.S. foundations by assets, and 173rd in the top foundations by assets for the state of California. It is on the lower end of the mid-range in terms of assets. What makes it of interest to conservatives is that it is a private foundation that reflects the aims and interests of one man who happens to be a member of Soros's Democracy Alliance. So let's examine what the foundation has tried to accomplish with its giving in recent years.

Since 2003 the Silberstein Foundation has made five donations since 2003 totaling $117,590 to Media Matters for America. MMfA is perhaps the most influential nonprofit left-wing media watchdog group. According to The Daily Caller's now famous exposé, MMfA had a direct line in to MSNBC in 2008 and had inside contacts that were capable of directly placing content in the New York Times, Los Angeles Times, and Washington Post, as well as online media such as Huffington Post, Daily Kos, and Salon. Since its founding by erstwhile journalist David Brock in 2004, MMfA has been pushing the ludicrous notion that the mainstream media has a monolithically conservative bias. Since its inception, MMfA has been in a constant state of war, aiming to defame and defund Fox News, Rush Limbaugh, Sean Hannity, Glenn Beck, and Lou Dobbs, to name only a few. Anyone familiar with MMfA's tendentious presentation of facts can empathize with the late Christopher Hitchens who, in reviewing Brock's 2002 memoir, wrote "I would say without any hesitation that he [Brock] is incapable of recognizing the truth, let alone of telling it. The whole book is an exercise in self-love, disguised as an exercise in self-abnegation."

In both 2013 and 2014 Silberstein made identical donations of $200,000 to American Bridge 21st Century, a super PAC devoted to opposition research and tracking Republican candidates that was founded by Brock in 2010. Other notable donors to MMfA in 2013 include Soros ($500,000), longtime Clinton ally Susie Buell ($400,000), American Federation of Teachers ($100,000), AFSCME ($100,000), SEIU COPE (Committee on Political Education, a PAC) ($100,000), the Boston law firm of Ropes and Gray ($25,000), and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) ($46,500). American Bridge 21st Century created a project called Correct the Record (CTR), a media and rapid response outfit that is dedicated to defending Hillary Clinton from criticism of her handling of the Benghazi scandal and the progress of Iran toward acquiring nuclear weapons that occurred on her watch as Secretary of State. Former Clinton White House special counsel Lanny Davis announced on Fox News that he will lead a "truth squad" under the auspices of CTR to counter the findings of Rep. Trey Gowdy's (R-S.C.) select committee investigation of Benghazi.

Since 2008 the Silberstein Foundation has donated $650,000 to the American Prospect, a left-wing magazine whose columnists regularly argue for the standard progressive agenda: single-payer healthcare, amnesty for illegal immigrants, same sex marriage, coal-killing environmental regulations, and card-check legislation to take away the right to a private ballot when workers decide whether to unionize.

Since 2002 the philanthropy has donated $800,000 to “Democracy Now,” a far-left radio news program that features anti-American radical Amy Goodman, among others. “Democracy Now” also receives substantial funding from Soros, Tides, and the Ford Foundation. This giving can truly be called philanthropic because left-wing talk radio has never been able to garner a large enough audience to sustain itself by selling advertisements.

Far-left Activist Groups and Think Tanks

Since 2005 the Silberstein Foundation has given $55,000 to the Tides Foundation, apparently at the request of the Democracy Alliance. Tides was founded in 1976 by far-left activist Drummond Pike, and along with its sister philanthropy, the Tides Center, it is second only to Soros’s billion-dollar Open Society Foundations (formerly known as Open Society Institute) as the preeminent funder of far-left activist groups over the past 20 years. To appreciate the magnitude of the far left’s advantage in so-called “dark money,” consider that Open Society’s net assets were $1,007,665,737 in 2011 and that year it awarded $33,616,565 in grants. Net assets for the Tides Foundation were $135,525,497 in 2011 and grants awarded came to $91,939,822, while net assets for the Tides Center were $75,030,551 in 2011 and grants awarded came to $19,341,827.

Compare these 2011 figures to the larger 2012 presidential year figures for the Charles Koch Foundation (assets: $276,881,787; total giving: $14,920,448) and David Koch Charities (assets: $60,567,797; total giving: $10,500,000). In short, Tides alone outspends the Kochs, while at the same time Soros is making them look poor, and the money from the Ford Foundation, Pew Charitable Trusts, and many others constitutes a torrent of money for left-wing 501(c)(3)s, 501(c)(4)s, 527s, and super PACs. The mainstream media simply chooses to ignore the Left’s vast advantage in dark money, in favor of echoing repeated over-the-top attacks on the Kochs made on the floor of the Senate by Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

The Silberstein Foundation has given $1,150,000 to the Center for American Progress (CAP) since 2001. With Soros as a key initial funder, CAP was launched in 2003 in the hope of creating a progressive think tank to rival conservative groups like the Heritage Foundation, the American Enterprise Institute, and the Cato Institute. With former Clinton White House Chief of Staff John Podesta at the helm, CAP has been staffed by a large number of Clintonistas and is often referred to as the Clinton White House in exile. (At the beginning of 2014, Podesta left behind his active leadership role at CAP to become a senior adviser in the Obama White House.) In recent years, CAP has served as an echo chamber for the Obama White House. There is little to no daylight between CAP and the Obama administration on the issues of Keynesian economic “stimulus,” tax increases, comprehensive immigration reform, gun control, and EPA’s destruction of the coal industry. (CAP was profiled in the May 2007 and February 2011 issues of Organization Trends.)

The wonks at CAP have helped to propagate the false and destructive class warfare narrative of extreme income inequality in America, in spite of the unprecedented surge in the standard of living for the poor in America over the last century, and the creation of a large and affluent middle class, and the greatest social mobility in human history. Numerous studies have shown that the distribution of income earners by quintile over the 20th century remained stable.

Moreover, economist Thomas Sowell regularly makes the point that, if one looks at individuals instead of categories, a person born in the poorest fifth of the income distribution (the bottom quintile) has a 50 percent chance of getting to the middle of the middle quintile in his or her own lifetime. No society has ever achieved anything like this level of social mobility, but the Left will let nothing stand in the way of its ugly, envy-laden class warfare narrative.

The Silberstein Foundation has donated $300,000 to the Campaign for America’s Future since 2001. CAF is a 501(c)(4) led by Sixties radicals Robert Borosage and Roger Hickey that was founded in 1996. It currently advocates higher taxes, increased social spending, and single payer-health care (for more on the group and its leaders, see Organization Trends, March 2013).

The foundation has donated $471,000 to Demos since 2004. Demos is a nonprofit that presses state and federal legislators to increase taxes on the rich, especially on the top 1 percent, and to hike corporate taxes as a strategy to strengthen the middle class. Demos also advocates for “redistribution” through increased transfer payments in Social Security, disability, and Medicare, and through legislating the “Buffet rule” on income taxes and tax credits targeted to the poor. The policy wonks at Demos are unfazed by the fact that the top 2 percent of income earners pay 40 percent of income taxes, the top 6 percent pay 60 percent of the taxes, the top 20 percent pay over 80 percent and about half of all Americans pay no income taxes at all. On the legislative front, Demos works to promote measures to establish same-day voter registration, to block voter ID laws, and to grant felons the right to vote. Demos staff generally favor expanding global governance, e.g., by supporting efforts like the job-killing Kyoto Protocol on carbon dioxide emissions and the UN Millennium Project to cajole rich countries to boost their developmental assistance donations to 0.7 percent of yearly GNP (the current issue of Organization Trends profiles Demos in depth.)

Common Cause, a Soros-funded group that focuses on campaign finance reform, gutting the military to increase welfare and environmental spending, and the "fairness doctrine" that would force privately owned radio stations to take a loss by mandating equal time for liberal talk shows, received $100,000 in 2007 from the Silberstein Foundation. The group continues to disparage the Supreme Court ruling in the Citizens United case. This is because it allows corporations to donate unlimited amounts anonymously to super PACs that advocate on behalf of causes or candidates while barring them from coordinating with campaigns (the May 2014 Organization Trends profiles Common Cause).

Judicial Activism

The Silberstein Foundation has donated $3.45 million to the Alliance for Justice (AfJ) since 2010. AfJ's mission is to promote the appointment and confirmation of liberal judges who practice judicial activism in order to achieve social outcomes, i.e., so-called social justice and equality of results. It also works to block conservative judicial nominees who believe it is possible to discern the original content and principles of the Constitution, who support the Madisonian principle of limited federal government, and who believe in the general principle of justice as equality before the law. The AfJ is best known for assisting in the organized publicity campaign to "bork" Justice Robert Bork's nomination in 1987, for supporting Anita Hill in her attempt to slander Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas during his confirmation hearings in 1991, and for helping to block dozens of President George W. Bush's nominees to the federal bench.

The Silberstein Foundation donated $200,000 in 2002 to the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University and has continued to make five-figure grants to it. The Center is a hotbed of activism for the promotion of the doctrine of the "living" Constitution. It advances the kind of activist jurisprudence that was first outlined in President Woodrow Wilson's "What is Progress?" speech, in which Wilson explicitly subordinates both the individual rights elaborated in the Declaration of Independence and the system of checks and balances in the Constitution, to the criteria of present economic needs and arbitrarily chosen social goals that are deemed vital to the general welfare by government administrators–with or without consent of the duly elected representatives of the people. (Organization Trends profiled the Brennan Center in April 2014.)

Green Energy

The Silberstein Foundation gave $500,000 in 2003, $250,000 in 2007, and occasional five-figure grants thereafter to the Apollo Alliance, an extreme environmentalist group that grew out of the Tides network and the Campaign for America's Future. The group uses the green agenda to mask its push to expand the welfare state and increase government regulation of the economy and civil society. The group claims, "Working with our coalition of labor, business, environmental and community leaders we will reduce carbon emissions and oil imports, spur domestic job growth and position America to thrive in the 21st Century economy."

Apollo Alliance was responsible for drafting the $86 billion green jobs portion of the $787 billion so-called stimulus package known as the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act of 2009. This stimulus didn't manage to stimulate anything, except the $17 trillion national debt, and participation in the labor force remains stuck at its lowest point since the Carter administration. The Left's fantasy of a competitive green energy sector invariably leads either to mass layoffs or a wave of multi-million dollar bankruptcies in green companies like Solyndra, many of which were linked to high-value donors to Obama's 2008 campaign. Heritage Foundation research cites 1,900 waste, fraud, and abuse investigations into all the stimulus energy projects, green or not, with 600 criminal convictions as of Oct. 18, 2012. (For more on the Apollo Alliance, see Green Watch, November 2012.)

Political Activity

The Center for Responsive Politics currently lists Silberstein as number 15 on the list of the top individual donors to "Federally Focused 527 Organizations" in the current election cycle. The $115,000 he has given consists of donations to EMILY's List ($75,000), Emerge America ($20,000), and the Progressive Change Campaign Committee ($20,000). EMILY's List is a group that funds female Democratic political candidates who oppose any and all limits on abortion; the acronym stands for "early money is like yeast."

In 2013, Silberstein donated $100,000 to the House Majority PAC, and gave $32,400 to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, along with $32,400 to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee in 2014. In 2013, he donated $25,000 to the Ready for Hillary PAC, and gave smaller sums to a slew of candidates in 2013-2014, including U.S. Sens. Cory Booker (D-N.J.), Kay Hagan (D-N.C.), and U.S. Rep. Keith Ellison (D-Minn.).

In a manner of speaking, Silberstein has provided his own data on his political giving in the state of California through the agency of the Center for Investigative Reporting (CIR). He has donated $505,000 to the CIR since 2008. The CIR manages the Data Center and produces the CaliforniaWatch.org website, which provides information on political donations in the Golden State.

Silberstein's California donations since 2001 total $1,335,000. About half ($625,000) went to the Democratic Party of California between 2006 and 2011. Gov. Jerry Brown has received donations totaling $29,500 since 2009, while Lt. Gov.

Gavin Newsom received $5,000 in 2010. The far-left Attorney General Kamala Harris has received $11,500 since 2009.

Breaking the Constitution's Electoral Machinery

Perhaps what best reveals Silberstein's political intentions is his significant donation of $500,000 since 2009 to the National Popular Vote Institute and the fact that he, though publicity shy, sits on its board. The Institute is part of the Left's forceful attempt to abolish the Electoral College without amending the U.S. Constitution. The Institute's objective is to achieve direct popular election of the president by establishing an interstate compact between the roughly 11 large states that would be needed for presidential candidates to win 270 electoral votes. The compact, it is believed, would then force the remaining states to comply with the compact without any say in the matter. Not surprisingly, this unconstitutional compact has only been ratified in the state legislatures of the bluest states: California, Hawaii, Illinois, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Washington, along with the District of Columbia.

As Hans von Spakovsky of the Heritage Foundation observes, the compact clearly violates the Compact Clause of the Constitution, which provides, "No State shall, without the Consent of Congress … enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State." He argues the change would lead to narrower margins of victory in presidential elections, decreased presidential legitimacy, more recounts, increased voter fraud, and more frequent electoral litigation. More importantly, candidates would campaign only in large population centers—where, by coincidence, the Left's electoral strength is greatest—leaving small and medium states to have no say in the election of the president.

Spakovsky explains that the Framers of the Constitution didn't establish a national popular vote for president because they wisely wanted to balance power between the federal government, headed by the president, and the state governments. That is why the Framers blended the proportional representation of citizens and the direct representation of states in the Electoral College, which assigns each state electors equal to the number of representatives and senators it has in Congress.

The Left's campaign for a national popular vote is an attempt to let a majority faction utterly dominate the sovereignty of the individual states and the rights of minorities, and thus to transform the American polity from a representative republic into a direct democracy under a centralized administrative state.

Conclusion

The philanthropic and political donations of the Stephen M. Silberstein Foundation demonstrate how one significant member of George Soros's Democracy Alliance understands the four stated goals of this secretive organization. This will allow us to decode the group's leftist Orwellian doublespeak.

To judge from the Silberstein Foundation's spending patterns, "an opportunity-driven economy" means bankrolling think tanks like Center for American Progress and Demos that support higher taxes on the rich, schemes of wealth redistribution, single-payer socialized medicine, and unduly burdensome regulatory control of energy markets designed to kill the coal industry (and natural gas next). "A dignity-based foreign policy" entails supporting Media Matters' Correct the Record campaign to obfuscate the findings of the House select committee on the cover-up of the Benghazi attack, leaving the families of four dead Americans without justice and the American public without an explanation.

It appears from the foundation's support for the Alliance for Justice and the Brennan Center, that in its view "an independent judiciary" means adopting a jurisprudence based on the concept of "the living Constitution," according to which the nation's founding principles and the Constitution's system of checks and balances are outdated and optional unless they can be harnessed to achieve "the common task and purpose" of the evolving social organism. In this view, the Constitution just means whatever judges claim is in the economic or social interest of the country. The radically egalitarian goal is to invoke the General Welfare Clause and the rhetoric of the common good in order to legitimate government regulation of markets, social institutions, and individual freedoms. Traditional due process is to be replaced by what leftist scholars euphemistically call "substantive due process."

Lastly, supporting "an open, vibrant democracy" means bankrolling the national popular vote movement in order to do away with federalism and the legitimate authority of the states. The national popular vote is an unconstitutional attempt by the Left to transform America from a representative republic into a direct democracy that fits the original ancient Greek notion of democracy, i.e., demokrateia meaning mob rule, as opposed to a politeia which enjoys constitutional government. For populist demagogy and undiluted majoritarianism are the only means by which the Left can complete the assimilation of the state governments into an all-encompassing socialized state along the lines of European social democracies.

It is not surprising that a member of George Soros's Democracy Alliance runs a foundation that backs the full spectrum of leftist groups striving to implement extreme Keynesian spending and regulatory policies, to pervert the original meaning and manifest tenor of the Constitution, and to exploit a national popular vote as an extra-constitutional means to secure permanent Democratic Party control of the presidency. Stephen M. Silberstein has joined the ranks of the

Rivlin: Israel has 'Right' to Settle in West Bank

President Reuven Rivlin said during talks with settler leaders on Monday that Israel had a "right" to build settlements in the West Bank, his office said in a statement. "I love the land of Israel with all my heart. I have never and will never give up on this land. For me, our right to this land is not a matter of political debate. It is a basic fact of modern Zionism," Rivlin said. For Rivlin the "land of Israel" includes the West Bank, where Jewish settlements are considered illegal under international law. "We must not give anyone the sense that we are in any doubt about our right to our land. For me, the settlement of the land of Israel is an expression of that right, our historical right, our national right."

Obama Poised to Avoid Need for Iran Veto Altogether

US President Barack Obama has won the backing of a fresh clutch of senators for his Iran deal, raising the prospect he could yet dodge a humiliating legislative rebuke. For months, Republicans and rebellious Democrats have looked on course to pass a resolution against the nuclear deal, a stinging rejection of a central Obama foreign policy goal. But, with 15 Senate Democrats backing the deal in as many days — including Senate minority leader Harry Reid and Michigan's Debbie Stabenow on Monday — the White House may dodge a political bullet.

Hammond: Iran Genuinely Seeks to 'Turn a Page'

British Foreign Secretary Philip Hammond said Monday he believed in Iranian's genuine desire to "turn a page" with the West and develop better ties, the Telegraph reported. Hammond spoke at the end of a two-day visit to Tehran and a meeting with Iranian President Hassan Rouhani to mark the reopening of the two nations' respective embassies after a break of several years. While he stressed that the countries' relations remained complex and difficult, he said Iran as a regional power was too important to ignore on Middle East issues. "It's hard to see what is the point of advocating dialog with someone who you know has a very different view of the world from you, unless you are anticipating some give and take," he said.

U.S. Judge Orders PA to Post $10m in Terror Case

A U.S. judge ordered the Palestinian Authority and Palestine Liberation Organization on Monday to post $10 million in cash or bond while they appeal a jury's finding that they supported militant attacks in Israel. At a court hearing in Manhattan, U.S. District Judge George Daniels in Manhattan said the defendants must also deposit $1 million each month pending the appeal of a February jury verdict worth $655 million in favor of 10 American families. The order came after the Obama administration took the unusual step of urging Daniels to "carefully consider" the Palestinian Authority's financial condition, saying too high a bond could compromise its ability to function.

Settlers Take EU to Court for Funding Pal. Building

Settlers on Monday asked the High Court of Justice to order the demolition of 15 Palestinian homes in Area C of the West Bank, which they say are illegal and funded by the EU. The modular structures with cement floors located within the boundaries of the Kfar Adumim settlement were built in 2015 and house Palestinian Beduin. The settlement and the non-governmental group Regavim, which monitors illegal Palestinian building, are the co-petitioners. They asked the state to force the Civil Administration to remove the structures, which they said were built illegally on state land. They presented photos of the structures, which have signs on the walls with the EU logo. The petition comes as the international community, including the EU and the US, is pressuring Israel not to demolish illegal Palestinian buildings.

Barak: Netanyahu Resisted Shalit Deal

A tape released Monday revealed former defense minister Ehud Barak's criticism of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's handling of the Gilad Shalit case. In the recording, which was aired by Israel's Channel 2 News, Barak was heard saying that the prime minister consistently opposed the deal that could bring Shalit home from captivity. According to Barak, once Shalit had been released in 2012, the most important thing to the prime minister was getting the first photo with the formerly imprisoned soldier. "His office sent teams to organize it and everything was directed towards one thing: For the picture to be the first picture when the kid (Shalit) comes down and for him to be with only Bibi in the frame." Barak continued criticizing Netanyahu in the recording. "Bibi strongly feels that it's really the picture, the word, that's more important than the actual deed."

Israel 'Very Interested' in Relations with Kurds

News published in the Financial Times on Sunday that Israel imports most of its oil from Iraq's Kurdish areas came as no shock to those following the secretive Israel-Kurd relationship. "The news is not so surprising, as it has been going on for some time," Prof. Ofra Bengio, editor of the book Kurdish Awakening: Nation-Building in a Fragmented Homeland, told The Jerusalem Post on Monday. "The Kurds do not want problems with Baghdad or Tehran, so they prefer to stay quiet about it and not upset anybody," said Bengio.

Girl Breaks 2,000-year-old Vase, Museum: Thanks

A little girl accidently broke a 2,000-year-old glass vessel during a visit to the Israel Museum on Sunday. The museum said the object has now been repaired and is in better shape than it was before. According to a museum employee, the little girl clung to the glass case or rocked it and as a result, the glass object fell inside the case and broke along the old crack. The museum removed the object and received permission from the collection's owners to repair it in its laboratory. "It would require a great effort to notice the crack with the naked eye," the museum said.

The Iran Strike that Never Was

Ehud Barak's interview outtakes shown on Channel 2 News tell a skewed version of what happened when the government decided to avoid striking Iran's nuclear sites.

By Nahum Barnea

Meir Dagan, Yuval Diskin, Gabi Ashkenazi, Benny Gantz, Gadi Eisenkot, Amir Eshel, Aviv Kochavi, Tamir Pardo, Dan Meridor, Benny Begin, Yuval Steinitz, Moshe Ya'alon - these are the real Israeli patriots when it comes to attacking Iran's nuclear sites, attacks that did not happen.

Plans of attack were discussed three times: In 2010, 2011, and 2013. Allegedly, the top three members of government urged the approval of these plans with all the vigor they could muster. I say "allegedly" because the members in question are Benjamin Netanyahu, Ehud Barak, and Avigdor Lieberman, three men for whom "allegedly" is practically a middle name.

The discussions focused on two questions, one obvious and one crucial. The obvious question was what Barak calls "operational readiness" – can the IDF significantly damage the nuclear sites and bring its pilots back home safely. The crucial question was what is it good for, what will the results of the strike be if it's successful, what will be the impact on the Iranian nuclear program, what will happen to the Middle East.

The interview outtakes of Ehud Barak speaking to Ilan Kfir and Danny Dor, two journalists who have written a new biography of him, which were recently aired on Channel 2 News, focus on the less crucial first question.

Those who hear the outtakes might come to three conclusions: First, that there was some patent, a magic wand, a brilliant operation with which a single blow could have been landed and with it destroy an existential threat to Israel. Second, that there were three brave ministers, determined spirits with the will to take action, but a group of cowardly politicians prevented them from doing so. And third, that among these three was an internal division: Barak was trying his hardest to get the operation greenlit, Lieberman didn't do very much, and Netanyahu failed as a leader.

Wrong, wrong, wrong.

The main point raised against an attack on Iran was that it would do more harm than good: The moment Israel attacked, Iran would have been free to push its nuclear program forward at full force while claiming self-defense. In two years, at the most, it would have manufactured its first bomb. Had we attacked in 2010, Iran would have been nuclear in 2013; had we attacked in 2013, it would have been nuclear today, without binding agreements or international oversight.

The Israeli strike could have borne fruit only if it had dragged the United States into war. Israel attacks, Iran retaliates harshly against the Israeli populace, the US is forced to stand with its ally and commit its full military power. The participants in the discussions that took place had to suspect that this was Netanyahu and Barak's real goal, that this was the gamble. Otherwise, the Israeli attack had no purpose.

The Israeli tail wanted to wag the American dog and start a regional war, one whose end was unknown. If Churchill could recruit Roosevelt into the fight against Hitler, Netanyahu will force Obama into fighting Khamenei. But Obama isn't Roosevelt, Netanyahu isn't Churchill, and Khamenei isn't Hitler. It's all talk.

The heads of the defense establishment who participated in the discussions didn't want to be seen as cowards. Therefore, they supported spending billions on purchases and training meant to bring the IDF to full operational preparedness. A large part of this investment went down the drain. We can take comfort in the fact that knowledge of the preparations for a possible Israeli attack contributed somewhat to the severity of the sanctions imposed on Iran.

Barak is a dangerous kind of person to drive behind. The kind who might signal left, turn the steering wheel in that direction, and still turn right in the end, or the other way around. It's doubtful whether we'll ever know if he really wanted military action, or if he hoped that Netanyahu would back out in the last moment and save him from being responsible for a catastrophe.

The prime minister holds a crucial role in this kind of decision. Ben-Gurion passed every important decision he supported through government votes during the 1948 Independence War, including the decisions on the Altalena Affair and the dissolution of the Palmach. On one decision, a majority of ministers voted "no": Conquering Mount Hebron. They saw that the prime minister was ambivalent. Ben-Gurion would go on to accuse his government of creating an "endless tragedy," but the ministers knew the truth.

When all the defense chiefs oppose a military operation, the prime minister knows that if it fails, he won't have anyone to share the blame. Everything will land in his lap. Menachem Begin took that risk when he chose to strike Iraq's nuclear reactor. He gambled and won.

It's easier to overcome opposition by ministers. When Netanyahu can't convince Steinitz, there's no escaping this conclusion: Either Steinitz is, deep down, very conniving – Che Guevara Steinitz – or Netanyahu, influenced by his own motivations, didn't really try.

I Saw Hamas' Cruel and Selfish Game in Gaza

By Wojciech Cegielski

I spent a month in Gaza during Operation Protective Edge. It was one of the worst and deadliest months I have seen in my life. The reality there was much more complicated than was seen from a safe distance in Europe or the United States.

Yes, Israel bombed Palestinian houses in Gaza. But Hamas is also to blame for its cruel and selfish game against its own people. I do not have hard evidence, but for me, spending a month in the middle of this hell, it was obvious that they were breaking international rules of war and worst of all, were not afraid to use their own citizens as living shields.

The first incident happened late in the evening. I was in the bathroom when I've heard a loud rocket noise and my Spanish colleague, a journalist who was renting a flat with me near the Gaza beach, started to scream. He wanted to light a cigarette and came to one of the open windows. The moment he was using his lighter, he saw a fireball in front of his eyes and lost his hearing.

From what our neighbors told us later, a man drove up in a pickup to our tiny street. He placed a rocket launcher outside and fired. But the rocket failed to go upwards and flew along the street at ground level for a long time before destroying a building. It was a miracle that nobody was hurt or killed.

When we calmed down, we started to analyze the situation. It became obvious that the man or his supervisor wanted the Israel Defense Forces to destroy civilian houses, which our tiny street was full of. Whoever it was, Hamas, Iz al-Din al-Qassam or others, they knew that the IDF can strike back at the same place from which the rocket was fired. Fortunately for us, the rocket missed its target in Israel.

The second story happened in the middle of the day. I was sitting with other journalists in a cafe outside one of the hotels near the beach. During wartime, these hotels are occupied by foreign press and some NGOs. Every hotel is full and in its cafes many journalists spend their time discussing, writing, editing stories or just recharging the phones. Suddenly I saw a man firing a rocket from between the hotels. It was obvious that we journalists became a target. If the IDF would strike back, we all would be dead. What would Hamas do? It would not be surprising to hear about the "cruel Zionist regime killing innocent and free press."

For me, provoking is also creating living shields.

While I was interviewing people on the streets of Gaza, I couldn't meet anyone who spoke something other than official propaganda. But some Palestinians, when they were sure my microphone was turned off, told me they have had enough but they are afraid. No one would dare to say publicly that Hamas is creating a hell inside Gaza. But they were also asking "what if not Hamas?" The Palestinian Authority government would have no authority there. So if not Hamas, they say, there could be somebody much worse. "The choice is between evil and evil plus," one of them said.The reality is much more complicated than can be seen from a distance.

McCain: By 2013 "The Iraq War has Been Won" (FNC 05/15/08 10:00am)
JOHN MCCAIN: By January 2013, America has welcomed home most of the servicemen and women who have sacrificed terribly so that America might be secure in her freedom. The Iraq War has been won. Iraq is a functioning democracy, although still suffering from the lingering effects of decades of tyranny and centuries of sectarian tension. Violence still occurs, but it is spasmodic and much reduced. Civil war has been prevented; militias disbanded; the Iraqi Security Force is professional and competent; al Qaeda in Iraq has been defeated; and the Government of Iraq is capable of imposing its authority in every province of Iraq and defending the integrity of its borders. The United States maintains a military presence there, but a much smaller one, and it does not play a direct combat role.

The threat from a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan has been greatly reduced but not eliminated. U.S. and NATO forces remain there to help finish the job, and continue operations against the remnants of al Qaeda. The Government of Pakistan has cooperated with the U.S. in successfully adapting the counterinsurgency tactics that worked so well in Iraq and Afghanistan to its lawless tribal areas where al Qaeda fighters are based. The increase in actionable intelligence that the counterinsurgency produced led to the capture or death of Osama bin Laden, and his chief lieutenants. There is no longer any place in the world al Qaeda can consider a safe haven.

Full Clip and Transcript of McCain Speech (FNC 05/15/08 10:00am)
Thank you. The hectic but repetitive routine of presidential campaigns often seems to consist entirely of back and forth charges between candidates, punctuated by photo ops, debates and the occasional policy speech, followed by another barrage of accusations and counter accusations, formulated into the soundbites preferred by cable news producers. It is a little hypocritical for candidates or reporters to criticize these deficiencies. They are our creation. Campaigns and the media collaborated as architects of the modern presidential campaign, and we deserve equal blame for the regret we feel from time to time over its less than inspirational features.

Voters, however, even in this revolutionary communications age, with its 24 hour news cycle, can be forgiven their uncertainty about what the candidates actually hope to achieve if they have the extraordinary privilege of being elected President of the United States. We spend too little time and offer too few specifics on that most important of questions. We make promises, of course, about what kind of policies we would pursue in office. But they often are obscured, mischaracterized and forgotten in the heat and fog of political battle.

Next January, the political leadership of the United States will change significantly. It is important that the candidates who seek to lead the country after the Bush Administration define their objectives and what they plan to achieve not with vague language but with clarity.

So, what I want to do today is take a little time to describe what I would hope to have achieved at the end of my first term as President. I cannot guarantee I will have achieved these things. I am presumptuous enough to think I would be a good President, but not so much that I believe I can govern by command. Should I forget that, Congress will, of course, hasten to remind me. The following are conditions I intend to achieve. And toward that end, I will focus all the powers of the office; every skill and strength I possess; and seize every opportunity to work with members of Congress who put the national interest ahead of partisanship, and any country in the world that shares our hopes for a more peaceful and prosperous world.

By January 2013, America has welcomed home most of the servicemen and women who have sacrificed terribly so that America might be secure in her freedom. The Iraq War has been won. Iraq is a functioning democracy, although still suffering from the lingering effects of decades of tyranny and centuries of sectarian tension. Violence still occurs, but it is spasmodic and much reduced. Civil war has been prevented; militias disbanded; the Iraqi Security Force is professional and competent; al Qaeda in Iraq has been defeated; and the Government of Iraq is capable of imposing its authority in every province of Iraq and defending the integrity of its borders. The United States maintains a military presence there, but a much smaller one, and it does not play a direct combat role.

The threat from a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan has been greatly reduced but not eliminated. U.S. and NATO forces remain there to help finish the job, and continue operations against the remnants of al Qaeda. The Government of Pakistan has cooperated with the U.S. in successfully adapting the counterinsurgency tactics that worked so well in Iraq and Afghanistan to its lawless tribal areas where al Qaeda fighters are based. The increase in actionable intelligence that the counterinsurgency produced led to the capture or death of Osama bin Laden, and his chief lieutenants. There is no longer any place in the world al Qaeda can consider a safe haven. Increased cooperation between the United States and its allies in the concerted use of military, diplomatic, and economic power and reforms in the intelligence capabilities of the United States has disrupted terrorist networks and exposed plots around the world. There still has not been a major terrorist attack in the United States since September 11, 2001.

The United States and its allies have made great progress in advancing nuclear security. Concerted action by the great democracies of the world has persuaded a reluctant Russia and China to cooperate in pressuring Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions, and North Korea to discontinue its own. The single greatest threat facing the West -- the prospect of nuclear materials in the hands of terrorists -- has been vastly diminished.

The size of the Army and Marine Corps has been significantly increased, and are now better equipped and trained to defend us. Long overdue reforms to the way we acquire weapons programs, including fixed price contracts, have created sufficient savings to pay for a larger military. A substantial increase in veterans educational benefits and improvements in their health care has aided recruitment and retention. The strain on the National Guard and reserve forces has been relieved.

After efforts to pressure the Government in Sudan over Darfur failed again in the U.N. Security Council, the United States, acting in concert with a newly formed League of Democracies, applied stiff diplomatic and economic pressure that caused the government of Sudan to agree to a multinational peacekeeping force, with NATO countries providing logistical and air support, to stop the genocide that had made a mockery of the world's repeated declaration that we would "never again" tolerant such inhumanity. Encouraged by the success, the League is now occupied with using the economic power and prestige of its member states to end other gross abuses of human rights such as the despicable crime of human trafficking.

The United States has experienced several years of robust economic growth, and Americans again have confidence in their economic future. A reduction in the corporate tax rate from the second highest in the world to one on par with our trading partners; the low rate on capital gains; allowing business to deduct in a single year investments in equipment and technology, while eliminating tax loopholes and ending corporate welfare, have spurred innovation and productivity, and encouraged companies to keep their operations and jobs in the United States. The Alternate Minimum Tax is being phased out, with relief provided first to middle income families. Doubling the size of the child exemption has put more disposable income in the hands of taxpayers, further stimulating growth.

Congress has just passed by a single up or down vote a tax reform proposal that offers Americans a choice of continuing to file under the rules of the current complicated and burdensome tax code or use a new, simpler, fairer and flatter tax, with two rates and a generous deduction. Millions of taxpayers are expected to file under the flat tax, and save billions in the cost of preparing their returns.

After exercising my veto several times in my first year in office, Congress has not sent me an appropriations bill containing earmarks for the last three years. A top to bottom review of every federal bureaucracy has yielded great reductions in government spending by identifying programs that serve no important purpose; and instigating far reaching reforms of procurement and operating policies that have for too long extravagantly wasted money for no better purpose than to increase federal payrolls.

New free trade agreements have been ratified and led to substantial increases in both exports and imports. The resulting growth in prosperity in countries from South America to Asia to Africa has greatly strengthened America's security and the global progress of our political ideals. U.S. tariffs on agricultural imports have been eliminated and unneeded farm subsidies are being phased out. The world food crisis has ended, inflation is low, and the quality of life not only in our country, but in some of the most impoverished countries around the world is much improved.

Americans, who through no fault of their own, lost jobs in the global economy they once believed were theirs for life, are assisted by reformed unemployment insurance and worker retraining programs. Older workers who accept lower paying jobs while they acquire new skills are provided assistance to make up a good part of the income they have lost. Community colleges and technical schools all over the country have developed worker retraining programs suited to the specific economic opportunities available in their communities and are helping millions of workers who have lost a job that won't come back find a new one that won't go away.

Public education in the United States is much improved thanks to the competition provided by charter and private schools; the increase of quality teachers through incentives like merit pay and terrific programs that attract to the classroom enthusiastic and innovative teachers from many disciplines, like Teach for America and Troops to Teachers. Educational software and online teaching programs endorsed by qualified non profits are much more widely in use, bringing to the smallest classrooms in America some of the greatest math, English, and science teachers in the country. This revolution in teaching methods has especially benefited rural America. Test scores and graduation rates are rising everywhere in the country.

Health care has become more accessible to more Americans than at any other time in history. Reforms of the insurance market; putting the choice of health care into the hands of American families rather than exclusively with the government or employers; walk in clinics as alternatives to emergency room care; paying for outcome in the treatment of disease rather than individual procedures; and competition in the prescription drug market have begun to wring out the runaway inflation once endemic in our health care system. More small businesses offer their employees health plans. Schools have greatly improved their emphasis on physical education and nutritional content of meals offered in school cafeterias. Obesity rates among the young and the disease they engender are stabilized and beginning to decline. The federal government and states have cooperated in establishing backstop insurance pools that provide coverage to people hard pressed to find insurance elsewhere because of pre-existing illness.

The reduction in the growth of health care costs has begun to relieve some of the pressure on Medicare; encouraging Congress to act in a bipartisan way to extend its solvency for twenty-five years without increasing taxes and raising premiums only for upper income seniors. Their success encouraged a group of congressional leaders from both parties to work with my administration to fix Social Security as well, without reducing benefits to those near retirement. The reforms include some form of personal retirement accounts in safe and reliable index funds, such as have been available to government employees since their retirement plans were made solvent a quarter century ago.

Part Two:
The United States is well on the way to independence from foreign sources of oil; progress that has not only begun to alleviate the environmental threat posed from climate change, but has greatly improved our security as well. A cap and trade system has been implemented, spurring great innovation in the development of green technologies and alternative energy sources. Clean coal technology has advanced considerably with federal assistance. Construction has begun on twenty new nuclear reactors thanks to improved incentives and a streamlined regulatory process.

Scores of judges have been confirmed to the federal district and appellate courts, including the U.S. Supreme Court, who understand that they were not sent there to write our laws but to enforce them and make sure they are consistent with the Constitution. They are judges of exceptional character and quality, who enforce and do not make laws, and who respect the values of the people whose rights, laws and property they are sworn to defend.

Border state governors have certified and the American people recognize that after tremendous improvements to border security infrastructure and increases in the border patrol, and vigorous prosecution of companies that employ illegal aliens, our southern border is now secure. Illegal immigrants who broke our laws after they came here have been arrested and deported. Illegal immigration has been finally brought under control, and the American people accepted the practical necessity to institute a temporary worker program and deal humanely with the millions of immigrants who have been in this country illegally.

Voluntary national service has grown in popularity in part because of the educational benefits used as incentives, as well as frequent appeals from the bully pulpit of the White House, but mostly because the young Americans, no less than earlier generations, understand that true happiness is much greater than the pursuit of pleasure, and can only be found by serving causes greater than self-interest. Scores of accomplished private sector leaders have joined the ranks of my administration for a dollar a year and have instituted some of the most innovative reforms of government programs ever known, often in partnership with willing private sector partners. A sense of community, a kinship of ideals, has invigorated public service again.

This is the progress I want us to achieve during my presidency. These are the changes I am running for President to make. I want to leave office knowing that America is safer, freer, and wealthier than when I was elected; that more Americans have more opportunities to pursue their dreams than at any other time in our history; that the world has become less threatening to our interests and more hospitable to our values; and that America has again, as she always has, chosen not to hide from history but to make history.

I am well aware I cannot make any of these changes alone. The powers of the presidency are rightly checked by the other branches of government, and I will not attempt to acquire powers our founders saw fit to grant Congress. I will exercise my veto if I believe legislation passed by Congress is not in the nation's best interests, but I will not subvert the purpose of legislation I have signed by making statements that indicate I will enforce only the parts of it I like. I will respect the responsibilities the Constitution and the American people have granted Congress, and will, as I often have in the past, work with anyone of either party to get things done for our country.

For too long, now, Washington has been consumed by a hyper-partisanship that treats every serious challenge facing us as an opportunity to trade insults; disparage each other's motives; and fight about the next election. For all the problems we face, if you ask Americans what frustrates them most about Washington, they will tell you they don't think we're capable of serving the public interest before our personal and partisan ambitions; that we fight for ourselves and not for them. Americans are sick of it, and they have every right to be. They are sick of the politics of selfishness, stalemate and delay. They despair when every election -- no matter who wins -- always seems to produce four more years of unkept promises and a government that is just a battleground for the next election. Their patience is at an end for politicians who value ambition over principle, and for partisanship that is less a contest of ide as than an uncivil brawl over the spoils of power. They want to change not only the policies and institutions that have failed the American people, but the political culture that produced them. They want to move this country forward and stake our claim on this century as we did in the last. And they want their government to care more about them than preserving the privileges of the powerful.

There are serious issues at stake in this election, and serious differences between the candidates. And we will argue about them, as we should. But it should remain an argument among friends; each of us struggling to hear our conscience, and heed its demands; each of us, despite our differences, united in our great cause, and respectful of the goodness in each other. That is how most Americans treat each other. And it is how they want the people they elect to office to treat each other.

If I am elected President, I will work with anyone who sincerely wants to get this country moving again. I will listen to any idea that is offered in good faith and intended to help solve our problems, not make them worse. I will seek the counsel of members of Congress from both parties in forming government policy before I ask them to support it. I will ask Democrats to serve in my administration. My administration will set a new standard for transparency and accountability. I will hold weekly press conferences. I will regularly brief the American people on the progress our policies have made and the setbacks we have encountered. When we make errors, I will confess them readily, and explain what we intend to do to correct them. I will ask Congress to grant me the privilege of coming before both houses to take questions, and address criticism, much the same as the Prime Minister of Great Britain appears regularly before the House of Commons.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We cannot again leave our problems for another unluckier generation of Americans to fix after they have become even harder to solve. I'm not interested in partisanship that serves no other purpose than to gain a temporary advantage over our opponents. This mindless, paralyzing rancor must come to an end. We belong to different parties, not different countries. We are rivals for the same power. But we are also compatriots. We are fellow Americans, and that shared distinction means more to me than any other association. I intend to prove myself worthy of the office; of our country; and of your respect. I won't judge myself by how many elections I've won. I won't spend one hour of my presidency worrying more about my re-election than keeping my promises to the American people. There is a time to campaign, and a time to govern. If I'm elected President, the era of the permanent campaign will end. The era of problem solving will begin. I promise you, from the day I am sworn into office until the last hour of my presidency, I will work with anyone, of either party, to make this country safe, prosperous and proud. And I won't care who gets the credit.

Thank you.

President Bush Attacks Barack Obama's Diplomatic Vision as "the False Comfort of Appeasement" (FNC 05/15/08 8:59am)

STEVE DOOCY: […] The President of the United States has been addressing the Israeli Parliament, the Knessy, and he took a shot at Barack Obama. Listen to this.

GEORGE W. BUSH: Some seem to believe that we should negotiate with terrorists and radicals, as if some ingenious argument will persuade them they have been wrong all along. We have heard this foolish delusion before. As Nazi tanks crossed into Poland in 1939, an American Senator declared: 'Lord, if only I could have talked to Hitler, all of this might have been avoided.' We have an obligation to call this what it is -- the false comfort of appeasement, which has been repeatedly discredited by history.

BRIAN KILMEADE: Now we do have a response from Barack Obama's camp and here it is, you are about to see it in front of you.

ROBERT GIBBS: Why would the President go halfway around the world to make a political attack instead of congratulating Israel on its 60th anniversary?

DOOCY: Yeah and so that officially why he was there, but he did take aim at Barack Obama. Now remember, we were talking a little about Hamas and Barack Obama earlier in the week because John McCain had said at one point that Hamas would like to see Barack Obama as President of the United States because a Hamas spokesperson had actually said that 'we like Barack Obama, he would make a good President.' So John McCain was being factual and just essentially reporting the facts so it is in the bloodstream this week.

CNN: President Bush "Unusual" Attack on Obama Helping "To Push John McCain and His Message" (FNC 05/15/08 8:30am)

KIRAN CHENTRY: This is really unusual to see this coming from the President right now. He's basically stayed out of making any political comments with regard to the candidates. What do you make of this?

SUZANNE MALVEAUX: It's not only unusual Kiran, the fact that he's saying this. But it's also unusual that it's coming from overseas, that he is making the statement in Israel itself. It's one of the indications that this is gonna be a real sensitive and important topic in the campaign. John McCain and if Barack Obama in fact becomes the nominee, the subject of Israel, Middle East peace, all of that. And President Bush under a great deal of pressure himself. As you know, he made this one of his goals of his administration, to bring Middle East Peace. And it's been something that has been a source of frustration for his own administration. So that is one thing that is kind of the backdrop. And its also another thing, Barack Obama has consistently been talking about reaching out to these leaders that President Bush has refused to talk to, has refused to reach out too. This is a very very different approach to National Security, to diplomacy [...] So this at the core of what he's running for, and it's very much against what John McCain has been talking about and how they approach these leaders. So it's clear that President Bush is already, he's trying to push John McCain and his message and obviously trying to push the administration's approach here.

Bash: This "Fits Together Nicely" with the McCain Campaign Strategy (CNN 05/15/08 8:40am)

JOHN ROBERTS It's surprising the forum in which he said it, not surprising that the Republican Party is trying to cast doubt among Jewish American voters on Senator Barack Obama and the policies he would pursue [...] Dana this really falls out of what the McCain campaign was hitting Barack Obama on, not too long ago when one of his aides had met with a leader of Hamas. That aide has since been dismissed from the campaign. But John McCain certainly went after Barack Obama pretty hard on this issue of he is the candidate that Hamas would like to see win the White House. How does this all fit together?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DANA BASH: It fits together really nicely with the McCain campaign strategy. Not just some of the things that Senator McCain himself and other aides have been saying, but more importantly John the kind of campaign they are planning on, that they are working on behind the scenes to work on and run against Barack Obama. It doesn't seem to be much of an accident here [...] So it is very similar to the kind of thing that you heard President Bush do not so subtly [...] What is striking isn't necessarily just that President Bush said this kind of thing and dove into the presidential campaign here in the United States, but the fact that he did it abroad and it did it in the Middle East, it's pretty striking John.

JOHN ROBERTS: Yeah, I mean, Dana you spent a tremendous amount of time working at the White House too as a White House correspondent, like Suzanne. President Bush, every time we would ask him about politics, he would say, 'ay, you're trying to drag me into the presidential race. I don't wanna go there.' I mean he lept in with both feet there and as you said, in a foreign country. That's highly unusual.

DANA BASH: Exactly and look, you know I've spoken, as I'm sure you have, cause you covered the White House John, spoken to several people frankly, who are so close to the President who left who do talk to him frequently about politics because President Bush is a political animal as much, or as more, as anybody who is currently running for President. And he is really has been chomping at the bit to get into involved in this, particularly when it comes to foreign policy, particularly when it comes to Barack Obama. People who have talked to the President who I've spoken to say that he really is frustrated with the idea that Barack Obama, for example, had suggested, even suggested that he would sit down with somebody like Ahmadinejad. That clearly came out in a really an unbelievable way, again, while sitting in the Middle East. Something that we haven't heard in that kind of way publicly, but certainly privately, we understand, that is something he has felt for some time.

BASH: You know Senator McCain and his campaign understand that this hasn't been a time where he has gotten a lot of attention because of the enormous attention going to the Democratic race. But what he is trying to do in this speech is say, 'it's 2013, my first term is over, and this is the kind of change that I will have enacted in my first term.' Very much, indirectly, but not so subtly, making the case that Barack Obama talks about change but here is how I'm gonna do it. And he really does tick off across the board of things he wants to do […]

Obama Camp Hits Back, Calls this "Unprecedented Attack" Ironic Because Bush's Own Secretary of Defense Has Begun to Engage Iranians (FNC 05/15/08 10:45am)
TOM DASCHLE: Well, I'm shocked and I'm actually very very saddened by what the President has done. This is actually an unprecedented political attack. He doesn't have to use names to know exactly what he's trying to do. We've never seen a President do that before. And I think the ironic thing is that his own Secretary of Defense just in the last couple of weeks has done exactly what Barack Obama has called for and that is to engage with the Iranians. He himself has said that so he probably ought to start by firing his Secretary of Defense if he takes offense at the positions that Barack has made here. I think the most important thing here is to underscore the extraordinary failure of this Administration when it comes to Iran. They are a lot more influential than they were 8 years ago. Their nuclear proliferation program, their nuclear program has expanded and so the very failures he has been unable to address are the ones now he is trying to blame others for so this is something we're ready for. We're gonna engage in this debate. And it's really too bad that in this day, at this point that to celebrate the 60th anniversary of Israel this way is uncalled for and is very very disappointing.

The Catholic League's Bill Donohue Forgives Pastor Hagee Calling Him "A Man of Great Courage" (FNC 05/15/08 6:50am)
STEVE DOOCY: Televangelist John Hagee, who supports John McCain, has faced a firestorm of criticism for his anti-Catholic rhetoric. Now Hagee has written an apology to Catholic League President Bill Donohue.

ALLIYSON CAMEROTA: And let's get a reaction from Bill Donohue, who joins us now in the studio. Just to remind people, he has said very offensive things about Catholics. He said that Hitler learned his sort of mindset from the Catholic Church. He also called the Catholic Church the 'great prostitute', but he used an even more offensive term. He has since apologized to the Catholic League and you've accepted it. Do you really think he's had a change of heart?

BILL DONOHUE:I do because I knew that something was in the work for about five, six weeks. There are number of people in Washington in particular, Catholics as well as evangelicals, who have been sitting down with him trying to bring him up to speed. The Catholic Church has had some ugly moments with Jews, but don't blame us for the Holocaust, ok? He took the dark side, the black legends that have been sold about the Catholic Church and he swallowed it. But people have been talking to him one-on-one, introducing him to certain books which I've recommended myself. And I'll tell you what, this man is a man of courage, as far as I'm concerned. He has given us a public statement of regret, which is very thorough, very complete, touched on all the right areas that I wanted him too. I didn't get one of these 'Well, I'm sorry if you were offended but.' So I commend him for turning the corner on this.

DOOCY: That's a big corner.

DONOHUE: Yes it is because I wrote to him in 1997 about some problems I had with him. But you know I mean there are people who have a readiness to accept the worst about certain peoples but the guy got an education. And he didn't have to do this. He didn't have to be as thorough as he has. I'm in the business of reconciliation too. So as far as I'm concerned this issue is over.

BRIAN KILMEADE: And Bill, do you think, what are you going to be listening for today? Or is this going to be just a formal press conference?

DONOHUE: Well you know I've been asked to meet with Pastor Hagee on a number of occasions. I've said no. The reason I've said no is that I wanted a public statement first that was very complete. I got it, now I'm gonna meet with him in my office this afternoon. He doesn't want any press, I don't care about press as you know. But that's ok, we're just gonna meet together, shake hands and maybe we can come together on issues we have in common.

Donohue Attacks Obama, Says He Supported "Infanticide" Bill in Illinois State Legislature (FNC 05/15/08 6:50am)
ALLIYSON CAMEROTA: And you also called up John McCain to repudiate things that Hagee had said, 'cause Hagee had endorsed John McCain, much in the same way that Barack Obama has recently repudiated things that his controversial Pastor has said. Is that over now?

BILL DONOHUE: Oh yeah. That's been over for some time. McCain, at first, I thought his statement on Hagee was a little bit tepid but then he came forth, very forthrightly. So he buried that hatchet a long time ago. This monkey is off of McCain's back. In the case of Wright and Obama, I'll let the public decide that.

STEVE DOOCY: So you've had a bone to pick with Pastor Hagee, who's a supporter of John McCain. Now you got a problem with Barack Obama and this is historical.

DONOHUE: Well I think Catholics gonna now turn their attention to what happened when he was in the state senate. I want to say this very delicately. When he was in the state senate Barack Obama worked hard against a bill that would provide health care for a baby who survived an abortion. That's exactly, this is called 'selective infanticide.' Now the late Daniel Patrick Monihand and our mayor of New York City, Ed Koch, both said they're pro-choice but when it comes to partial-birth, count me out. We're not talking about partial-birth, we're talking about infanticide. The baby is born and he says do not attend to the baby. There's been a media cover up on this, and I want Catholics and my friends in the evangelical community and Orthodox Jews and others who care about life, as well as all Americans. I can't imagine too many people, even if you're pro-choice, wanting to support a situation where a child is on the doctor's table and you say don't attend to the baby. Where's the discussion on this?

Robert Gibbs: John McCain Last Year Voted with Bush 95% of the Time (MSNBC 05/15/08
ROBERT GIBBS: I think one of the things independents are gonna have to think about in this election is, in this last year, John McCain voted 95% of the time with the George Bush Administration. I don't many people that work outside of the White House, or John McCain, that believe that George Bush was right 95% of the time last year. […]

Governor Charlie Crist Touts McCain's Bipartisanship and Green Credentials (FNC 05/15/08 7:50am)
BRIAN KILMEADE: Governor, when John McCain said Global Warming is my number one priority a lot of conservatives passed out. Is that pandering to the left?

CHARLIE CRIST: No, it's doing the right thing. You know, we're very focused on climate change here in Florida, as well. We'll have a summit coming up in June. I think it's extremely important to understand is what you wanna do is try to be good stewards of the land, to protect god's work. You know, we have a wonderful opportunity, life is a gift. And to be smart enough to understand, that we wanna make sure that we protect it, that we preserve it, that we do all the things that are necessary to be good stewards of the land and the water. I think is exactly what we ought to be doing.

STEVE DOOCY: Governor, 10 today I believe in Columbus, Ohio John McCain is going to give a speech and he's gonna talk about how this race and politics in general have just gotten so bitterly mean, there's got to be a change.

CRIST: Well he's right. You know, there's no question about it. You know we in Florida try to do things in a bipartisan way. John McCain understands that. He's the kind of guy who reaches across the aisle to work with others to get things done for the American people. It's what we're trying to do right here in Florida. Whether it's get Autism coverage or health insurance for the uninsured, those are the kind of things that people want us to do. They want us to work together to do what's right. John McCain understands that and I applaud him for it.

MSNBC Panel Discusses McCain's Health Problems, Including 2 Bouts with Melanoma (MSNBC 05/15/08 7:48am)
RICHARD STENGEL: […] that's essentially the argument that Barack Obama will make in opposition to John McCain. He's gonna say to people, "Are you better off now eight years later, after the George Bush administration? Do you want a third term of George Bush?"

PAT ROBERTSON: When you take a look at this McCain thing, you do wonder, the piece on McCain's health. You say he has had, what, Melanoma a couple of times.

STENGEL: Right, Stage 2A Melanoma.

ROBERTSON: And that there's a 40% chance of this recurring again […] We know that there's a 40% risk of metastasized Melanoma coming back even though the primary lesion is taken out. And he's had two primary lesions taken out, is that correct?

STENGEL: He's about to next week release all of his health records, obviously this is a matter of concern. […] When you've had this kind of Melanoma at this stage, the chances of it recurring are 40%. That doesn't mean that it will, that doesn't mean that it will kill you, but it does mean that there is a probability of something like that happening.

Good afternoon! We wanted to give you updates on recent events, Foundation work, and announcements in the news this week:

Several op-eds about the Clinton Climate Initiative have appeared in newspapers in island nations around the world, to discuss the importance of renewable energy and CCI's work in small island nations. Authored by CCI's CEO Dymphna van der Lans and Jules Kortenhorst, CEO of the Rocky Mountain Institute (RMI), each op-ed outlines the CCI-RMI partnership and the work we do to help islands transition to renewable energy. The op-eds have appeared in The Voice St. Lucia , The Seychelles Nation and The Nassau Guardian.

In late 2006, my old boss Hillary Clinton started talking to me about the ideas that would fuel her presidential campaign. I had advised Hillary on policy when she was first lady, Senate candidate, and senator, so it seemed natural that I'd be part of her presidential run. Natural to everyone but me, that is. At the time I had two young children, ages 1 and 4; advising a presidential campaign while caring for them seemed a gargantuan task.

I ached over the decision but ultimately said yes. Unlike most women, I was fortunate in two crucial ways: I had a husband who was truly a co-parent, and I had a boss who would give me the flexibility to do my work while still upholding my responsibilities as a mom. One memorable day, Hillary even flipped her schedule to ensure that I could attend my daughter's pre-K graduation and still run her debate prep. She never gave me less work or responsibility—believe me!—just the ability to do it on a schedule that let me get home for dinner (but not cook it) most nights and allowed me to work through the wee hours of the morning at home. I didn't get much sleep, but it worked.

Today I'm one of just a handful of women running major Washington institutions. But I'm fully aware that I would not be heading the Center for American Progress, as a mother of two, without being so lucky in my husband and former boss. I had the chance to step up in my career when my kids were young, not step back. That's impossible for most women in the U.S.

Because working women still shoulder the lion's share of caregiving at home, inadequate public policies mean that far too many professional women leave the workforce during the prime of their careers to bond with a new baby or care for a sick parent. When they return to work, they are forever behind their peers, both in the leadership pack and in earning potential.

The mores of high-pressure jobs in Washington—which emphasize long hours and put a premium on face time with the higher-ups—convince a lot of women that they can't succeed at the highest level and be good moms. But mores are a function of culture, and we can shape the culture. That's why, at CAP, we expect excellent work, but if a parent has to leave the office to take a child to the doctor, nobody sweats it.

Of course, family/work balance is far from the only challenge powerful women face in this town. And if you're a woman of color, well, watch out. I vividly remember one meeting with business leaders and academics early in Hillary's presidential campaign; at the time I was in my late 30s and rising through the ranks. I had called the meeting, and was doing most of the talking. But many of the men around the table aimed their questions right past me, to my white, male deputy. I could also see them looking to him for confirmation of what I was saying.

At first I thought it was because I was young. But then I realized my deputy looked half my age. Did they not see me as a leader because I was a woman? Because I was Indian? Because I was short? Because I was all three? I will never know. But I do know they didn't, or couldn't, see me as an authority figure.

What holds back women in Washington is not so much that they lack the proverbial "seat at the table"; after all, I wasn't just sitting at the table in that meeting, it was my table. It's not how they negotiate their salaries, either, or when they choose to have children, or whether they "lean in" enough; Washington has no shortage of brilliant, assertive young women. They are held back by a culture that often marginalizes their voices, by a society that undervalues their work, and by public policy that fails to support and empower them. You shouldn't have to win the boss lottery, or the husband lottery, to be able to thrive professionally while raising your children. But that's still the reality for too many.

CNN: "Clinton jokes: Darth Vader would not be my choice for president"

By Marina Cracchiolo

July 27, 2014, 4:44 p.m. EDT

Attention potential presidential candidates: Beware of the dark side.

A recent tongue-in-cheek analysis shows Americans prefer Darth Vader more than any potential 2016 presidential candidate. Never mind that Darth Vader has done some pretty evil things across the "Star Wars" films, including blowing up planets and torturing his own son, Luke Skywalker.

What does former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton think?

Clinton chuckled when asked during a taped interview with CNN's Fareed Zakaria that aired Sunday on "CNN's Fareed Zakaria GPS."

"Darth would not be my choice," she joked.

Instead, Clinton would prefer someone with a not-so-dark disposition. "Somebody of perhaps a slightly more positive attitude in his presentation," she said.

A poll from earlier this week, from FiveThirtyEight.com, showed results of who was most – and least – popular among "Star Wars" characters. A Washington Post blog then took those numbers and compared them to favorability numbers of potential 2016 presidential candidates.

In the Post's analysis, Clinton was the front-runner of any politician on this planet, though she still trailed Vader. Republicans Mike Huckabee and Sen. Rand Paul trailed her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Amid her laughter, Clinton offered a somewhat serious answer.

"I think the deeper meaning is that people love fantasies," she said, highlighting Americans' frustration "with the gridlock in Washington."

Clinton remains undecided about a possible 2016 presidential run.

[Subtitle:] Hillary Clinton says she warned White House Vladimir Putin would be 'more aggressive' in second shot as Russian president

Hillary Clinton has described Russian President Vladimir Putin as "tough" and "arrogant" but says he secretly suffers from a "fundamental insecurity" and can turn on the charm when he wants to.

The former First Lady, US Secretary of State and potential future presidential candidate, described her experiences of dealing with Mr Putin on the world stage, saying he would turn his "bright blue eyes" on those he wanted to dazzle.

Revealing she had sent memos warning US president Barack Obama that the Russian leader was likely to be more "aggressive" following his return to the presidency, she also said he bore indirect responsibility for the shooting down of Malaysian Airlines Flight 17 over Ukraine last month, having armed pro-Russian separatists.

"He's very tough, he's a very arrogant person to deal with, which I think is a combination of this vision of Russia and this fundamental insecurity," she told CNN.

"When you are with him he often acts as if he could care less; he's not interested. He acts bored and dismissive. So he has a lot of personas that he pulls out.

"If he wants to stare intently at you with his very bright blue eyes, because he wants something from you, or he wants to convey a message to you, he can turn on the charm.

"But he can also be very tough to deal with and act as though it's a burden on him to be in conversations with other world leaders."

Mrs Clinton claimed she was among the most "sceptical" within the Obama administration about Mr Putin following his return to the presidency in 2012, having stood down in 2008, saying: "I certainly made my views known in meetings, as well as in memos to the president.

"I think that what may have happened is that both the United States and Europe were really hoping for the best from Putin as a returned president. And I think we've been quickly, unfortunately, disabused of those hopes."

Mrs Clinton's scathing assessment of President Putin is the latest sally in a war of words between the two.

Last month, he rejected her claim that he had acted like Hitler in annexing Crimea, describing her as “weak” and saying "It's better not to argue with women."

He went on: “Mrs Clinton has never been too graceful in her statements.

"When people push boundaries too far, it's not because they are strong but because they are weak. But maybe weakness is not the worst quality for a woman."

The Hill: “Clinton not running away from Wall Street”

By Kevin Cirilli

July 28, 2014, 3:49 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton isn’t backing away from Wall Street.

As cries from within her own party grow louder for the all-but-declared 2016 Democratic presidential candidate to distance herself from high finance’s titans, Clinton is continuing to address Wall Street audiences.

This week she’ll speak at an Ameriprise Financial conference in Boston. She’s also been booked or given paid speeches at events sponsored by Fidelity, KKR and Co., the Carlyle Groups and Goldman Sachs.

Supporters of Clinton argue there’s no need for her to change her schedule.

They say her career is highlighted with support for liberals ideals, from raising the minimum wage to improving healthcare.

Giving a speech to a financial firm means nothing in that context, said veteran Democratic strategist Robert Shurm.

“Yeah, for some there's a desire to bash banks, but they care more about raising minimum wage, making college affordable and income inequality,” Shrum said. “And for Hillary, that's the test — not whether she gave a speech for Ameriprise.”

Liberals say the problem goes beyond the speeches. They worry that if Clinton becomes president, she’ll back policies they see as having contributed to the financial crisis. They want to at least pressure Clinton to move to the left on financial issues in a Democratic primary race.

Chamberlain notes that President Clinton backed the 1999 repeal of the Glass Steagall banking law requiring commercial banks to split off their investment banking operations.

Many on the left argue its repeal contributed to the financial crisis, and Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) has championed reinstating it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Warren has given no indication she's interested in entering the 2016 race, but she might be the one figure on the left who could emerge as a serious challenger to Clinton.

Chamberlain said he'd like to see Clinton move toward what he called the "Warren wing" of the Democratic party.

People in Clinton's camp scoff at such suggestions.

"Ask any so-called 'left' or 'liberal' critic of Hillary to name a single vote or position on issue on which Elizabeth Warren and Hillary would disagree," said one Clinton political strategist. "Rhetoric is not an acceptable answer."

Spokespersons for Clinton declined to comment for this story

Polls suggest that if Clinton enters the race for the 2016 Democratic nomination for president, she will be an overwhelming favorite.

She garnered 67 percent of Florida Democratic presidential primary voters, according to a Quinnipiac poll released last week. Warren nabbed just eight percent, as did Vice President Biden.

Republicans have signaled that they will try to tie Clinton to Wall Street if she is the Democratic Party's nominee.

"What exactly does Hillary stand for: Main Street? Wall Street? No one knows," mused GOP strategist Ford O'Connell. "She seems to be talking out of both sides of her mouth."

But Shrum and others argue those attacks aren't going to work.

Shrum noted that Barack Obama received considerable support from Wall Street during both his 2008 and 2012 presidential campaigns, and that it didn't prevent him from winning his party's nomination or the White House.

Politico blog: Politico Now: "Albright: 'The world is a mess'"

By Jose Delreal

July 27, 2014, 11:57 a.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright on Sunday offered a pithy summary of recent international events: "To put it mildly: the world is a mess."

"There are an awful lot of things going on that need understanding and explanation," Albright told host Bob Schieffer on CBS's "Face the Nation."

Albright's appearance comes as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict escalates and events in Ukraine continue to put a strain on US-Russian relations. The former secretary and Schieffer went on to discuss the saturation of international news in recent months and marveled at the the lack of media coverage surrounding the ongoing conflict in Syria and the temporary closure of the U.S. Embassy in Tripoli, Libya.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Can you recall a time when there was so much trouble in so many places around the world?” asked Schieffer. “We have so much going on right now, it’s almost like we’re caught up in events out of control.”

Albright offered praise for Secretary of State John Kerry's efforts to put impose a cease-fire in Gaza.

“I so admire Secretary Kerry for all the effort he’s put into this,” said Albright. “I think Secretary Kerry is doing everything he can at this moment to prolong the short peaceful cease-fires. It’s a tough sell for everybody.”

CNN: “British, U.S. diplomats out of Libya as militia fighting rages”

By Alan Duke

July 27, 2014, 1:36 p.m. EDT

A convoy of British diplomats made it safely into Tunisia from Libya despite an attack on its vehicles Sunday, British officials said.

"There was an attempted carjacking of a British Embassy convoy this morning," UK Ambassador Michael Aron said in a Twitter posting Sunday. "Shots were fired at our vehicles but all safe."

Several Western embassies, including those of Britain and the United States, were evacuated over the weekend as heavy militia violence raged in the Libyan capital, Tripoli.

The German government renewed its "urgent call for citizens to leave Libya" because of the dangers of kidnappings and fighting.

Britain warned its citizens against all travel to Libya and asked that any of them in the country "leave now" by commercial means, which is made difficult by the limited flights out of the main airport.

'Libya is reaching a critical stage'

Fighting in Tripoli and Benghazi is the worst seen since the revolution that overthrew the regime of Moammar Gadhafi nearly three years ago. The central government has been outgunned by increasingly powerful militias.

Witnesses reported heavy shelling and fighting around the Tripoli international airport Sunday, which has been under attack by an alliance of powerful militias from the city of Misrata and Islamist militias. The fighters are trying to take it from militias from the city of Zintan, which have controlled it since the 2011 revolution.

Dozens of people, including some women and children, died in fighting in Benghazi in recent days, according to the Libyan state news agency. Intense shelling continued Sunday, the reports said. Violence erupted in Benghazi last Monday when Islamist militias attacked military bases in the city.

The Libyan Health Ministry said at least 32 people who were killed and 62 wounded were taken to the Benghazi medical center on Saturday and Sunday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The ministry counted at least 97 killed and 404 wounded in Tripoli over the past two weeks. The casualty numbers do not count those taken to smaller field hospitals.

Envoys from the Arab League, the European Union, France, Germany, Italy, Malta, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States issued a joint statement Saturday calling for "a ceasefire from all sides."

"The situation in Libya is reaching a critical stage. We are deeply concerned about the ongoing violence across the country and its humanitarian consequences," the envoys said. The statement called for "a willingness to compromise" by all sides in "an inclusive political dialogue on the back of the ceasefire agreement."

U.N. 'should play a leading role'

The United Nations "should play a leading role in reaching a ceasefire in conjunction with the Libyan government and other internal partners, with the full support of the international envoys," the statement said.

The U.N. and other international organizations and businesses temporarily evacuated staff from Libya earlier this month.

The envoys also said Libya's recently elected Council of Representatives "must have the opportunity to convene according to the time table set out in the law" and "carry out its tasks in a spirit of inclusiveness, moderation and in the interest of the country."

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry, at the U.S. Embassy in Paris meeting with the Turkish and Qatari foreign ministersSaturday, called upon various factions to engage in a political process, saying "the current course of violence would only bring chaos." Kerry added that due to the "freewheeling militia violence that is taking place in Tripoli" the U.S., along with other countries including Turkey, has "suspended our current diplomatic activities at the Embassy."

'Robust package of military forces' standing by

The U.S. evacuated its 150 personnel, including 80 U.S. Marines, from the embassy in Tripoli on Saturday. Their convoy drove across the border into Tunisia, U.S. officials confirm to CNN.

U.S. officials stress operations have been "temporarily suspended" until "the security situation on the ground improves." The embassy will continue to operate from other locations. A senior State Department official said some of the staff will be sent to other U.S. embassies in the region and others will return to Washington.

U.S. President Barack Obama approved the State Department recommendation to temporarily relocate personnel because of the "ongoing violence resulting from clashes between Libyan militias in the immediate vicinity" of the embassy, a White House official said.

State Department spokeswoman Marie Harf said the United States is "currently exploring options for a permanent return to Tripoli as soon as the security situation on the ground improves. In the interim, staff will operate from Washington and other posts in the region," Harf said in a statement.

"Securing our facilities and ensuring the safety of our personnel are top Department priorities, and we did not make this decision lightly. Security has to come first. Regrettably, we had to take this step because the location of our embassy is in very close proximity to intense fighting and ongoing violence between armed Libyan factions."

The Pentagon had a "robust package of military forces" in the vicinity but out of sight, ready to move in if the convoy of evacuees had come under attack. Two F-16s were on combat air patrol overhead, while a drone tracked the convoy to the border and a Navy destroyer watched from offshore in the Mediterranean, CNN learned. An "airborne response force" of several dozen Marines was on V-22 Osprey aircraft flying nearby, prepared to land and protect the Americans if they came under attack during the transit to the Tunisian border.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Pentagon had pressed for weeks to evacuate the embassy, especially after the Tripoli airport came under repeated militia attack, leaving Americans no way to get out via commercial air, the official said. The decision to use vehicles to drive the Americans across the border was seen as the best low-profile approach to conducting the evacuation rather than sending U.S. military helicopters and troops into Tripoli.

This comes nearly two years after attacks on U.S. government facilities in the Libyan city of Benghazi. The assaults of September 11-12, 2012, left four Americans dead, including U.S. Ambassador Chris Stevens, and spawned political controversy in Washington. Republican lawmakers have claimed the Obama administration tried to mislead the public about the cause of the attacks and should have done more to prevent them.

GOP critics say they plan to make Benghazi an issue for former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, under whose watch the attacks occurred, should she decide to run for president.

Salon: Bill Curry: "My party has lost its soul: Bill Clinton, Barack Obama and the victory of Wall Street Democrats"

1.

In 2006 the Atlantic magazine asked a panel of "eminent historians" to name the 100 most influential people in American history. Included alongside George Washington, Abe Lincoln, Mark Twain and Elvis Presley was Ralph Nader, one of only three living Americans to make the list. It was airy company for Nader, but if you think about it, an easy call.

Though a private citizen, Nader shepherded more bills through Congress than all but a handful of American presidents. If that sounds like an outsize claim, try refuting it. His signature wins included landmark laws on auto, food, consumer product and workplace safety; clean air and water; freedom of information, and consumer, citizen, worker and shareholder rights. In a century only Woodrow Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt and Lyndon Johnson passed more major legislation.

Nader's also the only American ever to start a major social or political movement all by himself. The labor, civil rights and women's movements all had multiple mothers and fathers, as did each generation's peace and antiwar movements. Not so the consumer movement, which started out as just one guy banging away at a typewriter. Soon he was a national icon, seen leaning into Senate microphones on TV or staring down the establishment from the covers of news magazines.

What lifted Nader to such heights was the 1965 publication of "Unsafe at Any Speed," an exposé of the auto industry's sociopathic indifference to the health and safety of its customers. In little more than a year Congress put seat belts in every new car and created the forerunners of the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration.

Washington's rapid response affirmed Nader's belief that people provided with critical facts will demand change and that sooner than one might expect politicians, however listless or corrupt, will give it to them. This faith in the power of ideas and of public opinion — in the educability of people and thus in the viability of democracy — distinguishes Nader from much of what remains of the American left.

For nearly 30 years Nader largely abstained from electoral politics while turning out a steady stream of testimony and books. But his influence waned. By the late '70s the linked forces of corporate and cultural reaction we memorialize as the Reagan Revolution were gathering force. In 1978 Nader lost a pivotal battle to establish a federal consumer protection agency as key Democrats, including Jimmy Carter, whom Nader had informally blessed in 1976, fled the field.

In Reagan's epic 1980 sweep the GOP picked up 12 Senate seats, the biggest gain of the last 60 years for either party. Nader had done his best business with Democrats, especially the liberal lions of the Senate; men like Warren Magnuson, Gaylord Nelson, Birch Bayh and George McGovern, all swept out to sea in the Reagan riptide. In the House, a freshman Democrat from California, Tony Coelho, took over party fundraising. It's arguable that Coehlo's impact on his party was as great as Reagan's on his. It is inarguable that Coehlo set Democrats on an identity-altering path toward ever closer ties to big business and, especially, Wall Street.

In 1985 moderate Democrats including Bill Clinton and Al Gore founded the Democratic Leadership Council, which proposed innovative policies while forging ever closer ties to business. Clinton would be the first Democratic presidential nominee since FDR and probably ever to raise more money than his Republican opponent. (Even Barry Goldwater outraised Lyndon Johnson.) In 2008 Obama took the torch passed to Clinton and became the first Democratic nominee to outraise a GOP opponent on Wall Street. His 2-to-1 spending advantage over John McCain broke a record Richard Nixon set in his drubbing of George McGovern.

Throughout the 1980s Nader watched as erstwhile Democratic allies vanished or fell into the welcoming arms of big business. By the mid-'90s the whole country was in a swoon over the new baby-faced titans of technology and global capital. If leading Democrats thought technology threatened anyone's privacy or employment or that globalization threatened anyone's wages, they kept it to themselves. In his contempt for oligarchs of any vintage and rejection of the economic and political democratization myths of the new technology Nader seemed an anachronism.

His critics would later say Nader was desperate for attention. For certain he was desperate to reengage the nation in a debate over the concentration of wealth and power; desperate enough by 1992 to run for president. His first race was a sort of novelty campaign — he ran in New Hampshire's Democratic and Republican primaries "as a stand in for none of the above." But the experience proved habit-forming and he got more serious as he went along. In 1996 and 2000 he ran as the nominee of the Green Party and in 2004 and 2008 as an independent.

The campaigns defined him for a new generation, but he never stopped writing. His latest book, "Unstoppable," argues for the existence and utility of an "emerging left-right alliance to dismantle the corporate state." The book is vintage Nader and ranks with his best. The questions it poses should greatly interest progressives. The question is, will any read it.

It's a question because on top of all the hurdles facing even celebrity authors today, Nader is estranged from much of his natural readership. It goes back, of course, to his third race for president, the one that gave us George W. Bush, John Roberts, Sam Alito, the Iraq War and a colossal debt. Democrats blame Nader for all of it. Some say he not only cost Al Gore the 2000 election but did it on purpose. Nader denies both charges. Both are more debatable than either he or his critics allow.

In 1996 I served as counselor to President Clinton and met often with Nader to discuss that campaign. Early on he told me he wouldn't be a spoiler. Judging by his message and schedule and the deployment of his meager resources, he was true to his word. In 2000 his allocation of resources was little changed: He spent 20 days in deep blue California, two in Florida; hardly a spoiler's itinerary. But he was in Florida at the end and his equation throughout of Gore with Bush — "Tweedledum and Tweedledee" — outraged Democrats.

The Democrats' dismissal of Nader in 2000 was of a piece with our personality-driven politics: a curmudgeon on steroids; older now and grumpier; driven by ego and personal grievance. But Nader always hit hard; you don't get to be the world's most famous shopper by making allowances or pulling punches. The difference was that in 2000 Democrats as well as Republicans bore the brunt of his attacks. What had changed? It says a lot about the Democratic Party then and now that nobody bothered to ask the question, the answer to which is, a whole lot.

Between 1996 and 2000 the Wall Street Democrats who by then ruled the party's upper roosts scored their first big legislative wins. Until then their impact was most visible in the quietude of Congress, which had not enacted any major social or economic reforms since the historic environmental laws of the early '70s. It was the longest such stretch since the 19th century, but no one seemed to notice.

In the late '70s, deregulation fever swept the nation. Carter deregulated trucks and airlines; Reagan broke up Ma Bell, ending real oversight of phone companies. But those forays paled next to the assaults of the late '90s. The Telecommunications Act of 1996 had solid Democratic backing as did the Financial Services Modernization Act of 1999. The communications bill authorized a massive giveaway of public airwaves to big business and ended the ban on cross ownership of media. The resultant concentration of ownership hastened the rise of hate radio and demise of local news and public affairs programming across America. As for the "modernization" of financial services, suffice to say its effect proved even more devastating. Clinton signed and still defends both bills with seeming enthusiasm.

The Telecommunications Act subverted anti-trust principles traceable to Wilson. The financial services bill gutted Glass-Steagall, FDR's historic banking reform. You'd think such reversals would spark intra-party debate but Democrats made barely a peep. Nader was a vocal critic of both bills. Democrats, he said, were betraying their heritage and, not incidentally, undoing his life's work. No one wanted to hear it. When Democrats noticed him again in 2000 the only question they thought to ask was, what's got into Ralph? Such is politics in the land of the lotus eaters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The furor over Nader arose partly because issues of economic and political power had, like Nader himself, grown invisible to Democrats. As Democrats continued on the path that led from Coehlo to Clinton to Obama, issues attendant to race, culture and gender came to define them. Had they nominated a pro-lifer in 2000 and Gloria Steinem run as an independent it's easy to imagine many who berated Nader supporting her. Postmortems would have cited the party's abandonment of principle as a reason for its defeat. But Democrats hooked on corporate cash and consultants with long lists of corporate clients were less attuned to Nader's issues.

Democrats today defend the triage liberalism of social service spending but limit their populism to hollow phrase mongering (fighting for working families, Main Street not Wall Street). The rank and file seem oblivious to the party's long Wall Street tryst. Obama's economic appointees are the most conservative of any Democratic president since Grover Cleveland but few Democrats seem to notice, or if they notice, to care.

There's much talk lately of a "populist" revival but few can say what a populist is. Like "liberal"and "conservative," it's a word best used with conscious imprecision. As apt to indicate a sensibility as a theory, it's often just an epithet, the conjured image being one of class envy and fist-shaking anger. But populism can be civil; Huey Long was a populist, but so was Will Rogers. It has conservative as well as liberal elements. Populists espouse traditional values. They loathe bureaucracy, public or private. They seldom raise taxes and never on the poor or middle class.

The best template of populism remains the career of William Jennings Bryan. Like Jefferson and Jackson, Bryan railed against big banks. He thought it in the nature of big businesses to oppress small businesses and to corrupt government. He despised the gross income inequality of his day. His proposed graduated income tax left the lower and middle classes alone.

Bryan took the national stage decrying banks in his Cross of Gold speech and left it denying evolution at the Scopes trial. He didn't become a Bible-thumper in old age, he'd always been one. And he never altered his view of banks. He reminds us that populism can be economic or cultural — the first tends to reform, the second to repression — and that both species may abide in the same person. For a century the parties divided populism between them; Democrats ran the Cross of Gold speech at Republicans. Republicans ran the Scopes trial at them. Then Democrats decided to let Republicans have both cultural and economic populism. It was some gift.

Populism encompasses not just Bryan's late 19th century agrarians but their close relations, the early 20th century urban progressives and countless descendants of each. Jefferson and Jackson are called fathers of both populism and the Democratic Party. Jackson and Bryan are the only Democrats other than FDR to be nominated three times for president. All populists share common traits: love of small business; high standards of public ethics; concern for individuals, families and communities; suspicion of elites and of all economic trusts, combinations and cartels.

Some recent populist talk is owing to the election of two liberals, Elizabeth Warren and Bill de Blasio. (Liberals taking Massachusetts or Manhattan didn't used to be news.) It's unclear how well they and other Democratic liberals can tap populist sentiment. In any case, Democrats are late to the populist dance. Mass protests of corrupt oligarchies have roiled global politics for a decade. In America the Tea Party has been crying crony capitalism since the Bush bailout and Obama stimulus. Income inequality's so bad Mitt Romney wants to raise the minimum wage.

Even the Democrats' tardy me-too-ism seems insincere, less a churning of policy than a freshening of message. In 2009, when he had the votes in Congress, Obama chose not to raise the minimum wage. Not till late 2013 did Democrats press the issue. Why then? As the New York Times reported, "they found an issue they believe can lift their fortunes both locally and nationally in 2014." If there's a true populist revolt on the left it is as yet invisible to the naked eye.

Meanwhile the populist revolt on the right persists. In 2010 the Tea Party declared open season on GOP incumbents. It has since bagged quite a few. But Republicans don't just fight over offices, they fight over ideas. It's hard to track all the players in their endless policy scrum: Heritage, American Enterprise, Focus on the Family, Club for Growth, etc. Rand Paul pilfers Democratic issues like a fox stealing chickens while dynasty star Jeb Bush grapples with such timeless questions as whether there can be such a thing as a conservative social program.

Democrats aren't even having a debate. Their one think tank, the Center for American Progress, serves their establishment. (Its founder, John Podesta, once Clinton's chief of staff, is now counselor to Obama.) The last real primary challenge to a Democratic senator was in 2006 when Ned Lamont took on Connecticut's Joe Lieberman. They say the GOP picks presidents based on seniority. Two years out, Republicans seem headed for a bloody knife fight while Hillary Clinton may be headed for the most decorous, seniority-based succession in either party's history. (If she loses this time it will be to herself.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If Democrats had caught populist fever they'd be reappraising their own orthodoxy and offing a few of their own incumbents. Owing only partly to the Supreme Court's Citizens United ruling, they instead spend their days as Republicans do, in an endless search for new ways to help the rich pump money into politics. As public alienation deepens, polls show Democrats generally content with their party's leaders. Of such stuff revolutions are not made.

Which brings us back to Nader's book. It opens with a story of left and right banding together in 1982 to stop construction of Tennessee's Clinch River Breeder Reactor. Authorized in 1972, by 1977 this "public private partnership" had spent $1.3 billion of public money ($4.5 billion in current dollars) on preconstruction costs. That's when Jimmy Carter pulled its plug. Or thought he did.

In 1981 the Reagan administration revived it. It looked good to go until Arkansas Sen. Dale Bumpers convened an ad hoc coalition of liberals opposed to nuclear waste and conservatives opposed to wasting money. Its sublimely eclectic membership included the International Association of Machinists, the National Taxpayers Union and the Audubon Society. What happened next was Reagan and his allies in Congress got rolled. By 1983 the project was dead, this time for good.

Nader cites other issues, most culled from his own experience, on which left and right collaborated. He predicts convergence on topics ranging from civil liberties to defense, corporate welfare and open government. He assays 25 ideas he deems ripe for alliances and the strategies for forming them. He says all appeal to a growing populist movement. It's this movement he calls unstoppable.

Nader's belief in convergence isn't the same as Obama's naïve pursuit of the holy grail of bipartisanship. He doesn't say Democrats and Republicans can talk away their differences, only that some of them can work on issues on which they haven't any. He concedes that doing even that much is hard for Republicans, for whom it often proves fatal to work with Democrats even on Republican ideas.

To many, Nader's vision will seem naïve, as will the book's very title. Surely a lesson of our time is that all progress is stoppable. Not long ago optimism was in vogue. Obama's slogan then was "Yes we can." Today it could be "It turns out we can't." His basic brief: "With an economy so broken, government so broke, politics so corrupt and Republicans so crazy, no one could do better, so quit whining: from now on, this is as good as it gets." Better the Obama of 2008, or the Nader of today who insists "pessimism has no place in a democracy."

Some of the ideas in "Unstoppable" may seem small bore: defending whistle-blowers, auditing defense budgets, loosening restrictions on standing to sue. Some need elaboration — encouraging community-based businesses, reforming government procurement — while others seem too long a reach: tying the minimum wage to inflation, getting Congress to do its constitutional duty on declaring war. But all relate to systemic reforms Democrats no longer espouse.

Democrats envy Republicans their knack for framing issues in foundational values: thrift, hard work, family, patriotism. Nader espouses values that form the very substratum of American culture. He often cites lessons learned as a child, listening to his dad talk politics in the family restaurant or tagging along with his mom to town meetings. He doesn't tell these tales as politicians do, for mere nostalgic connection, but to make the case for community and small business, to defend families from the commoditization of privacy and the commercialization of childhood and, above all, to spark a revival of the grass roots, New England-style democracy of his youth. One may call such values liberal or conservative, or simply say they are rooted in American populism.

Republicans can talk values even while defending a corrupt status quo because, recent Tea Party convulsions aside, defending the status quo is their job. The Democrats' job is to challenge the status quo; when they don't do it, nothing they say sounds sincere. Nader's words resonate because they're rooted in a populist tradition and connected to a populist vision. Democratic rhetoric rings hollow because it's no longer rooted in any tradition or connected to any vision.

What agrarian populists did best was battle cartels and advocate for a kind of homegrown communitarian capitalism. They busted price fixing railroads and granaries, fought for rural free delivery and established cooperative banks that still provide a third of all credit to rural America. Most amazing, they did it all via Congress amid the venality of the first Gilded Age. Powerful trusts were turning farmers into wage slaves and the world's greatest democracy into just another corrupt oligarchy when Populists and Progressives rose as if from nowhere to stop them.

Parallels to our own time could hardly be clearer. Like invasive species destroying the biodiversity of a pond, today's global trusts swallow up everything smaller than themselves. The rules of global trade make organizing for higher wages next to impossible in developed and undeveloped countries alike. Fights for net neutrality and public Wi-Fi are exactly like the fight for rural free delivery. Small businesses are as starved for credit as small farmers ever were. PACs are our Tammany Hall. What's missing is a powerful, independent reform movement.

Republicans make their livings off the misappropriation of populism. Democrats by their silence assist them. Rand Paul is more forceful than any Democrat on privacy and the impulse to empire. The Tea Party rails loudest against big banks and corporate corruption. Even on cultural issues Democrats don't really lead: Your average college student did more than your average Democratic congressman to advance gay marriage.

It's hard for Democrats to see that their problems arise from their own mistakes. Obama called the 2008 recession "the worst since the Great Depression." It wasn't; by most measures — jobs, wages, exports — it was the worst since 1982. The valid comparison to the 1930s is that now as then all our vital institutions are broken. Our healthcare, banking, energy and transit systems are badly broken. Our defense policy is obsolete. Politics is a cesspool. Oddly, the one system working relatively well, public education, is the object of our only sustained reform effort.

Mistaking the nature of the crisis, Obama mistook massive fraud for faulty computer modeling and a middle-class meltdown for a mere turn of the business cycle. Had he grasped his situation he'd have known the most he could do by priming the pump would be to reinflate the bubble. Contrast him to FDR, who saw the systemic nature of his crisis. To banks Roosevelt offered only reform; financial help went to customers whose bad mortgages he bought up and whose savings he insured. By buying into Bush's bailout, Obama co-signed the biggest check ever cut by a government, made out to the culprits, not the victims. As for his stimulus, it didn't cure the disease and hefty portions of it smelled like pork.

Populist rage against the bailout and stimulus saved the Republican Party. In 2006 it had lost Congress, in 2008 the White House. Younger voters recoiled from its racial and religious politics. Middle-class decline had even devout Christians focused on family finances. That's when Democrats handed over title to economic populism. Absent the bailout and stimulus it's hard to imagine the Tea Party being born, Republicans retaking Congress or the government being so utterly paralyzed.

Liberals have spent the intervening years debating macroeconomic theory but macroeconomics can't fathom this crisis. This isn't just a slow recovery from a financial sector collapse, or damage done by debt overhang or Obama's weak tea Keynesianism. We're in crisis because of all our broken systems; because we still let big banks prey on homeowners, students, consumers and retailers; because our infrastructure is decrepit; because our tax code breeds inefficiency and inequality; because foreign interventions bled us dry. We're in peril because our democracy is dying. Reviving it will take more than deficit spending and easy money. It will take reform, and before that, a whole new political debate.

Reading "Unstoppable" reminds one of Nader's standing among the '60s reformers who formed populism's last great wave. The book is drenched in populist themes: distrust of big business and big government, faith in democracy and contempt for its corrupters, defense of all things small — towns, businesses, people — against the inevitable predations of all things big. Among its lessons for would be populists:

Populism isn't about spending. Of Nader's 25 proposals none costs any money. Eight actually save money. By cleaning up Reagan's fiscal mess Bill Clinton made Democrats the party of fiscal responsibility. With the bailout and stimulus Obama handed the issue back to Republicans. Populists know we have a choice: change the rules or write the check. And they know which choice generally works best. If instead of a bailout and stimulus Obama raised the minimum wage, secured a public option, rescued homeowners and cut defense there'd be no budget crisis today and he'd be a folk hero instead of a punching bag.

Populists challenge big business. Apart from global warming, our most pressing problem is the mal-distribution of power, opportunity and income. In their denial, Democrats think they can compete with Republicans for Wall Street cash and still "fight for working families," but on many issues — wages, credit costs, tax burdens — there really are two sides. Soon even the party's base will ask which side it is on.

Populists stand up for small business. We think of small business as Republican. Not necessarily. In a 2012 poll of small-business owners, a majority picked Obama over Romney, a choice their Washington lobbyists were at pains to explain way. No constituency gets more lip service and less actual service than small business, which is why it's always up for grabs. Nader's small town, small business populism speaks to it like nothing else can. Small business has never been, or felt, more threatened. A party that earns its trust can govern a long time.

Populists care about ethics. So do voters. In two recent rounds of exit polls voters named corruption their top concern over jobs and the economy, this in the teeth of a "jobless recovery." In 2008 Obama closed stump speeches with vows to "curb lobbyists' power" and "change Washington's culture." Voters thought he meant to make it more honest. It turns out he only meant to make it more polite, and even in that he failed. His longest list of unkept promises is the one titled "ethics and open government." Few among party elites have any sense of the price he has paid.

Populism changes with the issues and times. Ethics means even more to us than it did to the early populists. Technology has made privacy a populist issue. The bankruptcy of our foreign and defense policies elevates those issues. Populism is relevant to global warming. Its frugality fosters conservation. Its decentralization supports everything from local farms to distributed generation. Its anti-corporate ethos is a key to any credible effort to curb the influence of the fossil fuel industry.

It pains us to watch Democrats bungle populist issues. We see Rand Paul corner the market on privacy and the scrutiny of defense budgets and wonder why no Democrat rises to expose his specious rantings. We yearn for a new politics but worry that our democracy, like that Antarctic ice shelf, has reached its tipping point. For things to improve Democrats must come up with better ideas and learn how to present them. So why don't they?

One reason is that today's Democrats think politics is all about marketing. While Republicans built think tanks Democrats built relationships with celebrity pollsters. When things go awry one pops up on TV to tell us how they "lost control of the narrative." Asked to name a flaw, Obama invariably cites his failure to "tell our story." Judging by his recent book, Tim Geithner thinks failing to tell his story was the only mistake he ever made. People don't hate the bailout because Tim Geithner gives bad speeches. They hate it because their mortgages are still underwater.

Democrats must learn that policy precedes message; figure out what you believe, then how to tell people about it. A good idea advertises itself.

Democrats must also learn to argue history. They chortle when Michele Bachmann credits the founders with ending slavery or Sarah Palin forgets who Paul Revere rode to warn. Yet they let the right turn our founding myths into pulp propaganda with nary a reply from any but academics. In "Unstoppable" Nader enlists Jefferson, Adam Smith, Friederich Hayek and a raft of others to buttress his case and reclaim valuable ground.

Democrats think the power of money is greater than the power of ideas. Nader thinks that with the right ideas you can win even if outspent 100-to-1. Every year Democrats further dilute their ideas to get the money they think they need to sell them. The weaker the ideas, the more ads they need, the more money it takes, the weaker the ideas. As you can tell from their ads, they've been at this a long time.

They don't believe in ideas because they don't believe in people. Obama wasted years dickering with Republicans who wished him only ill. He should have talked to the people and let them talk to the Republicans.

One reason we know voters will embrace populism is that they already have. It's what they thought they were getting with Obama. In 2008 Obama said he'd bail out homeowners, not just banks. He vowed to fight for a public option, raise the minimum wage and clean up Washington. He called whistle-blowers heroes and said he'd bar lobbyists from his staff. He was critical of drones and wary of the use of force to advance American interests. He spoke eloquently of the threats posed to individual privacy by a runaway national security state.

He turned out to be something else altogether. To blame Republicans ignores a glaring truth: Obama's record is worst where they had little or no role to play. It wasn't Republicans who prosecuted all those whistle-blowers and hired all those lobbyists; who authorized drone strikes or kept the NSA chugging along; who reneged on the public option, the minimum wage and aid to homeowners. It wasn't even Republicans who turned a blind eye to Wall Street corruption and excessive executive compensation. It was Obama.

A populist revolt among Democrats is unlikely absent their reappraisal of Obama, which itself seems unlikely. Not since Robert Kennedy have Democrats been so personally invested in a public figure. Liberals fell hardest so it's especially hard for them to admit he's just not that into them. If they could walk away they might resume their relationship with Nader. Of course that won't be easy.

Populism isn't just liberalism on steroids; it too demands compromise. After any defeat, a party's base consoles itself with the notion that if its candidates were pure they'd have won. It's never true; most voters differ with both parties. Still, liberals dream of retaking Congress as the Tea Party dreams of retaking the White House: by being pure. Democratic elites are always up for compromise, but on the wrong issues. Rather than back GOP culture wars, as some do, or foreign wars, as many do, or big business, as nearly all do, they should back libertarians on privacy, small business on credit and middle-class families on taxes.

If Democrats can't break up with Obama or make up with Nader, they should do what they do best: take a poll. They would find that beneath all our conflicts lies a hidden consensus. It prizes higher ethics, lower taxes and better governance; community and privacy; family values and the First Amendment; economic as well as cultural diversity. Its potential coalition includes unions, small business, nonprofits, the professions, the economically embattled and all the marginalized and excluded. Such a coalition could reshape our politics, even our nation.

In other words, one major flaw in the emerging agreement is that Iran would be free of constraints after the period. She should take the position that unless Iran radically changes its posture over this period of time, the U.S. should never allow Iran to become a nuclear weapons state, as North Korea is now.

President Obama and Secretary Kerry have been persistent and determined in pursuit of this goal, building on a decade of bipartisan pressure and diplomacy. Getting the rest of the way to a final deal by June won't be easy, but it is absolutely crucial. I know well that the devil is always in the details in this kind of negotiation. So I strongly support President Obama and Secretary Kerry's efforts between now and June to reach a final deal that verifiably cuts off all of Iran's paths to a nuclear weapon, imposes an intrusive inspection program with no sites off limits, extends breakout time, RESOLVES THE MILITARY DIMENSION, and spells out clear and overwhelming consequences for violations. The onus is on Iran and the bar must be set high. It can never be permitted to acquire a nuclear weapon. It is also vital that these efforts be part of a comprehensive strategy to check Iran's regional ambitions, defend our allies and partners, and reinforce American leadership in the Middle East. There is much to do and much more to say in the months ahead, but for now diplomacy deserves a chance to succeed.

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Where are we on this?" — Hillary Clinton in an email with the subject line "Gefilte fish." Yesterday, thousands of emails were released from the private server she controversially used while sec. of state.

SKIMM THIS

THE BIG O

THE STORY

Yesterday, OPEC – a squad of the world's biggest oil producers – said it might be open to working with other countries to boost oil prices.

WHO ARE YOU TALKING ABOUT?

OPEC's a group of 12 countries - think: Mideast, African, and South American nations - that together produce almost half of the world's crude oil. And lately, their oil profit game has been thrown off by fracking (read: a controversial way of producing oil and gas) in the US and Canada. Fracking has flooded the market with oil supply, even though there's not as much demand for oil (thanks in big part to a sluggish global economy). This has led to prices dropping like it's hot. (Psst...we Skimm'd it for you.)

SO WHAT'S THE LATEST?

Now, it looks like OPEC might be open to working with other producers to revive oil prices. Which a lot of people think means the US and Canada. This, plus other slick headlines, sent oil prices way up.

theSKIMM

OPEC isn't known for playing nice with others, but the drop in oil prices has been a big blow to some of its member countries, who depend on oil to keep their economies afloat. This could be a smoke signal that they're hurting badly enough to flirt with countries they don't normally do business with.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR FLIGHT'S DELAYED...

Can I leave, please? These journalists can relate. Yesterday, two British Vice News journalists and their translator were arrested in Turkey on terrorism charges. Turkey says they were working for a terror group, allegedly one you might have heard of (hint: rhymes with crisis). Reminder: Turkey recently starting fighting ISIS in Syria. Turkey's also been fighting the PKK back home, a group it considers a terrorist organization. These journalists were covering the violence between the Turkish military and the PKK. Vice has called the charges "baseless and alarmingly false." Human rights organizations agree.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR GRANDMA MAKES AN INAPPROPRIATE COMMENT AT A FAMILY DINNER...

Not the place for that. The Auschwitz museum's had problems with high temperatures recently. So the caretakers of the former concentration camp installed "mist showers" to cool people off. And now high temperatures are the least of their problems.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU'RE TRYING TO RESOLVE MULTIPLE PEOPLE'S COMMENTS IN A SHARED DOC...

Hard to please everyone. Ukrainian lawmakers know about that. Yesterday, the country's parliament voted on whether to give more power to pro-Russian separatists in eastern Ukraine. Reminder: Ukraine has been going through an epic identity crisis for years (Here's your Skimm). In February, Ukraine, Russia, and the West agreed on a cease-fire deal to end months of violence between Ukraine and pro-Russian separatists in the country's eastern cities. Part of that deal included separatists getting more autonomy. But a lot of Ukraine doesn't want to give up any power to the separatists, who everyone thinks are actually backed by Russia. Yesterday, protests in the capital got violent. One person was killed and dozens were injured when a grenade was thrown. Now, Ukraine's government is left wondering if it'll have enough support to hold up its end of the cease-fire bargain. Rock, meet Putin's abs.

SKIMM THIS

WHAT TO SAY WHEN THE SAME CAR ALARM KEEPS GOING OFF OUTSIDE...

This again? Everyone's talking about Tom Brady's balls. Still. Yesterday, the star QB was back in court, appealing the NFL's decision to bench him for four games for his role in Deflategate. Deflategate: when the Patriots were accused of intentionally deflating game balls to make them easier to grip...and win playoff games. Brady says he knew nothing of the shrunken balls. The NFL begs to differ. Yesterday was the last chance for both sides to talk it over and hug it out before a judge steps in. There was no hugging. The judge says he'll make the call this week on whether to keep Brady sidelined.

SKIMM THIS THING TO KNOW

Denali: The mountain formerly known as Mt. McKinley. Obama officially renamed it this week to please his Alaskan friends - who've been on the Denali name train for pretty much forever. His GOP frenemies are none too pleased.

New York Times: First Draft: "Group Backing Netanyahu Will Air Ad Attacking Hillary Clinton"

"The first television advertisement of the 2016 presidential campaign cycle to attack Hillary Rodham Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, will have its debut this weekend, paid for by a neoconservative group that strongly supports Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel."

Lancaster Online: "Sen. Casey expects Clinton to be Democratic nominee"

"His spokesman, John Rizzo, responded with that message to an email Friday morning inquiring whether Casey's spike in appearances on national news outlets was a precursor to a 2016 presidential run. 'No. Senator Casey loves his work in the Senate. Senator Casey expects Secretary Clinton to be the nominee,' Rizzo wrote in the email but would say if the senator will throw his support behind Clinton for the nomination."

ABC News: "Rand Paul Wows CPAC Crowd, Talks Privacy, Tax Cuts, Hillary Clinton"

By Shushannah Walshe

February 27, 2015 2:47 p.m. EST

Sen. Rand Paul got a rousing reception this afternoon at the Conservative Political Action Conference, lighting up a crowd that tends to have a libertarian streak to it, saying, "In the coming weeks, I will propose the largest tax cut in American history."

Speaking with rolled-up sleeves, he promised to pitch "a tax cut that will leave more money in the paychecks of every worker in America. My tax plan will keep the IRS out of your life and out the way of every job creator in America. My plan will also cut spending and balance the budget in just five years."

Paul, R-Ky., blasted Congress, now controlled by Republicans, calling it "dysfunctional."

"Often, bills are plopped on our desk with only a few hours to review," he said. "No one, and I mean no one, is able to read what is in the bill. I propose something truly outrageous: Congress should read every bill."

The crowd was packed with supporters, and Paul was interrupted by chants of "President Paul, President Paul." He perhaps received the loudest applause when talking about personal privacy and going after the woman he may face if he they both choose to run in 2016: Hillary Clinton.

"Hillary's war in Libya is a perfect example," he told the CPAC crowd in National Harbor, Maryland. "Hillary's war made us less safe," adding, "Libya's less stable."

He said to cheers: "It's time for Hillary Clinton to permanently retire."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Calling the crowd “lovers of liberty,” he asked them to “rise to the occasion.”

“You do have a right to privacy," he said. "Your rights are who you are, your rights are what you are, your rights are in your DNA -- and the government can, quite frankly, get over it.

"I say that the phone records of law-abiding citizens are none of their damn business," he added. "From within, our freedom is threatened by debt and by a government that regulates everything that moves.”

He differed in some ways with other Republican presidential contenders who have taken the stage at the conference since Thursday, specifically on the issue of foreign policy -- an issue that may make him an outlier in the GOP field, but was well-received by the libertarian-leaning activists gathered.

“At home, conservatives understand that the government is the problem, not the solution. But as conservatives, we should not succumb to the notion that government inept at home will somehow become successful abroad,” he said, "that a government that can’t even deliver the mail will somehow be able to create nations abroad. Without question, we must be strong. Without question, we must defend ourselves. I envision an America with a national defense unparalleled, undefeatable and unencumbered by nation building.”

He ended the speech by asking the crowd to “stand” with him: “Will you fight for freedom? Will you vote for freedom?”

Paul is popular with the CPAC crowd. He has won the CPAC straw poll the last two years, and his father, former Rep. Ron Paul, a three-time Republican presidential candidate, won the straw poll in 2010 and 2011. This year's winner will be revealed Saturday.

However, Paul received some criticism today at CPAC, even if it was veiled.

Right after Paul spoke, former Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., a 2012 presidential candidate, took the stage. Santorum didn’t mention Paul’s name, but in the past he has said he thinks possible candidates like Paul, as well as Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., and Sen. Ted Cruz, R-Texas -- all in their first terms -- do not have enough experience to be president.

He said it was the president’s “profound lack of experience that has created the problems for us here in America,” stressing his own “eight years of service on the armed services committee” while he was in the Senate.

"Commander-in-chief is not an entry-level position,” he said. “[The] Oval Office is no place for on-the-job training, not in times like this.”

The pro-Clinton group "Correct the Record," responded to Paul's speech with spokeswoman Adrienne Elrod saying in a statement, "Rand Paul's brand of extreme isolationism would foster global instability."

She said "Americans want a tested and proven leader like Hillary Clinton."

New York Times: First Draft: “Group Backing Netanyahu Will Air Ad Attacking Hillary Clinton”

By Maggie Haberman

February 27, 2015 3:27 p.m. EST

The first television advertisement of the 2016 presidential campaign cycle to attack Hillary Rodham Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, will have its debut this weekend, paid for by a neoconservative group that strongly supports Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel.

The ad is being purchased by the Emergency Committee for Israel, a group started by William Kristol, the editor of The Weekly Standard, who has been deeply critical of President Obama and of Mrs. Clinton, the former secretary of state.

It is being supported with a small advertising buy: about $200,000, mainly on cable networks, beginning with the Sunday news shows and running through Tuesday, with some placements during the morning shows on two broadcast networks. There will also be a digital component, according to an official with the group, although it was unclear what portion of the dollar figure will be spent online.

The ad comes less than two weeks after a Republican group, American Crossroads, began running a web-only advertisement critical of Mrs. Clinton.

The new saber-rattling ad is harshest with Mr. Obama, but its main target is clearly Mrs. Clinton. The commercial ties together the Obama administration’s nuclear talks with Iran and Mr. Netanyahu’s scheduled speech before Congress at the invitation of House Republicans, which has been met with protest from Democrats, a number of whom plan to boycott the address. The ad then turns to Mrs. Clinton, who has not spoken publicly about Mr. Netanyahu’s speech.

“Does she support the boycotters, or is she too afraid to stand up to them?” it asks.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton did not respond to an email for comment. A White House press aide did not respond to an email.

Mrs. Clinton wrote extensively about her sometimes contentious dealings with Mr. Netanyahu in “Hard Choices,” a memoir that she promoted heavily last year. But she also forcefully defended Israel in its conflict with Hamas in a widely discussed interview with the columnist Jeffrey Goldberg of The Atlantic.

While Mrs. Clinton is not expected to seek to distance herself from Mr. Obama on domestic policy to a great extent, she has pointed to areas of disagreement with the administration on global issues, and she is historically more hawkish than the president.

With foreign policy potentially playing a bigger role in this presidential campaign than it did in 2012, Republicans have long planned to try to make Mrs. Clinton's tenure as secretary of state a liability. And top Republican operatives have spent months discussing the possibility of airing ads before Mrs. Clinton officially begins a campaign, to try to define her before she openly starts to present herself to voters as a candidate.

"The Obama administration has launched an all-out assault against the Israeli prime minister," Noah Pollak, the executive director of the Emergency Committee for Israel, said in a statement. "Friends of the Jewish state ranging from Joe Lieberman to Elie Wiesel to Shelley Berkley have rallied to his defense. Hillary Clinton has remained silent. It's time for the former secretary of state and prospective presidential candidate to come out of hiding and tell us where she stands. Does Hillary Clinton stand with the boycotters or the supporters of Israel?"

Lancaster Online: "Sen. Casey expects Clinton to be Democratic nominee"

By Karen Shuey

February 27, 2015

There may not be any official candidates for president yet, but Sen. Bob Casey is betting on Hillary Clinton to be the Democratic nominee.

His spokesman, John Rizzo, responded with that message to an email Friday morning inquiring whether Casey's spike in appearances on national news outlets was a precursor to a 2016 presidential run.

"No. Senator Casey loves his work in the Senate. Senator Casey expects Secretary Clinton to be the nominee," Rizzo wrote in the email but would say if the senator will throw his support behind Clinton for the nomination.

Poll after poll shows Clinton is the safest bet.

Public Policy Polling's newest national survey finds Clinton leading all of her potential Democratic challengers.

The poll, released Wednesday, found that 54 percent of the party's voters want her to be their candidate to 16 percent for Vice President Joe Biden, 12 percent for Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, 5 percent for Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, 2 percent for former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb and 1 percent for former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley.

Clinton has more than 50 percent support for the nomination from almost all demographic groups tracked by the poll. The only two groups where she falls a bit short of that mark are men and middle-aged voters.

The former secretary of state is also ahead when the poll pits her against potential Republican candidates.

She has 7 point advantages over Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio. An 8 point advantage over retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker. And a 10-point lead over former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz.

The poll surveyed 691 registered voters, including 310 Democratic primary voters, from Feb. 20- 22. The margin of error for the overall survey is plus or minus 3.7 percentage points, and for the Democratic primary component it's 5.6 percentage points.

CNN: "Hillary Clinton stacks March schedule with women's events, a paid speech"

By Dan Merica

February 27, 2015, 2:15 p.m. EST

After a handful events in two months, Hillary Clinton has filled her March with a mix of women's events, nonprofit speeches and at least one paid appearance.

In January and February, Clinton headlined three events -- only one of which was in the United States. But as Clinton moves closer to her expected 2016 presidential campaign announcement, the former secretary or state has at least seven events scheduled for the month of March.

Most of Clinton's events are focused on one thing: women.

Clinton starts her month by headlining the 30th anniversary gala for Emily's List -- a pro-Clinton organization that focused on helping Democratic women win elected office. At the D.C. speech on March 3, Clinton is expected to give a nod to the group's importance to Democrats and highlight the reason more women are needed in politics.

Emily's List has been energized by Clinton's campaign and has pledged to raise and spend more money than any other election cycle because of the prospect of a Clinton White House.

The following week, Clinton will headline two New York events tied to her 1995 speech to the U.N. Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing -- a speech Clinton regularly references in pitches to women. In that speech Clinton said, "If there is one message that echoes forth from this conference, let it be that human rights are women's rights and women's rights are human rights once and for all."

On March 9, Clinton teams up with Chelsea, her daughter, and Melinda Gates to release a report through the Clinton Foundation that looks at "the gaps that still remain" in women's participation in the economy and politics.

The following day -- on March 10 -- Clinton will headline the United Nation's Women Empowerment Principles annual gathering in New York. Clinton will use the speech to outline the findings in the Clinton Foundation report and "reflect on progress made in implementing the agenda set in Beijing two decades ago," the organizers said in a release about the event.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On March 16, Clinton will be inducted into the Irish America Hall of Fame at an event in New York. Clinton is not Irish -- her family is of English, Scottish, French, and Welsh descent -- but she is being hooded because of "her dedicated work on Irish Peace Process."

"Hillary Rodham Clinton is one of the unsung heroes of the success of the Irish peace process," said Irish America co-founder Niall O'Dowd.

In 1998, Clinton put together the Vital Voices Conference of women in Belfast, a body that pressed for a piece agreement. The former secretary of state cited her experiences in Ireland during a number of speeches in 2014.

O'Dowd is a longtime Clinton supporter, though,and was a member of her 2008 campaign finance team. Some Republicans have questioned how active Clinton was in the Northern Ireland peace process. The Washington Post Fact Checker wrote in 2008 that Clinton "seems to be overstating her significance as a catalyst in the Northern Ireland peace process, which was more symbolic than substantive," but that she did play "a helpful role at the margins."

On March 19, Clinton will headline her only confirmed paid speech of the month when she heads to Atlantic City for the American Camp Association, NY & NJ Conference.

Susie Lupert, the group's executive director, tells CNN, "Yes, just like most nonprofits and conferences, she is being paid for her appearance." But she would not confirm how much she is being paid. On average, Clinton makes between $200,000 and $300,000 per speech.

Near the end of the month, on March 23 in Washington, D.C., Clinton will be the keynote speaker at the award celebration for the Toner Prize for Excellence in Political Reporting from Syracuse University.

Robin Toner, who graduated from Syracuse, was the first woman national political correspondent for the New York Times.

Syracuse Dean Lorraine Branham said Clinton is a "vivid example — like Robin — of a pioneering woman at the top of her profession."

Clinton headlining an event honoring political journalists is somewhat unique because for decades she has held a dim view of the profession.

In a 1996, according to the diary of the late Clinton confidant Diane Blair, Clinton said the media are "complete hypocrites." At an event in 2014, Clinton said "journalism has changed quite a bit in a way that is not good for the country and not good for journalism."

"A lot of serious news reporting has become more entertainment driven and more opinion-driven as opposed to factual," she said. "People book onto the shows, political figures, commentators who will be controversial who will be provocative because it's a good show. You might not learn anything but you might be entertained and I think that's just become an unfortunate pattern that I wish could be broken."

Clinton's presidential campaign has become a forgone conclusion and Democrats close to Clinton expect she will announce some official move towards the presidency in April.

Politico: "At CPAC, Republicans attack Hillary Clinton from every angle"

By Gabriel Debenedetti

February 27, 2015, 6:38 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Democrats suggest the varying attacks show GOP is confused about how to take her on.

NATIONAL HARBOR, Md. — Texas Sen. Ted Cruz said Hillary Clinton couldn't make it to the Conservative Political Action Conference because "we couldn't find a foreign nation to foot the bill." Carly Fiorina, the former Hewlett-Packard CEO, insisted Clinton "likes hashtags, but she doesn't know what leadership means." And former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush knocked her on conflict of interest claims involving her family's foundation.

It was amply clear at the annual conservative confab this week that Clinton has eclipsed Barack Obama as the Republican residential hopefuls' main punching bag. But it is the sheer number of distinct anti-Clinton attack lines that is raising eyebrows.

Whether onstage or off, Republicans derided Clinton from every angle. They cast the 67-year-old as yesterday's news, brought up her husband Bill Clinton's 1990s scandals, questioned the rationale for her expected run for the White House, criticized her high-dollar speaking fees, and, of course, lashed her over the Benghazi attacks.

Republicans eager to derail a Clinton 2016 campaign, like those flooding the Gaylord National Resort and Convention Center here, see the panoply of critiques as a show of force against a candidate they insist is more vulnerable than her allies realize. Watching warily from afar, however, Democrats eager to see a Clinton presidency cast the attacks as a sign of confusion in the GOP, predicting the mish-mash of arguments will fail to jell and dent the former secretary of state's image.

Both sides could agree on one thing: that the brewing questions about the Clinton Foundation's funding — the theme gaining most attention at CPAC and among national political operatives in recent weeks — pose special danger for her. "The foundation stuff is real," said a Democrat in Clinton's orbit. "That's hurting."

Clinton has stayed relatively low-key in recent months, appearing in public within the United States for the first time just this week. She is expected to take a formal step toward a presidential run before the end of April, and her allies expect she and her campaign team will engage with such criticisms once she does. Republicans, however, cite her aides' unwillingness to take on the critics now as evidence that Clinton is "hiding" because she doesn't have a good response.

"Hillary barely comes out in public these days," Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus said on stage. "If there's not a private luxury jet and a quarter million-dollar speaking fee waiting for her, you can forget about it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans' intense and long-standing focus on Clinton suggest many of them expect her to be a formidable candidate. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, for instance, warned a packed hotel suite of about 100 college students that Clinton has strategic advantages because she is a woman and could make history by winning the White House.

But as White House aspirants paraded through the convention center halls this week and riled up conservative activists from the stage, fellow Republicans brushed off the notion that there were too many arguments against Clinton floating around, pointing out that 2016 hopefuls aren't expected to coordinate their messages.

"Democrats have a real problem if they are complaining about Hillary Clinton having too many vulnerabilities for Republicans to exploit. This is further proof of how flawed their candidate is and why she won't come out of hiding to talk with voters," RNC spokeswoman Allison Moore said.

Democrats pointed out that Clinton, a public figure for decades, has weathered numerous controversies in the past, and that it will be hard for any one issue to change perceptions of her so far ahead of the election, especially when Republicans are hitting her with so many separate criticisms.

"It's more important to get [the campaign launch] right than to be out there to deal with all these one-offs," said former Bill Clinton White House aide Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist.

The anti-Clinton messages were not limited to the main speakers' stage at CPAC: posters trashing the former first lady line the walls; college-age Republicans frequently refer to Clinton as the enemy as they stroll the hallways; and the official schedule included a screening of an anti-Clinton documentary.

Republican 2016 hopefuls speaking at the convention center aren't trying to sway independents; they're trying to excite the GOP base, and a stinger of a line about Clinton is worth the barrage of attention it will get.

Speaking on Friday afternoon, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul fumed over the 2012 attacks on the U.S. mission in Benghazi, Libya, whose victims included U.S. Ambassador Christopher Stevens. He called on Clinton to "permanently retire."

"Hillary's war made us less safe," Paul said. "As Hillary was declaring victory in Libya, Ambassador Stevens was pleading for more security."

Asked by conservative media personality Sean Hannity for a one-word description of Clinton a few hours later, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said, "foreign fundraising."

Some of the harshest attacks of the week against Clinton have come from Fiorina, the sole woman in the emerging GOP presidential field, who appears to be positioning herself as its top Clinton antagonist.

Fiorina zeroed in on the Clinton Foundation and its relationships with foreign governments: "Please explain why we should accept that the millions and millions of dollars that have flowed into the Clinton Global Initiative from foreign governments doesn't represent a conflict of interest," Fiorina implored an energized crowd on Thursday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Speaking next that afternoon, Cruz went a similar route, saying Clinton “embodies the corruption of Washington.” Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, meanwhile, continued his tactic of painting Clinton as a candidate of “yesterday.”

But amid the deluge of anti-Clinton talk, one unexpected argument in particular caught CPAC’s attention and set the crowd abuzz.

The notion was offered up by popular conservative radio host Laura Ingraham, who was tasked with helping rouse the sleepy activists on Friday morning.

“Why don’t we just call it quits?” she asked. “Jeb and Hillary can run on the same ticket.”

Politico: “Rick Santorum makes a Kenya joke about Obama”

By Nick Gass

February 27, 2015, 1:38 p.m. EST

The world is a dangerous and complex place, former Sen. Rick Santorum told the Conservative Political Action Conference on Friday, even more so than when he ran for the presidency in 2012.

He called out President Barack Obama and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton in particular, two perennial targets at the annual gathering of conservative activists.

“We don’t need just someone with a strong economic plan. Thanks to the Obama-Clinton foreign policy team, we have gone from a policy of peace through strength to a policy of leading from behind,” he said.

“In fact, the president’s popularity is so bad around the world today that I heard a source that the Kenyan government is actually developing proof that Barack Obama was actually born in America,” he joked.

Santorum broached the possibility of a GOP candidate facing Clinton in the general election next year. That candidate had better call “radical Islam” by its name, he said.

“The likelihood that we’re going to face a former secretary of state means that we need someone who has a long and deep understanding of the threats we confront, particularly the threat of radical Islam,” he said, adding that the president’s “profound lack of experience has created problems.”

“Commander in chief is not an entry-level position,” the former Pennsylvania senator said, touting his time on the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Santorum called for boots on the ground to defeat the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant, as well as increased aid to Jordan and Egypt.

“We need to start by crushing ISIS. Now,” he said, using an alternative name for the terrorist group. “We must start in Iraq. We need to get ISIS out of Iraq. The first thing we need to do is arm the Kurds. Instead of sending them bandages and bodybags, we need to send them weapons.”

If Iran develops a nuclear weapon, Santorum warned, the U.S. will have failed in its negotiations.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu’s upcoming address to Congress has become a political flashpoint, with many Democrats, including Vice President Joe Biden, declining to attend.

“In the end, Prime Minister Netanyahu would not be coming to America, he would not be risking the most important national security arrangement that Israel has if it wasn’t for the fact that he believed in his heart that Iran’s and the United States’ nuclear negotiations was going to end up being an existential threat to his country,” Santorum said.

New York Times: “Bush Confronts Skeptics at Conservative Gathering”

By Jonathan Martin and Maggie Haberman

February 27, 2015

OXON HILL, Md. — Confronting a somewhat hostile crowd for the first time since declaring his interest in a presidential race, Jeb Bush on Friday reiterated his support for an immigration overhaul and for Common Core education standards, positions that are anathema to many hard-line conservatives who play an outsize role in some of the early nominating states.

But Mr. Bush, the former Florida governor, also emphasized his conservative credentials, pointing to his efforts to curb spending during his two terms in Tallahassee and to create a business-friendly climate in the state.

The combination — refusing to bow on the more centrist positions he feels strongly about while highlighting his right-leaning record in office — offered a preview of the sort of primary campaign Mr. Bush intends to run. He and his advisers have styled it “inclusive conservatism,” and say they believe it will be crucial to win the party’s nomination and still remain viable for the general election.

Mr. Bush, appearing at the annual Conservative Political Action Conference here before thousands of activists — who gave Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin a rousing reception on Thursday, and broke out into chants of “President Paul!” for Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky earlier on Friday — offered language that differed sharply from the trail of presidential hopefuls who had preceded him onstage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The simple fact is there is no plan to deport 11 million people,” Mr. Bush said, calling for “a path to legal status” for illegal immigrants. He also said flatly, “No,” when asked if Common Core amounted to a federal takeover of education.

And he explained to a mostly white audience that Republicans should aggressively appeal to people “who don’t know they are conservatives,” mentioning minority groups and young voters.

Mr. Bush’s name was much discussed before he arrived at the conference, long an important fixture on the Republican political calendar. While he is not the front-runner in polls, Mr. Bush is expected to amass a large fund-raising advantage over his rivals. This perceived financial strength has created a sense of foreboding among some who say they fear that another Bush presidency would depart from conservative orthodoxy much as the first two did.

That hostility was stoked earlier in the conference. The conservative talk-show host Laura Ingraham used repeated appearances to savage Mr. Bush — mocking his wife’s expensive jewelry purchases at one point — and nudged Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey to swipe at him. And a succession of White House hopefuls drew implicit contrasts, citing their conservative stances on immigration and education and describing their roots as decidedly more humble than that of a president’s son.

Notably, while Mr. Bush criticized President Obama and Democrats, he was chiefly focused on delivering his own message. This was an exception at a gathering where many presidential aspirants delivered scathing attacks on Mr. Obama and, to a lesser degree, on Hillary Rodham Clinton, the likely Democratic nominee in 2016.

Mr. Bush declined to give a prepared speech. Instead, he spent just under 25 minutes answering gently adversarial questions from the conservative talk-show host Sean Hannity about his policy positions and his view of the Republican Party.

Standing the entire time, Mr. Bush appeared considerably more animated and at ease than he did when delivering policy speeches this month in more staid settings.

Mr. Hannity brought up Mr. Bush’s support in Florida for offering driver’s licenses to illegal immigrants and for allowing illegal immigrants’ children to receive in-state college tuition. Mr. Bush parried by saying that no such driver’s-license bill was ever passed, and that Florida’s conservative-dominated Legislature had approved the in-state tuition measure and that the state’s Republican governor signed it last year.

Mr. Bush was booed loudly a few times, but he seemed ready. “I’m marking it down as neutral, and I want to be your second choice if I decide to go beyond this,” he told his adversaries in the crowd.

Eventually, Mr. Hannity softened his line of questioning and allowed Mr. Bush to detail his record as governor from 1999 to 2007. Mr. Bush said he had run on conservative principles, recalled his expansion of school vouchers, and noted that he had ended affirmative action in higher education. He boasted that he had been called “Veto Corleone” for his spending cuts. And he earned laughter when he spoke of the budget reserves he had left behind: “No drunken sailors,” he said.

Though there were many skeptics in the audience, Mr. Bush was not exactly walking into a political lion’s den. There were a good number of his supporters in the audience, notably well-tailored and many of them wearing red JEB lapel pins, who did their best to drown out any catcalls with cheers and applause.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hoping to pre-empt any mischief at the conference, Mr. Bush's backers, including a group of lobbyists and advisers, worked with former aides from President George W. Bush's administration to organize a caravan from Washington to the hotel in Maryland where the conference was being held.

After his appearance in the main ballroom, Mr. Bush addressed a smaller group of his supporters, who crowded a meeting room. Mr. Bush sounded another pragmatic note, saying that Republicans needed to remain unified despite their differences.

"A campaign should be about getting to 50" percent, he said, "not trying to tear down the differences between the 35 or the 40." He added: "Last time I checked, in a two-person race, you got to get to 50."

Jeb Bush faces plenty of early warning signs (WAPO)
By Aaron Blake
February 11, 2015
By Washington Post

We've seen a smattering of new polls of the nascent 2016 campaign in recent days.

The good news for Jeb Bush: Most of them show him as a front-runner.

The bad news: There's plenty of bad news.

Of the four major Iowa and New Hampshire polls released over the past 10 days, half show Bush leading, and all show him toward the front. This is a function, in large part, of name recognition. But there are plenty of warning signs, too.

Here's a quick recap:

1) His image numbers are not good

The lone Iowa poll in the bunch shows that likely Iowa GOP caucus-goers view Bush more negatively than anybody not named Chris Christie. Just 46 percent had a favorable opinion of Bush in the Bloomberg/Des Moines Register poll, while 43 percent had an unfavorable one. Again, this is Republicans.

Bush's numbers in New Hampshire (where the universe of voters is less conservative) were better, but not by a huge amount. He was at 61 percent favorable/26 percent unfavorable in the Bloomberg/Saint Anselm College poll released over the weekend, and at 47/33 in the University of New Hampshire/WMUR-TV released just prior.

Part of this is that Republicans today are just fussier when it comes to purity, and Bush can't help but be seen as the establishment (i.e. "moderate," to the tea party) candidate. But it's also clear they have some preconceived notions about Bush that he'll have to dispel.

Which brings us to...

2) The name isn't helping

Bloomberg asked likely New Hampshire primary voters whether they viewed Bush's and Hillary Rodham Clinton's prospects as being more tied to their own accomplishments or to their family name.

While just 21 percent of Democrats said Clinton is a front-runner because of her family connections, 59 percent of Republicans say the same about Bush. Only 31 percent said Bush is where he's at because of his "unique qualities and achievements."

Similarly, a Washington Post/ABC News poll released a few weeks ago showed the Bush name was a net-negative for 33 percent of voters, while just 11 percent said it was a reason to vote for him. It was more even among Republicans, but again, it wasn't nearly the benefit the Clinton name was.

3) The porridge question

The other reason Bush's numbers might suffer -- in addition to him being a Bush -- is that he's seen as too moderate. We're not sure how much people have actually processed his positions in favor of comprehensive immigration reform and Common Core, but already 37 percent of likely Iowa caucus-goers see him as "too moderate." Another 7 percent say he's "too conservative."

In fact, the 40 percent who say Bush is ideologically "about right" is lower than Ben Carson (49 percent), Ted Cruz (48), Mike Huckabee (57), Rand Paul (55), Rick Perry (62), Mitt Romney (46), Marco Rubio (53), Rick Santorum (49) and Scott Walker (56). That's pretty much anybody who is reasonably well-known (and isn't named Chris Christie).

4) Immigration and Common Core

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While most likely New Hampshire primary voters don't yet say these issues are disqualifying, plenty still do. The Bloomberg poll showed 41 percent of likely New Hampshire primary voters say Bush's pro-comprehensive immigration reform position is a deal-killer, while 20 percent say the same of Common Core. Those are significant chunks of voters who say Bush's positions are non-starters.

Perhaps more illustrative, just 40 percent say Common Core is not a real problem for them when it comes to Bush, and just 22 percent say the same of his immigration position. The others are in the mushy middle (but haven't ruled out supporting him) or haven't decided.

The good news is that these liabilities, at this point, aren't yet overwhelming; Scott Walker's lack of foreign policy experience, for comparison, is deemed as a deal-killer by 28 percent of Republicans — something we have a hard time believing will pan out.

All of this, indeed, is quite preliminary. While Bush has been something of an open book, the campaign hasn't actually begun in earnest, and thus he hasn't had much of a chance to combat these early preconceived notions. These notions, in other words, probably aren't based on a whole heck of a lot.

What these numbers prove, though, is that there are preconceived notions that he'll have to contend with. And they're generally bigger hurdles than his opponents have to clear.

Of course, his opponents aren't likely to have the kind of funding Bush does, either.

Hillary Clinton has a busy March, but all's quiet now (WAP)
By Anne Gearan
February 10, 2015
The Washington Post

This post has been updated.

Hillary Rodham Clinton is everywhere and nowhere these days.

The subject of daily news stories and Republican attacks befitting her position as the 2016 Democratic front-runner, Clinton has made just two public speaking appearances since Christmas. Both of them were in the voter-rich state of Canada. She hasn't visited Iowa or New Hampshire since the November midterm election.

As she readies a vast campaign operation to be rolled out later this spring, Clinton is keeping an intentionally low profile. She isn't even an official participant in a Clinton Foundation event Tuesday at which her husband and daughter spoke.

Clinton did attend a session with daughter Chelsea on saving endangered wild elephants that was closed to the press. The day-long Clinton Global Initiative winter meeting focused on the Clinton network's expanding philanthropic efforts.

By staying mostly mum now, Clinton isn't exactly keeping people guessing. Although she heads off questions about her intentions in public, Clinton has sent unmistakable signals to Democrats that she is running. Her quiet schedule makes it easier to navigate this time in official political limbo, although of course everything Clinton says and does is viewed through that lens.

The former first lady, senator, secretary of state and 2008 presidential candidate is in heavy demand as a speaker, both paid and unpaid, but is declining most invitations. She will speak at a Silicon Valley technology conference later this month, for which she is expected to draw a paycheck of $250,000 or more.

She has a busy March planned, with at least four speaking appearances. She is expected to be paid for one of those, a practice that has already raised eyebrows and that would be awkward to continue once Clinton announces. There is nothing on her public schedule after March 23.

Big donors awaiting word from Clinton (WAPO)
By Matea Gold
February 11, 2015
The Washington Post

Hillary Rodham Clinton's decision to delay an announcement about her presidential ambitions until as late as July has stymied efforts of a major allied super PAC to come out of the gate early with a slew of big-money commitments.

Priorities USA Action - which has positioned itself as the main advertising vehicle to back a Clinton candidacy - had hoped to line up dozens of seven-figure pledges before April as a show of strength but has secured only about 10, according to people familiar with the situation.

One factor that has contributed to the reluctance: Many wealthy political givers on the left have written large checks to the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation, part a drive to raise money for the nonprofit organization before a likely Clinton presidential run. Major foundation donors have indicated to super-PAC fundraisers that they are holding off on other large pledges for now, according to people with knowledge of the conversations.

Priorities' slow progress has prompted internal conversations about whether the group will recalibrate what it can expect to raise this cycle - a sum that people close to the operation originally expected to be around $300 million. The super PAC's difficulties in securing pledges were first reported late Tuesday by Politico.

Priorities officials said they are not concerned.

"Priorities USA Action chose not to raise money in the 2014 cycle because we did not want to compete with the many good Democrats who were fighting for their political lives," senior adviser Paul Begala said in a statement. "We will play a critical role in electing a Democratic President in 2016. Anyone who doubts us should ask President Romney."

Many party fundraisers concur, saying that once Clinton is officially in the race, the money will rush in from loyalists and new donors eager to be part of her candidacy.

"I think it's like everything else going on -- what's the timeline with her?" said one party strategist familiar with the dynamics, who requested anonymity to discuss donor attitudes. "Once things are more finalized with what she is doing, their job will become a little easier."

Some top Democratic contributors said they won't consider committing large amounts until she is officially in the race.

"I'm waiting to see if Hillary announces a campaign and to see what it looks like," said David desJardins, San Francisco-based investor who supports independent political groups on the left.

Among the major Clinton supporters who have not pledged to Priorities is Esprit co-founder Susie Tompkins Buell, according to a person familiar with the situation. Buell, an early backer of the group Ready for Hillary, did not return a request for comment.

Billionaire media mogul Haim Saban, who has said he will spend "whatever it takes" to help Clinton reach the White House, has also not made a commitment to the super PAC, according to a person with knowledge of the fundraising efforts. Saban and his family have given between $10 million and $25 million to the Clinton Foundation, including a donation last year, according to the foundation's records. A spokeswoman for Saban could not immediately be reached for comment.

The difficulties that Priorities has encountered in assembling an early money juggernaut also suggests that Democrats are still working to overcome distaste in the donor community for big-money groups.

New York venture capitalist Alan Patricof, a longtime Clinton friend and fundraiser, said he does not plan to get involved until she is an official candidate - and at that point, he said, he will probably focus his efforts on helping her official campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I am not much interested in a super PAC,” he said. “It’s just not something I believe in. I’m not ready to deal with the realities that people can give any amount of money.”

The early donor drought is one of the factors that led to a public falling-out this week between liberal activist David Brock and Priorities officials. Brock, who runs a network of prominent groups on the left such as Media Matter and American Bridge, noisily resigned from the super PAC’s board Monday, accusing people affiliated with the group of feeding negative information to the New York Times about the fundraising practices of his organizations.

After outreach by top Priorities officials, Brock agreed to reconsider joining the group. But the public showdown exposed a clash between two power spheres on the left, both vying for big contributions.

Supporters of Priorities were hoping to build an early financial base and avoid scrambling for dollars in the midst of the campaign, as the group did during the 2012 race, when the nascent super PAC initially struggled to raise money to run ads on behalf of President Obama.

In the end, Priorities pulled in $79 million. While the group was far outpaced by the pro-Mitt Romney super PAC Restore Our Future, which raised $153 million, its hard-hitting ads were credited with helping frame the Republican presidential nominee as an out-of-touch plutocrat.

This time around, the donor outreach began early. The day after last November’s elections, DreamWorks Animation chief executive Jeffrey Katzenberg and Hollywood political strategist Andy Spahn began reaching out to potential backers, urging them to make commitments to Priorities, which was refashioned into a pro-Clinton vehicle after 2012.

Other top officials have also been making pitches, including Priorities board co-chair and former Michigan governor Jennifer Granholm, executive director Buffy Wicks, finance adviser Jonathan Mantz, and senior advisers Sean Sweeney and Begala.

Less involved has been Jim Messina, who ran President Obama’s reelection campaign and co-chairs Priorities with Granholm. Most recently, he has been in London, where he has been consulting for Prime Minister David Cameron in the run-up to British elections.

Emerging Clinton Team Shows Signs of Disquiet (NYT)
By Nicholas Confessore and Amy Chozick
February 11, 2015
The New York Times

Lingering tensions between Hillary Rodham Clinton's loyalists and the strategists who helped President Obama defeat her in 2008 have erupted into an intense public struggle over who will wield money and clout in her emerging 2016 presidential campaign.

At issue is controlling access to the deep-pocketed donors whose support is critical to sustain the outside organizations that are paving the way for Mrs. Clinton's campaign. It is a competition that has been exacerbated, many Clinton supporters said, by Mrs. Clinton's reluctance to formally enter the race and establish a campaign organization with clear lines of authority.

The dispute broke into the open on Monday after David Brock, a Clinton ally, accused Priorities USA Action — a pro-Clinton "super PAC" whose co-chairman is Jim Messina, Mr. Obama's 2012 campaign manager — of planting negative stories about the fund-raising practices of Mr. Brock's organizations. Mr. Brock resigned from the super PAC's board in protest.

Mr. Messina is one of the half dozen top veterans of Mr. Obama's campaigns that Mrs. Clinton's tight-knit circle of advisers has hired or courted, vexing some longtime Clintonites seeking more prominent roles for themselves. Other former Obama aides are working with pro-Clinton groups to organize grass-roots volunteers or to fend off attacks on her record, efforts that some Democrats view as the first step toward a place in Mrs. Clinton's campaign when it finally gets off the ground.

All recognize that Mrs. Clinton's political operation could dominate the Democratic Party for the next decade, controlling the flow of commissions, consulting work and political appointments. But the marriage between the two camps — based to a large degree on mutual interest, if not love — now appears more uneasy than at any time since Mr. Obama asked Mrs. Clinton to serve in his administration after the 2008 election.

"It is 'The Dream Team,' but only five can start," said John Morgan, a Florida lawyer who has raised money for both Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama. "Who do you put at guard? Jordan, LeBron, Kobe, Magic, Bird, Derrick Rose? That is where it is."

The list of Obama veterans now working in "Clinton World" includes the New York-based pollster Joel Benenson, who Mrs. Clinton has settled on as chief strategist over several pollsters with long Clinton ties. A consulting firm founded by two Obama voter-turnout specialists, Mitch Stewart and Jeremy Bird, is being paid $20,000 a month by Ready for Hillary, a super PAC focused on organizing grass-roots Clinton supporters. Jim Margolis, whose firm handled lucrative media-buying contracts for Mr. Obama's campaigns, will also advise Mrs. Clinton, whose campaign will probably raise and spend over a billion dollars in the next two years.

But Mr. Brock's path to the Clinton inner circle is perhaps the most convoluted. Once a conservative journalist whose reporting on President Bill Clinton prompted Paula Jones's 1994 sexual harassment lawsuit against him, Mr. Brock has since emerged as a prominent liberal organizer and one of Mrs. Clinton's chief defenders.

With the tacit blessing of both Clintons, Mr. Brock has maneuvered his $28 million network of media-monitoring and opposition research organizations into the center of the emerging Clinton effort, establishing a new project, Correct the Record, that has defended Mrs. Clinton in the news media and even issued daily emails explaining her positions.

His successful fund-raising has been led by Mary Pat Bonner, whose firm has been paid millions of dollars by Mr. Brock's groups to court donors — some of whom have criticized the arrangement as well as Mr. Brock.

"He is a cancer," said Mr. Morgan, who is close to Mr. Messina.

"If you care about your party and our country, you just do what you are asked," said Mr. Morgan, referring to Mr. Brock's public resignation from Priorities USA, which immediately reignited tales of infighting from Mrs. Clinton's 2008 campaign. "If you care about yourself, you take your toys and go home."

Mr. Brock declined to comment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Susie Tompkins Buell, a friend of Mrs. Clinton's and a donor from San Francisco who is close to Mr. Brock, said he "is an incredibly important part of the Democratic Party" whose work "protects us from the onslaught and destruction of the Republican attack machine."

Ms. Buell added: "Certain people are trying to destroy David through off-the-record conversations with reporters. They are spineless and devious."

Mr. Messina, now a consultant with a significant roster of corporate and political clients, became co-chairman of Priorities early last year, charged with helping the advertising-oriented super PAC secure hundreds of millions of dollars in contributions. But with the campaign season still a year away, Mr. Messina and his team have encountered some difficulty getting commitments, according to several Democrats involved in helping the group.

Mr. Brock, in turn, has been reluctant to cede turf — or pre-eminence — to Obama veterans like Mr. Messina. "He was never accepted" by the Obama camp, said one Clinton loyalist, who like most people interviewed for this article declined to speak on the record for fear of angering either the president or the woman who hopes to replace him.

Months ago, Mrs. Clinton's top advisers encouraged the three pro-Clinton super PACs — Ready for Hillary, Priorities USA, and Mr. Brock's American Bridge 21st Century — to combine efforts. Mr. Brock's organization would provide opposition research to Priorities, which would eventually raise high-dollar donations to pay for attack ads. Ready for Hillary would dissolve after Mrs. Clinton officially declared her candidacy.

But Priorities is the only one of the groups founded by Obama operatives, making it the least easiest to fit into the emerging Clinton apparatus. And all outside groups are facing increased competition from official party organizations, like the Democratic National Committee, which are now free to solicit their own million-dollar commitments from big donors, thanks to new campaign finance rules inserted into December's federal spending bill.

In a statement, Mr. Messina suggested there was little tension with Mr. Brock or his organizations. "Priorities USA Action works closely and cooperatively with progressive champion David Brock and American Bridge," he said. "Both organizations have clear and complementary missions, and we look forward to continuing to work together to build on our shared success."

Several donors approached by Priorities in recent months, including some advised by Ms. Bonner, said they had already given generously or otherwise committed to Mr. Brock. Mr. Messina's allies worry that Clinton loyalists will seek to replace him with another strategist closer to Mrs. Clinton, perhaps Guy Cecil, previously a contender for the job of Mrs. Clinton's campaign manager.

When the Priorities board issued a statement on Monday evening asking Mr. Brock to reconsider his resignation, it was signed not by Mr. Messina but by his co-chairwoman, Jennifer M. Granholm, the former Michigan governor and a Clinton supporter in 2008. Ms. Granholm and other Priorities officials have sought to soothe Mr. Brock, Democrats assisting the group said, and he has suggested he would be open to rejoining the super PAC's board.

In an interview, Mr. Messina denied a report in BuzzFeed that he had used the controversy around Ms. Bonner's fees to try to rally donors around a pledge to hold back checks from any organizations paying fund-raisers on commission. Such a campaign could cripple Mr. Brock's groups, which rely entirely on Ms. Bonner's firm to raise money.

"I've never heard of a petition, I don't know anything about it, no one has talked to me," Mr. Messina said. "It's not true."

Hillary Clinton fundraising off to slow start (Politico)
By Kenneth Vogel
February 10, 2015
Politico

The main super PAC supporting Hillary Clinton is struggling in its early efforts to line up cash toward a fundraising goal of as much as $500 million, according to sources with knowledge of its fundraising.

The group, Priorities USA Action, is trying to secure 30 or more pledges of at least $1 million apiece to be unveiled publicly when the former secretary of state officially enters the race, sources say. But, so far, it has received only about 10 firm commitments, and it is encountering resistance from top donors who have given to other Clinton-linked vehicles, including ostensibly aligned super PACs and even the apolitical Clinton Foundation.

Discussions have focused on trying to supercharge the sluggish fundraising by enlisting help from heavyweight surrogates with close ties to the Clintons, including possibly Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe or investment banker Tom Nides, who served under Hillary Clinton at the State Department, according to sources.

Priorities, which has worked to reinvent itself after helping President Barack Obama win reelection in 2012, has been buffeted by disagreements over its mission, as well as its fundraising strategy and goals, according to interviews with about a dozen Democratic donors and operatives working to lay the groundwork for an expected Clinton campaign.

Priorities occasionally has clashed behind the scenes with other groups working toward the same goal. The tensions spilled out into public view Monday, when Clinton ally David Brock quit the Priorities board amid accusations it was trying to boost its own fundraising by undercutting that of two pro-Clinton groups he runs.

While Brock said late Monday he was “open to returning” after Priorities pledged to address his concerns, it’s Priorities itself that some Clintonites are concerned about.

“People are starting to worry that Priorities could be a weak link,” said a strategist who has worked with the various pro-Clinton outside groups.

The stumbles — and the slow fundraising start — raise doubts about a key assumption about Clinton’s strength as a presidential candidate: that her allies will be able to rely on a seemingly bottomless well of support from rich supporters to build an historic political money juggernaut that will overwhelm prospective rivals.

Over the past two years, the two super PACs that have been most active paving the way for an expected Clinton campaign — Brock’s American Bridge 21st Century and Ready for Hillary — raised a combined $29 million, according to Federal Election Commission filings.

And the Clinton Foundation this week said it had raised all but $2 million of an aggressive $250 million fundraising drive for an endowment it had hoped to complete before any campaign kickoff, at which point the Clintons themselves likely would have to withdraw from foundation activities.

Meanwhile, Priorities, which was created in 2011 to help boost Obama’s reelection, has been mostly idling since it spent $75 million during the 2012 campaign. It raised only $364,000 in the past two years, and finished 2014 with less than $500,000 in the bank, according to FEC filings.

Peter Kauffmann, a spokesman for Priorities, said “we are confident that we will have the resources necessary to execute our mission.”

But there’s also debate about how much exactly the PAC will need to provide effective advertising cover for Clinton’s would-be campaign during an election cycle in which the network overseen by the conservative billionaire Koch brothers intends to spend at least $889 million.

Some Clinton allies argue that Priorities must raise as much as $500 million — a major increase from the $300 million goal floated by insiders late last year — while others privately worry that figure is out of reach, even for the Clintons. For perspective, the super PAC supporting Republican Mitt Romney’s 2012 presidential campaign raised $154 million, while the Karl Rove-conceived Crossroads advertising groups spent $325 million during that cycle.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Priorities is hampered by the absence of a Clinton campaign organization, say people familiar with its early efforts. They expect fundraising to spike once Clinton declares her candidacy, but that might not come until July, which is one reason Priorities began seeking pledged donations. The group's co-Chair Jennifer Granholm, Executive Director Buffy Wicks and Finance Director Diana Rogalle are among those soliciting pledges for Priorities.

Many donors have begged off solicitations until Clinton formally announces, with some saying they have recently given to other groups associated with the Clintons.

Granholm and Wicks last year discussed Priorities' efforts with Michael Vachon, a representative for billionaire financier George Soros, who has donated $25,000 to Ready for Hillary. But Vachon told them Soros had not yet made any decisions about 2016 political spending, sources say.

Another major donor got a visit from two Priorities fundraisers about a month after attending a fundraising luncheon for the Clinton Foundation but did not make a pledge to the group.

Los Angeles television producer Marcy Carsey and Boston philanthropist Barbara Lee this year turned down requests from Granholm to pledge seven figures to Priorities, according to sources, despite both having written recent large checks to other Clinton-related endeavors. Carsey had given a significant sum to the Clinton Foundation, as well as $275,000 in the last two years to EMILY's List and Ready for Hillary, while Lee has given at least $875,000 in that span to Ready for Hillary, EMILY's List and Brock's American Bridge.

Carsey could not be reached for comment, while a spokeswoman for Lee said in an email, "Barbara receives a number of various requests, and as a matter of strategy, she does not publicly discuss them."

Investment banker Robert Wolf, a top bundler for Obama who describes himself as "fully supportive" of a Clinton 2016 campaign, nonetheless said he hasn't pledged to Priorities.

"In 2014, I gave to CGI [the Clinton Global Initiative], Clinton Foundation, Obama Library and DNC [the Democratic National Committee] and individual races, so I have not focused yet on 2016 Presidential stuff, but will at some point," he wrote in an email.

There is a sense among some donors that donations to various Clinton-linked efforts are indistinguishable, say sources who travel in Democratic finance circles. That impression may be reinforced by the involvement of a handful of key operatives in both the political and foundation fundraising efforts.

Brock and his fundraising team, including his star fundraiser, Mary Pat Bonner, who also raises money for Ready for Hillary, have raised funds for the foundation on a pro bono basis. The foundation official who oversaw the endowment drive, Dennis Cheng, served as a finance director on Clinton's 2008 campaign and is expected to play a similar role in any 2016 bid.

Cheng is stepping down at the end of this week, which some read as a signal that Hillaryland is officially shifting its attention to a more imminent campaign.

Clinton Foundation spokesman Craig Minassian credited Cheng with "diversifying the donor base" of the foundation, which works on public health and women's empowerment initiatives around the world.

Priorities board member Joe Solmonese, a former president of the Human Rights Campaign, said major donors aren't going to conflate any of the pro-Clinton super PACs, let alone the foundation.

"People who write big checks like that are a lot smarter than that," he said. "Having many different entities doing many different things is necessary to win in the context of an election cycle. And donors are sophisticated enough to evaluate these things individually and to give on the basis of what they're passionate about and what there is a need for."

A veteran Democratic operative with close ties to the Clintons who has been briefed on Priorities efforts said, "I have not heard of anyone saying, 'I gave at the office.' The folks Priorities is talking to are intensely political people. Many were there for Clinton the first time, they were there for Obama, they'll be there for Hillary this time, and they'll be there for Chelsea if she ever runs."

The operative said it had not been determined whether Priorities would release the list of pledged donations, casting the pledge push as just in the "internal discussion" phase. "I'm less interested in the announcement as I am in the cash.” And the operative also stressed that the overall fundraising goal had not been definitively determined, while conceding that waiting for Clinton to declare her intentions creates planning and fundraising challenges.

“Nobody is going to write a seven-figure check for a cause that has not yet come to fruition,” said the operative.

The resulting questions about how Priorities would make best use the interregnum between the Obama and Clinton campaigns has occasionally left the impression that “there is a lot of lurching over there,” in the words of one Democrat involved in laying the groundwork for a Clinton campaign.

And there have been lingering tensions from the 2008 Democratic presidential primary between some Clinton backers and Priorities co-Chair Jim Messina, who ran Obama’s reelection campaign and is said to have taken a significant behind-the-scenes role in shaping Priorities’ strategy.

Then came this week’s blow-up, during which Brock, whose groups defend Clinton against attacks, suggested that the Priorities leadership was pursuing “their own personal agendas.”

Granholm dismissed concerns about the infighting, asserting in a Monday night statement, “we all have the same shared goals.”

Hillary Clinton's best frenemies (Politico)
By Ben Schreckinger
February 11, 2015
Politico

What makes Jim Webb a better presidential candidate than Hillary Clinton? "I really don't have an answer for you on that," the former Virginia senator told NPR late last month. Where does Martin O'Malley differ from Clinton as a leader? "My mind is not even in the compare-contrast mode," O'Malley told the New York Times. How does the bombastic Bernie Sanders feel about the candidate he's planning to challenge for the Democratic nomination? "This is a woman I respect, clearly a very intelligent person," Sanders said Monday.

With enemies like these, who needs friends?

Time and time again, when invited to criticize Clinton, her potential Democratic primary rivals have ducked, deflected and dodged. They're trying to present themselves as viable alternatives to the daunting frontrunner without addressing the obvious question of how they stack up against her.

"At the end of [interviews], somebody has to ask me a question about Hillary, and I try not to attack her. Usually, no matter what I say, it becomes 'Hillary Clinton,'" said Sanders, raising his arms in a sweeping gesture as if to indicate that Clinton's name becomes the banner headline. "What I'm running on are the issues … Her name recognition is about 10 times greater than mine, so if I run, it would take a lot of work getting around the country introducing myself to people."

With Elizabeth Warren continuing to resist entreaties to enter the race, liberals are still waiting for a serious challenger to Clinton to emerge — if only to ensure the party's progressive wing gets the attention and respect it believes its views deserve. At this point in 2007, President Barack Obama was declaring his candidacy and drawing a contrast with Clinton on issues like the Iraq War and the politics of triangulation, pioneered by Clinton's husband in the 1990s.

This time around, would-be Clinton spoilers are not so far along.

The outspoken Sanders deflected a question about Clinton posed by POLITICO late last month. "All I know is if I run, I'm not running against Hillary Clinton," protested the Vermont senator, who if he runs, almost certainly would be running against Clinton. Over the weekend, he did engage the prospective match-up more directly, telling MSNBC that it would be a "real clash of ideas" on issues like trade, climate change and infrastructure investment.

But at an event at the Brookings Institution this week, Sanders made it clear he had little interest in going after the former secretary of state.

"It is not my style to trash people," he said.

Clinton's other two most likely rivals haven't even gone that far. Before Webb dodged a Hillary question from NPR's Steve Inskeep ("If I were to run, it would not be sort of as a counterpoint to her") he ducked a similar one put to him by Yahoo's Matt Bai in late December ("I'm not running against Hillary Clinton"). When an O'Malley operative began talking about Clinton to a New York Times reporter last fall, the former Maryland governor's communications director "jabbed him in the side" to make him stop, according to the newspaper's account.

The repeated questions and dodges underscore the unusual nature of the Democratic race. Though Clinton is a private citizen who has not declared she is running, she has cultivated an aura of inevitability so strong that, "She's tantamount to an incumbent," in the words of Democratic consultant Tad Devine.

Naturally, voters will want to know how lesser-known candidates compare to Clinton, but advisers to those candidates argue that talking about the former secretary of state would be a mistake.

"It makes no sense, whether it's Webb, Sanders, or O'Malley, to start a campaign by going on the attack," said an adviser to one Democrat considering a 2016 run who was not authorized to speak on the record about messaging strategy. "It would be putting the cart before the horse a little bit to start lobbing bombs at Hillary Clinton before you even enter the race."

"You need to make an affirmative case before you get to the contrast," said the adviser, who added that Mitt

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Romney erred in 2012 by focusing on Obama before he had articulated a positive vision of his own candidacy.

Devine, a longtime Sanders ally who will advise the senator's presidential campaign should he launch one, conceded that conflict generates coverage, a precious commodity for lesser-known candidates. But he said that the Vermont senator would try to attract attention by targeting the forces of runaway capitalism rather than his primary opponents. "It's a huge challenge," said Devine. "It's a different kind of conflict than the press is used to covering and perhaps than voters are used to hearing."

"Governor O'Malley is looking forward to introducing himself to Democrats outside of Maryland and talking about his own affirmative ideas for the future," wrote O'Malley spokeswoman Lis Smith in an email.

Candidates on the livelier Republican side of the presidential fieldhave been a lot more willing to snipe at both Clinton and each other. Jeb Bush and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio have both characterized Clinton as old news, with Rubio calling her a "20th century candidate." Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul regularly trolls his presidential rivals on social media and recently released a gag audio recording of a Jeb Bush impersonator conspiring with a Hillary Clinton impersonator.

But the Democratic field faces something of a Catch-22. Because no challenger has gained traction, Clinton feels little pressure to campaign and is reportedly considering postponing an announcement until July. But the longer Clinton stays out of the race, the longer she can avoid taking positions that opponents can attack to gain traction.

"They don't know what she's going to say," said Democratic strategist Bob Shrum, who worked on the presidential campaigns of John Kerry and Al Gore. "And it's hard to define yourself without knowing what contrast you want to draw."

Webb, Sanders and O'Malley are all planning to travel to early primary states in the coming weeks and months, and the pressure to define themselves in contrast to Clinton will only intensify.

For now, though, they're content to play nice.

"The Beltway media might want a food fight right now," said Smith, the O'Malley adviser, "but that won't do anyone — let alone Democrats — any good."

Brock Is No Stranger to Political Rumbles Involving Clintons (NYT)
By Amy Chozick
February 10, 2015
The New York Times

“As rough and tumble as they get.”

That’s how one old friend of Bill and Hillary Clinton described David Brock when he arrived in Arkansas in early 1993 to dig up dirt on President Clinton.

Back then, Mr. Brock was a star reporter for The American Spectator, the conservative magazine. Today, he is a liberal devoted to getting Hillary Rodham Clinton elected president. But he’s still rough and tumble.

On Monday, Mr. Brock accused a pro-Clinton “super PAC,” Priorities USA Action, of “spreading derogatory material” about his organizations, Media Matters and American Bridge, to The New York Times.

He knows a thing or two about how to generate a controversial press report. Mr. Brock’s story accusing Arkansas state troopers of setting up sexual liaisons for Mr. Clinton led to Paula Jones’s 1994 sexual harassment lawsuit against him.

Mr. Brock later converted to the left, and his 2002 memoir, “Blinded by the Right: The Conscience of an Ex-Conservative,” became one of Mr. Clinton’s favorite reads. (He keeps copies in a dresser at his home in Chappaqua, N.Y., and gives them out to visitors.)

In turn, Mr. Brock has become one of the Clintons’ most loyal political soldiers, though he is sometimes accused of applying the attack-dog tactics he used as a conservative on behalf of the other side of the political spectrum.

Hillary Clinton Seeking Office Space in Brooklyn or Queens (Time)
By Sam Frizell
February 10, 2015
Time Magazine

Hillary Clinton's staff are working with global real estate broker CB Richard Ellis to find a headquarters for her likely 2016 presidential campaign, TIME has learned from several sources familiar with the matter.

Her campaign headquarters would likely be located in Brooklyn or Queens, where commercial rents are significantly cheaper than in Manhattan. It's unclear whether, or how soon Clinton will settle on a headquarters.

The Los-Angeles-based brokerage CBRE has worked with the Clintons in the past. Roshan Shah, a broker and senior vice president at CBRE, helped the William J. Clinton Foundation negotiate the move out of its Harlem offices. CBRE declined to comment.

There aren't many options for large, contiguous office spaces in downtown Brooklyn and Queens, where a high demand for commercial leases has raised prices in recent years. The current average annual rent price per square foot of office space in Brooklyn is around $40-$45. Prices in a 2013 report indicated averages around $35 per square foot in Brooklyn compared with around $60 in Manhattan.

Clinton's staff privately toured office space at MetroTech last year, a large office complex in downtown Brooklyn, and have also looked at the One Pierrepont Plaza building in Brooklyn Heights. The Pierrepont building is home to over 120,000 square feet of available office space.

Both spaces are owned by Forest City Ratner, whose chairman Bruce Ratner is a Democrat and an ally of New York City mayor Bill de Blasio. De Blasio served on Clinton's 1999 campaign for Senator in New York.

In 2011 and 2012, the Obama campaign leased 50,000 square feet of office space in the Prudential Building in Chicago, which is now available for $20 to $27 per square foot but was cheaper four years ago, according to the current property managers.

Clinton has been courted by Westchester notables in an effort to attract the presumptive presidential candidates 2016 campaign to the New York City suburb.

Hillary Clinton's Brooklyn options are limited (Capital New York)
By Dana Rubenstein
February 11, 2015
Capital New York

In recent days, people who pay close attention to the undeclared presidential campaign of Hillary Clinton have been wondering about her real estate plans, which could, reportedly, involve setting up shop in Brooklyn or Queens.

"A base in gentrifying Brooklyn or Queens could help give Clinton's campaign a youthful feel, and would likely be a relief for Democratic operatives dreading a relocation to the suburb, or a daily commute from New York City," explained MSNBC.

In the ensuing days, two pertinent details leaked out.

First, the Daily News reported that Clinton's team, which is believed to include brokers from CBRE, checked out One Pierrepont Plaza and MetroTech, both owned by Forest City Ratner. Bruce Ratner, the company's executive chairman, is a big Democratic donor.

Then, the News reported that Clinton was seeking 100,000 square feet of office space. That's a quite a lot.

For comparison, 100,000 square feet is twice the amount Barack Obama's campaign occupied in 2012. It's also roughly twice the space Clinton's campaign occupied in 2008.

It would be hard enough for Brooklyn and Queens to accommodate a 50,000-square-foot tenant. A 100,000-square-foot requirement would further narrow Clinton's options in two boroughs that have, for decades, sent commuters to offices in Manhattan, rather than developing office space themselves.

Brooklyn is "a borough of churches and houses," said Chris Havens, the vice president of commercial real estate at the Brooklyn-based aptsandlofts.com.

"I'm skeptical," he said. "This is a very tight market. There's a lot of space available in Manhattan."

Roy Chipkin, a Queens commercial real estate broker at CBRE, described the Queens market as "very thin," because "nothing's been built in 100 years," and most of what has been built is residential.

Given the slim pickings, what are Clinton's realistic options, should she indeed decide to headquarter in the outer boroughs instead of Manhattan?

The contours of her former presidential endeavor may provide some guidance.

The last time Clinton ran for president, in 2008, she ran her campaign from a drab office building at 4420 North Fairfax Drive in Arlington, VA. It had roughly 50,000 square feet, five floors, an elevator.

According to former staffers, the space was aggressively utilitarian. (Before Clinton, the Immigration and Naturalization Service ran a detention center there.)

It was also quite spacious.

There was a floor devoted to ping pong and debate prep. Mold flourished on a war-room wall.

The headquarters were close to the Metro line, and 20 minutes from D.C. by car. There was ready access to mid-market food options, like Cosi, not to mention a hamburger joint called Big Buns.

It's not clear how much Clinton paid per square foot in Arlington, but commercial real estate database CoStar indicates that asking rents at her old headquarters are now $36 per square foot.

Clinton's office didn't respond to any questions about the real estate requirements of her campaign-to-be.

Interviews with several real estate experts in both boroughs suggested a few potential options.

If Clinton wants to cultivate a pioneering vibe, she could venture out to Industry City, the creative-industry beehive on the Sunset Park waterfront.

Michael Phillips, president of Jamestown Properties, which owns part of the complex, said it could accommodate a new, 100,000-square-foot tenant.

To get there, staffers could take the N or D trains one stop past Atlantic Avenue. Or drive. There are some good food options on site, but not that many of them. It would offer her space and some distance from the ravenous media crowd.

“That’s definitely a place where they’d be able to find chunks of space and have a lot more flexibility,” said Ofer Cohen, president of TerraCRG, a Brooklyn-based commercial real estate brokerage.

Cohen also said, “The cost would be significantly, significantly less [than other parts of Brooklyn], in the 20 dollar per-square-foot range.”

There isn’t much of anything available in North Brooklyn. The Walentas family’s DUMBO properties are not believed to have the necessary space.

“DUMBO Heights,” the old Jehovah’s Witnesses complex now partly controlled by Jared Kushner, has some room. But it’s thought to be on the pricey side, with asking rents in the $50s per square foot, according to Cohen.

Nor is it clear that the complex, which Kushner is renovating, is imminently available.

“From what I understand, the building’s not really open for occupancy yet,” said Tucker Reed, president of the Downtown Brooklyn Partnership. “They’re a year or two away, so the timeline might not match up.”

Kushner wouldn’t comment for this story.

Finally, and most obviously, there’s Downtown Brooklyn proper, a neighborhood where high demand and a paucity of office space have created a very low vacancy rate.

Sources say that Forest City could make about 170,000 square feet available at One Pierrepont Plaza, the building the Daily News said Clinton’s people had visited.

But some wonder whether the asking rent—which sources say is at least in the $40s per square foot—is too high.

From a symbolism standpoint, Brooklyn isn’t necessarily all upside either.

“Brooklyn has the advantage and the disadvantage of having cache,” said Seth Pinsky, a real estate executive and the former president of New York City’s Economic Development Corporation. “The advantage is that you can attract a lot of young, talented people and it links you to a new, very highly desirable urbanism. At the same time, there are also a lot of stereotypes—good and bad—that come with both of those and it’s unclear whether she wants to be associated with those as she’s campaigning for president.”

Queens, which is often cheaper than downtown Brooklyn, appears to offer Clinton more options.

“If she’s looking for something that’s funkier and that’s close to Manhattan, then certainly a place like Long Island City would be the most logical place,” said Pinsky.

Last week, at Capital’s request, Evan Daniel, the executive vice president of the ModernSpaces real estate group, sent Capital a list of properties 50,000 square feet and greater in the western Queens submarket.

There’s a 1930s-era Astoria factory on 36th Street down the street from the Museum of the Moving Image called “Offices at the Square.” Sixty-three thousand square feet are available there, it’s close to the M, R, N and Q trains and there’s a beer garden downstairs

There’s hundreds of thousands of square feet available at the Factory, on 47th Avenue in Long Island City, according to the report. The nearby Falchi Building could also accommodate a 100,000-square-foot tenant.

There’s 90,000 square feet at an old industrial building on Austell Place, and more than 100,000 square feet at 30-30 Northern Boulevard and One MetLife Plaza. There's nearly that much at 3430 Steinway Street.

There's also Queens Boulevard in Kew Gardens, home to borough hall and the Queens district attorney's office, though that market's not believed to have to have enough space.

And, should she more inclined to maintain her distance from Midtown, there's Jamaica.

It's accessible by subway and Long Island Rail Road, but not too accessible. It's also close to the airport and some of her donors on Long Island. It's pre-trendy.

"If she wanted to show she was more a 'woman of the people', then a place like Jamaica, with a feel similar to where her husband is in Harlem, would send an interesting signal and it's certainly transit accessible as well," said Pinsky.

(It's not clear that there's supply there either, though. Justin Rodgers, managing director of real estate and economic development at the Greater Jamaica Development Corporation said he couldn't think of anything off the top of his head.)

Certainly, Queens leaders would love to have her.

"Queens is the gateway to the city, the nation and the world, with its unparalleled transportation connections including bridges, tunnels, rail and airports, and has a population to match," said Elizabeth Lusskin president of the Long Island City Partnership. "While space is tight, I'm sure Queens would find room for any national candidate wise enough to chose the World's Borough for her home base."

Dems make up after Hillaryland spat (CNN)
By Brianna Keilar
February 10, 2015
CNN

Washington (CNN)Priorities USA and American Bridge -- two super PACs aligned behind likely 2016 Democratic presidential contender Hillary Clinton -- are publicly mending fences after the head of American Bridge abruptly resigned his position on the board of Priorities USA earlier today.

David Brock, longtime Clinton defender and the founder of the liberal opposition research juggernaut American Bridge and media watchdog Media Matters, quit in protest of a New York Times story published Friday that pulled the curtain back on the opaque fundraising practices of his groups.

The piece questioned Brock's ties to fundraising adviser Mary Pat Bonner, revealing that she receives 12.5% commission on the donations she raises for Brock PACs.

In a letter, first published by Politico and verified by multiple sources, Brock defended his fundraising practices and called the Times story "an orchestrated political hit job," taking aim at current and former officials at Priorities USA, saying they "were behind this specious and malicious attack on the integrity of these critical organizations."

Brock's resignation was a departure from the cooperation that Priorities, American Bridge and another pro-Clinton super PAC, Ready for Hillary, have displayed since brokering an agreement to work together last year. But it also harkened back to the days of the 2012 presidential cycle when American Bridge and Priorities USA, then a nascent super PAC backing President Barack Obama, were at odds at they competed for the attention of Democratic donors.

Democratic operatives close to Clinton who are involved in outside groups dedicated to her seemingly certain presidential run, were eager to tamp down speculation about trouble in Hillaryland and orchestrated the public make up, according to multiple sources.

In a statement distributed to reporters following the flap, former Michigan Gov. Jennifer Granholm, co-chair of Priorities USA, said, "We take the concerns board member David Brock raises seriously and are working to address them."

Brock said he had spoken to the group's leaders and was assured his concerns would be addressed, though for now he remains off the board of Priorities USA, a sign that not all is forgiven.

"I'm open to returning to the board and I share their desire to find a way to move forward," he said in the statement.

Republicans, meanwhile, were only too happy to see the intra-party fighting.

"If they can't keep it together 20 months out and before Hillary has even officially announced, one has to seriously wonder how they're going to hold up in the heat of a national campaign," said Republican National Committee spokesman Michael Short.

Boris Johnson once compared Hillary Clinton to 'a sadistic nurse in a mental hospital' (Telegraph)
By Raf Sanchez Washington

The Telegraph Online

Mayor of London hastily tries to make amends for comparing the potential next president of the United States to Lady Macbeth

Boris Johnson today attempted to make sheepish amends for once comparing Hillary Clinton to "a sadistic nurse in a mental hospital" and alluding to conspiracy theories she was involved in a friend's death.

A day before he was due to meet Mrs Clinton in New York, the Mayor of London was reminded that he had once said she represents "everything I came into politics to oppose" including "an all-round purse-lipped political correctness".

Writing in the Daily Telegraph in November 2007, when Mrs Clinton looked the favourite to win the 2008 presidential election, Mr Johnson mused about whether he could support her candidacy.

"She's got dyed blonde hair and pouty lips, and a steely blue stare, like a sadistic nurse in a mental hospital," he noted.

Perhaps more damaging than his colourful remarks about her appearance was Mr Johnson's conclusion that he thought Mrs Clinton should win in 2008 because it would bring Bill Clinton back to the White House:

For all who love America, it is time to think of supporting Hillary, not because we necessarily want her for herself but because we want Bill in the role of First Husband. And if Bill can deal with Hillary, he can surely deal with any global crisis.

Mr Johnson also made a reference to conspiracy theories surrounding the death of Vince Foster, a close friend of Mrs Clinton's who killed himself with a gun in 1993.

Some opponents of the Clintons have suggested that he may have been killed and they had a hand in his death - a theory refuted by multiple official investigations.

In his column, Mr Johnson referred to "worrying allegations" about "the anomalies in the position of poor Vince Foster's gun".

He also said Mrs Clinton appeared to have spent her eight years as First Lady behaving like "a mixture between Cherie Blair and Lady Macbeth, stamping her heel, bawling out subordinates and frisbeeing ashtrays at her erring husband".

When reminded about his eight-year-old comments by ITV News , Mr Johnson said: "I'm delighted to be able to meet Senator Clinton. I'm sure that whatever I've said in the past will be taken by the Senator who is a very distinguished politician in the light hearted spirit in which it was intended."

Even his efforts to make amends may cause new issues.

While Mrs Clinton was once a senator from New York, and therefore entitled to be called "Senator Clinton", that title was overtaken by her work as US Secretary of State.

Americans universally refer to her as "Secretary Clinton", which may have been the title Mr Johnson was grasping for.

The mayor is due to meet Mrs Clinton, who is expected to run for president in 2016, in New York on Wednesday for talks expected to focus on foreign policy.

The flap over his past comments is the latest in a series of hiccups to befall Mr Johnson's US trip.

He had been due to meet with Bill de Blasio, the mayor of New York, on Tuesday but his Big Apple counterpart pulled out of the meeting citing illness.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While Mr de Blasio cancelled his meeting with Mr Johnson - and several other engagements during the day - he was apparently well enough to give a speech at the premiere for a television documentary later in the evening.

Parts of Mr Johnson's scheduled visit to Boston also had to be called off as the northeastern city was inundated by historic snowstorms.

He is due to travel to Washington on Thursday.

Boris Johnson Had Unkind Words for Hillary Clinton (WSJ)
By Tim Hanrahan
February 10, 2015
The Wall Street Journal

London Mayor Boris Johnson, set to meet with Hillary Clinton on Wednesday, found himself in a bit of hot water over a column he wrote in 2007 that took some jabs of the then-senator.

In the Telegraph column, Mr. Johnson -- today seen as a potential future U.K. prime minister -- said he found himself hoping that Mrs. Clinton would be the next U.S. president, despite his long list of misgivings about her.

“She’s got dyed blonde hair and pouty lips, and a steely blue stare, like a sadistic nurse in a mental hospital,” wrote Mr. Johnson. He added: “[S]he represents, on the face of it, everything I came into politics to oppose: not just a general desire to raise taxes and nationalize things, but an all-round purse-lipped political correctness.”

After a few more digs, Mr. Johnson explains why he was pulling for Mrs. Clinton, instead of the “plainly brilliant” Barack Obama and others: so that former President Bill Clinton could return to the White House as first husband.

In a statement to ITV News Tuesday, Mr. Johnson said: “I’m sure that whatever I’ve said in the past will be taken by the Senator ...in the light-hearted spirit in which it was intended.”

Bill, Hillary tee off; for pay — and to play (SF Chronicle)
Phillip Matier and Andrew Ross
February 11, 2015
The San Francisco Chronicle

Democrats' other first family, Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton, are getting into the swing of things around here — both on and off the golf course. Hillary Clinton is scheduled to headline the $295-a-head Lead On conference for women at the Santa Clara Convention Center on Feb. 24. The event is being put on by Watermark, an executive networking group for women, and is being sponsored by a number of prominent Silicon Valley companies, including Cisco and Intel, as well as by the San Francisco 49ers and The Chronicle. Watermark spokeswoman Karen Breslau said the organization does not comment on whether "any speaker is paid or not." Meanwhile, Bill Clinton, who received $17 million in speech honorariums in 2013, delivered four for-pay talks last week in Oakland, San Rafael and San Mateo as part of the MPSF Speaker Series.

While he was in town, Bill also had time for some good old-fashioned political schmoozing, including a quick morning meet-and-greet with San Francisco Mayor Ed Lee at the Harding Park Golf Course. Afterward, the former president shot 18 holes with a foursome that included city Recreation and Park Commission President Mark Buell, whose wife, Susie Tompkins Buell, has been one of Hillary's most ardent backers. "I'm always glad to welcome a Clinton to San Francisco," Lee said of his get-together.So, apparently, was an SUV full of women who spotted Bill Clinton crossing the road and rushed to get his photo and autograph, causing the obliging ex-president to wave off the fast-descending Secret Service. Later, Clinton realized he had left his favorite sand wedge on the course. Rec and Park staff promised to get it to Mark Buell at City Hall.However, when the staffer showed up with club in hand, sheriff's deputies refused to let it past security. Buell eventually retrieved the club outside City Hall and delivered it that night to Clinton — who greeted its safe return with his trademark toothy grin.

Split rail: It ought to be an interesting BART meeting this week when directors take up the question of what do to — or not do — about the 14 protesters who were arrested after shutting down the system for three hours on the Friday after Thanksgiving. "Right now, I see a three-way split," said Board of Directors member Joel Keller. At issue is BART's initial call for Alameda County District Attorney Nancy O'Malley to prosecute and seek $70,000 in restitution from the protesters — or $5,000 each — for losses from the shutdown. BART General Manager Grace Crunican has since backed off on the cash demand, saying she would prefer a payback through community service. The "Black Friday" protesters chained themselves to a BART train at the West Oakland Station, effectively shutting down the system for hours, to call attention to their anger over grand juries' refusals to indict police officers who killed unarmed black men in New York and Ferguson, Mo.. BART Directors Rebecca Saltzman and Tom Radulovich want both the restitution and the charges dropped altogether. Keller and fellow director Nick Josefowitz have come out for dropping the restitution demand, but supporting whatever charges O'Malley decides to pursue. A third option would be to let the call for prosecution and community service stand. The nine-member board will hash it all out Thursday. "From my count, there are three directors leaning for each of the options," Keller said.

Crash call: In San Francisco, everything gets political — even a head-on collision with a suspected car thief. At least that was the case for former Assemblyman Tom Ammiano, who was in a crash Saturday night with a suspected car thief who was fleeing from police. As Ammiano described it in an Internet posting, he and a friend were stopped at a red light at Sixth and Mission streets when the suspected thief "ran a red light, nailing 2 or 3 cars and then slammed into us."Ammiano's car was totaled, but he and his passenger escaped with "scrapes, bruises and whiplash," Ammiano wrote. It was while sitting in the ambulance waiting to go to St. Luke's that things took a political twist. According the Ammiano, a cabbie whose car had also been bashed by the fleeing thief yelled, "I hope this is a wake-up call to run for mayor!" "Only in San Francisco," Ammiano said.

Inside the Beltway: Where's Hillary Clinton - and why is she hiding? (Washington Times)
Jennifer Harper
February 11, 2015
The Washington Times

The Republican National Committee is fretting about Hillary Rodham Clinton's absence from the public arena at the moment. "We've noticed it. You've noticed it: Hillary Clinton is hiding," the committee notes in a public memo. "Potential Republican presidential candidates are out in public, speaking to voters, and sharing their ideas. But Hillary Clinton is nowhere to be found." Their point has resonated. Others parse the who, what, when and where of it all. "Come out, come out wherever you are," writes the Weekly Standard's Daniel Halper. "Where in the world is Hillary Clinton? Over the past several weeks, she has been behaving like a reclusive third-world dictator," declares Washington Free Beacon editor Andrew Stiles.

Journalist and author Sharyl Attkisson wonders why Mrs. Clinton — who once erroneously claimed she was shot at in a Bosnian war zone — isn't scrutinized as closely as NBC News anchor Brian Williams, who falsely claimed he encountered enemy fire in the skies over Iraq. It's ironic, Ms. Attkisson told NewsMax TV, that he could lose his career, "yet we didn't care enough to have it matter with someone who became our Secretary of State." The point was also brought home by Washington Times columnist Joseph Curl.

The GOP, meanwhile, points out that it has been 202 days since Mrs. Clinton held a press conference, and 184 days since offering a major interview. She has been spotted around Manhattan, enjoying a Broadway show, and appearing at a fundraiser also attended by Mitt and Ann Romney, speaking of irony. Mrs. Clinton had two public speaking engagements in Canada in late January, notable for a moment when she imitated Russia President Vladimir Putin. She is now said to be hard at work on a "modern, aggressive campaign," according to the Washington Post.

The GOP is not buying any of it.

"Why would a would-be presidential candidate behave this way? Because she's made a strategic decision that the only way to ensure she is the Democratic nominee is to make everyone think she's inevitable. The last time she had to face voters and actually compete for the nomination, she lost to a newcomer. She doesn't want to make the same mistake twice," the organization continues. "As her poll numbers show, when Hillary is campaigning, she's much less popular. What's the only way not to seem like she's campaigning? Go into hiding."

FOR THE LEXICON

"Infotainment confusion syndrome."

— A condition developed by NBC anchor Brian Williams, according to Comedy Central's fake newsman Jon Stewart, who told a recent audience, "It occurs when the celebrity cortex gets its wires crossed with the medulla anchor-dala." Mr. Stewart noted that "celeb-rellum" is then activated, adding, "That's known as the brain's applause center. Once that engages, there's no going back."

And what timing. Late Tuesday, NBC announced that Mr. Williams had been suspended from his newscast for six months minus pay, for his aforementioned fib - in the same hour that Mr. Stewart went public with news he would leave his own show later this year. And as the sages say, hmmm.

CALIFORNIA DREAMIN'

Fire up Air Force One, it's California fundraising time. In 48 hours, President Obama will travel to Palo Alto to address the Summit on Cybersecurity and Consumer Protection at Stanford University. Well that's nice. Then it's on to San Francisco proper for a Democratic National Committee fundraiser — specifically an "intimate dinner" with 60 other fans in the private home of an investment guru, priced at $10,000 a person for dinner and a photo with Mr. Obama, and $32,400 for dinner, a photo and a "co-chair" title.

And just to review, the president attended 71 fundraising events in 2014, this according to an excruciating count by the Sunlight Foundation. But we also must mention that the group also says that New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie went to 109 fundraisers last year in his role as chairman of the Republican Governors Assoc.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Meanwhile, there is some more traveling to come, though. On Valentine's day, "the President will depart San Francisco and travel to Palm Springs, California where he will remain overnight. Further details about the President's travel to California will be made available in the coming days," the White House advised earlier this week.

MCCAUL GETS BUSY

The mission does not end. A House Committee on Homeland Security hearing titled "Countering violent Islamist extremism: The urgent threat of foreign fighters and homegrown terror" has drawn some very helpful witnesses, including Nicholas Rasmussen, director of he National Counterterrorism Center; Francis X. Taylo r, undersecretary for intelligence and analysis at the Department of Homeland Security and Michael B. Steinbach, the FBI's assistant director for counterterrorism.

"Islamist terror groups like ISIS and Al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula are surging, and every day we witness their brutality and senseless violence. The threat they pose to the homeland has reached its highest level since 9/11," says Rep. Michael McCaul, Texas Republican and committee chairman. "I want to make sure we are doing everything possible to keep that terror from reaching our shores."

And on the death of Kayla Mueller, an American aid worker who was held hostage by the Islamic State group, Mr. McCaul says, "While Kayla selflessly devoted herself to the cause of helping those in need, violent Islamist extremists like ISIS have devoted themselves to death and destruction. Her death will only strengthen our resolve to destroy these depraved barbarians."

The hearing is at 10 a.m. ET, and will be carried live by C-SPAN.

ONE FOR A HISTORIC FEBRUARY

Allen Wes t, Ben Carson and Kenneth Blackwell are among the sizable host committee for a Republican gathering of significance on Wednesday. The Republican National Committee hosts the 3rd Annual Black Republican Trailblazer Awards in the nation's capital, meant to celebrate Black History Month and honor those with "historic victories," says committee chairman Reince Priebus.

Awards and kudos will go to Sen. Tim Scott, Reps. Will Hurd and Mia Love, plus the late Ed Brooke — who is honored posthumously. The event is at the splendidly restored Howard Theater; onstage with Mr. Priebus and co-chairman Sharon Day: New York Jets owner Woody Johnson, TVOne host and editor Roland Martin, and CNN political analyst Tara Setmayer Love.

VOTE OR ELSE

"More than 100 Hamilton County poll workers got fired for failing to do the one thing that matters most on Election Day. They didn't vote. The board of elections said goodbye to the 104 workers after learning they had not voted in either the 2013 or 2014 elections, despite spending most of those Election Days in a polling place, surrounded by voters and ballots," reports the Cincinnati Enquirer.

"I'm frankly kind of shocked by the number of people on that list," said Tim Burke, chairman of the board and leader of Hamilton County's Democratic Party. "We want everyone to vote. If we have poll workers who don't vote, we're not encouraging that."

POLL DU JOUR

• 74 percent of Americans say the federal government does not have the right rules and regulations in place to prevent another recession from occurring.

• 55 percent say the U.S. government did a "good" job helping the nation recover from the recession that began in 2007.

• 55 percent say "big business" has recovered from that recession; 52 percent say the stock market has recovered.

• 35 percent say their own family has recovered from the recession; 30 percent say their local real estate market has recovered.

Republicans say Hillary Clinton's 2016 campaign is already falling apart (Business Insider)

By Colin Campbell

February 10, 2015

Business Insider

One of the leading political operatives in Hillary Clinton's world caused some major behind-the-scenes drama on Monday.

David Brock, a close Clinton ally who leads several liberal advocacy groups supporting her potential presidential campaign accused other Hillary backers of leading "an orchestrated political hit job" against him, according to a letter obtained by Politico.

"Our Democratic Presidential nominee deserves better than people who would risk the next election – and our country's future – for their own personal agendas," Brock declared in the letter.

Brock was apparently upset over a recent New York Times report detailing the millions of dollars a prominent Democratic consultant's firm made while helping organizations affiliated with Brock raise money. Brock accused officials from a major pro-Clinton "super PAC," Priorities USA Action, of intentionally leaking information to benefit themselves at his expense. In the letter to the PAC's leaders, Brock announced his resignation from their board. (Priorities denied involvement in the Times story to Politico.)

Reporters and conservative political operatives quickly compared the drama behind Brock's resignation letter to Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign, which infamously suffered from perennial infighting and leaks. In "Game Change," John Heilemann and Mark Halperin described her White House bid as "a simmering cauldron of long-held animosities" — much of it centered on her then-pollster, Mark Penn.

"Good afternoon – Meet the new Hillary Clinton presidential campaign," Michael Short, a spokesman for the national Republican Party, quipped in an email, "same as the old Hillary Clinton presidential campaign."

Targeted GOP senator: ‘I will never vote with my reelection in mind’ (The Hill)

By Alexander Bolton

February 10, 2015

The Hill

Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) is up for reelection this cycle, but he says he’s not changing. Not one bit.

“I’ll always tell Wisconsinites the truth, to the best of my ability, and I will never vote with my reelection in mind. I’m not afraid to justify my votes. I generally have a pretty good rationale for voting the way I do,” he told The Hill in an interview from his office in the Hart Senate Office Building.

To win back the upper chamber in 2016, Democrats probably have to defeat Johnson. The freshman senator knows he is a huge target, but he isn’t shying away from his conservative credentials in a state that hasn’t voted for a Republican presidential nominee since 1984.

Johnson, 59, says he won’t let a difficult reelection race push him out of bare-knuckled confrontations with the administration or soften his resolve to reform entitlement programs.

As the new chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, he is taking a prominent role in the immigration debate by putting together a border security bill that will be the first item of the GOP’s reform agenda.

Johnson was sworn into office in 2011 after beating incumbent Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold (Wis.) in a stunning upset. This time, he will run for reelection in a presidential year, when Democratic voters typically turn out in greater numbers.

A member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Johnson is positioning himself as an outspoken critic of the Democrats’ likely nominee, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. He has slammed her for not taking enough precautions to avert the attacks that left four Americans dead in Benghazi, Libya.

“The bigger problem for Secretary Clinton is just her dereliction of duty. She has not been held to account yet for that,” he said.

The two had a contentious exchange during Clinton’s testimony before the Foreign Relations panel in 2013, when Johnson pressed her on the administration’s initial claim that the attacks evolved from a spontaneous protest.

“Was it because of a protest, or was it because of guys out for a walk one night who decided that they’d they go kill some Americans? What difference, at this point, does it make?” Clinton asked.

Johnson’s Homeland Security Committee gavel gives him a platform to speak out on another fast-rising issue: the threat posed by militant Islamic groups around the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

”We’re not the ones devising the strategy. Only the commander in chief can do that. So, [President Obama] has to establish the goal. He has to define what that looks like. What do you mean by defeat? Is it just in Iraq? Is it in Iraq and Syria?” he asked.

Democrats say Johnson’s refusal to distance himself from his party will come back to haunt him next year.

“Without a doubt, Ron Johnson is the most vulnerable senator in the country,” said Justin Barasky, communications director of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. “He has distinguished himself in a variety of ways, be it his record, his public posturing, his partisan warrior stance he’s used to taking on every issue.”

Barry C. Burden, a professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, said, “He’s really latched onto two or three Washington issues to focus on. … When he arrived, it was about the healthcare law and wanting to repeal that, and then moving on to Benghazi and other foreign policy issues. To his credit, he hasn’t relented on any of those things. They’re still his focus, even though we’re a year and a half from the election.”

There’s speculation that Feingold might want a rematch and some chatter that veteran Rep. Ron Kind (D-Wis.) might jump in the race.

Republicans say that, while Johnson has stuck to his conservative principles, it won’t hurt his reelection bid, because he eschews the heated rhetoric of some of his colleagues.

“He’s conservative, but he’s not somebody who’s alarming. He has a reassuring presence. Some conservatives don’t have it. He’s conservative and responsible in his rhetoric,” said Peter Wehner, former director of the White House Office of Strategic Initiatives under George W. Bush.

Johnson, he said, feels free to speak his mind on thorny political and policy topics because he’s not a career politician. The Wisconsin Republican spent most of his professional life in the business world running a plastics manufacturing company. He never visited Washington before running for the Senate.

Privately and publicly, Johnson has pressed Obama on the debt, noting that the Congressional Budget Office has projected federal spending will exceed federal revenue by about $126 trillion over the next 30 years.

“Know what he said to me? He said, ‘Ron, we can’t show the American public numbers that big. If we do, they’ll get all scared, throw up their hands, give up all hope,’ “ Johnson recalled of his conversation with Obama. “He said, ‘Besides Ron, we can’t do all the work; we have to leave some work for future presidents, future Congresses.’

“It would be funny if it weren’t so sad,” Johnson added.

Johnson will be a central player in this year’s fiscal debate as a member of the Budget Committee. While he views the growth of Social Security and Medicare spending as a dire problem, he has enough of a sense of political self preservation to advise his GOP colleagues not to propose cuts to those programs unilaterally.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I’d say that’s probably not the smartest thing to do politically,” he said.

Instead, Johnson wants them to lay out a “solution menu” of options to extend the solvency of those programs.

The domestic side of national security (The Hill)

The Hill

The Obama administration has released its long-awaited update to the "National Security Strategy." While ostensibly a report to Congress on the president's priorities for safeguarding U.S. interests globally, around which to base funding and procurement discussions, a fair amount of the domestic political agenda inevitably creeps in. This go-around, though, this was flipped on its head; the domestic focus predominates.

The second sentence of the report posits that, "America's growing economic strength is the foundation of our national security and a critical source of our influence abroad," and a remarkable amount of text that follows is related to that premise. Before any mention of external threats or challenges, we're told that "we have created nearly 11 million new jobs during the longest private sector job growth in our history," that "[u]nemployment has fallen to its lowest level in [six] years," "[w]e are now the world leader in oil and gas production," and "[w]e continue to set the pace for science, technology, and innovation in the global economy."

Flattery abounds, with kudos given to our "young and growing workforce" and the "entrepreneurial spirit of our workers." We're told that "[o]ur higher education system is the finest in the world" and that "we continue to attract immigrants from every corner of the world who renew our country with their energy and entrepreneurial talents." It shouldn't come at all as a surprise, then, that "[o]ur economy is the largest, most open, and innovative in the world."

The first mention of conflict is to proclaim that "we have moved beyond the large ground wars in Iraq and Afghanistan," followed by a nod to "a military whose might, technology, and geostrategic reach is unrivaled in human history."

To be sure, that's followed by serious talk about violent extremism, the terrorist threat, cybersecurity, a resurgent Russia, a nuclearizing Iran and various other honest-to-goodness national security issues. And, as I argue elsewhere, the agenda set forth for global "leadership" is unbounded by geography or time.

Still, seldom a paragraph and nary a page goes by without a sop to the American public. Indeed, the very "model of American leadership" extolled in the document is allegedly founded on "the values of the American people." The "American exceptionalism" the president rejected early in his tenure is now enthusiastically embraced and attributed at least partly to "the grit, talent, and diversity of the American people."

Congress, the ostensible target audience of the report, gets a few shout-outs as well, although they're mostly either perfunctory or backhanded. We're told that the document "serves as a compass for how this administration, in partnership with Congress, will lead the world though a shifting security landscape." That the institution has just turned over to the opposition party, which opposes much of the agenda set forth in the document, is left unstated.

There's an olive branch in that direction, with a note that "[m]any achievements of recent years were made possible by Democrats and Republicans," but it's followed by the caveat that "we face continued challenges, including political dysfunction in Washington that undermines national unity, stifles bipartisan cooperation, and ultimately erodes the perception and strength of our leadership abroad." While it's perhaps axiomatic that "American leadership is always most powerful when we are able to forge common ground at home around key national priorities," it's neither appropriate for a national security strategy nor a circumstance that occurs in a vacuum.

The economy has substantially rebounded from the Great Recession and the “National Security Strategy” mentions this fact repeatedly. It professes to build “on the progress of the last [six] years, in which our active leadership has helped the world recover from a global economic crisis and respond to an array of emerging challenges.” A couple pages later, we’re reminded, “[i]n the last [six] years alone, we arrested the worst financial crisis since the Great Depression and catalyzed a new era of economic growth.”

Despite the fact that “economy is the largest, most open, and innovative in the world” and “an engine for global economic growth and a source of stability for the international system,” the administration is “investing in a new foundation for sustained economic growth that creates good jobs and rising incomes.” In turn, this requires an impressive domestic agenda, including “expanding access to early childhood and affordable higher education,” the “further acceleration of our manufacturing revolution” to “create the next generation of high technology manufacturing jobs,” “immigration reform that combines smart and effective enforcement of the law with a pathway to citizenship,” “quality, affordable healthcare to more and more Americans,” “opening markets and leveling the playing field for American workers and businesses abroad” and a “more modern and reliable infrastructure.”

Sustaining our “competitive edge” in technology, which in turn “secures our military advantage, propels our economy, and improves the human condition” has long been part of our national security strategy, going back at least to the Manhattan Project and the “missile gap.” Still, the agenda which flows in this iteration is impressive indeed; it “requires robust Federal investments in basic and applied research”; that we somehow “strengthen science, technology, engineering, and mathematics (STEM) education to produce tomorrow’s discoverers, inventors, entrepreneurs, and high-skills workforce”; and translates into “preparation and compensation for STEM teachers, broadband connectivity and high-tech educational tools for schools, programs that inspire and provide opportunities for girls and underrepresented minorities, and support for innovation in STEM teaching and inclusion in higher education.”

In a section on homeland security, the administration posits that they “have countered terrorism and transnational organized crime” — very much traditional national security threats — “in ways that enhance commerce, travel, and tourism.” While the combination is surely desirable if true, one would think a national security strategy might focus on lives saved rather than tourists attracted as the key metric.

Climate change, legitimately a national security issue if one not amenable to traditional hard power solutions, gets 15 mentions, including inclusion among the eight “top strategic risks to our interests” that they administration will “prioritize.”

Indeed, even “improv[ing] our banking practices and forg[ing] ahead with regulatory reform” are somehow matters of national security.

No section of the report is more indicative of the predominance of U.S. domestic policy than the one entitled “Advance Equality.” We’re told that “American values are reflective of the universal values we champion all around the world.” In addition to ones that, while certainly not universal, are widely embraced at home “including the freedoms of speech, worship, and peaceful assembly; the ability to choose leaders democratically; and the right to due process and equal administration of justice,” the document declares that “[w]e will be a champion for communities that are too frequently vulnerable to violence, abuse, and neglect — such as ethnic and religious minorities; people with disabilities; Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender (LGBT) individuals; displaced persons; and migrant workers.”

Now, I happen to think that’s a noble sentiment. But, given the fact that we’re simply not going to place a premium on LGBT rights in our negotiations with our closest allies, let alone our adversaries and frenemies in less savory cultures, there's simply no reason but domestic politics to include these platitudes in a national security strategy. While they may be aspirational, publicizing them in this manner is likely counterproductive in the actual conduct of U.S. foreign relations.

Similarly, the document makes repeated references to "the political and economic participation of women and girls — who are too often denied their inalienable rights and face substantial barriers to opportunity in too many places." That focusing on the particular plight of women and girls is critical to development efforts is supported by years of social science research. The administration has, to its credit, made this a point of emphasis from the outset, notably during Hillary Clinton's time at the helm in Foggy Bottom. But, again, the intended audience here are American voters, not the heads of government in places where we routinely overlook horrific human rights abuses — much less a second-class role for women — in the furtherance of other interests.

Public-facing foreign policy documents like the "National Security Strategy" naturally have many audiences and the president's employers, the American public, are certainly among them. Selling his national security policy — which after all requires the lion's share of the discretionary budget — in terms that appeal to their interests, including the impact on their pocketbooks, is perfectly reasonable. But this document goes well beyond that, sending political messages at best tangentially related to security while failing to take seriously the business of prioritizing our national interests. And it seeks to score political points while poking a finger in the eye of the party that controls the purse strings, making the restoration of "the bipartisan center that has been a pillar of strength for American foreign policy in decades past" just a bit more difficult.

Three reasons why markets would love a President Hillary Clinton (Business Insider)
By Akin Oyedele
February 10, 2015
Business Insider

Greg Valliere at Potomac Research says Hillary Clinton, “has to be considered the favorite to win the presidency.”

And for the markets, Valliere thinks a Clinton presidency would be a positive.

“Our very early bottomline is that the markets could gladly live with her,” Valliere wrote in a note Tuesday.

Valliere gives three main reasons why:

A divided government is good for markets: Stocks rose over 200% when Bill Clinton was president. Hillary would have to deal with a Republican-controlled house – currently a 246 - 188 majority, and the GOP is likely to be in control until the next redistricting exercise in 2021.
She’ll avoid the “us-versus-them rhetoric” against Wall Street, with a more moderate approach to big business than President Obama.
She’s a crony capitalist, or someone who would develop a close relationship with businesses and give them incentives to invest in the economy. While some like senator Elizabeth Warren see this as a problem, it’s actually a plus for Clinton because she would look to market leaders for advice more than Obama has. Regulations on business would not be as tough as they are under Obama, if she wins.
And what’s more, Valliere adds that if the 2016 presidential race turns out to be Hillary Clinton versus Jeb Bush, markets will find either winner acceptable.

Axelrod: Hillary not a 'healing figure' (Washington Times)
By Dave Boyer
February 11, 2015
The Washington Times

Political adviser David Axelrod told Barack Obama prior to the 2008 Democratic presidential primary that rival Hillary Rodham Clinton was not a "healing figure" and would have difficulty convincing voters that she was as a candidate of the future.

Mr. Axelrod's memoir, released Tuesday, includes a 12-page strategic memo written for Mr. Obama after Thanksgiving 2006, when the then-senator from Illinois was gearing up for his presidential campaign.

The Chicago adviser wrote: "Hillary... and her team have played this course many times before. They know every bunker, sand trap and the lay of the greens. And she has the best caddy in the business. But for all of her advantages, she is not a healing figure. ... The more she tries to moderate her image, the more she ... compounds her exposure as an opportunist."

And in an observation that could have implications for Mrs. Clinton's anticipated presidential bid in 2016, Mr. Axelrod wrote nearly 10 years ago: "After two decades of the Bush-Clinton saga, making herself the candidate of the future will be a challenge."

Mr. Axelrod's memoir, "Believer: My Forty Years in Politics," was published Tuesday by Penguin Press.

In interviews promoting his book this week, Mr. Axelrod said Mrs. Clinton will need to run "like an insurgent" in 2016.

"She needs a very well-conceived message about where she wants to lead the country," he said. "If she doesn't have that, then it does become a problem. ....I think she has to approach this campaign like a challenger, not like a front-runner — like an insurgent."

The Republican National Committee said Tuesday that Mrs. Clinton is behaving like someone "in hiding" as the 2016 campaign begins to heat up.

"She's made a strategic decision that the only way to ensure she is the Democratic nominee is to make everyone think she's inevitable," said RNC spokesman Sean Spicer. "The last time she had to face voters and actually compete for the nomination, she lost to a newcomer. She doesn't want to make the same mistake twice."

The RNC said it will be keeping a tally "of just how secretive she's been," including:

Days since last press conference: 202

Days since she's done an interview: 184

Days since she's been in Iowa: 103

Days since she's been in New Hampshire: 100

Days since she's done an event that didn't require significant speaking fees: 69

Dukakis: Hillary will be '16 nominee (The Hill)
By Kevin Cirilli
February 10, 2015
The Hill

Michael Dukakis, the 1988 Democratic presidential nominee, says Hillary Clinton is going to be the party's 2016 standard-bearer — and he's okay with that.

"Look, I consider myself part of that liberal base. I'm very comfortable with her as a candidate, as a nominee and as the president of the United States," Dukakis said Monday on Fox Business Network's "Cavuto." "Hillary is going to be the nominee and I'd like to see as many of us as possible get behind that effort now."

Many progressives have raised concerns about Clinton's ties to Wall Street, a relationship they see as too cozy.

But Dukakis pushed back against that idea, suggesting that Clinton's views are more skeptical of Wall Street than progressive critics would suggest. That being so, he asserted that she will likely not have to change those opinions to rebuff a primary challenge from the left.

"I don't think she will be forced to vary her view dramatically. ... She's a very progressive Democrat and one who's not soft on the kinds of financial fooling around that virtually sucked the country dry," Dukakis, a former governor of Massachusetts, told Fox Business Network.

Liberal groups such as Democracy For America and MoveOn.org are trying to move Clinton to the left and in some cases draft candidates such as Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), who has insisted she's not running.

"I don't think these folks have anything to worry about and frankly — I'd feel a lot better if they were out organizing 200,000 precincts in this country and getting ready for what is going to be a very tough contest in 2016," Dukakis told Fox Business Network.

Hillary Clinton to be in D.C. on same day as Bibi speech (Politico)
By Gabriel Dibenedetti
February 10, 2015
Politico

When Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu heads to Washington to deliver a controversial address to Congress on March 3, he won't be the only big name in town who might soon be facing an election.

Hillary Clinton is also scheduled to be in the capital city on that day, to be honored by EMILY's List, the group supporting female Democratic candidates.

Clinton's spokesman did not respond to a question about whether the two plan to meet, but the convergence of the prime minister and former secretary of state brings together two of the most talked-about figures in politics, at a crucial time for both of them.

While Clinton's all-but-certain 2016 campaign will be nearing its likely launch, Netanyahu's speech will generate major attention after drawing condemnation from many Democrats who are critical of him and of House Speaker John Boehner's invitation of the prime minister despite the White House's disapproval.

Neither President Barack Obama, nor Vice President Joe Biden will attend the speech, which will address the Iran nuclear deal. Biden will be out of the country, Obama has ruled out meeting with Netanyahu just before Israel's March 17 election. Secretary of State John Kerry is also expected to avoid seeing Netanyahu.

Clinton has repeatedly spoken about her role in Middle East policy since leaving the State Department in 2013, but she has not commented on Netanyahu's upcoming address. Her Washington event is sure to draw the attention of many political observers, as it will be one of her first public events in months. The former senator and first lady has been busy building her campaign team.

And while Clinton is the presumptive front-runner for the Democratic nomination in 2016, a potential rival — Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders — grabbed headlines Monday by becoming the first senator to announce he would boycott the speech.

Word by word; New Chicago program aims to prevent achievement gap by teaching parents (Grand Forks Herald)
By Sara Neufeld
February 10, 2015
Grand Forks Herald

CHICAGO - On the third-floor hospital maternity ward at the University of Chicago Medical Center, Bionka Burkhalter had just given birth to her first child, a 7-pound, 4-ounce boy named Josiah. There was a knock on the door, and two women asked to give a presentation on how to build her baby's brain. The 21-year-old single mother gave them her attention.

In the next 15 minutes, she heard about the importance of talking a lot to Josiah, whose thick dark hair poked out from under a swaddle blanket in a bassinet beside her bed. She heard about tuning into his cues and responding when he cries, and about giving him a chance to communicate back to her, even if just through eye contact.

Burkhalter is a test subject in one of many initiatives being piloted by the Thirty Million Words Project, which aims to prevent the achievement gap from starting with the power of parent-child talk - beginning at day one. In this intervention with newborns, mothers still in the hospital learn research-based parenting practices less commonly known in poor households.

There will soon be follow-up lessons at pediatric checkups.

This winter, Thirty Million Words is embarking on a major long-term study of a home-visiting program that teaches communication skills to parents of slightly older babies. Children will be trailed from about 15 months old through at least kindergarten.

Thirty Million Words was founded by University of Chicago pediatric surgeon Dana Suskind, who performs cochlear implant surgery on deaf children, allowing them to hear. Suskind was disturbed to discover that, after the same operation, some patients from poor families had more difficulty learning to speak than children from affluent homes. She became intrigued by a famous study finding that a hearing child born into poverty hears 30 million words fewer before age 4 than a middle-class peer.

This so-called "word gap" has been getting a lot of attention lately, thanks to Hillary Clinton making it a pre-campaign campaign of sorts. Her Too Small to Fail partnership has spurred a White House conference on the topic, public service announcements on Spanish-language Univision, and strategic dialogue on TV shows like "Orange Is the New Black" and "The Fosters." The American Academy of Pediatrics released a policy in June asking its 62,000 member doctors to encourage parents to read to their babies daily. There are now text message campaigns to give parents talking reminders and tips.

Thirty Million Words has promising results from a small pilot home-visiting program, and the national buzz has helped catapult the organization into a rapid expansion in Chicago. Suskind and her 13-member staff, plus graduate student interns and volunteers, are trying several approaches to reach families while measuring impact for potential widespread replication.

These strategies do not simply involve the quantity of words spoken; they target parent-child relationships, in line with new research that the quality of communication matters most.

"Obviously, language can in itself be a key part of building a child's brain, but the parent relationship really is the basis for all of child development," said Suskind, 46, a widowed mother of three school-age kids who sits on the Too Small to Fail advisory council.

"We're using the lever of parent talk to get into the parent-child relationship." Language, though, can be quantified where relationships can't. In the long-term study that began in December, babies will wear a device recording how many words adults say to them in a day and how many chances they get to respond.

Results will be collected for 200 children recruited from Early Head Start and other city programs. All families will receive six months of home visits, but parents won't all learn about the same thing. Half in a control group will get lessons on nutrition. The other 100 will see the Thirty Million Words video curriculum, explaining scientifically backed communication skills.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Parents will be taught to weave back-and-forth conversation into daily activities, from diaper changing to cooking dinner, and to explain to children why they are being asked to do things, rather than just directing them. They'll be urged to go on a "technology diet," since children need human interaction; their brains don't build connections with televisions and computers.

In partnership with the city of Chicago, Suskind's team will follow all 200 children overtime to measure their kindergarten readiness.

Suskind also is in talks with the Chicago Children's Museum to create targeted conversation points for the 400,000 children and parents who visit each year.

She is applying for a grant to train low-income parents to be ambassadors promoting the cause. (Her organization gets a mix of public and private funding.) "The ultimate answer is the whole society understanding how important parents are in their children's development," Suskind said. In low-income communities, "they've been told the opposite, that they're not powerful." Burkhalter, who holds a GED and lives with her mother on the South Side of Chicago, was one of 80 new moms who got the newborn presentation after giving birth at the University of Chicago in recent months.

Feedback from these women will be incorporated into a video to roll out this summer in the maternity wards of the hospitals at the University of Chicago and Northwestern University, shown when newborns have their hearing tested.

Similar videos are being developed to show parents on iPads while waiting to be seen at pediatric checkups.

Before her presentation began, Burkhalter filled out a survey. She checked "somewhat agree" to the statement, "How smart an infant will be depends mostly on their 'natural' intelligence at birth." She then turned to Beth Suskind and Iara Fuenmayor Rivas, who led her through a 59-slide Power Point. Beth is Dana Suskind's sister-inlaw and runs Thirty Million Words' daily operation.

Despite having just been through 17 hours of labor, Burkhalter listened attentively as Beth Suskind explained that 85 percent of baby Josiah's brain will develop in the next three years. Her talking, responding and caring for him will make his brain grow strong.

Every snuggle, every diaper change counts.

She debunked a common myth that infants can be spoiled with too much attention, explaining that their short-term memories are still developing for the first six months - so Josiah needs to be reminded that Mommy is there to comfort him when he's upset.

"There are no perfect parents," she said. "You're teaching him he can count on you." Asked for "brutally honest" feedback at the end of the presentation, Burkhalter didn't have anything negative to say. She learned a lot. "I'm gonna talk to him when I'm changing his Pampers," she said.

She then took the same survey again. Beside the statement "How smart an infant will be depends mostly on their 'natural' intelligence at birth," she had a new answer: "Strongly disagree."

Hudson, WI - McCain Town Hall Meeting 07/11/08

(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background Details:
- Event for women, nearly entire audience women
- Audience extremely enthusiastic -- lots of applause, cheering
- Carly Fiorina in the audience
- Local woman gave remarks, introduces Cindy McCain
- Cindy McCain spoke, introduced McCain

Speech Highlights:
- Thank you's.
- 16 years ago, Cindy was on a medical mission in Bangladesh -- she met two babies who were really sick and they were likely not going to live; Cindy took one of the babies home and when I met her at the airport she said -- meet your new daughter
- I'm proud of the work Cindy has done -- she just returned from a trip with Operation Smile
- ONE is a great organization, doing amazing work and Cindy will be joining them on a trip soon
- My mother is 96 years old and she's very spry; went to France and they wouldn't let her rent a car because of her age, so she bought one
- A number of years ago I wrote a book with my friend about my experience as a P.O.W.
- One of those experiences I wrote about was how I use to yell obscenities at our keepers -- well those obscenities appeared in an article later that my mom read and she called me up and told me that she was going to wash out my mouth with soap
- We now have a woman who is the head of the House -- I wish she'd switch parties
- Hillary Clinton ran for President -- and almost secured the nomination
- One of my main supporters -- Carly Fiorina, she's right here, she started as a secretary and became CEO of Hewlett Packard
- Proud to have the support of Ebay CEO, Meg Whitman
- I want to make sure there is equal pay for equal work -- and my record shows that
- Americans are worried about the security of their jobs -- the cost of everything is rising
- Juggling family and career can be hard enough -- but now you have to deal with the dwindling economy
- I believe the role of government is to unleash the ingenuity of the American people
- Nothing is more pressing right now is our dependence on foreign oil
- We need to solve this problem -- our jobs and security depend upon it
- That's why I introduced the Lexington Project last year -- and it will create hundreds of thousands of jobs
- We need do invest in nuclear energy
- The people of Wisconsin get 65% of their energy from coal -- we need to develop clean coal technology
- Obama doesn't want to do anything -- for someone who is suppose to be "Yes we can" he is a lot of "No, we can't."
- Senator Obama will raise your taxes, I will not
- When you raise taxes in a bad economy, you eliminate jobs. I am not going to let that happen.
- The differences between Obama and me is stark -- he wants to make everything harder for you
- On education we must do more to empower women for 21st century jobs
- I will veto every single bill with wasteful spending - you will know their names and I will make them famous
- I have never received an earmark or pork-barrel spending during my career; Obama has received several million dollars with
- I will never ask for a pork-barrel project my friends
- Nothing is inevitable in America -- we've always been captains of our fate
- I will fight for your future -- not for politicians and bureaucrats
- I make you one promise, I will always keep. In war and in peace. I've been an imperfect servant, but I've been a servant first, now and last. Nothing has never mattered more to me than the honor of serving America. I will always put America first. I will keep that promise.

Question and Answer:
1 Q) Will you agree to drill in ANWR to get oil?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: I believe we should drill off our coasts. I believe ANWR is a pristine area. I believe we should drill off our coasts and Obama is against that. We are sending 700 billion dollars of our money overseas to countries that don't like us that much. And sometimes that ends up in the hands of terrorists. We've got to decrease our dependence on foreign oil. We've got to have clean coal, wind, solar and nuclear. Senator Obama opposes nuclear power. France is using nuclear for 80% of their energy needs!

2 Q) You intend to build 45 new nuclear power plants. How will you move this country toward accepting the need for new nukes?
MCCAIN: Americans are smart. They know what we have to do and they know that nuclear power is safe. Americans understand and Americans are sick and tired of us doing nothing in Congress. Their approval rating is at 9%. Americans have figured it out -- they're demanding we move forward. Nuclear energy is key to reducing our greenhouse gas emissions. This election is a mandate for change -- it's either the right kind of change of the wrong kind of change and nuclear energy is the right kind of change.

3 Q) Our soveirgnty. American is truly the last great hope for the world. How do we deal with a group like the U.N who takes away our power?
MCCAIN: I understand your frustration. I'm sure you heard about Iran testing missiles. And Russia at the U.N. is preventing us from doing what we need to do. We have to unite with nations like France, etc. We will remain the world's super power. We are seeing the rise of India and China -- we have to work with them. I'd also like to talk about Afghanistan. We have to urge our friends and allies to get more involved there because the Taliban is getting stronger. It's important for us to lead, but not do it alone.

4 Q) My father was a solider in WW11 -- he was injured there. Given your strong stand on the environment, what is your opinion on the revelation that VP Cheney forced scientists to doctor the facts on global warming?
MCCAIN: Thank you for your father's service. Our veterans health care has to be better. We have to take care of the greatest generation. As I hope you know, I've had strong disagreements with this administration on climate change. I've traveled the world -- often at your expense and I've seen the effects of climate change. But suppose I'm wrong, but we still move to develop all these alternative energy sources and we hand off to our children a cleaner planet. But suppose, I'm right and we do nothing - then we hand off a worse world to our children. But I also believe there's lots of economic opportunity in the development of green technology. I am not familiar with the allegation you said. But as the chair of the commerce committee, I didn't see anything that was inappropriate, but I did think they were not forthcoming enough. I believe that young Americans are committed to cleaning up our nation. And we Republicans are the party of Theodore Roosevelt.

5 Q) What do you think of the release of 1 in 5 prisoners held at Guantanamo says about the ability of the Bush Administration to fight terrorism? This is a chance for you to separate yourself from George Bush.
MCCAIN: I don't believe in torture. I disagree with the Supreme Court's decision. It's not in my view that these non-citizens should have the full rights of American citizens. Let me point out to you, some have already joined and again attacked the United States. So lets be careful on how we address this. I don't think we have to read them their Miranda rights, okay.

6 Q) Thank you. A year and a half ago I became a widow. I asked if I would lose my benefits if I got remarried. They said no. Then I got remarried, and then I asked again and they said yes. Is there some way that widows that have worked so hard can keep their benefits? I'm a teacher.
MCCAIN: All I can say is that I will do everything to fix that problem. I will look into it.
FOLLOW-UP: We talk about family values. I teach my kids -- and then I just go live with someone and not get married.
MCCAIN: I understand. Thank you. It's a compelling story and I will look into it.

MCCAIN: The entire social security system is going to go bankrupt. It's not going to be there for young Americans. We gotta reform it, fix it. Democrats and Republicans have to work together.

7 Q) Most Democrats are moving to the center to get elected and will say and do anything to get elected and this is certainly your opponent. Will you hammer away at this? They have moved so far to the left! Will you hammer away at their socialist, Marxist ways?
MCCAIN: Yes! I give the American people great credit for their intelligence and knowledge. I am sorry that Barack Obama has not taken up the request to have these town hall meetings together. We should stand in front of you and listen to the American people. The American people deserve more than the soundbyte, the gotcha moment. They deserve to see us with the voter. These things are great and wonderful. It's the most fun thing and informative thing I've ever done. I promise you this makes me a better candidate and also a better president.

8 Q) My husband is a WWII veteran and I promised him I would shake your hand. Wisconsin is the leader of health care -- we do not have a crisis. What we have is a health care, care crisis. Medicare is failing. It puts a burden on all of us. Do you have a plan to help us out there a bit?
MCCAIN: You remind me of my mother. Thank you and thank your husband. You put your finger on the problem -- it's not the quality of care that's the problem, it's the skyrocketing cost. We've got to put incentives into place that keep health care costs down. I want to give every family in American a $5000 tax credit. I want to start giving people with chronic diseases outpatient care. We need walk-in clinics and community centers. We need to look at the issue of the uninsurables. We need to have government approved plans for these people. We need to establish risk-pools. Wellness and fitness, wellness and fitness. This is very important. The rise of obesity among young people is staggering. We should know what the school lunch is and what the phys-ed is in schools. Get fit and get in shape. We can have health insurance provide incentives for people to get healthy and fit as well.

9 Q) Many JROTC programs are not getting Phys Ed credits, funding, etc. We're getting the boot in high schools. What are you opinions of JROTC programs?
MCCAIN: I think that program is an outstanding one. I do not know that about California -- and I will bring this up with the Governor. I think its a great program.

10 Q) Thank you for your work with Feingold on campaign finance reform. I was going to ask you about the Iraq war and its costs but instead, I'll have to ask you about what everyone is thinking: Is Brett Farve coming out of retirement?
MCCAIN: That's a great example of wellness and fitness. And I'd just like to add what a great state this is. Let me recognize the mayor here. Let me tell you about my story running for the Senate - and I was elected. Tells story.

11 Q) How would you address the growing problem of all the illegal entries into our country.
MCCAIN: It's a big problem and it's a federal responsibility. My friends our borders are broken. I tried twice to get comprehensive immigration reform. We have to secure our borders first. Then, we need tamper-proof biometric document that temporary workers can use. We also have to address this in a human way as well. It's a federal responsibility and we must act and quickly.

12 Q) I'm from Minnesota. Please take Pawlenty as your VP.
MCCAIN: Gov. Pawlenty is a wonderful person. He's the next generation of leadership.

13 Q) Nuclear power. What do we do with the waste of 45 nuclear power plants?
MCCAIN: We have to store and reprocess. France reprocesses. I'd like to set up a reprocessing facility in Russia -- they've offered, but I don't know if they are serious. There's some issues we have to figure out with Yucca Mtn, but we should pursue that.

14 Q) I'm an undecided voter. I'm tired of all these crises! I think we all have to work together. I'm tired of the war when there's so many things we have to fix here. What can you tell me as I am an undecided voter?
MCCAIN: Thank you for coming here. What it really comes down to is what Americans want us to do. And my records shows me doing that. Now someone mentioned Feingold -- I've worked with him. I've worked with Lieberman and Kennedy. Americans want us to sit down together and figure out these problems. I have a proven record of reaching across the aisle. Sometimes I have not succeeded -- like immigration -- but at least we sat down together. Americans are so frustrated. Most Americans think we are on the wrong track. The last time Social Security was in danger -- Democrat Tip O'Neil and Republican Ronald American sat down together and fixed it. My record shows me having done this as well.

Conclusion
A long time ago I had the opportunity to leave the prison camp before others who had been their longer. I declined. I put my country first. I've done what I thought was right and I've put my country first, even when it made others made. I will always put my country first.

Oof. That's the trap Obama fell into with unhappy results.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

A Memorial Day test for Hillary Clinton // CNN // John King - May 24, 2015

Jitters about Jeb, some praise for Rick Perry, the meaning of Hillary Clinton's holiday weekend parade march and some coming Democratic competition filled our Sunday trip around the "Inside Politics" table. Plus, a take from conversations with a couple dozen younger voters that was both interesting and a bit depressing.

1. Hillary's hometown parade & a test of 2016 style

Memorial Day parades are a popular place to find politicians this holiday weekend, whether one is running for sheriff or president. Count Hillary Clinton among those marching, and it is both a familiar stroll for her and perhaps a glimpse at her style as she moves past early events that have been carefully scripted.

Maggie Haberman of The New York Times reminded us that Secretary Clinton -- formerly Senator Clinton -- has walked in her local New York parade before and gotten a great reception. Perhaps there's a tad more scrutiny this time because she is back in the running for president -- and because she is about to enter a somewhat new phase of the 2016 effort -- including the big official rollout rally.

"There has not been a sense of great energy around her candidacy so far," said Haberman. "So that is one thing to keep an eye on."

"So far, she's keeping these events small. They're doing it for a reason, but you lose something when you do it that way and they need to really kind of galvanize and mobilize people."

2. The summer of Bernie?

So far, the Clinton strategy is pretty obvious: lay out her positions in a way that both protects her standing as the prohibitive Democratic front-runner and, when possible, exposes GOP divisions.

Can she stick to what at times seems to be already a general election approach? Stay tuned.

CNN's Jeff Zeleny notes that the Democratic field is about to become bigger, at least officially, when Bernie Sanders launches his campaign on Tuesday.

"He's going to have a big rally, probably reminiscent of Howard Dean's big entry into the race in '03-'04," said Zeleny.

"The question is, will this be the summer of Bernie? Will he be able to rally things? He's already getting a lot of online support and a lot of interest from that side."

Zeleny adds that he will be watching Sanders and O'Malley, who will launch later in the week, to see how much "space they occupy" in the Democratic 2016 presidential field.

3. Jitters about Jeb, even as he says the ship has been righted

It's a bit off when the candidates get into self-analysis, but there was Jeb Bush this past week saying all is well and the ship is righted.

He felt compelled to make that statement after a stretch in which he seemed to have a hard time talking about the Iraq War and his brother's judgment in launching it.

So is his self-assessment shared by other Republicans? Not so fast, reports Robert Costa of The Washington Post.

"When I was in Iowa and New Hampshire this past week, I sat down with a lot of Republican officials and donors in those states and I said, you know, really just give me a sense of what's on your mind behind the scenes," said Costa.

"And the topic almost all of them brought up was angst about Jeb Bush, angst about his candidacy. They're anxious that he's not getting momentum, that he doesn't have energy in any way in this primary. They're not sure how he's going to get it."

4. Is Rick Perry the new Rick Santorum?

Rick Perry torpedoed his 2012 run for the presidency. The trademark moment was, of course, when he couldn't -- in a debate -- name three Cabinet agencies he would eliminate if elected.

This time, as he explores another run, the former Texas governor is but a blip in most polls.

But Julie Pace of The Associated Press, just back from some time on the ground in Iowa, says Perry is getting some favorable reviews from activists as he works the state and seeks political redemption. And, Pace says, he has a model for his 2016 plan: the rise of former Senator Rick Santorum from 1% or 2% in early polls to victory on caucus night.

"He is spending a ton of time in Iowa," said Pace. "He's doing all of the big campaign forums. He went to the Eagle Scout dedication of a local activist. He's just doing the things that people in Iowa want to see candidates do."

5. Some Sanders buzz, plus a lot of disillusionment among younger voters

I spent a good deal of time last week talking to younger voters, and possible voters. As always, these conversations were refreshing -- the energy is inspiring and I was involved in several interesting conversations about big 2016 campaign issues. But some of it was a tad depressing.

At a Boston dinner for the remarkable community service organization City Year, I was approached by a handful of young people who wanted me to know how eager they were to help Sen. Sanders in his Democratic bid.

Many others said they were unimpressed with the candidates so far. Many expressed views consistent with what we see in public opinion polling: Many young people lean conservative or libertarian on issues such as taxes and regulation and NSA surveillance, but see the Republican Party as trapped in a time warp when it comes to issues such as immigration, climate change and same-sex marriage.

My casual, and unscientific, focus groups included my older children. My son, Noah, graduated from Boston College on Monday. We drove back to Washington on Wednesday, with all his stuff, plus 18-year old Hannah King and "almost four" Jonah King.

We don't talk politics much because they have always viewed it as dad's job -- and boring. But for a chunk of our drive we did, and they had thoughtful observations about the big issues and about many of the candidates in the 2016 race.

But -- this is the tad depressing part -- like many of those at the City Year dinner, they voiced the opinion that nothing gets done on the big and hard stuff anyway, so why waste their time worrying about the campaign?

Whether you were happy with the results or not, the enthusiasm of younger voters in the Obama campaigns was good for our politics.

There is a huge opportunity -- and a huge potential campaign talent pool -- available to the 2016 contenders. But most of the young people I talked to were skeptical about politics, if not outright disillusioned.

All of the candidates, regardless of party, need to do a better job convincing these voters -- and possible voters -- that they are listening, and that it does matter.

Hillary Clinton to speak at S.C. Democratic women's event in Columbia // The State // Jamie Self - May 24, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton is coming to Columbia on Wednesday for her first trip back to the Palmetto State since her 2008 presidential campaign.

The former secretary of state will give the keynote address at the third annual 2015 Day in Blue, the event's co-hosts announced Sunday.

Clinton also will hold a roundtable discussion with African American small business owners and make brief remarks to the S.C. House and Senate Democratic caucuses.

Hosted by the S.C. Democratic Women's Council and the S.C. House Democratic Women's Caucus, the Day in Blue brings together S.C. Democratic women to the State House for a conference.

Clinton will give her keynote address at 1:45 p.m. at the Columbia Marriott.

Clinton's visit comes more than a month after her April 12 entry into the race and after she has campaigned in early primary states Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada.

Clinton's stops so far have consisted of small, controlled events and roundtable discussions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The campaign has announced a larger campaign kick-off event scheduled for June 13, but the location has not been announced.

An ongoing congressional inquiry into Clinton's leadership of the U.S. Department of State during the 2012 attack on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya, and revelations that she used a private email account and server to conduct state department business have followed her on the campaign trail.

Last Friday, on her second visit to New Hampshire, Clinton took questions from a gaggle of reporters, marking a shift from the distance she has kept from the media since entering the race.

Also the heavy favorite in the race, Clinton returns to the Palmetto State after a seven-year absence. She last was in South Carolina during the January 2008 Democratic presidential primary debate in Myrtle Beach. She lost the S.C. primary to then-Sen. Barack Obama who won all but two counties.

The former first lady's S.C. trip also trails visits by her rivals, including U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who was first to announce he's seeking the nomination. Former governors Martin O'Malley of Maryland and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island are expected to announce soon. Former U.S. Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia also is eyeing a run.

Clinton will head to Florida on Thursday and Friday followed by a June 3-4 trip to Texas, according to media reports.

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Clinton's full embrace of immigration // MSNBC // Amanda Sakuma - May 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton's embrace of immigration reform has been an unusually bold gesture for a public figure best known for her caution. By hiring onto her campaign staff a 26-year-old grassroots activist who lived in the U.S. without documentation for more than a decade, the 2016 Democratic front runner has signaled she's serious about going all-in on the single-most contentious issue roiling the immigration debate – full citizenship for potentially millions of undocumented immigrants – all the while hitting a key Republican pressure point with precision.

The effort may reflect a heartfelt change in Clinton's views on immigration, nearly 8 years after a question in a nationally televised debate on whether she supported driver's licenses for undocumented immigrants sent her into a fit of verbal contortion. But the move largely political, severely undercutting her likely GOP opponents' ability to compete in drawing support from Latinos, one of the fastest growing voting blocs in the country, and one that will be crucial for any party to claim future presidential elections.

As the former secretary of state's stance on the issue takes shape with increased clarity, the spotlight falls squarely on the crowded Republican field, where candidates' murky policy positions are being pushed further and further to the right.

The strategy could risk alienating voters in areas of the country where illegal immigration remains a hot button issue. But by coming out early and strong on the matter, Clinton appears willing to take that risk – clearly acknowledging that Latinos have led the way in turning many historically red states purple.

"She's concerned about the swing states where it's crucial for her to win: Nevada, Colorado and certainly Florida," said William Frey, an expert in U.S. demographics with the Brookings Institute. "Immigration is not the most important issue, but it's a symbolic. That enthusiasm is going to be very important for her."

Clinton outpaced Obama's Latino support during the 2008 primaries by a nearly two-to-one margin, throwing her support behind comprehensive immigration reform before stumbling at that infamous primary debate. She eventually come out against driver's licenses for undocumented immigrants. This month Clinton went much further, saying she supported a full and equal pathway to citizenship, while also vowing to take Obama's controversial executive actions a step further to extend work permits and a temporary legal status to millions more undocumented immigrants.

While Clinton has been aggressively pushing her position on immigration forward, Republicans have been scrambling to pull theirs back. Sen. Marco Rubio was the architect of the comprehensive immigration plan in Congress before he abruptly began sprinting away from the bi-partisan bill; Govs. Scott Walker, Chris Christie and Jeb Bush favored a pathway to citizenship before they suddenly didn't; and former Govs. Rick Perry and Mike Huckabee have advocated for tighter border security without detailing what exactly that means.

It was not by mistake that Clinton chose to unveil her immigration platform in Nevada, a swing state that Obama visited immediately after announcing his sweeping executive actions last November. Nor was it by accident that Clinton chose to make her announcement while sitting at a table with young, undocumented student activists – a group the former secretary of state knows she needs to win over – rather than by giving a barn-burning speech before hundreds of supporters.

Lorella Praeli, who was appointed this week to lead Clinton's immigrant outreach, sits atop a very short list of young DREAMers who can seamlessly shift between roles as an activist, cable news commentator and honored White House guest. Immigration advocacy is inevitably divided into two separate camps – those who influence from within the halls of power and those on the outside who build political pressure from the ground up. Few organizations, like Praeli's, have managed to do both, proving that the young people directly impacted by immigration policy are some of the most effective messengers for reform.

DREAMers often note that they've been burned before. Obama made sweeping promises early in his first term to pass comprehensive immigration reform, but instead the community watched as more people were deported under his administration than any other. Obama later followed through with his series of sweeping executive actions, but with the programs tied up in the courts, it's now up to the next occupant of the Oval Office to finish what he started.

The obstacles facing Clinton on immigration remain formidable. She faces an uphill battle in actually accomplishing most policy positions she has staked out on immigration: creating a pathway to citizenship and ending bed-quotas at immigrant detention centers would both require support from Congress. Meanwhile, the Obama administration maintains that the president's executive actions are as far-reaching as possible within the confines of the law – anything further, as Clinton has promised, would almost certainly be challenged in the courts.

The question remains whether Clinton's early immigration platform could come back to bite her with undecided voters in the general election, should she secure the Democratic nomination. Clinton's campaign has not been defined by immigration yet, but she carries the risk of being defined in negative terms on the issue with some white voters in Iowa, said Dennis Goldford, a political scientist at Drake University in Iowa.

"For your average, rural, small town Republican voter, illegal immigration is an assault on their culture," Goldford said.

Just a month into her official campaign, Clinton's consistency on immigration only amplifies the disarray within the GOP 2016 field over how to address immigration without alienating base voters. In 2012, Republican leaders made adopting a more welcoming tone toward Latinos a top priority after the party's "self-deportation" platform set them back dramatically in the last presidential election. But 2016 Republican candidates have since seized on the anti-immigrant sentiment of the party's base, pushing their platforms further to the right.

While flip-flopping on his own position on a pathway to citizenship this week, New Jersey governor and likely 2016 GOP presidential candidate Chris Christie called out Clinton for "pandering" to immigration advocates. Some immigrant rights groups, however, are saying that they're shamelessly accepting the attention.

"It was a brilliant electoral strategy and it's a strong commitment," said Frank Sharry, executive director of the advocacy group America's Voice. "If there's any pandering going on, it's the Republicans who are lurching to the right to pander to the nativists."

Clinton, Secret Service go way back // TH Online // William Garbe -May 24, 2015 - May 24, 2015

Carrie Tedore's home was packed with people as a member of Hillary Clinton's Secret Service detail stood watch at the front door, a star-shaped badge emblazoned with the White House facade pinned to the chest of his shirt.

Among those impressed with the Secret Service was Tedore's 10-year-old son, Bobby, who greeted the Democratic presidential candidate with his parents before dashing upstairs.

"I didn't expect him to be quiet the whole time," Tedore said. "That's a 10-year-old for you."

The Secret Service detail has followed Clinton since the successful 1992 presidential campaign of her husband, Bill. More than two decades later, the same type of detail followed her to Dubuque Regional Airport after she departed the Tedore residence.

"On Tuesday afternoon in Dubuque, Iowa, a few dozen passengers waited for their routine American Airlines flight to Chicago, one of only three flights scheduled from the tiny airport that day," wrote MSNBC journalist Alex Seitz-Wald.

Clinton neither passed through TSA security, nor did she converse with passengers or talk to Seitz-Wald, a passenger himself. Instead, she sat on the plane, sunglasses on, BlackBerry in hand, surrounded by the Secret Service, he reported.

Jeb Bush tidbits

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush hasn't run for any office since 2002, and he technically isn't running for one now -- at least yet. But should the Republican choose to do so, he'll be ready to take selfies.

"By the way, I found a new way of doing this," he said to a supporter during his May 16 visit to Loras College. The supporter had just asked to take a cellphone photo with Bush.

"You turn it back to the way it was, go like this," Bush said, fiddling with an iPhone in his hand. "I found out yesterday. I take a lot of these."

Bush continued working the room when another attendee approached.

"Gov. Bush, since the tallest candidate always wins," said Russ Furhman, of Dubuque.

"George Pataki?" Bush said interrupting Furhman, referring to the also-tall former governor of New York.

"Now that I've seen you I'm going to run out and put 10 bucks on you," Furhman said.

"Well, it's a long path, man," Bush said. "Wait until the odds get really, really bad and then buy."

FUNDRAISING FOR BUSTOS

If you're in the market to see Taylor Swift in concert, you might consider making a $2,500 donation to U.S. Rep. Cheri Bustos, D-Ill.

According to an invitation obtained by the Sunlight Foundation, a nonpartisan, open government nonprofit, Bustos is offering tickets to donors willing to make the per-person donation. The concert will be held July 13 at Nationals Park in Washington, D.C.

'16 race feeds Benghazi talk // Boston Globe // Owen Boss - May 24, 2015

The sister of a Navy SEAL killed in the Benghazi terrorist attack is wary that Hillary Clinton's 2016 presidential run will mean her family will have to deal with nonstop news coverage focused on the former secretary of state's failure to boost security at the embassy.

"What's unfortunate for us is Hillary Clinton running for president is going to keep this story on the news," Kate Quigley of Marblehead told the Herald yesterday. "It would've been lovely a long time ago if she accepted her responsibility in it but that never happened and that most likely will never happen."

Quigley's brother, Glen Doherty of Winchester, and fellow Navy SEAL Tyrone Woods were killed by mortar fire while holding off dozens of insurgents on Sept. 11, 2012, at the U.S. Embassy in Benghazi, Libya. U.S. Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens and U.S. Foreign Service Information Management Officer Sean Smith also were killed in the attack.

The State Department released nearly 900 pages of Clinton's personal correspondence Friday, some of which reinforced the notion that the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination received numerous warnings about security at the American diplomatic compound prior to the deadly attack.

One email shows Clinton received a message from Stevens warning of the deteriorating police presence near the compound.

"The police chief is a university professor who took on these police duties after the revolution. According to the police chief, there are only 3,000 police in the Benghazi area, down from 6,000 prior to the revolution," Stevens wrote. "Many police simply did not return to their jobs after the revolution, as they feared retaliation."

Another email, sent just seven months before the attack by then-Ambassador to Libya Gene Cretz, warned of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"concern here that continuing rivalries among the militias remains dangerous from the perspective of the havoc they can wreak with their firepower and their continued control of select turf."

Quigley said the release of Clinton's personal emails hasn't provided her family any bombshell revelations.

"We've known this all along," Quigley said of the lack of security at the compound. "I have heard that now there are new restrictions pertaining to how embassies are supposed to be staffed but this is nothing new for us. We still are not going to blame the government, we still lay blame where we always have — with the people who planned and executed the attack."

Clinton campaign strategy catching flak // Sentinel Source // Anita Kumar - May 24, 2015

CEDAR FALLS, Iowa — Here's how Hillary Clinton campaigned for president this week: She took a private 15-minute tour of a bike shop that had closed for her visit. She spoke to four small-business owners chosen by her staff in front of an audience of 20, also chosen by her staff. She answered a few questions from the media following weeks of silence.

And after a little more than an hour, Clinton was off, whisked away by aides and Secret Service agents, into a minivan and on to the next event.

Members of the public who wanted to go inside the building to support her, oppose her or merely ask a question of her were left outside on an unseasonably cool Iowa day. Most didn't bother showing up.

"I am troubled that so far in this caucus cycle she hasn't had any public town halls," said Chris Schwartz, a liberal activist from Waterloo, as he stood outside the bike store hoping to talk to Clinton about trade. "If she had a public town hall then we wouldn't be out here. We would much rather be in there engaging with her."

Welcome to Hillary Clinton 2.0. Mindful of her defeat by Barack Obama in 2008, Clinton has embraced a new strategy — one that so far does not include town hall meetings and campaign rallies, media interviews, even public events.

Instead, she holds small controlled events with a handful of potential voters in homes, businesses and schools. She repeats many of the same lines ("I want to be your champion" is a favorite), participants are handpicked by her staff or the event host, and topics are dictated by her campaign.

Clinton's approach — made possible by her lack of strong competition for the Democratic nomination — comes as she works to relate to working American families after years of being criticized as an out-of-touch Washington insider garnering hefty paychecks for her speeches and books.

But the campaign to show the world that she's never forgotten her middle-class, Middle America sensibilities can be a tough sell from inside a bubble of armored cars, Secret Service agents and wary aides.

"It's going to come back and haunt her," said Eric Herzik, chairman of the political science department at the University of Nevada, Reno. "I think it will backfire."

Clinton's distance from the public stands in contrast to other candidates in both parties, who routinely mix and mingle with the public, hold town hall meetings and appear on TV news programs.

So far, Clinton has not held one event open to the public since she launched her campaign, though aides say she eventually will hold bigger events..”

Andrew Smith, director of the University of New Hampshire Survey Center, said that while there’s value in hearing what potential voters say, the Clinton campaign has ensured she only gets friendly audiences even if she doesn’t know exactly what they will say.

“There’s not the same level of pushback. It’s always going to be artificial,” he said. “She shouldn’t be afraid to talk to voters and really campaign.”

Sliver of Clinton Emails Hint at Lingering Political Trouble // Real Clear Politics // Lisa Lerer, Matthew Lee & Jack Gillum - May 24, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton received information on her private email account about the deadly attack on U.S. diplomatic facilities in Benghazi that was later classified "secret" at the request of the FBI, underscoring lingering questions about how responsibly she handled sensitive information on a home server.

The nearly 900 pages of her correspondence released Friday are only a sliver of the more than 55,000 pages of emails Clinton has turned over to the State Department, which had its plan to release them next January rejected this week by a federal judge.

Instead, the judge ordered the agency to conduct a "rolling production" of the records. Along with a Republican-led House committee investigating the Benghazi attacks, the slow drip of emails will likely keep the issue of how Clinton, the front-runner for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, used a personal email account while serving as the nation's top diplomat alive indefinitely.

Committee Chairman Trey Gowdy, R-S.C., said that the released emails were incomplete, adding that it "strains credibility" to view them as a thorough record of Clinton's tenure.

The prospect for political complication in Clinton's choice to use a personal email account, rather than one issued by the government, was evident in the messages released Friday. They included several that were deemed sensitive but unclassified, contained details about her daily schedule and held information - censored in the documents as released - about the CIA that the government is barred from publicly disclosing.

Taken together, the correspondence provides examples of material considered to be sensitive that Clinton received on the account run out of her home. She has said the private server had "numerous safeguards."

Campaigning in New Hampshire, Clinton said Friday she was aware that the FBI now wanted some of the email to be classified, "but that doesn't change the fact all of the information in the emails was handled appropriately."

Asked if she was concerned it was on a private server, she replied, "No."

State Department spokeswoman Marie Harf said, "It was not classified at the time. The occurrence of subsequent upgrade does not mean anyone did anything wrong."

It's not clear if Clinton's home computer system used encryption software to communicate securely with government email services. That would have protected her communications from the prying eyes of foreign spies, hackers, or anyone interested on the Internet.

Last year, Clinton gave the State Department 55,000 pages of emails that she said pertained to her work as secretary sent from her personal address. Only messages related to the 2012 attacks on the U.S. diplomatic post in Benghazi, Libya, that killed four Americans, including U.S. Ambassador Christopher Stevens, were released by the department on Friday. The 296 emails had already been turned over to the House Benghazi committee.

A Nov. 18, 2012, message about arrests in Libya was not classified at the time, meaning no laws were violated, but was upgraded from "unclassified" to "secret" on Friday at the request of the FBI to redact information that could contain information damaging to national security or foreign relations.

Twenty-three words were redacted from the message, which detailed reports of arrests in Libya of people who might have connections to the attack, Harf said.

The redacted portion appears to relate to people who provided information about the alleged suspects to the Libyans. That part of the email had been categorized by the State Department as "NOFORN," meaning that foreign nationals weren't allowed to read it, including close U.S. allies.

The message, originally from Bill Roebuck, then director of the Office of Maghreb Affairs, was forwarded to Clinton by her deputy chief of staff, Jake Sullivan, with the comment: "fyi."

No other redactions were made to the collection of Benghazi-related emails for classification reasons, officials said. They added that the Justice Department had not raised classification concerns about the now-redacted 1 1/2 lines in the Nov. 18 email when the documents were turned over to the Benghazi committee. The committee retains an unredacted copy of the email, the officials said.

Clinton also appeared to send and receive protected information about the CIA, which was withheld on Friday because the State Department said federal law prevented its disclosure. The department did not offer a detailed description of what it was withholding, such as a name or other sensitive information.

A number of the messages were marked with codes indicating that the information had been censored for reasons related to the U.S. intelligence community, law enforcement or personal privacy - a process that happened after they'd already been circulated through Clinton's home server.

Much of the correspondence concerned the mundane matters of high-level government service, press clippings, speech drafts, and coordination of calls with other top officials as well as chit-chat about shopping between Clinton and top aide Huma Abedin.

"What a wonderful, strong and moving statement by your boss," Christian Brose, a top adviser to Sen. John McCain, writes in an email to Sullivan, forwarded to Clinton just after Stevens' death. "Please tell her how much Sen. McCain appreciated it. Me too."

There are repeated warnings of the unrest in Libya, though Clinton has said she was never personally involved in questions of security in Benghazi before the attack. One message describes a one-day trip by Stevens in March 2011 to "get a sense of the situation on the ground" and prepare for a 30-day stay in the future. A request for Defense Department support was made, the email adds, but no approval had yet been received. Stevens was killed in Benghazi on Sept. 11, 2012.

As early as April 2011, Clinton was forwarded a message sent to her staff that the situation in the country had worsened to the point "where Stevens is considering departure from Benghazi," The email was marked "Importance: High."

8 things we learned from the Clinton emails // Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood - May 23, 2015

The highly selective trove of Hillary Clinton emails released by the State Department Friday revealed both the seemingly strong influence Sidney Blumenthal wielded over the secretary of state and the preoccupation with media coverage exhibited by her closest aides.

If the 296 published emails are to be considered a complete collection, they would suggest Clinton relied almost exclusively on an aide that had been banned from the State Department, Blumenthal, to provide her intelligence on a country at war.

The emails show that Clinton's staffers often circulated and debated press clippings amongst themselves and occasionally discussed how to respond to certain media criticisms.

They also provide a narrow glimpse of how the State Department's top ranks operated in the weeks before and after the greatest crisis of Clinton's tenure.

Clinton asked State Dept. aides to prepare speech for Clinton Foundation

An email dated Sept. 22, 2012 shows Clinton appeared to discuss a speech for the Clinton Global Initiative less than two weeks after the Benghazi attack.

Jake Sullivan, a top Clinton aide, sent Clinton a draft of the speech that day and encouraged her to "let me know your thoughts."

The entire speech is redacted under a FOIA exemption that allows agencies to hold back internal deliberations.

What is unclear is why Clinton was using State Department aides to prepare a speech for her family's foundation, or why the text of that draft would be considered an internal government communication.

The day of Benghazi attacks, Clinton asked for a film she made a cameo in Hours before the attack on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Clinton asked a pair of her top staffers to find her a copy of the Bernard Henri Levy documentary, "The Oath of Tobruk."

Levy had directed the film about the Libyan war, which featured a cameo from Clinton herself.

But elsewhere in the emails, Levy's name surfaced again, although it was redacted in the version released by the State Department.

In a memo to Clinton dated March 27, 2011, Blumenthal noted that French President Nicolas Sarkozy had asked Levy, a sociologist, to use his "long established ties to Israel, Syria, and other nations in the Middle East" to assess the level of influence al Qaeda and other terrorist groups wielded in the Libyan government.

'This will be exciting when it's FOIA'd'

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A light-hearted exchange between Philippe Reines, Thomas Nides and Caroline Adler — all top Clinton aides — revealed the staffers had FOIA in mind when emailing with their government accounts.

Describing an interview Clinton gave to Wall Street Journal reporter Monica Langley in which the reporter sat too close to the secretary, Reines said he didn't "think you see that behavior among any type of mammal."

"Was like the dental hygienist rolling around the floor to get the best access to your mouth depending on what tooth she was trying to get access to," he wrote.

"I may go and throw up since I am laughing so hard," Nides said.

Adler, who was copied on the chain, added, "this will be exciting when it's FOIA'd."

Clinton confused names of slain Americans

In the hours after Ambassador Chris Stevens and three other Americans were murdered in a terrorist raid, Clinton sought advice from her aides about when to announce Stevens' death.

But critics quickly pounced on the fact that Clinton seemingly jumbled the ambassador's name with that of Sean Smith, a foreign service information management officer who was also killed in the attack, by referring to the slain diplomat as "Chris Smith" instead of Chris Stevens.

Blumenthal and Clinton had secret meeting just after Benghazi attack

Clinton appears to have visited Blumenthal just weeks after the Benghazi attack.

Blumenthal told his old friend it was "great to see you" on October 6, 2012, and encouraged her to "drop in again," the emails show.

A day later, he invited Bill and Hillary Clinton to his home after the election.

"Post-election, we'd like to have you over for dinner," Blumenthal wrote. "Bill can come too, if he's in town. Whatever works."

"Will do," she replied.

The exchange was yet another illustration of the close ties between the former Clinton aide and secretary of state that has sparked controversy in recent days.

Emails between Blumenthal and Clinton made up a significant portion of the records released Friday.

In 9 months leading up to Benghazi, there's only 35 Clinton emails

The State Department emails span most of Clinton's final two years in office, but the cache contains long stretches of time when either no emails were sent, or none were disclosed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the two weeks before the Benghazi attack, Clinton and her staff either did not send each other a single email regarding the atmosphere in Benghazi that led to the death of four Americans in a raid on the U.S. consulate there, or the emails during that time were not disclosed.

In the nine months of 2012 before the Sept. 11 attack, Clinton and her aides exchanged just 35 emails that the secretary of state evidently deemed fit to give the State Department.

Private server emails contained sensitive data FBI classified just hours before release

The FBI classified information in one of Clinton's emails just hours before their release, the Associated Press reported Friday.

State Department officials told the AP Clinton's emails from Nov. 18, 2012, contained the names of suspects that had been arrested in Libya in connection with the attacks.

Twenty-three words were redacted from that particular email published on the State Department website.

Reporters pressed State Department spokesperson Marie Harf on why information sensitive enough to be considered classified, even retroactively, was handled on a private server.

"It's possible that the degree of sensitivity ... evolved over time," Harf said at a briefing Friday.

State Dept. made political, helpful redactions

Leaked emails published by the New York Times just one day before the State Department officially released the email trove show that the agency redacted a number of passages before publishing the documents.

The State Department had redacted parts of emails that revealed officials' personal opinions about prominent Libyans.

The agency also removed some of Clinton's own words, such as her suggestion to explore arming the Libyan rebels using "private security experts."

Clinton's attempt to warn the White House to prepare for Republican attacks on the Obama campaign using Benghazi as fodder was also redacted, although it is unclear how that information would affect national security.

Possible Clinton running mate decries Benghazi 'witch hunt' // The Hill // Devin Henry - May 24, 2015

Julian Castro, an Obama Cabinet secretary floated as a potential running mate for Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, said on Sunday the release of State Department emails relating to Benghazi is part of "basically a witch hunt."

"What you have here with these emails is basically a witch hunt, and Congressman [Trey] Gowdy [R-S.C.], who is leading this, is very intentionally trying to manipulate this witch hunt to play politics," Castro, the Housing and Urban Development Secretary, said on CNN's "State of the Union."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Under public pressure, the State Department on Friday released hundreds of emails between Clinton and other department officials related to the 2012 attack on the American embassy in Benghazi, Libya. Gowdy, who is chairing a congressional investigative committee into the events around the attack, has called Clinton to testify on the matter before Congress later this year.

“This thing has been studied to death, by Republicans and by Democrats, several committees, including in Congress, that have all said, ‘Yes, of course what happened was tragic, but Secretary Clinton was not in any way at fault,’ ” Castro said.

Democrats have pitched Castro as a potential running mate for Clinton in the 2016 presidential election, speculation he has brushed off as “flattering.”

“If I had a dime for every amount of speculation that happens in DC, I think all of us would be wealthy,” he said.

Clinton inevitable? Really? // Miami Herald // Editorial Board - May 23, 2015

The aura of inevitability in which Hillary Clinton basked for so long has smacked up against the reality of the rough-and-tumble of a presidential campaign. And both she and the Democratic Party are worse off.

She deigned to speak at length to the media last week after about a month of giving reporters, and the public she seeks to represent, the silent treatment. At a time when Republican wannabes are grabbing every microphone, gabbing at length to differentiate themselves from each other, Mrs. Clinton, until last week, had taken another, less winning approach.

Really, the Republican campaign so far, with its cast of seemingly thousands, has been fun to watch, informative and revealing.

Mrs. Clinton, however, has seemed imperious, remote and tone-deaf to the clamor to hear directly from her instead of being defined by the people who hope to oppose her next Election Day. She’s already lost one presidential campaign; it’s up to her now to persuade Americans that she really wants to be president and is not just going through the motions because of ...inevitability.

Of course, it’s way early in this campaign, and she may yet find her mojo. Maybe it’s part of her strategy to not expend a lot of energy before it’s clearer who her Republican opponent will be.

Still, it’s no longer too early for Mrs. Clinton to make the case that she’s hungry for this job, that she’s the better choice for the position. So far, though, she hasn’t really moved the needle of her poll numbers since declaring her candidacy. And despite the intimate, unrecorded chats Mrs. Clinton has held with small groups of voters, her 27-day silence let others fill the void and tell the public who she is, and mostly in negative terms.

Thing is, when she engages in straight talk, as she did this week in unequivocally declaring that the U.S. invasion of Iraq was a mistake, she plays to her strengths. Yes, it’s past time for her foes to give up on their Benghazi allegations — they have been a nonstarter from the outset.

But, like every other candidate, Mrs. Clinton comes with baggage, the contents of which should be examined, explained. The dubious sources of donations to the Clinton Foundation, for instance, are fair game.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton's hurdles are short-term — she only has to make it to Election Day — but the Democratic Party's challenges are long-term. Despite having one of its own in the White House for six years, party leaders seem complacent, not hungry to maintain occupancy at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave., not just in 2016, but 2024, 2032 and beyond.

In other words, the Democratic bench isn't very deep, and that stands to cause enduring damage to the rich mix of ideas and ideology that has propelled American politics for centuries now.

If tomorrow Mrs. Clinton decided, "You know, maybe I don't want to be president after all," who would step into the void? So far, Sen. Elizabeth Warren has a large, cultish following that could translate into a credible, popular campaign. Joe Biden? Experienced and personable, but like Mrs. Clinton, and even Jeb Bush on the Republican side, there's a freshness lacking, though it's not a deal-killer.

U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders is in there pitching, and former Maryland Gov. Mike O'Malley is exploring. But where the country is only benefiting from the scrappy fighters on the Republican side, from the credible to the far-out, Mrs. Clinton and her party lack that "oomph." They must keep in mind that inevitability is hardly a winning strategy.

Can Hillary Clinton Keep it Cool? // Elle // Sarah Lindig - May 24, 2015

The old adage says, "If at first you don't succeed, try, try again." And then there's also "Learn from your mistakes," which is always good advice, right? Just ask Hillary Clinton. She's taking both these themes to heart with her #Hillary2016 campaign.

Back in 2008, she had her work cut out for her. It was a battle of competing "firsts": Hillary Clinton as the first female vs. Barack Obama as the first African American. Both were undeniably progressive, but Obama had the cool factor. He (along with his stylish wife) was new, inspiring, savvy, and just really, really likable—and with that he had a lock on the lucrative Generation Y demographic. The celebrities, digital media users and cultural trendsetters that made up this group of voters championed Obama's cause as their own, turning support for his campaign into a lifestyle, if not a social status symbol. No Hope posters and t-shirts for Hillary.

Despite her legacy as a feminist and political icon, other elements of Mrs. Clinton's (or the Clintons, general) reputation precede her. Before she ever officially announced she'd be running, there was already a circulation of criticism about a second-time-around regime returning to the White House and skepticism about what will be different, plus endless spoofs and parodies that painted her as an icy, power-hungry, headband and skirt suit-wearing woman and played up her husband's notoriety. (We're looking at you, SNL.) In the face of it all, the political powerhouse seems to be operating under a new strategy that seeks to shake these stereotypes. The new Hillary isn't cold—she's cool.

This time around though, the former Secretary of State is taking cues from the exiting president's success. Hillary's official announcement video focused on communities and individuals before ever mentioning her name or the word "campaign"—a far cry from the stiff talking head that she showed us in 2008. Her online presence is revamped from her active social media use, complete with the requisite Beyoncé references, gifs, memes and selfies, down to her website's humorous 404 page (which, it just so happens, would make for a great #tbt). And let's not forget her new campaign headquarters, located in the heart of Brooklyn Heights. Because, "Brooklyn, U.S.A. How can you beat that?"

The question we're left wondering is this: Can Hillary Clinton keep it cool? Popularity is fleeting, especially with the Millennial crowd where technology is tantamount to oxygen and the window for what's trending refreshes daily. Will Hillary successfully excite and engage young voters the way Obama did, or will the level of interest rest firmly at apathetic? She's got a jumpstart on the campaign trail and numerous heavy-hitting stars in her corner, but there's still a year and change left to tell.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

Hillary: hiding in plain sight // Baltimore Sun // Jules Witcover – May 25, 2015

Has Hillary Clinton learned the lessons of 2008? Her reticence on TPP says no.

In President Barack Obama's struggle with Congress to win fast-track authority on trade with 12 Pacific nations, a conspicuously missing voice has been that of his former secretary of state, Hillary Clinton, now a declared 2016 presidential candidate. It's in keeping with her obvious strategy to campaign in a defensive crouch.

Her reintroduction to the American electorate, delayed well into 2015, was deliberately — yet transparently — low key, to counter the widespread perception not only that she is entitled but also that her coronation for the next Democratic nomination is assured.

Rather than kicking off her campaign with a large and raucous televised rally and full-throated campaign speech, she settled for a brief Internet video pitched to the "everyday Americans" she pledged to represent, in which she appeared and spoke only for a few closing moments.

In an obvious gesture of calculated humility, the former first lady eschewed a lightning-swift opening visit to Iowa, the state in which she had placed an embarrassing third behind Mr. Obama and Sen. John Edwards in its 2008 caucuses. Instead, she elected to endure a 1,000-mile bus ride.

That endurance was tempered by her use of a large luxury van driven by a Secret Service agent. But she maintained a facade of just-folks normality by stopping off at a Chipotle, where photographers managed to capture her consorting with the hoi polloi.

Throughout the Iowa visit and in the following days, Hillary Clinton continued to hold small conversations with her intended targets in neighborly chats. They were designed to combat an impression left by her failed 2008 presidential campaign that she was too impersonal and aloof to warm hearts of other than the already committed and faithful.

But a bump in the road came early. After leaving the Obama cabinet, it turned out she had complied with a government requirement to forward business-related emails yet chose to erase personal emails from the private Internet server she had used in office. She defended the action as a right of privacy in a rare press conference of limited duration, and thereafter took few questions from the press.

All of this conduct inevitably worked against the campaign strategy of presenting a Hillary Clinton who had learned lessons from her 2008 campaign, widely criticized in the press at the time as excessively closed, cautious and isolated her from the voters.

Then the other day, a serious policy question was in the news that saw her on the sidelines in a potentially disadvantageous manner. President Obama's major effort to gain fast-track trade authority from Congress, as part of the effort to pass the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade agreement (TPP), suffered a temporary setback when all but one Democratic senator voted against it, leaving the measure eight votes short of the margin necessary for it to advance.

Candidate Clinton is no longer in the Senate, and she remained essentially silent on the matter that she once as secretary of state said would "create a new high standard for multilateral trade." Her reticence drew a jibe from House Speaker John Boehner last week on "Meet the Press," who remarked that "she can't sit at the sidelines and let the president swing in the wind here."

Her failure to step into the fray came as Democrat Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, emerging as the party's strongest liberal voice in the Senate, has pointedly taken on Mr. Obama on the pending trade deal. She contends the deal could jeopardize the financial reforms on Wall Street and investments set in place by Congress after the Great Recession, and that the text of the deal, now classified, should be made public before any binding vote.

Mr. Obama in turn lashed out personally, saying Ms. Warren is "absolutely wrong" on the point, adding he would be "pretty stupid to sign a provision that would unravel" the reforms enacted with his support.

The disagreement within the Democratic ranks would ordinarily be an invitation to a presidential candidate like Ms. Clinton to express her views on it. Yet to date she has looked like a referee standing in a neutral corner, letting the boxers untangle each other on their own. With the fate of TPP still to be resolved, Hillary's cautious election strategy compromises her claim to be a decisive leader.

If Hillary Falters, Why Not Joe? // Real Clear Politics // Carl M. Cannon - May 24, 2015

Ten years ago, I wrote an article making the case for Hillary Clinton in 2008. The former first lady, then a senator from New York, was popular with Democrats and boasted near-total national name identification. She'd proven her fundraising prowess, was improving her résumé, and had ambition to burn. "Why Not Hillary?" my essay was titled.

It didn't happen for Clinton in that election cycle. She ran up against a historical juggernaut in the person of Barack Obama, who'd been in the Senate only a few months when I assessed Hillary's chances. In a long primary season they essentially split their party's votes, but Obama narrowly edged her out in delegates, mainly with superior organizational skills.

When it came to dividing the spoils, Clinton seemed to get short shrift again. Although she would become Obama's first secretary of state, Joe Biden—a distant also-ran in the Democratic primaries—was tapped as Obama's running mate. But Biden seems to have been informed by his boss that this was as far as he was going in politics. Clinton was told no such thing, not that she would have accepted such a restriction anyway, and she's running again.

For those who care about good government, this is problematic. Eight years ago, Bill and Hillary Clinton hadn't yet perfected the sophisticated money-making operation that has Republicans salivating and Democrats fretting. The details are only now coming to light, but the scheme seems to work like this: huge corporations and wealthy individuals—and foreign governments—donated millions to the Clintons' foundation, while also paying Bill huge speaking fees, and then turned around and lobbied the administration in which Hillary was a high-ranking official for various favorable decisions that will generate great profits. The projects we're talking about range from transnational oil pipelines to uranium mines.

Democratic Party professionals are understandably worried about the atmospherics. On Thursday, I had lunch with three former White House officials, all Democrats, who were discussing possible alternatives. "Hillary's campaign is going to implode," one of them said. The question was who could pick up the pieces. None of my lunch companions gave any love to the three Democrats who have expressed interest in running against Clinton. (If you're keeping score, that's former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Virginia Sen. James Webb, and former Socialist Bernie Sanders, currently representing Vermont in the Senate.)

Three other names arose, however: California Gov. Jerry Brown, former vice president Al Gore, and 2004 Democratic nominee John Kerry—the man who replaced Hillary Clinton at the State Department. I added a fourth: Joe Biden.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Why not Joe?

For the pros and cons, let's start with the positive: On paper, he may be the most qualified presidential candidate in America: two terms as vice president, three decades in the U.S. Senate, including chairman of the Judiciary Committee and Foreign Relations Committee. He's run for president twice before. He's been scandal-free in all that time, save for a 1987 plagiarism beef that looks mild by today's standards. He has working-class roots, connects with blue-collar "Reagan Democrats," and is respected by military families. He has easy sense of humor.

Unlike other Democrats I could name, he hasn't amassed a personal fortune. He's a public servant committed to public service. As vice president, he's been exceedingly valuable to Obama, on politics and policy. I'll cite two examples.

Remember when the intransigence of House Republicans and the petulance of Senate Democrats—and the president himself—threatened to take the country over a "fiscal cliff" in 2013? Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell called Biden, his former and longtime colleague, with a simple question: "Does anyone down there know how to make a deal?"

There was, and once Obama tasked his vice president with getting it done, a deal happened. It's called governing, and Joe Biden knows how to do it.

He's savvy on politics, too. The prevailing wisdom holds that Bill Clinton rescued the Democrats' 2012 humdrum nominating convention in Charlotte with a stemwinder that pumped up the delegates. But Biden is the one who may have actually saved that convention four months earlier when he blurted out his support for same-sex marriage on "Meet the Press."

"I think you may have just gotten in front of the president on gay marriage," his communications director told him afterward. This was true, but after Education Secretary Arne Duncan did the same thing on "Morning Joe," the president realized that the Democrats' days of having it both ways on gay marriage were over.

White House officials didn't know it then but Biden may have saved the convention. Delegates would have raised hell over this issue in Charlotte. Some would have walked out over it. That would have been a bigger news story than Bill Clinton's speech.

So those are the pros. There are cons—Joe is only human—and I won't gloss over them. For one, he will be nearly 74 on Election Day 2016. Also, he's famous for his blooper reel. That sense of humor I mentioned? Sometimes it's inadvertent. Everybody, it seems, has their favorite Biden gaffe. Two of my favorites came on the 2012 campaign trail. "My mother believed and my father believed that if I wanted to be president of the United States, I could be, I could be vice president!"

Three weeks earlier, he told a college audience, "I promise you, the president has a big stick. I promise you."

At a White House conference on violent extremism earlier this year, Biden said he has "great relationships" with Somalis because "there is a large, very identifiable Somali community" in Wilmington, Delaware and "an awful lot [of them are] driving cabs and are friends of mine. For real. I'm not being solicitous. I'm serious."

This might have been problematic even if Biden's premise were true; actually there are hardly any Somalis in Wilmington, let alone a huge squadron of taxi drivers. But nobody is perfect, and after eight years of Obama's cautious and detached diffidence—and after only two months of fresh Clinton scandals—maybe Biden's genuine, if flawed, "Uncle Joe" persona is what the American people want.

“Joe Biden is what you see,” says Republican former House Majority Leader Eric Cantor. “Yes, he’s prone to gaffes publicly, and he'll admit that. He’s very self-deprecating like that. And I'm certainly not one who agrees with Joe Biden on all things ... but from a human and relationship standpoint, the guy’s awesome.”

Sanders opens presidential campaign headquarters in downtown BTV // WPTZ // Stewart Ledbettr - May 24, 2015

BURLINGTON, Vt. —Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders has leased office space in downtown Burlington for his presidential campaign headquarters on the eve of the national kickoff here Tuesday.

The insurgent candidate will challenge Hillary Clinton for the 2016 Democratic nomination.

Staffers already occupy part of the third floor space at 131 Church Street, a stone's throw from City Hall where Sanders' political career first gained traction with his election as mayor in 1981.

Nostalgia, aides said, played a role in selecting the location.

Sanders has hired former Chief of Staff Jeff Weaver to manage the presidential effort.

"This campaign is going to be a grassroots campaign," Weaver said. "It's going to take advantage of the tens and tens of thousands of volunteers we already have, and the tens and tens of thousands more we're going to get, and he is going to go from one end of Iowa to the other, one end of New Hampshire to the other, and we're going to be in a whole bunch of other states as well."

Weaver said they're looking to open satellite offices in Ohio and New Hampshire soon.

Sanders will hold a rally and formally begin his campaign on Tuesday at 5 p.m. at Waterfront Park in Burlington.

Bernie Sanders Is Over Social Media Gaffe Stories // Bloomberg // Ali Elkin -May 24, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders says he's grown weary of campaign coverage that focuses more on the horse race and outrage than on the policy issues shaping the election.

“In terms of campaign coverage, there is more coverage about the political gossip of the campaign, about raising money, about polling, about somebody saying something dumb, or some kid works for a campaign and sends out something stupid on Facebook, right?” the Vermont senator said in an appearance Sunday on CNN's Reliable Sources, a program about media. “We can expect that to be a major story. But what your job is, what the media's job is, is to say, 'Look, these are the major issues facing the country.' We're a democracy. People have different points of view. Let's argue it.”

Controversies about social media posts by aides to figures including Jeb Bush and Scott Walker, likely Republican presidential candidates, have captured the political media's attention repeatedly in this early stage of the race.

"We can expect that to be a major story."

Senator Bernie Sanders

Sanders, who identifies as an independent in the Senate, said last week on the network that he likes Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton and wants to avoid attacking her but, to his dismay, isn't sure he can get any media attention with that approach. During Sunday's appearance, Sanders said he would much rather see news outlets focus on climate change or income inequality than on some of the other stories they deem newsworthy.

"I think that instead of coming up with the next news of the moment, 'Breaking news! There was an automobile accident and a cat got run over,' here's breaking news: For 40 years the American middle lass has been disappearing and the rich have been getting richer. Why?" Sanders said.

Step aside, Bernie Sanders has a big week // Washington Times // Jennifer Harper - May 24, 2015

He is the busiest of all the presidential hopefuls this week. Sure, Sen. Marco Rubio will celebrate his birthday in Las Vegas on Thursday, and Carly Fiorinaand Gov. Scott Walkerwill head for New Hampshire later in the week, but it's Sen. Bernard Sanders who has the wall-to-wall schedule punctuated by the rallying cry, "A political revolution is coming." So step aside, folks.

On Tuesday, the Vermont senator kicks off his formal campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination with a Zydeco band and free Ben & Jerry's ice cream. Company founders Ben Cohen and Jerry Greenfieldwill be by his side, incidentally. Mr. Sanders rushes to New Hampshire on Wednesday for town meetings in Concord, Portsmouth and Eppington. By Thursday, he will be in Iowa for more town meetings in Davenport, Muscatine, West Branch, Iowa City and Kensett and pushing his new "Agenda for America" wherever he goes. And Mr. Sanders, 75, is in a fighting mood when it comes to the press.

"In terms of campaign coverage, there is more coverage about the political gossip of the campaign, about raising money, about polling, about somebody saying something dumb or some kid works for a campaign and sends out something stupid on Facebook, right?" Mr. Sanders told CNN on Sunday. "The media's job is to say, 'Look, these are the major issues facing the country. We're a democracy. People have different points of view. Let's argue it.'"

Bill de Blasio: The Boring Progressive // American Thinker // David Lawrence - May 24, 2015

I am so sick of de Blasio promoting his Progressive agenda. The job of a politician is to pragmatically play among various ideologies and to satisfy the majority of his constituents rather than to dogmatically stick to his opinions.

De Blasio has been traveling around the country giving feeble, redundant Progressive speeches. New Yorkers feel that he should stay home attending to New York's problems rather than campaign for political-philosophical clichés.

In Washington, our resident of Gracie Mansion spoke about income inequality. He spoke with another quasi-communist – Elizabeth (phony Indian) Warren.

Hey, I earn a lot less than either one of them. Yet I don't feel I deserve income equality. I used to be a businessman and earn millions of dollars. I lost it all. I didn't feel that because I had been rich, I deserved to be rich again. I am not a jealous person.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I now live modestly as a boxing coach. If you asked me if I wanted to go back to the insurance industry and earn a fortune, I'd tell you no. If income equality demands working a lot in a field that doesn't stimulate you, then you can shove it. I don't want to be an accountant or an insurance man even if it would pay me bundles.

De Blasio promotes fiscal jealousy; Obama promotes divisive racism. They both believe in divide and conquer. However, they are conquering themselves and their constituents, us.

De Blasio instituted paid sick leave and universal kindergarten. I don't think you should get paid for being sick. If you can't afford a few days off, you haven't managed your money correctly. Universal kindergarten? I don't know. I didn't learn a thing in kindergarten.

Where do the handouts stop? Maybe we should give people free cars, marijuana, and prostitutes? Maybe we should breathe and eat for them?

De Blasio's still pushing for a minimum wage of $15. As if that wouldn't turn around and bite us down the line. I don't want to pay ten dollars for a Big Mac or see inflation go through the roof just so de Blasio can pretend that he's helped the poor with his $15-an-hour concession. With inflation it washes out to be nothing. Also, it does little to put the poor in dream coops.

Mr. de Blasio said an issue like mass incarceration is "exceedingly pertinent" to income inequality. Crime is a lifestyle not necessarily driven by greed. I knew a gangster who was part of the Whitey Bulger crew in Boston. He told me that he got a football scholarship to college but chose instead to join the mob because it was more exciting. He even told me that he'd rather be John Gotti than Paul McCartney.

Even the poor are not always motivated by money. There's glamour, style, and leading a proper life.

Give the income inequality a break. It's boring.

One of de Blasio's simple-minded cohorts, Ms. Greenberg, ballyhooed gay marriage. Gay marriage is an oxymoron, and the rephrasing of a negative. De Blasio seems to be behind everything that is new, as if the continuity of the world were meaningless.

Marijuana doesn't need to be decriminalized. Alcohol is enough to get us high; we don't need marijuana, too. I had some bad trips on it when I was young and almost flipped out.

Now de Blasio wants to stop arresting drug dealers over 40. He figures that concentrating on younger drug dealers would bring down the gun violence. If he wants to bring down the shootings, which have been going up, why doesn't he just reinstitute Stop & Frisk?

Oh, that's right – that would hurt the feelings of the minority criminals who might get profiled. Better to let drugs flow and people get shot. Who cares if the murder rate has gone up?

De Blasio is a tone-deaf egotist. He doesn't hear that New Yorkers don't approve of his selfie travels.

He moans again about affordable housing. Hey, let some of these people move to cheaper places outside the city so that New York can become a classier place that attracts businesses, hotels, and posh condos. We don't need a leprous city like Mumbai. We don't need bums on every street corner and subway.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New York City is beautiful. Why does de Blasio want to turn it into a slum? As it goes downhill, the crime will only worsen. The windows will all be broken.

Let de Blasio admit that progressivism is a failure. Its goal is progress, but its results are chaos, destruction, and a depressed society. Because "progressivism" has the word "progress" in it, it fools de Blasio and his followers.

De Blasio is impressed by his own borrowed rhetoric. His progress is really regress into his shortsighted failures.

Carly Fiorina Talks, Iowa Swoons, as Polls Shrug // NYT // Amy Chozick - May 24, 2015

DES MOINES — After 11 Republican presidential contenders spoke to a huge gathering of Iowa party activists at the Lincoln Day Dinner this month, they moved to hospitality suites to greet people one on one.

Jeb Bush's suite looked sparse, with a handful of visitors asking the former Florida governor for a photo. Rick Santorum said hello to a scattering of old supporters.

But the line to meet one candidate, Carly Fiorina, a former Silicon Valley executive whose name recognition is negligible among voters, snaked down the hallway. For more than an hour, Iowans filed into the suite for their chance to meet Ms. Fiorina.

Ms. Fiorina, a former chief executive at Hewlett-Packard with a flair for biting one-liners, had just delivered a speech that included references to God and a joke about former President Bill Clinton's hormones. When a timekeeper cut off her microphone, indicating that she had used up her allotted 10 minutes, the audience broke out in catcalls and groans. The crowd wanted more Carly.

"It was the most exciting speech all night," said Cait Suttie, 27, who waited to meet Ms. Fiorina and now wants to volunteer with her campaign.

Iowa voters are known to fall in love with firebrand candidates and underfunded outsiders, from Pat Buchanan in 1996 to Howard Dean in 2004. And this cycle, Republicans here are starting to swoon over Ms. Fiorina, who is so unknown in national polls that she may not even be included in the first presidential debate in August.

Ms. Fiorina, whose net worth is between $30 million and $119 million, has generated headlines and steady crowds of conservative voters. In April, nearly 300 people showed up to see her deliver the keynote address at the Clinton County Republican Party dinner in Iowa, twice as many as were expected. On Saturday, when she spoke at the Southern Republican Leadership Conference in Oklahoma City, she was interrupted by several standing ovations.

Whether Ms. Fiorina, the only woman in the Republican race, can build from her status as a crowd-pleasing speaker and curiosity into a serious competitor is not clear. But something is happening on the ground here.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While supporters in Iowa noted that she had doubled her standing in state polls, it was a statistically insignificant change from 1 percent to 2 percent, according to a Quinnipiac University Poll released May 6. (That may seem piddling, but the same poll had Mr. Santorum, who won the Iowa caucuses in 2012, also at 2 percent, while 5 percent supported Mr. Bush.)

Not even Ms. Fiorina's aides predicted that she would become the surprise hit at the Lincoln Day Dinner on May 16, which 1,300 Republican stalwarts paid $75 a plate to attend.

"She walked on the stage, and they said, 'Who is she?' " said Steve DeMaura, the executive director of Carly for America, a "super PAC" that supports her candidacy. "And then she walked off the stage, and they said: 'She's impressive. I want to see her six more times.' "

Gender clearly separates Ms. Fiorina from the pack. And she seems to be building on the popularity of Joni Ernst, the state's motorcycle-riding senator, who became the first woman to represent Iowa in Congress after a campaign last fall in which she promised to cut pork in Washington much the way she had castrated pigs on her farm.

But another element of Ms. Fiorina's appeal is an experience often lost in her biography: She spent much of her technology career in marketing, and has a talent for reading an audience and crafting pithy, and sometimes cutting, comments.

Ms. Fiorina says she writes all of her own remarks, including some choice jabs at the Democratic front-runner, Hillary Rodham Clinton. "Flying is not an accomplishment, it's an activity," she likes to say, knocking Mrs. Clinton's boast that she traveled 956,733 miles as secretary of state. In her announcement video, Ms. Fiorina watched — and critiqued — Mrs. Clinton's own announcement video.

She is prepared with answers on issues from the Islamic State to the California drought (which she has blamed on "overzealous liberal environmentalists") and distills them into one-liners that play to the party's base.

Of the Affordable Care Act, Ms. Fiorina likes to say, "The law is longer than a Harry Potter novel and not nearly as interesting."

But at times, Ms. Fiorina, 60, also speaks in deeply personal terms about her faith, her struggles to conceive a child, her survival of breast cancer and the death of a stepdaughter, experiences that seem to resonate with a heavily evangelical party base. "It was my husband Frank's and my personal relationship with Jesus Christ that saved us from a desperate sadness," she has said.

Her favorite remark on the trail — after bashing Mrs. Clinton — is to relay the advice of her mother, who taught Sunday school: "What you are is God's gift to you, and what you make of yourself is your gift to God."

Ms. Fiorina has been among the most frequent visitors to Iowa in the Republican field. She has spent 10 days in the state this year, according to a tally kept by The Des Moines Register, and on a five-day swing last month, she held 13 events. On June 6, she will be back, attending a "Roast and Ride" event with Ms. Ernst, a fund-raiser that includes a 38-mile ride on a Harley-Davidson, followed by barbecue and horseshoes.

Her campaign is expanding in the state faster than those of some better-known rivals, and aides hope a strong showing in Iowa will give Ms. Fiorina the money, infrastructure and enthusiasm to continue to make her case in New Hampshire, South Carolina and beyond.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Supporters are careful not to call it a groundswell. “Everyone, understand the challenges she faces,” said Boris Feldman, a Silicon Valley lawyer and fund-raiser for Ms. Fiorina. The Republican establishment is “ready to declare the messiah before the three wise men arrive,” he said, but independent-minded Iowans can help stem the tide.

Ms. Fiorina — who lived all over the world as a child, was educated at Stanford and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and was once criticized for her reliance on private jets at Hewlett-Packard — is not traveling in grand style here. In April, she was driven around the state in a Honda CRV owned by Mary Earnhardt of West Des Moines, who is the Iowa director of Carly for America.

Continue reading the main story

“To me it’s quite fun to see people in their element where they’re comfortable,” Ms. Fiorina said in a telephone interview.

Still, she has not caught on to all the local customs.

“You meet people over breakfast, you talk to them while they’re eating gigantic cinnamon rolls or a Pizza Palace breakfast or whatever it is,” she said. (A spokeswoman said Ms. Fiorina was referring to Pizza Ranch, an evangelical-owned pizza chain and must-stop for candidates here.)

The most immediate aim for the Fiorina campaign is making the threshold for the first debate, which Fox News has said will include only the top 10 contenders.

In perhaps the most meaningful sign that Ms. Fiorina is gaining, she is starting to annoy others in the back of the pack. After the Lincoln Day Dinner, a flustered Donald Trump, told The Register that more people had come to his hospitality suite than to Ms. Fiorina’s, which seemed a debatable claim. “I had people counting. I was curious,” he said.

“She’s a nice woman,” said Mr. Trump, who is expected to announce his own plans next month. “But she got fired viciously from Hewlett-Packard.”

Ohio Gov. John Kasich edges closer to 2016 run // Washington Times // Tom Howell Jr. - May 24, 2015

Ohio Gov. John Kasich hinted Sunday that he is ready to jump into the GOP race for president, saying he’s “very optimistic about where we’re headed.”

Mr. Kasich, a Republican, said his team is “getting closer” to making a firm decision about the 2016 contest and he is soliciting financial support while he tests the waters in key primary states.

“I’m pretty qualified for this kind of a job,” he told ABC’s “This Week,” citing his executive work in a large state and 18 years in Congress.

While Mr. Kasich boasts a long resume, some in the GOP have lambasted his positions as inadequately conservative, notably his embrace of Medicaid expansion under Obamacare.

Also, he would enter the presidential race as a late underdog who wouldn’t qualify for a spot on the stage in early debates.

Unfazed, Mr. Kasich said there's plenty of time for him to catch fire.

"You go to New Hampshire and you do well and you're on a rocket ship," he said.

Perry Seeks to Win Over Iowa, One Handshake at a Time // RCP // Catherine Lucey & Steve Peoples- May 24, 2015

LE MARS, Iowa (AP) -- Rick Perry is working his way through small-town Iowa one handshake, bear hug and backslap at a time.

The early, hands-on approach from the 2016 presidential prospect contrasts with his failed bid four years ago, when he entered the race relatively late and stumbled in the debates. The former Texas governor says he has more policy knowledge under his belt buckle now and more time for the early states.

"Nobody came to Iowa more in 2014 than I did," Perry said after speaking to about 20 people at a Pizza Ranch in Sioux Center this past week. "And I will suggest to you that will probably be the case in 2015. If somebody is going to spend more time in Iowa than I am, they better bring their lunch."

Although politicking in diners and pizza places is hardly new in the leadoff caucus state, Perry has been notably active in some of Iowa's more out-of-the-way places, which get less frequent traffic from presidential hopefuls. Since 2014, he has made more than a dozen visits to Iowa.

"I think it's a good strategy," said Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad, noting that former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum employed a similar tactic in 2012 and narrowly won the caucuses. "It's not a bad strategy to be kind of under the radar and just kind of build."

Perry, 65, has also been spending time in other early voting states, such as New Hampshire and South Carolina. He says he will announce on June 4 whether he's running for president again.

Perry launched his 2012 presidential bid with fanfare and high expectations, but quickly went from being a front-runner to an also-ran because of gaffes and poor debate performances. This time, Perry is hoping his energetic pursuit of each vote will help people forget his "oops" moment, when he was unable to recall the third of three federal agencies he said he would close if elected president.

Perry's aides have said he wasn't prepared when he entered the last presidential race and have blamed his debate problems on a busy schedule and pain medication he was taking after back surgery. After finishing fifth in the Iowa caucuses and sixth in New Hampshire's primary, Perry quit the race.

"I hadn't spent the time and the preparations that I should have," he says now.

During stops in conservative northwestern Iowa, Perry boasted about his record as the longest-serving governor in Texas history, citing his state's low taxes, limited regulation and caps on civil lawsuit damages. An animated speaker, Perry gestures dramatically as he talks about his farm upbringing, military record and experience in office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I don't just talk about 'here's what I would do,' but I say 'here's what I've done,'" he said. "This is going to be a show-me, don't-tell-me election. Executive experience has been what's been missing out of the White House."

Texas has a booming population and posted solid job growth during much of Perry's three terms as governor, from December 2000 to January of this year. But it has the nation's highest rate of residents without health insurance and the economy has been hurt in recent months by falling oil prices.

One shadow hanging over him this time: Perry is facing a criminal abuse-of-power indictment in Austin for threatening in 2013 to veto state funding for public corruption prosecutors, then doing so.

If he runs, Perry will enter a race packed with contenders, some of them also former or current governors.

Still, former Iowa Republican Party Chairman Matt Strawn saw opportunity for Perry in the state.

"The good news is, Iowans are going to give Gov. Perry a second chance, and he's doing all the right things," Strawn said. "The bad news is, it's a stronger field of options than four years ago."

As Perry packs in appearances in early voting states, he's also quietly expanding his national network, with an advisory board of donors and Republican officials. Many are prominent GOP names from Texas, but the board also has people from financial centers around the country.

Several Iowa Republicans said they were impressed by Perry, though not ready to commit.

"He's got a great personality," said Leann Bohlken, 56, of Le Mars, who chatted with Perry in an ice cream parlor. "He didn't have to share a personal story with me, but he did."

Huckabee: Distrust of government at new high // The Hill // Mark Hensch - May 24, 2015

Former Gov. Mike Huckabee (R-Ark.) said on Sunday that American skepticism of the government has reached the highest peak he has ever encountered.

“Frankly, there’s never been a time in my lifetime where people are more distrustful of government,” Huckabee told host Chris Wallace on “Fox News Sunday.”

Huckabee, a 2016 GOP presidential candidate, blamed the National Security Administration (NSA) and its bulk phone records collection program as a major force behind citizen unease.

“If this is so effective, why hasn’t it foiled potential terrorist plots?” he asked.

“Not one of them has been tied to the NSA’s collection of metadata,” Huckabee said of the program’s warrantless collection of phone records for countering terrorism.

“It seems like we’re spending billions of dollars on the whiz-bang technology and not enough on human resources, which have proven to be the most effective way of stopping terrorism," he added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Huckabee's remarks follow the Senate's decision to adjourn early on Saturday without reforming NSA practices or renewing the controversial Patriot Act portion relating to them.

The upper congressional chamber departed on Saturday morning without a clear strategy for revisiting the Patriot Act's intelligence-gathering provisions, parts of which expire at the end of the month.

Huckabee argued on Sunday that the Constitution offered one tried and true method for combating terrorism – the rule of law.

"I think the Constitution already provides what we should do," he said.

"If you have probable cause to suspect Chris Wallace is going to commit criminal acts you go to a judge and get a warrant and then you can listen to his phone calls," Huckabee told Wallace.

Huckabee also noted on Sunday that mystery surrounding the NSA program's effectiveness mirrored the greater opaqueness of both President Obama and Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton.

"The secrecy with which this government has operated and specifically Hillary Clinton operating outside State Department protocol is extremely troubling," he said.

Huckabee additionally argued that the Supreme Court had abused its legal power with recent decisions, thus eroding the public's faith in the institution.

"Judicial review is exactly what we have operated under," he said of the judicial branch historically. "Judicial supremacy is not what we have operated under."

"One can't overrule the other two," he added of the three branches of government.

"We learned that in ninth grade civics," Huckabee said. "It's a matter of balance of power."

Huckabee suggests government should have a warrant before spying // MSNBC // Aliyah Frumin - May 24, 2015

Mike Huckabee is the latest Republican to weigh in on the controversial issue of government surveillance, going as far on Sunday to suggest authorities should get a warrant if they want to listen in on Americans' phone calls.

Appearing on "Fox News Sunday," the presidential candidate and former Arkansas governor criticized the National Security Agency's controversial collection of millions of Americans' phone records, asking host Chris Wallace, "If this is so effective, why hasn't it foiled potential terrorists plots?"

He argued the NSA program – recently deemed illegal by a federal appeals court – was just one of the reasons

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Americans are so distrustful of government. Huckabee pointed to the U.S. Constitution, saying it “provides what we should do.” He added, “If you have probable cause to suspect Chris Wallace is going to commit criminal acts you go to a judge and get a warrant. Then you can listen to his phone calls.”

If no action is taken by the end of May, some provisions of Patriot Act will expire – including the ability to conduct roving wiretaps, business record searches and gathering information on individuals who are suspected of terrorist activity but aren’t necessarily affiliated with a particular group.

It’s an issue that has divided the emerging 2016 Republican field.

Critics have spent years condemning the Patriot Act – which was instituted after the 9/11 terrorist attacks and allows the government to obtain telecommunication, financial and credit records without a court order – arguing it tramples on civil liberties and allows the government to spy on innocent people. In 2011, Obama signed a four-year extension of the act, allowing the government to conduct roving wiretaps in an effort to thwart terrorists.

Some like former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie – who have not officially declared their 2016 intentions but are expected to run – have defended the programs, arguing they are vital to national security. Similarly, declared candidate Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida Recently argued on the Senate floor that a perception has been created “that the United States government is listening to your phone calls or going through your bills as a matter of course,” said Rubio. “That is absolutely and categorically false.”

Others like Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky (who spearheaded an 11-hour filibuster like speech against the NSA program) have hailed the court decision as “monumental” for “all lovers of liberty” and called on the Supreme Court to “strike down the NSA’s illegal spying program.” Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas said the ruling confirmed what many Americans already know – that the NSA “went too far in collecting the phone records.”

Mike Huckabee on Fox News Sunday // Fox News // May 24, 2015

CHRIS WALLACE: all right now on "fox news sunday." hello from fox news in washington. it's not just barbecue on the menu this memorial day weekend. there's also politics and national security. we begin with former arkansas governor Mike Huckabee who ran second for the gop presidential nomination in 2008, became a star on fox news channel, but then left television to run again. governorHuckabee joins us now and welcome back to fox news sunday.

MIKE HUCKABEE: thank you, chris. great to be back.

CHRIS WALLACE: i want to start with a couple of breaking stories. first of all, the release on friday by the state department of 296 of hillary clinton's e-mails concerning benghazi. here's the reaction that you gave.

MIKE HUCKABEE: we expect these charades and masquerades in ussr, the old soviet union, not the u.s. explain what you mean by that. h which this government has operated and specifically, hillary clinton using a private e-mail server outside the bounds of normal state department protocol is very troubling, especially because we have yet to give an answer to what happened in benghazi. i know that sounds like something an old broken record, we need to know why did four different times an ambassador call for help and no help came? the one thing american soldiers and american diplomats need to know wherever they are stationed across the world is when they are under fire and being shot at, we will move heaven and earth to try to get to them, to rescue them and to protect them. and we didn't do that on the night of benghazi. hillary's phone rang 3:00 in the morning and she let it go to voice mail. we need to know why.

CHRIS WALLACE: let me ask you about another breaking question. congress is more deadlocked than ever what to do about the nsa's bulk data collection of phone records with the program set to expire on june 1st. here's what you had to say about that this week.

MIKE HUCKABEE: does the constitution allow the government to read the mail and to listen to the phone calls, even to collect them without a warrant or probable cause? i think the obvious answer is no, it does not.

CHRIS WALLACE: a couple of points here. section 215 of the patriot act, which is the section that is going to expire on June 1st, has nothing to do with listening in on phone calls. it's just recording the fact that my phone number called your phone number. so aren't you wrong there when you talk about listening in? secondly what do you think we need to do about this bulk data collection?

MIKE HUCKABEE: i think the constitution already provides what we should do. if you have probable cause to suspect that Chris Wallace is acting in a nefarious manner, you go to the judge and listen on his calls because you have the other branch of government that is constitutionally required to be part of that process. you don't give unlimited resources, unlimited power. our founders were very concerned about too much power being invested in any one, any branch. the balance of power is fundamental to our system. i don't want to be made unsafe, but Chris, 225 different terrorist plots over the past year since 9/11, and so far not one of them has been tied directly to the NSA collection of meta data. if this is so effective, how come it hasn't resulted in the foiled terrorist plots? those have been foiled by old-fashioned police work, human intelligence. it seems like we are spending billions of dollars on wiz bang technology and not enough money on human resources which has proven to be the most effective way of stopping terrorism.

CHRIS WALLACE: let's turn now to your candidacy. you announced it three weeks ago. i was struck listening to your campaign announcement. you laid out bold policies. i want to drill down into those. you said first of all, no cuts, no changes to medicare or social security. here you are.

MIKE HUCKABEE: if congress wants to take away someone's retirement, let them in their own congressional pensions, not your social security.

CHRIS WALLACE: but government trustees say without any changes, for instance, medicare's hospital instance, medicare's hospital insurance fund will run out of money by 2030 and the social security trust fund will run out of money by 2033. governor, don't we have to find some way, raising the eligibility age, cutting benefits perhaps for the wealthier people to keep these programs solvent for people 55 or younger.

MIKE HUCKABEE: the problem with people 55 or younger, they've been paying in 40 years. this was not a voluntary extraction from their paycheck. it was involuntarily lifted from them under the guise that the government would then provide for them, their money, back in that social security or medicare fund. this is not an entitlement as much as it is an earned benefit that people have paid in. there are some factors here. one of the reasons i'm for the fair tax, it means everybody will help fund social security and medicare, not just the working people of america. right now the only people paying in are the people who work for wages. people who get their money off dividends are not paying anything in. social security and medicare funds are being short shrifted because we limit the manner which people pay in. if everybody was under a consumption tax, which is what the fair tax does, all americans would be contributing.

CHRIS WALLACE: i want to stay on this entitlement reform. back in to 2011 here is what you told neil cavuto.

MIKE HUCKABEE: we keep saying that 60 is the new 40. okay. let's treat 60 like it's the new 40. let's raise that eligibility age up to 70 for the people under 55.

CHRIS WALLACE: you favored reforms to entitlements back then what's changed?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MIKE HUCKABEE: well, the main thing i feel like that has happened, as i understand, if we start breaking promises to people and we start making changes in a program people have been into for years, i think it adds to the distrust we have of government. frankly, there's never been a time in my lifetime where people are more distrustful of government. i say go back to people who are d 15 just entering the work force -- and here is another suggestion.

CHRIS WALLACE: if i may briefly, it was only four years ago you were saying we do need to change it for people who were 55 and younger, because frankly people are living longer.

MIKE HUCKABEE: i think the fact is that we can't make those changes because, as i talk to people across the country, they feel like that is a gut punch and if we are going to make the changes, let the individual. for example, if you want to give me the option to take my retirement benefits in one lump sum, but let me make that choice, okay. give me the tax-free benefits, but i don't think you can go and give seniors the sense that everything they have been involuntarily paying in for is now going to be taken from them.

CHRIS WALLACE: okay. let's talk about the fair tax which you just brought up. you want to abolish the income tax, you want to abolish the irs and create a fair tax, as you say, is a national sales tax. critics say the problem with that is it's too regressive. the tax policy center said that the average rate for the lowest income group would exceed 33%, while the average for the top group would fall to less than 16%. the argument, governor, is that the rich who spend less of their income are going to end up making out pretty well under this. and the poor who spend almost all their income and are going to be paying this sales tax are going to pay the most, or at least the highest percentage.

MIKE HUCKABEE: they have it exactly wrong. in fact, it's the bottom third of the economy who benefit the most from the fair tax. the people of the top of the economy benefit the least. although everybody benefits some. that tax study is one that has been discredited by the people who spend over $20 million, very thorough economic study developing the fair tax. it's not ome political idea.

CHRIS WALLACE: doesn't it just stand to reason if i make 5,000, i'm going to spend a higher percentage of my income just for the necessities, and if i make $1 million, i probably am not going to spend as much a percentage of my income because i've got a lot of income.

MIKE HUCKABEE: well, the difference is who, and this is where a lot of people don't understand, the fair tax has what's called the prebate, if you are at the bottom third, chances are you don't pay any effective tax in the consumption tax because you are consuming less and getting a prebate in advance of what you would have spent. that's why the poorest people come out better. i recommend people going to the fair tax website, reading books on the fair tax, but getting it from people who actually know what it does rather than those who don't want to see the fair tax. i'll tell you what the fair tax does, it empowers the consumer and lets people have their whole paycheck and takes the power out of the hands of congress and puts it in the hands of the consumer. that's power to the people.

CHRIS WALLACE: governor, i want to keep moving along. there are a lot of things you said in your announcement. you indicate as president you wouldn't necessarily obey court rulings, even the supreme court. here you are.

MIKE HUCKABEE: many of our politicians have surrendered to the false god of judicial supremacy, which would allow black robed and unelected judges the power to make law as well as enforce it.

CHRIS WALLACE: we have operated under the principle of judicial review since 1803.

MIKE HUCKABEE: judicial review is actually what we've operated under. we have not operated under judicial supremacy. presidents lincoln, jefferson, jackson, presidents understood that the supreme court cannot make a law. they cannot make it. the legislature has to make it, the executive branch has to sign it and enforce it, and the notion that the supreme court comes up with the ruling and that automatically subjects the two other branches to following it defies everything there is about the three equal branches of government. the supreme court is not the supreme branch. for god's sake, it isn't the supreme being. it is the supreme court.

CHRIS WALLACE: but sir, george will, the conservative columnist pointed out back in 1957, another governor of arkansas, orville forbis decided to disregard and refuse to obey the ruling to desegregate schools. president eisenhower had to call in the 101st airborne. are you saying president Huckabee might decide he wasn't going to obey the ruling on desegregation or president nixon to turn over the tapes? that it's up in the air whether you are going to obey the supreme court?

MIKE HUCKABEE: you know george will is no fan of mine. he recently called me appalling. i'm not surprised he would make such a false comparison. in that case the supreme court had ruled the legislature and executive branch agreed with the supreme court and precisely what happened is what should happen. the president ordered the airborne to come in and enforce the law. the law that did exist. it wasn't that the president defied the law, the president was carrying out the law and using all the forces at his resources to do it.

CHRIS WALLACE: let's say he said i don't want to turn over the tapes and the court can't make me?

MIKE HUCKABEE: the president has to follow whatever the law is. does congress have a law that tells him what he is going to do? in that case, the congress was ready to impeach nixon and he ultimately resigned. i want to get back to the main point. it's a matter of balance of power. if the supreme court could just make a ruling and everybody has to bow down and fall on their faces and worship that law, it isn't a law because it hasn't been passed, what if the supreme court ruled they were going to make the decision as to who was going to be the next president and save the taxpayers and voter from all the expense and trouble of voting, and they'll just pick a president. we would say, they can't do that. why can't they do it? they can't do it because it's not in the law. we are sworn to uphold the constitution and law. it has to be consistent and agreed upon with three branches of government. one can't overrule the other two. that's all i'm saying. we learned that in ninth grade civics. i'm convinced a lot of ivy league law schools must have forgotten that simple basic civic lessons along the way.

CHRIS WALLACE: governor Huckabee, an awful lot of interesting things you said in your announcement. interesting things you'll say in this campaign. thank you for coming in today and thank you for sharing your holiday weekend with us. we'll see you on the campaign trail.

MIKE HUCKABEE: thank you.

CHRIS WALLACE: and we'll keep asking you questions.

MIKE HUCKABEE: all right, chris. thanks.

When Huckabee Also Wanted Us To Forgive Mel Gibson // The Daily Beast // Aswain Suebsaeng - May 24, 2015

GOP Presidential contender Mike Huckabee not only wants you to forgive an admitted sexual predator, he wants Mel Gibson off the hook too.

On Friday, 2016 Republican presidential hopeful and professional Beyoncé opponent Mike Huckabee took to Facebook to publicly convey his support for accused sexual predator Josh Duggar.

“Josh’s actions when he was an underage teen are as he described them himself, ‘inexcusable,’ but that doesn’t mean 'unforgivable,'" the former Arkansas governor wrote. "No purpose whatsoever is served by those who are now trying to discredit Josh or his family by sensationalizing the story. Good people make mistakes and do regrettable and even disgusting things."

He goes on to chide the "blood-thirsty media" for covering the fact that Duggar—a social-conservative activist and reality-TV star—was accused of molesting five underage girls when he was a teen.

Huckabee, being the devout Christian that he is, has plenty of forgiveness to throw around at controversial, similarly devout figures in entertainment. (Again, provided they are not Beyoncé.) For instance, last year, Huckabee took to his verified Facebook account to urge Hollywood and America to make up with Mel Gibson.

"Will Hollywood ever forgive Mel Gibson?" his post reads. He, again, spots an opportunity for casual media-bashing, this time unfair "showbiz journalists."

"[Gibson has] also quietly given millions of dollars to Jewish charities, and not just to polish his image, because nobody knew about it," Huckabee added. You can read the whole post below:

Huckabee is a fan of Gibson's controversial 2004 film, The Passion of the Christ. In fact, Huckabee owes some of the early momentum during his last presidential campaign to a Christian-voters email list that had its roots in the marketing strategy for The Passion of the Christ.

Gibson fell out with much of Hollywood over accusations of anti-Semitism, and his widely covered ugly, racist, misogynistic rant.

But again, the "blood-thirsty media" are the real problem here.

Jeb Bush having new mansion built for him on family compound in Maine: report // Daily News // Adam Edelman - May 24, 2015

Jeb Bush is going for Maine over Main Street.

The all-but-certain 2016 candidate is having a huge house built for him at the Bush family compound at Walker's Point, in Kennebunkport, Maine, the Boston Globe reported Sunday.

The former Florida governor's new home will be built on a 1.3-acre site worth at least $1.4 million, the Globe reported, and was ordered built by Bush's parents, former President George H.W. Bush and former First Lady Barbara Bush.

The 3,000 square-foot, 4-bedroom, 4.5-bathroom "cottage" is expected to have a gorgeous wraparound porch and feature panoramic views of the Atlantic Ocean. The construction of the house, which is expected to be completed in July, is thought to be around $600,000, the Globe reported.

"I'm incredibly blessed to be George and Barbara's son and am thankful that they have built a special place for their family to gather," Bush, who currently owns a home in Coral Gables, Fla., with his wife worth at least $1.3 million, said in an email to the Globe. "We are so lucky."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to the Globe, the potential 2016 candidate didn't take part in the design of the new mansion, yielding instead to his mother Barbara.

"Barbara dictated most things," Kristi Kenney, the architect of the new house as well as another one built nearby for Jeb's younger brother Marvin, told the Globe.

The extended Bush clan has enjoyed a decades-long relationship with the Kennebunkport area, where multiple generations of the iconic political family have vacationed, and where Jeb's four siblings already have homes "set aside for them," the Globe reported.

The land for the "Bush Compound," which serves as the summer home for George H.W. Bush and Barbara, was originally purchased by the 41st president's great-grandfather, and has been kept in family since. It now houses several homes for the Bushes as well as a unit for Secret Service agents.

For Jeb Bush, however, who is already struggling both with making inroads with middle-America Republicans and with distancing himself from his family's political legacy, another mansion in a New England vacation town given to him by his parents may not provide him the relaxation it was intended to.

Bush has faced continued criticism over his inability to articulate how he would govern differently than his brother, former President George W. Bush, experiencing particular difficulty in stating his position on the failed 2003 invasion of Iraq.

He has also been on the receiving end of attacks from a growing number of rivals for the 2016 GOP nomination, who have suggested he won't be a friend to middle-class voters.

Christie's curse-fest, and how the media blew it // Star Ledger // Tom Moran - May 24, 2015

I don't usually rush to defend someone who calls me an angry drunk, but I'm making an exception today.

The crack came from Gov. Chris Christie, and it was part of a good-natured roast at an annual dinner where journalists and politicians trade jabs while raising money for a good cause.

He's wrong about me, first of all. I'm not angry.

But Christie is taking heat because his speech was packed with obscenities, including a generous helping of the f-word, and some of the media broke custom and reported every scrap of it.

This won't hurt Christie here in Jersey, where our sensibilities have been worn down to a nub. But evangelical Christians might see things differently.

"In South Carolina and other states with a conservative religious tradition, it could be a big deal," says Brigid Harrison, a political scientist at Montclair State University.

My concern is not for Christie's campaign. If he becomes commander in chief, I'm building a bomb shelter and investing my money in gold bullion. Scary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He regards me now as something akin to toe fungus. But he feels free to joke, and I feel free to laugh.

But this event, the Legislative Correspondents Dinner, just suffered a wound that could be mortal. And that's a pity. This is one night a year when we all put down our weapons and share a drink and a few laughs.

The dinner, which raises about $10,000 a year for scholarships, began in 1890. I don't know what they talked about back then, but the speeches these days are full of obscenity and personal attacks. People laugh hard. Christie broke no new ground; he was just a lot funnier than most of them.

Normally, that stuff stays in house. The speeches used to be strictly off the record, and most journalists still treat it that way. But the rules changed in 1994 after the editor of The Record of North Jersey objected.

Even now, though, most reporters treat the dinner as off the record. Until last week, I thought it was still officially off the record. Christie did, too, clearly.

"Probably more than half the audience thinks that," says Mike Symons, a reporter for Gannett New Jersey Newspapers, and the director of the show.

The tradition of restraint died Thursday morning when a small consulting firm, Jaffe Communications, printed the meat of Christie's speech, including the f-words, in its daily newsletter to clients and media.

Bruno Tedeschi, a former Star-Ledger reporter who is a partner in the firm, had recorded the speech.

"How do you have a gathering of 350 people and tell them it's off the record when everyone has a recording device," Tedeschi says. "And how does being off record give you license to say thing that are just crude, quite frankly?"

After the newsletter broke this, Bloomberg News ran a story, as did the International Business Times, and the New York Times. Then the social media world exploded. The Star-Ledger declined to publish a news story until Saturday.

You can now send friends a recording of Christie using the f-word over and over. Why that is considered newsworthy is a mystery. Seems to me more like teenager staring through a keyhole for thrills.

Christie is considering a boycott next year, and who can blame him? Will the next governor play ball?

Symons worries the whole event could collapse. To some editors and ethicists, that would be welcome. They warn that politicians and journalists have become too chummy.

I get the concern, but I don't see much evidence of it on the ground. Most journalists I know salivate at the prospect of uncovering a scandal and sending a politician to jail.

We can laugh at Christie's jokes, and then skewer him the next day. We can walk and chew gum at the same time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

My own relationship with Christie is a good example. When he was a prosecutor, we had many lunches together, used first names, joked and chatted frequently.

Then he started screwing up as governor, and I wrote that he was screwing up. He regards me now as something akin to toe fungus. But he feels free to joke, and I feel free to laugh.

It strikes me as healthy for pols and journalists to be reminded once a year that the other guy is a human being, that banging heads on the job doesn't have to make us personal enemies.

That's probably lost now. And for what?

This was not a noble fight for a free press, or the public's right to know. This was a cheap shot on the governor, first from a communications firm eager for attention, then from mainstream media that followed the path without thinking.

It's not a week when I'm proud to wear the uniform.

Can Feingold come back from defeat? // Milwaukee Journal Sentinel // Craig Gilbert - May 23, 2015

For almost two decades, Russ Feingold had a winning image in Wisconsin politics — the liberal maverick. He galvanized Democrats, won independents and made small but critical inroads among Republicans.

That election formula abandoned him in the conservative wave of 2010, when the three-term senator lost his seat to Republican newcomer Ron Johnson.

Can Feingold come back from defeat?

Can he recover his “maverick” brand?

Can he reconstruct the appeal he once had to voters outside his Democratic base?

Early polls seem to offer that hope. In fact, his numbers right now are more reminiscent of the Feingold victories of 1992, 1998 and 2004 than the Feingold rejection of 2010 (see chart).

In surveys by the Marquette University Law School, Feingold’s popularity ratings are better than almost any politician Marquette has asked about in its three and a half years of statewide polling. He led Johnson by 16 points in last month’s poll. He led by almost 20 points among independents — after losing them by 12 in 2010.

Even among Republicans, a sizable minority — 27% — viewed Feingold favorably. That may not sound like much, but it’s practically unheard of these days in a polarized state where big-name politicians get almost no support from voters in the other party.

These numbers are so promising for Feingold it’s hard to know how much stock to put in them. Is a 27% favorability rating among Republicans sustainable for a Wisconsin Democrat trying to unseat a Republican senator? No. Is a 16-point lead sustainable in a state as divided as this one? Almost certainly not.

It's worth remembering that what Feingold is trying to do — win back his old Senate seat — is rare for a reason. Rejection isn't usually a building block to victory.

But it's also worth asking why someone who lost his job less than five years ago is polling so well.

Let's start with something both sides can agree on about Feingold's political history.

Even in his losing 2010 campaign, voters didn't come to view him all that negatively.

"Both candidates ended up with pretty good image ratings after the 2010 race," says Johnson strategist Brad Todd.

"In the last week of the campaign, his favorability rating was coming back up," says Paul Maslin, who polled for Feingold in 2010.

But they take different lessons from that. Todd says Feingold's loss wasn't about "personal animus" but political rejection based on Feingold's voting record on issues like the stimulus and the new health care law. That record will remain a problem whatever voters think of him personally, Todd argues.

"It has been since the 1930s that a senator (last) came back to beat the person that took him out of office. The reason that is nearly impossible to do is because the voters have already made that choice," says Todd. "You can't escape the fact that Russ was fired, despite the fact that he had a positive image among Wisconsin voters. It was pleasant, it was amicable, but it was a firing. He can't come back and say, 'I'm going to make the case I made before,' and expect to be rehired."

Feingold has a different reading of his defeat: that it had much more to do with a national political wave than an individual repudiation.

"I do not believe and didn't believe then it was a personal judgment or rebuke (by voters)," says Maslin. As a three-term senator "in the midst of the Obama administration, it was very difficult for him to maintain the Feingold brand…But I don't think voters concluded Russ Feingold's time had come and gone," Maslin says.

In last month's Marquette poll, Feingold was viewed favorably by 47% and unfavorably by 26% of registered voters, a better "net favorable" rating than almost any politician Marquette has asked about since it started polling in Wisconsin in 2012. At the moment, voters are much less polarized over him than over Gov. Scott Walker, President Barack Obama or either of the state's two U.S. senators, Republican Johnson and Democrat Tammy Baldwin.

Marquette pollster Charles Franklin says all that is a "positive signal" for Feingold.

"It says the voters' rejection of him in 2010 did not turn into a lasting antipathy toward him," says Franklin.

There are some caveats, however. The one other Wisconsin politician with numbers like Feingold's in recent years was former GOP Gov. Tommy Thompson at the outset of his own 2012 Senate race. Like Feingold, Thompson had been out of partisan politics for several years, making him a less polarizing figure. Like Feingold, he scored well with independents and did unusually well with voters in the opposing party.

But in Thompson's case, his popularity and crossover appeal didn't survive the polarizing brawl of the 2012 election, which he lost to Baldwin.

"Thompson started at plus 18," says Franklin, referring to the difference between his positive and negative rating. "But he finished at minus 14. It's a powerful example of how a campaign can change a politician's image with the voters in the state."

So Feingold's early polling numbers should be taken with some caution. He won't end up with 12% of the GOP vote against Johnson, as he did in last month's Marquette poll. The state has grown too polarized for that to happen. In recent state elections, only about 5% of voters in each party have crossed over to vote for the other party's candidate.

And Feingold will be hard-pressed to win independents by 20 points as he did in last month's Marquette poll, since those independents include many voters who lean Republican and usually vote that way in the end.

On the other hand, Feingold doesn't need to make the kind of Republican inroads he made in the 1990s to win in 2016, and he doesn't need to win independents by double digits.

The presidential electorate in Wisconsin usually includes more Democrats than Republicans. It's usually better for Democratic candidates than the midterm electorate. If that turns out to be the case next year, Feingold only needs to hold his own among independents to win.

That makes it sounds easy, but broadly speaking, what Feingold is trying to do is not easy. He's trying to persuade Wisconsin voters to make a different choice between the same two options they had a few years ago. He has to do that by getting people to switch their votes, or by relying on the added voters that turn out in a presidential election, or both.

It's a challenging path. But the early polling suggests that Feingold starts out with less baggage than you might expect for someone who was voted out of office in his last election.

The road to the White House // The Tampa Tribune // Blaise Ingooglia - May 23, 2015

The road to the White House goes through Florida, and that means it goes through each one of us. Voters across our great state get to play a key role in electing the next president of the United States. Moms and dads, students and recent grads, hardworking employees and job seekers all alike will have the opportunity to decide which candidate has the leadership and plan for our country.

This is why the Republican Party of Florida is committed to having an open conversation on our vision of a better future for all people through greater opportunity, economic growth and individual empowerment.

At our recent spring quarterly meeting, I introduced our plan for 2016: Project 29. Our first goal of Project 29 will be to fully engage with all communities, Hispanics and African-Americans, seniors and millennials, students and taxpayers, to talk about the issues facing our nation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Project 29 will help shape how our party operates during the 2016 elections, and it is my hope that these changes will make a lasting impression on our state.

We are not only fighting for Florida's 29 electoral votes, but we are fighting to keep control of Florida's U.S. Senate seat, increase Florida's Congressional majority and maintain majorities in the Florida House and Senate.

Our Party will accomplish these goals by being present and embedded in communities where we have been absent in the past. We plan to engage with churches and faith leaders, local community leaders and organizations. We plan to have one-on-one conversations about the future of our economy and discuss your concerns and ideas for the future of our country.

A key part of our plan is to provide support for local races in addition to moving back toward the grass roots by opening Victory Offices throughout the state.

Florida will now be the first winner-take-all primary in the country, ensuring that all presidential campaigns will have to spend a considerable amount of time in our neighborhoods speaking to Floridians from Pensacola to Key West and everywhere in-between.

Our party is going to be called on to do more than ever before. We're going to knock on more doors. We're going to make more phone calls. We're going to reach out to voters that may never have heard from us before. I know that Republicans in this state are ready to hear your opinion and talk about our future.

The Democratic Party believes it is ready for Hillary Clinton, but I can promise it that it won't be nearly as ready as we will. From being embedded early on in all communities to building up the technology infrastructure needed for digital outreach, our party will be ready to play a key role on the national stage.

Project 29 is not just about outcomes, but changing the way our party engages with communities as well. With the launch of our new website, Florida.GOP, we are fulfilling our commitment to modernize the way we engage with voters across the state. As we prepare our path to victory in 2016, this new website provides a digital platform to interact with voters and empower volunteers with the tools they need to be effective.

We now have a clear road map with Project 29, and if we work hard and spread our message I know we can be successful. Florida's 29 electoral votes can only be delivered by the voters of Florida. We need to make sure that we make our votes count. Florida will decide the next President of the United States, and our Party will make sure Project 29 is successful.

Blaise Ingoglia is the chairman of the Florida Republican Party.

Two dead as south-central U.S. storms force evacuations // Reuters // Jim Forsyth - May 24, 2015

Two people were killed in flash flooding and severe storms in Texas and Oklahoma that forced evacuations and rooftop rescues and left thousands without power, officials said on Sunday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The National Weather Service reported river flooding across southern Oklahoma and central Texas, where 6 to 9 inches of rain fell overnight. Flash flooding remained a threat on Sunday from central Iowa into southern Texas, where the heaviest rainfall was expected, the NWS said.

Tornado watches were in effect in the Midwest and south on Sunday evening, including Kansas, Colorado, Iowa, Missouri, Illinois, Arkansas and Louisiana, the NWS said.

As much as 3 inches of rain could fall in east central Texas on Monday, and possibly more in certain areas, the NWS said.

"They haven't seen flooding like this for probably a good decade, probably more like 25 years, even longer, on some of these rivers," said Kurt Van Speybroeck, a NWS meteorologist in Fort Worth, Texas.

He said soil was saturated from heavy rainfall over the past three weeks.

Helicopters rescued people off rooftops in Hays County in central Texas.

More than 1,000 people were rescued or evacuated from 400 homes, county officials reported on Sunday.

The county, which includes the small cities of Wimberley and San Marcos, about an hour's drive north of San Antonio, ordered a Sunday night curfew.

Local officials at an afternoon news conference said debris piles were nearly 20 feet high. An unidentified man was found dead from the flooding in San Marcos.

Three people who had been reported missing in San Marcos were found safe, a representative for emergency management operations said.

In San Antonio, electric utility CPS Energy said it would take up to 48 hours for power to be restored to 2,600 customers.

In Oklahoma, which also had weekend flooding, a firefighter died overnight in Claremore, about 30 miles northeast of Tulsa.

Captain Jason Farley, a 20-year veteran of the department, had been responding to a call to help about 10 people trapped in their homes by floodwater, said Claremore Fire Chief Sean Douglas. Farley was swept into a storm drain and died.

Another firefighter who rushed to his aid was also swept into a drain but survived with minor injuries, he said.

"It is a tragic event and a devastating loss for us," Douglas said.

Here are the cities that need a $15 minimum wage the most // Fortune // Claire Zillman - May 24, 2015

Californian cities have plenty of work to do.

The Los Angeles City Council this week voted 14-1 to pass a $15 minimum wage for the city. The hike, which will go into effect over the next five years, further solidifies the $15 minimum as the new national standard.

New York City seems poised to follow suit. This month, New York Governor Andrew Cuomo announced plans to convene a panel to consider a wage increase for the fast-food industry, a change that can become law without a vote in the legislature.

There are plenty of arguments against this high of a minimum wage, including one made by Berkshire Hathaway CEO Warren Buffett on Friday, in which he called for an expanded earned income tax credit rather than a $15 per hour wage. But like it or not, the $15 per hour train is gaining steam. It had already made stops in Seattle and San Francisco before pulling into L.A. Should others follow suit? That question prompted Fortune to examine which U.S. city residents would benefit the most from a $15 per hour minimum wage. We asked David Cooper, an economic analyst at the Economic Policy Institute, for help.

We first wanted to determine which cities had the largest share of sub-$15 per hour earners, where a minimum wage boost to $15 would presumably have the biggest direct effect, not in absolute numbers but by percentage of the working population. (One caveat here: we used the Bureau of Labor Statistics' data for metropolitan statistical areas—geographical areas with high population density and consistent economies that don't necessarily contain just one city and might reach beyond a city's official limits.)

It turns out that there are plenty of metropolitan areas—especially in the South—where 45%, 50%, and even 55% of the working population earn less than $15 per hour. (Another caveat, because of the size of some of these areas, some percentages have margins of error up to 4.3%.) For example, in the part of Texas that encompasses McAllen, Edinburg, and Pharr, which is located in the state's southeast corner near the Mexican border, just over 68% of its workforce earns less than $15 per hour.

But when you examine how much it costs to live in that region—which Cooper measured using regional price parity, the price of goods and services in that area versus the national average—you get a different picture. The RPP there is 85, on a scale where the overall national RPP is equal to 100, which means goods and services in that area are cheaper than the national average. To take that factor into account, we looked at the most expensive places to live, as measured by RPP, and used the U.S.'s average share of sub-$15 per hour earners—42.4%—as a cutoff for the share of low-wage workers.

The map above shows the metropolitan areas that turned up. L.A., which will soon have a $15 per hour minimum wage when Mayor Eric Garcetti signs the recently passed measure into law, makes the list. It's one of five California areas in the top 10.

The list picks up on the fact that there's "greater inequality in cities where there's a high cost of living and where wages are low," says Chris Tilly, director of the UCLA Institute for Research on Labor and Employment.

In the old, rust belt wage structure, there was a healthy population of middle wage income earners. Men worked in manufacturing; women held clerical jobs. But the bottom has dropped out of the middle class, in part, because of the reduction in traditional manufacturing jobs. As cities begin to orient themselves to newer, techonology-driven economies, there's very little middle ground. You either work in high tech (engineers, etc.,) and its ecosystem (lawyers, accountants) or you're left at the bottom, Tilly says. Cities with large immigrant populations also tend to have a wide disconnect between the cost of living and wages.

Missing from this list is, notably, New York City. The metropolitan statistical area that includes New York (plus parts of New Jersey and Long Island) has the second highest regional price parity on our list—122.2, behind only Honolulu's 122.9. But the New York area's share of sub-$15 per hour workers is 36%, considerably lower than the the national average of 42.4%. Then again, with a national average as high as 42.4%, it sounds like there's plenty of room for improvement all across the U.S.

GM: Criminal charges likely in ignition case // Fortune // Stephen Gandel - May 24, 2015

Fine is likely to eclipse $1.2 billion paid by Toyota last year.

General Motors is facing a criminal prosecution and may have to pay a record fine to resolve charges related to its faulty ignition switches. The switches, which shut some cars off while traveling at high speeds, have been linked to over 100 deaths.

The Department of Justice's soon-to-be-unveiled criminal case against the company appears to revolve around the fact that GM failed to disclose the problem with the switches in Chevrolet Cobalts and other older cars. The U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan believes the company hid problems with misstatements for over a decade.

The Justice Department is also considering charges against former GM employees, but has not finalized whether those charges will be brought.

GM's fine is likely to eclipse the $1.2 billion Toyota paid last year for concealing acceleration problems in its cars. GM could also plead guilty to criminal charges, but a deferred-prosecution agreement is also possible in the case.

The ignition switch problems emerged more than a year ago, and have weighed on GM's stock. The possible criminal charges were first reported by the New York Times.

John Nash dies in car accident leaving behind incredible legacy: 6 remarkable life lessons // True Jersey // Ann Brasco - May 24, 2015

American mathematician, John Forbes Nash Jr., and his wife, Alicia, were suddenly killed in a taxi accident on the New Jersey Turnpike today.

I never knew John Nash. I never met him. I never was fortunate enough to be his student, or to stand in a room with him. Like most everyone else, I came to know of his story through the 2001 movie A Beautiful Mind.

The unexpected news was startling. There is something about tragedy when it unexpectedly strikes in the middle of a sunshine day. It is as if the tragedy grabs your being by its lapels and shakes you to essence of your core, reminding you to look inward at what matters.

A remarkable, gifted man best known for providing the world with insight into the factors that govern chance taught us, in fitting irony, leaves behind great lessons both the orderly and expected and all that is possible. His brilliant life reminds us of how these seemingly adverse pieces of a complex puzzle fit together.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The legacy of a courageous and tireless genius speaks to us all in many ways. Here are just six of many lessons that a remarkable teacher has left us with:

1. Don't believe everything you are told. When Nash was sold a bill of goods about his prognosis, he didn't buy it. If John Nash would have believed his mental condition to be limiting, it would have been.

Nash didn't let the limitation of others dictate who he became and what he could achieve. He didn't let ordinary assumption dull his potential for extraordinary achievement.

2. Non-conformity is a gift. Nash was not valued solely because he was one of the most talented mathematicians of the century. John Nash was incredibly wonderful because he embraced, especially in his latter years, an offbeat authenticity that was completely unique and completely himself.

John Nash's life, both his remarkable body of work and who he was as an individual, remain inexplicably intertwined and boldly remind us of that being ordinary should never be the goal. It is in our authenticity that our gifts, talents, and self-truths are tangled.

Nash embraced his unique perspective. He explained, "One aspect of this is that rationality of thought imposes a limit on a person's concept of his relation to the cosmos."

3. Egotism is sheer madness. In his eighty-six years of life, John Nash's achievements were truly extraordinary. Nash was on the mathematics faculty at MIT and a Senior Research Mathematician at Princeton University. Nash was awarded the 1994 Nobel Memorial Prize in Economic Sciences with two other game theorists and recently won the notable Abel Prize in 2015. Nash had much to proudly boast about and yet he did not.

Nash, never a fan of egotism, thrived in humility. Those who knew him are quick to point out that he always focused on his work before he even mentioned his own accomplishments. Nash understood his own contributions to be part of something infinitely greater.

Nash candidly admitted, "When I started thinking irrationally, I imagined myself as really on a Number 1 level. I was the most important person of the world."

4. Believe in second chances. When it came to love, Nash remarried his first wife, Alicia, in 2001. When it came to work, Nash was indefatigable and understood his value in a larger context. He persevered through struggle with tenacity, grit and a passion for creativity.

Nash explained, "The only thing greater than the mind is the power of the heart." Nash showed us through constant example that authenticity is far more interesting and outstanding than a pursuit of ghostly perfection.

5. Be careful not to judge. Long before I was a mom and a writer, I had the unique privilege of working as a clinical social worker in a long-term inpatient adult psychiatric ward. I only say this because after spending over half a decade in this setting, I have a slight understanding of a fraction of Nash's uphill climb.

Nash was treated in a medical field that was just emerging in terms of treatment and not very fair to its patients. He was existing in a society that, at its worst, stigmatizes those with a different brain composition, and at its best, pities them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

John Nash said it best when he explained, "People are always selling the idea that people with mental illness are suffering. I think madness can be an escape. If things are not so good, you maybe want to imagine something better."

6. Believe you matter. Several great athletes in the past century have overcome physical limitations. Many of our greatest thinkers throughout history have been those affected by adversity, whether it was a neurological limitation, a disorder related to concentration, a problem related to reading, depression, mania, or even delusion.

It seems that that the concurrence of great adversity and extraordinary accomplishment is more than coincidental. It also appears that the way that person perceives themselves to be a determining factor.

Whether we hear our subconscious as a literal voice or a soft echo, it shapes who we become and what value we add to the world around us. The thoughts we think undoubtedly shape the actions we take.

Few of us will solve complex mathematical theorems, yet we all have talents, gifts, and purpose and it is up to no one but ourselves to remain committed to these gifts. As parents, caregivers, and teachers, we must build up our children to know that they matter because they do.

The world is often too eager to separate and classify madness from genius, obstacle from advantage, misapplication from accuracy, and weakness from strength. Nash's life brilliantly reminds us that these things are not so easily separated or even classified for that matter. Perhaps it is only the total sum of these things that matters anyway.

Defense Secretary Ash Carter: Iraqis lack 'will to fight' // MSNBC // Aliyah Frumin - May 24, 2015

U.S. Defense Secretary Ashton Carter offered a stinging criticism of the recent takeover of Ramadi by the terrorist group known as ISIS, arguing it demonstrated Iraqi forces lacked the "will to fight."

Carter's remarks are the most strident yet from the Obama Administration since the crucial city fell to extremists a week ago. He told CNN's Barbara Starr in an interview that aired on Sunday that Iraqi forces were not outnumbered. "In fact, they vastly outnumbered the opposing force, and yet they failed to fight, they withdrew from the site. And that says to me, and I think to most of us, that we have an issue with the will of the Iraqis to fight [ISIS] and defend themselves," he said.

The defense secretary called the situation "very concerning," arguing while the U.S. and allies could provide Iraqis with training and equipment, they can't give the forces motivation to fight.

"We can't make this happen by ourselves, but we can assist it to happen, and we are counting on the Iraqi people to come behind a multi-sectarian government in Baghdad," said Carter.

Iraqi Prime Minister Haider Al-Abadi's office dismissed Carter's assessment, telling NBC News that the takeover by ISIS was an anomaly and that the government has "started its on investigation to punish those who neglected their duty." Dr. Sa'ad Al-Hadithi, the media director for Al-Abadi, added, "...we cannot consider one or two failures committed by our forces as a failure of all Iraqi troops."

According to NBC News, Iraqi forces on Sunday, recaptured territory near Ramadi on Sunday – an effort to head back toward the key city that fell to ISIS a week ago.

Separately, according to Syrian state television, members of ISIS reportedly killed at least 400 people in the ancient city of Palmyra. Just days ago, the terrorist group claimed it had taken over Palmyra as well.

How to combat ISIS was a central issue on the Sunday news shows. Sen. John McCain of Arizona accused the White House of having no game plan. The Republican said on CBS' "Face the Nation" that "there is no strategy, and anybody that says that there is, I'd like to hear what it is, because it certainly isn't apparent…" McCain, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee argued in favor of a more militaristic strategy. "We need to have a more robust strategy. We need more troops on the ground, we need forward air controllers - we're just referring to air strikes," he said.

On the other hand, Democratic California Rep. Adam Schiff said on the same show that there will be no victory unless the Iraqi government can resolve its own issues. He added, "I wouldn't say that we're winning. I don't think we're losing either, but I think we're seeing an ebb and flow, and largely a stalemate situation in the war against ISIS."

Vote serves as beacon of hope for those still facing oppression // Irish Times // Dennis Staunton - May 24, 2015

Ireland's vote in favour of same-sex marriage is a milestone in the global struggle for equality for gays and lesbians that has seen dramatic progress in many western countries while others slide backwards into further repression.

Homosexual activity remains illegal in almost 80 countries and in many, including Uganda, Nigeria, Russia and Egypt, the situation for gays and lesbians has worsened. Our Yes vote can serve as a beacon of hope not just for LGBT people on the brink of achieving equality but for those millions throughout the world who continue to face persecution, oppression and violence.

Marriage equality, which was a marginal, almost eccentric demand only two decades ago, is now a reality in 20 countries and in many sub-national regions, including 37 of the 50 states of the United States.

It is an entirely 21st century phenomenon, with the Netherlands becoming the first country in the world to allow gays to marry in 2001. It is also essentially a conservative one, which was initially resisted by radical gay rights campaigners who saw marriage as a repressive, patriarchal institution.

Tragic

The Aids crisis of the 1980s and early 1990s brought into sharp, tragic relief the consequences of the lack of legal recognition of gay partnerships as men were denied access to their dying partners in hospitals, were evicted from the homes they shared when loved ones died and had no inheritance rights. The initial response came in the form of domestic partnerships.

It was the gay conservative writer Andrew Sullivan who first put gay marriage on the agenda in the US in 1989 with a groundbreaking essay in the New Republic called "Here Comes the Groom". He argued that marriage would help to "humanise and traditionalise" gays by strengthening their relationships and providing emotional and economic security.

As in Ireland, what brought marriage equality into the mainstream in the US was the growing number of gays and lesbians coming out to friends and family. Greater visibility not only made gays and lesbians appear less exotic, it gave more straight people a stake in the debate as they backed equal rights for friends or family members.

Some 60 per cent of Americans now approve of same-sex marriage and the US supreme court will next month rule on Obergefell v Hodges, a set of four challenges to state bans on gay marriage. It is expected to rule that the bans are unconstitutional, a move that would effectively legalise same-sex marriage throughout the US.

Until 2010, when the states of Maine, Maryland, Minnesota and Washington approved same-sex marriage in referendums, the conventional wisdom in the US was that the issue could not win popular approval at the ballot box.

Progress

Most progress on the issue in the US has come through the courts, with referendums more often called to introduce bans on same-sex marriage than to lift them.

But the courts are not deaf to public opinion and the head of the European Court of Human Rights suggested in 2012 that the court could reconsider its view that same-sex marriage is not a human right if enough countries introduced it. The European Parliament last March passed a resolution recognising such a right, although just 10 European Union member-states, including Ireland, have marriage equality, with two more – Slovenia and Finland– set to join them within months.

Ireland has shown marriage equality can win popular support and Friday's vote will encourage legislators and activists elsewhere in Europe to be bolder. The lessons of Ireland's campaign will be useful elsewhere, just as the successful campaigns in the US in 2012 helped to guide Ireland's campaigners.

Perhaps the central lesson is that it is less effective to simply demand rights than to persuade through personal testimony. It was stories such as those of Ursula Halligan, Pat Carey and Una Mullally that cut through the noise and appealed to the better nature of undecided voters. And straight allies such as Mary McAleese and Noel

Women activists cross DMZ between North and South Korea // CNN // Jethro Mullen - May 24, 2015

Paju, South Korea (CNN)An international group of female activists crossed the heavily fortified border between North and South Korea on Sunday in a controversial effort to bring attention to the need for peace between the two nations.

The group of about 30 members, called WomenCrossDMZ, included feminist Gloria Steinem and two Nobel Peace laureates, Mairead Maguire of Northern Ireland and Leymah Gbowee of Liberia.

On Sunday morning, a bus picked them up from the North Korean side and ferried them across the Demilitarized Zone that has separated the two Koreas for more than half a century.

"We feel very celebratory and positive that we have created a voyage across the DMZ in peace and reconciliation that was said to be impossible," Steinem said after the group, which had originally planned to walk across the zone, arrived in South Korea.

The activists said they acted as "citizen diplomats" in North Korea, speaking with women at a series of events during their time there.

"We can learn on paper and on screen," Steinem said. "But the ability to understand, not just learn, happens when we are together and able to empathize."

The group says women need to be involved in the peace-building process. It calls for reuniting families divided by the Korean War, and replacing the 1953 armistice with a permanent peace treaty -- demands similar to those made by the North Korean government.

Criticism from other activists

Other activists have criticized the event, saying the group is overlooking major problems faced by women under Kim Jong Un's authoritarian rule.

"It is absolutely outrageous that they completely ignore the suffering of the North Korean people, especially North Korean women," said Suzanne Scholte, head of the North Korea Freedom Coalition.

"If they truly cared, they would cross the China-North Korea border instead, which is actually more dangerous now than the DMZ," Scholte said ahead of the event.

North Korean women who cross into China often become victims of human trafficking, ending up being forced to work in the sex industry or sold as brides to rural Chinese men.

The reported abuses for North Korean women are not limited to the Chinese border. North Korean defectors have testified of rape and abuse in prison camps by fellow inmates or guards.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Maguire, who became known for organizing peace demonstrations during the conflict in Northern Ireland, suggested the human rights situation would improve if the two Koreas were to sign a full peace treaty.

"You can get to human rights when you have a normal situation and not a country at war," she said Sunday.

Sympathy for North Korea?

Christine Ahn, one of the event's organizers, has been called a North Korea sympathizer -- an allegation she denies.

"Basically that is a Cold War, McCarthyist mentality," she told CNN in April. "And that kind of framework has enabled Korea to remain divided. I am pro-peace. I am pro-engagement. I am pro-dialogue. I am pro-human rights."

She says she is for ending "the state of war on the Korean peninsula."

Her critics include Human Rights Foundation's Alex Gladstein, who accused Ahn of "whitewashing the North Korean regime for more than a decade, always excusing the Kims, saying they aren't so bad, and blaming North Korea's problems on South Korea and the U.S."

Observers say that a group being allowed by both North and South Korean authorities to hold this kind of event is unusual but not unheard of.

A group of bikers from New Zealand crossed the border in 2013, and another group drove through the DMZ last year.

Last week, U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon said the North Korean government abruptly canceled his planned visit to an industrial zone. Situated to the north of the DMZ, the Kaesong Industrial Complex contains factories that are owned by South Koreans and staffed by thousands of North Koreans.

The Center Needs a Voice // WaPo // David Ignatius - May 22, 2015

WASHINGTON -- Hillary Clinton's move to the left on trade and other issues is a reminder of the growing power of activists on the wings in presidential nominating politics -- and a corresponding diminution of the power of the center.

"Social and demographic shifts mean that no left-leaning position Clinton takes now would be likely to hurt her" in the 2016 general election, writes The Washington Post's Anne Gearan in a recent assessment of Clinton's strategy. Meanwhile, GOP candidates are doubling down in the other direction, as they move toward their party's right wing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The disenfranchisement of the center is a fact of modern politics. That should be worrisome even if you think the center is an ideological muddle. As we've seen in recent years, in a world dominated by the political wings, the compromises necessary for passing any legislation become difficult. As the center disappears, so does governance.

To illustrate how the current system works, a would-be reformer named Peter Ackerman recently showed me a diagram that estimates party affiliation: "Democrats: Less than 30 percent," "Republicans: Less than 30 percent," and in the middle "Unaffiliated: Greater than 40 percent." He argues that if you include left-leaning and right-leaning voters in the "moderate" camp, it makes up two-thirds of the electorate.

Yet as we head toward the presidential nominating season, the voice of this broad center is barely audible. Politics is pulled toward the left and right by campaign-finance rules, redistricting and other issues discussed in countless essays and op-ed pieces. This centrifugal force seems to increase in every election cycle, with a resulting paralysis in Washington.

Ackerman has launched a campaign dubbed "Change the Rule" to address one piece of this puzzle of America's political dysfunction. The rule in question is imposed by the Commission on Presidential Debates, which the two major parties created in 1987 to administer the televised debates that are the nexus of modern presidential campaigns. Ackerman argues that this rule, as currently applied, prevents the emergence of an independent candidate who might empower the underrepresented middle.

The current debate rule requires that any third-party candidate must average 15 percent support in five polls taken in the two weeks before the debates begin in October of the election year. To get the necessary name recognition and support, Ackerman's group estimates that an independent candidate would have to spend $266 million. Because of contribution limits, this effectively precludes anyone who's not a billionaire from joining the debates as an independent.

Ackerman argues that the entry ticket to the debate should instead be getting on the ballots by the end of April in an election year in states that together have at least 270 Electoral College votes. To avoid chaotic debates, just one such independent candidate should be added -- the one with the highest number of ballot-access signatures nationwide. Such a signature drive would cost less than $15 million, Ackerman estimates, opening the field to less-wealthy candidates who could mobilize volunteers and small donations.

Supporters are a "who's who" of the bipartisan center: John Anderson, a Republican former congressman who ran as an independent in the 1980 presidential race; William Cohen, a Republican former senator who served as secretary of defense for a Democratic president; Lee Hamilton, a Democratic former congressman who co-chaired bipartisan commissions on 9/11 and the Iraq War; Jon Huntsman, a Republican former governor whose moderate positions vaporized his 2012 presidential campaign; and Joe Lieberman, a Democratic former senator and vice presidential nominee. Other backers include retired Gen. Stanley McChrystal and retired Adm. James Stavridis.

To bolster the case, Ackerman commissioned a survey last July by pollster Douglas Schoen. In the sample of 1,000 likely voters, 86 percent said the political system is broken and doesn't serve ordinary people; 89 percent said they wished politicians would work together and compromise; and, interestingly, 66 percent said they thought presidential debates could do a better job of informing the electorate.

Other surveys reflect this deep mistrust of the system. A January 2015 Pew Research Center poll reported a 48 percent unfavorability rating for the Democratic Party and a 53 percent negative for the Republicans. An August 2014 Gallup survey found that 83 percent disapproved of the job Congress is doing.

Yet the system grinds forward with a perverse set of incentives that rewards extremism and punishes compromise. I don't know if opening the presidential debates would fix this mess, but it might pull candidates back toward the center, where the public lives and where problems get solved.

Who's going 'Iowa heavy,' 'Iowa light' // Des Moines Register // Jennifer Jacobs - May 25, 2015

Presidential contenders often tell Iowa voters some variation of "I'll be back soon" or "You'll see a lot of me."

Their travel histories, however, reveal which ones truly have an "Iowa heavy" strategy and which ones are playing "Iowa light" — at least so far.

Of the 15 GOP White House hopefuls knocking around Iowa these days, a Des Moines Register review of days spent in Iowa pegs five as Iowa light, six in the middle range and four as Iowa heavy.

At the lightest end of the scale among top-tier candidates is Florida U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio, with just two days here in calendar year 2015.

No one has had more face time in Iowa than Rick Perry. The former Texas governor is looking for redemption after a 2012 presidential bid he admits was pock-marked with mistakes, including spending only 36 days here last cycle. He has already tabulated 30 this time, with nine months to go before caucus night, scheduled for Feb. 1.

"If anyone spends more time in Iowa over the next year, God bless them," Perry said in an interview with the Quad-City Times last week. "They'd better pack a lunch because I will be here often."

Because of the record number of Republicans slicing up the positioning for the Iowa caucuses, the amount of time a contender spends connecting with voters could be more critical this year than in earlier cycles, Iowa politics watchers said.

"In a crowded field, personal retail interaction becomes even more important," said Republican strategist Matt Strawn, a former state party chairman. "That may be the differentiation between candidates that are very closely aligned ideologically."

STRAW POLL:

And with polling showing the GOP field tightly clustered, the dicey game of beating expectations may be another factor that weighs more heavily than ideology in determining victory, said Dennis Goldford, a Drake University political science professor.

"For candidates high in the polls, failing to do well in the caucuses hurts worse than a win helps," Goldford said.

Appearances in Iowa are one of the most visible measures of commitment to the first-in-the-nation presidential voting state, but appearances may not be what they seem when it comes to an Iowa footprint, strategists cautioned.

Contenders seeking to keep expectations low are likely doing more than meets the eye, said campaign veteran Craig Schoenfeld, who is unaligned with any 2016 candidate. Subterranean work includes private telephone calls to Iowans from the contender, tele-town halls (a speech or Q&A by mass conference call), social media outreach and online advertising — which can all happen without the candidate ever stepping foot in Iowa, and sometimes without the media or rivals knowing about it, Schoenfeld said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And in the new era of super PACs taking on more campaign-style voter recruitment duties rather than just doing TV advertising, a candidate's Iowa footprint may be even less obvious than when the traditional campaign structure handled them.

To sum it up, strategists said, "Iowa heavy" for 2016 candidates means: Be here. Be here virtually even when you're not. Have your friends and super PAC allies here when you're here — and when you're not.

Historically, there hasn't always been a direct correlation between days spent in Iowa and victory in the caucuses, said Goldford, who co-authored a book on the caucuses. The Rick Santorum model of hitting all 99 counties is merely a way for candidates who aren't well known or well funded to gain an edge, he said.

Mitt Romney, who spent just 19 days in Iowa on his second go at the White House in 2012, fell just 34 votes shy of Santorum, a little-known Pennsylvania senator who blew apart the GOP record book with 105 days here. But Romney had built his Iowa network by spending 77 days here in the 2008 cycle. (Historical days in Iowa are from Goldford's book, "The Iowa Precinct Caucuses," co-authored with Hugh Winebrenner.)

Eventual caucus winners such as Kansas U.S. Sen. Bob Dole in 1996 (41 days) and Texas Gov. George W. Bush in 2000 (29 days) were well-known figures who didn't need to camp out in Iowa to establish a following.

What about the Democrats?

Democrats reign as king of the road warriors in the Iowa caucuses, according to "The Iowa Precinct Caucuses" co-authors Hugh Winebrenner and Dennis Goldford.

While Rick Santorum set the Republican record with 105 days in 2012, his total pales compared with the all-time leader: Democrat Dick Gephardt, a U.S. representative from neighboring Missouri who campaigned 148 days in Iowa in the 1988 cycle. The time Gephardt put in paid off with a caucus win. Eventual nominee Mike Dukakis, who campaigned in Iowa 82 days, came in third.

In the Democrats' most recent competitive caucus, in 2008, six candidates spent more than 75 days each in Iowa. Then-Delaware U.S. Sen. Joe Biden led the way with 120 days, but placed a disappointing fifth and left the race. The caucus winner and eventual president, Barack Obama, spent 89 days in Iowa. Hillary Clinton, a candidate again this cycle, spent 74 days.

Welcome, candidates: Some answers, please // TH Online // Editorial Board - May 24, 2015

When presidential hopefuls visit with Iowans, let's press them to talk about the real issues.

The next presidential election is still a year and a half away, but campaigning is ramping up in Iowa, where citizens are treated to an "early bird special" of candidate visits.

Its status as first-in-the-nation caucus state makes Iowa a choice destination for presidential hopefuls. Thus, Iowans, more than citizens in nearly all other states, have more chances to see and hear the candidates. Just in the past week or so in Dubuque, Republicans Jeb Bush and Rick Perry made public appearances and Democrat Hillary Clinton attended a private event.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But a stump speech is a stump speech, whether you see it from the front row or on YouTube. Citizens want more from candidates than platitudes and promises, one-liners and tweets. One of the reasons Iowa maintains its first-caucus status is because Iowans have a reputation for being no-nonsense and interested in the issues, not just the personalities.

While the candidates are appearing in Iowa's town halls and coffee shops -- come January, they will be gone -- Iowans should be proactive in directing the conversation.

The problems facing our country are complex and will require thoughtful planning and collaboration. Detailing a solution won't fit in a sound bite. A quip won't do justice to a difficult problem. Pointing out what's wrong is not the same as explaining how to make it right.

Rather than sit back and let the candidates choose the topics and spin them their way, Iowans would be doing themselves and the country a monumental favor if they pressed the candidates to be more specific on how they would address major issues.

For example:

* Infrastructure: Some 20 percent of the country's 900,000 miles of highways are in desperate need of reconstruction. About a quarter of its 600,000 bridges are categorized as structurally deficient or functionally obsolete. In Iowa, that accounts for more than a quarter of the bridges people use every day. Fixing infrastructure means spending.

What's your plan for paying for the infrastructure work the country so desperately needs?

* Debt: While issues like infrastructure will require spending, fiscal responsibility must be a key element to any candidate's platform. U.S. debt is on an unsustainable track. As a share of the economy (GDP), the debt has grown from 35 percent of GDP in 2007 to 74 percent today, according to the Concord Coalition. The debt is projected to exceed the entire economy by the 2030s.

What steps will you take to address the unsustainable growth of debt? Will reforming the tax code and changing the Social Security formula be part of the plan?

* Immigration: Politicians of every stripe know that immigration reform is long overdue. Still, we have yet to see anyone with the leadership to make that happen. It has been seven years since the Postville, Iowa, raid that resulted in nearly 400 employees of Agriprocessors being arrested and hauled away. That event put a face on the issue of illegal immigration in the Heartland, and still reform has languished.

What plan do you have for immigration reform? Should there be a path to citizenship for undocumented people living here now?

* Health care: Ever since the landmark Affordable Care Act was passed, it's been a tale of two Obamacares. Opponents will tell you this legislation will drive up prices, limit health care options and critically damage our whole health care system. Supporters will talk about how many people have insurance coverage for the first time and the benefits, rights and protections now in place.

Is there a way to keep the elements of the Affordable Care Act that are working well and discard the parts that have failed? Who will make those assessments and how?

* Economy/jobs: Though the economy has shown great strides of improvement, memories of the recession and job losses are still fresh in the mind of many Americans. The availability of better-paying jobs is part of the American Dream.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

How would you continue to grow the economy and spur business and industry to create jobs and increase wages?

* Environment: As evidence of climate change caused by human action piles up, government has been slow to react. A global issue like this shouldn't divide people down party lines, but it has. Regardless of political persuasion, there ought to be some basic tenets upon which everyone can agree. Increasing research on and production of renewable fuels, for example, and mandating greater fuel-efficiency. Meanwhile, the quality of our air and water, while better than it was a half-century ago, remains an issue of concern.

What environmental rules would you support to decrease humans' footprint on our world, improve sustainability and protect our air and water?

* Partisanship: The preceding laundry list of challenging issues all have one thing in common -- they are stymied in large part because of partisan politics.

How will you break through partisan gridlock and be a leader for all Americans? Everyone knows collaboration needs to happen to effect change. How will you get the two sides to work together?

None of these questions is easy to answer. But anyone running for president should have taken the time to think not just about campaigning but about governing and what it will require. The candidate who can answer these questions -- no matter what the answer is -- will go a long way toward winning credibility among Iowans during caucus season and all Americans come November 2016.

Fusion Media Aims at Millennials, but Struggles to Find Its Identity // NYT // Ravi Somaiya - May 24, 2015

In 2011, when Isaac Lee, president of news for Univision, set out to persuade his company and Disney to back Fusion, a digital news service and cable channel he wanted to start, he promised nothing less than the holy grail: young viewers for the older media conglomerates.

He played a slide show in which a middle-aged white man transformed into a young brown woman. The executives present were dazzled.

"It's very hard to say no to Isaac Lee," said Ben Sherwood, president of the Disney/ABC Television Group, describing him as "extremely charismatic and dynamic and a visionary." Randy Falco, president and chief executive of Univision, said of Mr. Lee: "Oh, my God. He is really a force of nature."

The reality, since Fusion began in October 2013, has been more complex. Many inside and outside the company are hard pressed to define what exactly Fusion does. Traffic to its website has been anemic at times, and it has yet to deliver the kind of attention-getting stories that digital media rivals like Buzzfeed and Vice have produced.

The site was originally aimed at young Latinos who spoke English as a first language, but it quickly shifted its target audience to young viewers of all ethnicities. In April, it shuffled its news and features editorial team and appointed a new editor in chief.

Fusion has grown quickly, with 250 employees and offices in Miami, New York, Washington, D.C., Boulder, Colo., and Oakland, Calif. Mr. Lee and his senior editors say the organization is young and quickly finding its way — they point to an interview with Marco Rubio as an example of the kind of noteworthy journalism they strive for.

They believe that Fusion will eventually fulfill a mission that news organizations across the world see as vital to survival: reaching younger and more diverse audiences on the platforms they go to for news, like Snapchat and YouTube.

In an interview, Mr. Lee, 44, said his employees “have the ability to bet and to make mistakes, and the results are there,” specifying both written and visual storytelling and investigative reporting. “I think that this is one of the very few organizations that is about journalism and talent,” he added.

Fusion is, in many ways, the archetype for broader movements in media. As traditional news organizations have struggled to adapt to the rhythms of the web, a new generation of media companies, like Buzzfeed and Vox, have moved from bright ideas to full-fledged businesses at breakneck speed. They are often backed by big corporations — Disney is also behind the websites Grantland and FiveThirtyEight — or venture capital firms making big bets that all the people browsing the web on their phones will demand fresh content.

Many covet millennials — a group loosely defined as those born after 1980, or about one-third of the current American work force, according to the Pew Research Center. Nobody has quite figured out what they want or if it is possible to tell stories that appeal universally to a huge number of Americans who sometimes seem united only in the dreams of marketers.

Disney and Univision supplied Fusion with an additional $30 million in financing recently, according to a person involved with the deal who spoke on the condition of anonymity. But the cultures of the companies and Fusion have already clashed. For instance, according to two senior Fusion staff members, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, Disney put the organization on notice that it would not take kindly to coverage that might dent its standing with consumers. The warning came after Fusion published several stories based on documents that hackers stole from Sony.

Fusion is not alone: In negotiations to create a Vice cable channel, Disney and Hearst insisted on a clause protecting the companies in the event that Vice content “embarrasses Hearst or Disney in any way,” according to people with knowledge of the matter, who spoke on condition of anonymity to discuss private negotiations.

Fusion has offered lavish wages to hire a number of highly regarded journalists. Big names include the financial writer Felix Salmon and The Atlantic’s Alexis Madrigal, who was named editor in chief in late April in a broad reshuffling of the organization’s management ranks.

Mr. Lee made his name starting and editing a series of publications aimed at audiences in Mexico and his native Colombia. He became the head of news at Univision in 2010 and is known in media circles to be funny, profane and inclined to go off on philosophical tangents.

He said that no one, however close to him they are, receives preferential treatment. Addressing high wages, he said he believed that journalists, “not just suits,” should be paid well.

Though Fusion was recently nominated for two Livingston Awards for its investigative work, the network is perhaps best known for sifting through hacked Sony emails — something that made Disney the target of criticism in Hollywood — and for using foul-mouthed puppets in its State of the Union coverage in January.

Recently, Fusion’s website had stories on the potential dangers of virtual-reality pornography and on new emojis, and an investigation into industrialized chicken farms titled “Cock Fight.” Its television offerings include “America with Jorge Ramos,” the popular Univision news anchor, and the Cannabusiness Report, on “the mainstreaming of marijuana."

Several current and former Fusion employees mentioned a masculine and raucous office culture inside the organization.

Last year, when the company instituted what it described as a routine training program on appropriate sexual behavior, some employees took it as a reaction to widespread rumors of office liaisons. David Ford, a spokesman for Fusion, said that, just like other corporations, it conducted "respect in the workplace training as part of our overall compliance program."

Its web traffic late last year, according to internal figures obtained by The New York Times, dropped as low as 23,000 page views on some days. Fusion said its traffic this past December reached 1.9 million unique users and increased to about five million by April. The media measurement company Nielsen said it did not measure Fusion's viewership on television.

Mr. Madrigal described the organization in simple terms: "Fusion is a cable and digital network that is championing a more diverse and inclusive America." It will do so by hiring those who are "naturally and natively interested in things that the rising generation of people in America are interested in," he added. That will include television shows on topics like prisons and technology, with matching content online, on social media and in live events.

Mr. Falco said Fusion was "different, experimental." It should act as a kind of ideas lab, he said, that feeds the lessons it learns back to its parent companies. One goal, he said, was to expand Fusion's cable channel from its current reach of 40 million homes to as many as 70 million homes over the next few years.

It is a complex time to introduce a new cable channel — the pressure from consumers is to narrow the bundle of networks sold to them, not to expand it. But Fusion, one of the most modern of media enterprises, is supported in part by one of the most old-fashioned of revenue streams: cable fees.

For his part, Mr. Sherwood, the president of Disney/ABC Television Group, repeatedly compared the service to ESPN, which began as a small-town Connecticut cable channel and grew into a media behemoth.

"It's going to be a big success," Mr. Sherwood said of Fusion. "You have to take the long view when you're building a multiplatform service." He added that he was "excited" about the comedy news program with the puppets, which is called "No, You Shut Up!"

Mr. Lee projected confidence, too.

"I have nothing to worry about," he said. "I know exactly what I am doing. I know that we don't know everything, but we are running the best possible process to figure it out. This is a marathon."

Only Capitalism Can Save the Planet // The Daily Beast // Eleanor Clift - May 23, 2015

Lester Brown, environmentalist nonpareil, isn't waiting for government. He thinks the free market is the way to address climate change.

A warming planet poses a threat to our way of life whether it's man-made or a natural phenomenon, and government efforts to combat and slow its impact so far have been minimal. President Obama says our failure to act weakens national security, yet Congress is beholden to climate-change deniers and no real action is likely to happen anytime soon.

This isn't surprising in the least to Lester Brown. A pioneering environmentalist who decades ago warned of the "manhandling of nature" and its dire consequences, Brown isn't looking to government to save the planet. "Government helped get some of these things going (like solar energy and wind farms), but now government is less and less important," he says. "The important thing is that the market is now driving this."

As the founder of two nonprofit research organizations, the Worldwatch Institute and the Earth Policy Institute, and the recipient of a MacArthur genius grant for his work on sustainable development, Brown is an unlikely champion of capitalism. But he predicts a half-century's worth of change is possible in the next decade as corporate America and billionaire investors move into profit-making new-energy ventures.

He cites Wal-Mart's decision last year to move toward solar energy—not to save the planet, but to save money. "It's a business decision," Wal-Mart CEO Bill Simon said in May 2014. "The renewable energy we buy meets or beats prices from the grid."

The beauty of this quiet revolution is that it's more than the usual suspects. Billionaires Michael Bloomberg and Warren Buffett are on the front lines, investing in new sources of energy, but so is conservative oilman Philip Anschutz, owner of the conservative outlets The Weekly Standard and The Washington Examiner, who a year ago invested $15 billion to build a 3,000-megawatt wind farm in Wyoming. "Anschutz has jumped into this with all four feet, he's pulling out all the stops," says Brown. "He sees Wyoming as a huge gold mine, and he's building a transmission line to California. Wyoming has 600,000 people; California has 28 million." Do the math, he says.

Renewable energy is an issue that divides conservatives. Some see its value; others see it as a threat to oil and gas. When the business-friendly American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC) developed legislation for state legislatures requiring consumers who use solar to pay an added fee, the Tea Party joined with the Sierra Club in some states to fight the fee, dubbing itself the Green Tea Party.

Shifting alliances in energy can be dizzying. Texas has gone from being the country's leading oil producer to being the biggest wind producer, getting 10 percent of its power from wind and building transmission lines to Mississippi and Louisiana. Texas billionaire T. Boone Pickens, an early believer in wind power, backed away in the face of early challenges. Brown tells of listening indifferently as Pickens lectured him on how oil is forever. "You're not listening to me, are you?" Pickens said. "No," Brown replied.

Trim and fit in his 80s, still jogging, and with a full head of white hair, Brown cemented his reputation as a seer with a 1994 article on who will feed China that ran in The Washington Post under the headline, "How China Will Starve the World." It said that to feed 1.2 billion people, China would have to import so much grain that world food prices would rise, and nations would move away from emphasizing military preparedness to insuring and protecting food supplies.

Chinese officials angrily denied any such looming crisis. But they quietly revamped their agriculture policies to accommodate population growth that Brown said was the equivalent of a new Beijing each year. Several years later, a top Chinese official who was in power at the time told Brown his book, Who Will Feed China? Wake-up Call for a Small Planet, was very helpful.

It may seem unusual for a leading environmentalist to place his faith in the power of capitalism to move the country, and indeed the world, away from the cheap oil and coal economy that has powered America's economic success since the Industrial Revolution. Brown does hedge, writing in his new book, The Great Transition, that no one can say with any certainty that the change that's underway will proceed fast enough to avoid catastrophic climate change.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ted Turner, long an advocate on climate change and a funder of Brown's work, purchased 4,000 copies of The Great Transition and is distributing them to members of Congress and elected officials across the country. It is a rare optimistic look at evidence that the economy is moving away from oil and coal to solar and wind and battery-powered vehicles. "That's the most exciting for me, how fast things are moving," says Brown, citing a UBS survey that says rooftop solar panels with backup batteries for home and cars will be cost-competitive in Europe by 2020.

Obama's "war on coal" was a feature in the 2014 midterm election, and there's still plenty of pushback in Congress. But 188 of the nation's 523 coal plants have closed or are scheduled to close, and the $80 million donated by Michael Bloomberg to the Sierra Club's "Beyond Coal" campaign is a game-changer, says Brown. As the economy transitions, so does the investor class. Brown points out that Goldman Sachs pulled out of coal, and Morgan Stanley is out of oil. Even the Rockefeller Brothers Fund, whose ancestor founded Standard Oil, divested its investments in fossil fuels last year. "When you get the billionaires moving out, that's smart money," says Brown.

Pressure to divest is also cropping up on college campuses. Stanford is out of coal, and Syracuse University is out of all fossil fuels. Harvard students staged a sit-in in February demanding the university shed its investments in fossil-fuel companies. The administration refused, but the pressure will continue. More than 200 faculty members have signed a letter asking Harvard's governing body to reconsider, and Harvard law students have filed a lawsuit in an effort to force the change that everybody knows is coming. For those who worry about the health of the planet, help is on the way.

ISIS rises, the economy falters, and Obama's legacy falls apart // NY Post // John Podhoretz - May 23, 2015

Deep into the seventh year of his tenure, Barack Obama is thinking about his post-presidential legacy. We know this because he's telling us so.

In an interview this week with The Atlantic about the potential deal with Iran regarding its nuclear program, the president sought to use the fact of his relative youth and his consciousness about how history might judge him to his advantage: "Look, 20 years from now, I'm still going to be around, God willing. If Iran has a nuclear weapon, it's my name on this. I think it's fair to say that in addition to our profound national-security interests, I have a personal interest in locking this down."

In one sense, this is what we want presidents to worry about. We want them to be restrained by the cautionary examples provided by history and by the fact that history will judge them.

But what if the desire to tip the scales of history's judgment in his favor leads a president to take dangerous risks?

In fact, we know that is what Obama has done with the Iran deal because his aides have told us so.

His deputy national security adviser, Ben Rhodes, put it this way last year to a roomful of liberal activists when talking about the initial November 2013 agreement to begin talking about Iran's nuclear program: "Bottom line is, this is the best opportunity we've had to resolve the Iranian issue diplomatically…This is probably the biggest thing President Obama will do in his second term on foreign policy. This is health care for us, just to put it in context."

But this "opportunity" didn't just emerge organically — which is actually where "opportunities" are supposed to come from. It did not result from changing conditions that opened a new possibility of finding common ground.

Iran's behavior didn't change, and its pursuit of nuclear weapons didn't change. Obama manufactured what

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rhodes called an opportunity by pursuing a deal with Iran and dangling all kinds of carrots in front of the mullahs.

And why? Because he wants a foreign-policy legacy to match the size and scope of his key legacy in domestic policy.

And who can blame him? After the failure of the Arab Spring, the collapse of Libya, the failure to act on his self-imposed "red line" in Syria, Russia's seizure of Crimea from Ukraine and the terrifying rise and forward march of ISIS, the only unmitigated positive on his foreign-policy spreadsheet remains the killing of Osama bin Laden.

Masked Iraqi fighters prepare to battle ISIS who have risen to prominence on Obama's watch.

Look, the guy will need something impressive to fill the exhibition space at his brand-new presidential library in Chicago.

Obama's asking us to trust him because, he says, you can't think he would want to look like the man who allowed Iran to go nuclear at some point in the future.

So what explains the president's own unprompted comments in an NPR interview in April that, under the terms already announced, Iran would have the right to go nuclear by 2028 — when he will,

God willing, be a mere 67 years of age?

"A more relevant fear," he said, "would be that in year 13, 14, 15, they have advanced centrifuges that enrich uranium fairly rapidly, and at that point, the breakout times would have shrunk almost down to zero."

Obama offered an answer. "The option of a future president to take action if in fact they try to obtain a nuclear weapon is undiminished," he said.

So it will be up to his successors to bail him out in the eyes of history and make it appear as though his legacy wasn't the nuclear destabilization of the Middle East!

For all of Obama's posturing, he has done little to curb the nuclear ambitions of Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

Speaking of legacies, how's that key domestic-policy legacy going? Not so hot.

ObamaCare remains unpopular; far more Americans oppose than favor it.

People still remember the disaster of the October 2013 rollout, which still casts a shadow over the program today.

Those hard feelings were deepened last year by the discovery of a series of talks by key ObamaCare architect Jonathan Gruber in which he bragged that it had been falsely marketed to the American people to take advantage of their stupidity.

Its defenders say the program is beginning to work, in the sense that it's covering more people — but it's not covering as many as the administration said it would by this time.

They tout the fact that the cost of the program is lower than it was supposed to be by now.

But that's an inconsistent claim; it's only less expensive because it isn't meeting its target numbers, not because cost savings have suddenly materialized from the ether.

Meanwhile, at some point over the next month, the entire policy may be thrown into terminal chaos when the Supreme Court issues its judgment in a case called King v. Burwell — which challenges the legality of a central component of ObamaCare.

Modal Trigger

Obamacare is the president's key domestic achievement, but the gargantuan piece of legislation might not even be legal.

As the Supreme Court debates and writes its opinions, the overall economy continues to sputter. Over the past five years, it grows and halts, grows and halts, in a somewhat mystifying pattern that has kept the American people on guard and on edge.

In the latest RealClearPolitics polling average, 62% say the country is on the wrong track — more than seven years after Obama moved into the White House.

Obama still has 18 months to go, and presidents have staged remarkable turnarounds in public opinion in such a time frame. Bill Clinton did it before his re-election in 1996, which seemed like a ludicrous prospect in early 1995.

Ronald Reagan was at low ebb in mid-1987 and left office on a triumphant high in early 1989.

But we've also seen the opposite. Indeed, we've seen the opposite more recently. George W. Bush was in bad shape in mid-2007, unquestionably — worse than Obama, because he'd lost the confidence of some Republicans, while Obama seems not to have lost any of his base.

But in 2008 the bottom fell out when a financial crisis that began in the spring turned into a total meltdown by the fall. Bush left office with one poll showing his approval rating at 22%.

Right now, would you bet on things getting substantially better for Barack Obama, or substantially worse? Does it look like we're going to triumph over ISIS?

Does it feel like the economy is going to improve or that ObamaCare will suddenly gain public support? Does it seem like the deal with Iran is a good one?

If you answer these questions in the affirmative, then you are likely to be the sort of person who's kept your 2008 Obama "Hope" poster on your wall and your 2012 Obama bumper sticker on your car.

Alas for America and the world, a poster and a bumper sticker do not a legacy make.

The Making of a Great Ex-President // NYT // Justin S. Vaugh - May 23, 2015

Though deeply engaged in his presidency — battling for the Trans-Pacific Partnership and against ISIS — Barack Obama is also casting an eye beyond Jan. 20, 2017, when his post-presidency begins. We've learned that his presidential library will be in Chicago, and he will continue to advocate for young minority men.

Mr. Obama's slow pivot to his retirement coincides with renewed controversy over how Bill Clinton has conducted his, especially around donors to the Clinton Global Initiative and possible conflicts of interest during Hillary Rodham Clinton's tenure as secretary of state. Some assessments of Mr. Clinton's post-presidential career have become extremely critical.

Which of Mr. Obama's predecessors have been the best ex-presidents and which have been the worst? ...

Best

Engaged in important work, sometimes at a level that exceeded White House accomplishments.

John Quincy Adams

After losing badly to Andrew Jackson in 1828, he re-entered politics almost immediately and served nearly 20 years in the House of Representatives. While in Congress, he was chairman of multiple committees, fought vigorously against slavery and helped bring the Nullification Crisis to an end. He was instrumental in ensuring that James Smithson's fortune built the Smithsonian Institution and successfully argued before the Supreme Court on behalf of African slaves who had revolted against their Spanish captors and seized the slave ship Amistad.

Jimmy Carter

President Carter has been out of office for 34 years and counting. He is renowned for his work with Habitat for Humanity, and his foundation, the Carter Center, has done extraordinary work promoting democracy, human rights and global health. Of particular note is the foundation's effort to eradicate the Guinea worm, which has helped lead to infections dropping from 3.5 million in 1986, when the foundation began combating the problem, to around 100 in 2014. Critics, however, allege the foundation gave its approval to questionable election processes in Venezuela in 2004.

William Howard Taft

Eight years after leaving the presidency, Taft became chief justice of the United States. He held the post, which had long been his dream job, from 1921 to 1930. Taft was the author of more than 250 opinions and became well respected for his role as a jurist, appearing in the Top 20 in some academic rankings of the greatest Supreme Court justices. He also led reform efforts to streamline the Supreme Court's organization and give it greater control over which cases it hears, and led the charge for a new Supreme Court building, though it would not be completed until after his death.

Herbert Hoover

He lived three decades after leaving office at 58. He campaigned against Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal and rebuked Harry Truman's decision to drop the bomb on Japan in 1945 and his aggressive approach to the Cold War. But he also led essential administrative efforts, including international relief in Europe during World War II and food distribution in famine-stricken parts of the world. Hoover later was chairman of the Hoover Commission, from 1947 to 1949, which proposed reforms to strengthen the executive branch and helped make the modern presidency.

Worst

Took strong positions against the national interest and undermined successors for personal and political reasons.

John Tyler

Tyler became an advocate for Southern secession from the Union and was elected to the Confederacy's House of Representatives, though he died before he could be sworn in. At the time of his death, many in the North considered him a traitor, a position Jefferson Davis's political exploitation of his funeral did little to combat. Even though his coffin was draped with a Confederate flag, it should be noted that Tyler was chairman of the 1861 Virginia peace convention in a commendable, if failed, effort to avert civil war.

Millard Fillmore

After leaving office in 1853, Fillmore ran again as the Know-Nothing Party's candidate in 1856. He lost, but still helped prevent John C. Frémont, a Republican, from defeating James Buchanan, who went on to be the worst president in American history, according to numerous scholarly studies. Fillmore continued to take positions on the wrong side of history, from his support of the Constitutional Union Party (which placed priority on maintaining the union above all else, including ending slavery) in 1860 to his disdain for the Emancipation Proclamation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Franklin Pierce

A staunch critic of Abraham Lincoln throughout the Civil War, Pierce's opposition to the 16th president was so renowned he became the subject of rumors that he was involved in a planned uprising against the government, which would replace Lincoln's administration with a provisional government and put in office a president more sympathetic to the Southern states. Although these claims would ultimately be revealed as a hoax, the public remained suspicious of his loyalty to the country. A longtime drinker, Pierce ultimately succumbed to cirrhosis of the liver in 1869.

Teddy Roosevelt

After leaving office, he went on an African safari with a group that killed hundreds of animals, including rare species like the white rhino. Upon his return, he undermined his chosen successor, William Howard Taft. After a failed challenge to Taft for the 1912 Republican presidential nomination, Roosevelt formed the Progressive Party, known as the Bull Moose Party, which split the Republicans and helped elect Woodrow Wilson. Roosevelt railed against Wilson, too, helping the Republicans win back Congress in 1918, which would play a key role in the defeat of Wilson's League of Nations plan.

Studies and rankings in that area are rare, compared with those that rate or rank presidential greatness, which has become something of an intellectual cottage industry. Indeed, in the most recent poll of professional presidency watchers — which I conducted with Brandon Rottinghaus of the University of Houston — Mr. Obama found a place at No. 18.

In looking at the recipe for post-presidential greatness, an analysis of his predecessors suggests equal parts opportunity, activity and incentive.

First, presidents need to stay alive after leaving office long enough to have a chance to provide meaningful service. Those who do need to also accomplish something significant beyond campaigning for their fellow partisans, burnishing their legacy and cutting the ribbon at the groundbreaking of their library.

Many of our greatest presidents would not — indeed, could not — make the list. Fully one-half of all presidents died either in office or within a decade of decamping from the White House. Favorites like Abraham Lincoln, Franklin Delano Roosevelt and John F. Kennedy died as presidents, and others, including near-greats Woodrow Wilson, Ronald Reagan and Lyndon B. Johnson, suffered health problems that severely constrained their post-presidential activities.

As one study shows, the presidents most likely to engage in ambitious post-presidencies were those who either resigned or failed to win re-election. Consider, for example, Richard M. Nixon's purposeful post-presidency: In addition to writing several books, he represented presidents abroad in sticky diplomatic situations and became a respected elder statesman.

Our greatest ex-presidents have engaged in important work, sometimes at a level that rivaled their accomplishments in the White House. Our worst ex-presidents, on the other hand, have been noteworthy for taking strong positions against the national interest and consistently undermining their successors for personal and political reasons.

If Mr. Obama seeks an alternative to Mr. Clinton's path, George H. W. Bush offers a model. He has been the very picture of post-presidential dignity, retiring to Houston, where he is loath to criticize his successors or appear on the national stage, except for the occasional birthday sky-dive or to raise funds for natural disaster relief.

President Obama would do well to chart an active course that makes a difference but avoids partisan entanglements and financial controversy.

N.H. political veterans talk about what it takes to throw a good campaign event // Concord Monitor // Casey McDermott - May 24, 2015

If you're a presidential candidate looking to make your mark in New Hampshire, the old adage rings true: Location, location, location.

There's no shortage of iconic campaign stops that have produced legendary primary moments over the years, but when voters show up to a town hall, a house party, a Politics and Eggs breakfast, a parade or any other pre-planned event, they're only seeing half of it.

Just about any veteran strategist who's navigated the Granite State campaign trail agrees that a location can say a lot about a candidate.

"You can tell a lot about a candidate's strategy – where they think their voters are – by where they go," said veteran Republican strategist Tom Rath.

As much as the place itself, a good campaign stop is also about the people who show up or lend a hand behind the scenes, about the potential for photo ops, about the press access, about the broader message, about paying homage to New Hampshire traditions without revisiting the same list of places candidates have been frequenting for decades.

"New Hampshire primary history is filled with really historic and meaningful sites, it is a challenge to find the right balance," said Jim Merrill, who's handled his fair share of location scouting assignments through the years and serves as a senior adviser to Marco Rubio's campaign. "The challenge and the joy of each cycle is finding the new places folks haven't gone to before."

There are places like the Merrimack VFW post or the Old Bow Town Hall — no better way to illustrate a candidate's appreciation for New Hampshire's civically active electorate than to meet them at one of these community institutions.

Then there are the greasy spoons and cafes: Chez Vachon, the Red Arrow, the Tilt'n Diner and the like. Candidates are almost guaranteed to find people who otherwise might not attend a political event, and it makes for a fun photo op. There's little control over who's in the room, and these can yield especially unscripted moments with voters. And those who don't win the presidency can at least get their name or campaign sticker adorned on a booth.

Large rallies like the ones held in the past at the State House, Concord High School or local colleges attract plenty of attention in the media and otherwise, but these venues come with some risk as candidates have to place bets on whether they'll draw large enough crowds to fill the space.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the summer, candidates benefit from the state's lineup of parades and festivals – which offer great exposure and require little energy from campaign staff. Candidates often just have to show up, shake hands and smile.

And for more formal policy conversations, presidential hopefuls can tailor "roundtable" discussions to suit their intended themes: a community college to talk about education, a high tech company to talk about business or energy, a defense firm to talk about national security, and so on.

And that thrill Merrill mentioned about finding just the right New Hampshire spot for a presidential candidate's appearance crosses party lines. Mike Vlacich, who's leading Hillary Clinton's team in New Hampshire after years of working on local campaigns, approaches the challenge with equal enthusiasm.

"What I like about this cycle is the conversations both parties are having about how to bring candidates back to the living room and back to the small businesses," Vlacich said. "While there is always going to be a role for the large venues. . . . What's important is that we're all working hard to get back to a place where we can keep the primary unique and special and having the candidates have a conversation with people, not talk at people."

The way Executive Councilor Colin Van Ostern sees it, the candidates who visit New Hampshire can be broken up into three tiers. There's the first tier, the lowest: These are the ones who focus mostly on optics, using the state "as a backdrop for the national media." Then there's the next level: These ones recognize that the first-in-the-nation primary state gives them an opportunity to "shake a lot of hands and meet a lot of people," and to make a dent in their standing. "That's valuable," Van Ostern noted, "because we're not a big state."

And then there are, in his eyes, the top-tier candidates: the ones who take the time to do more than shake hands and take pictures, and use it as a chance to really listen.

"Not only does it help them win over New Hampshire voters," said Van Ostern, a Hillary Clinton supporter whose resume includes work on a few high-profile campaigns, "but it makes them a better candidate."

Advice for beginners: Try 'borrowing' a crowd

New Hampshire is especially well-suited for underdogs who might not have the kind of staff and resources to launch a campaign with lots of bells and whistles.

"Oftentimes, you'll see candidates borrowing someone else's crowd," said Fergus Cullen, a former state Republican Party chairman who's working on a book about the history of the New Hampshire primary.

Local civic organizations – like, say, a rotary club or a VFW post – can help on this front. Often, these groups can also boost a candidate's turnout by spreading the word to their existing members and encouraging them to share with their networks.

Likewise, Cullen and other strategists said, long-running traditions like "Politics and Eggs" can be ideal for candidates in the early stages of a campaign. That event, hosted by the New Hampshire Institute of Politics and the New England Council, has the added benefit of bringing out people from both parties – regardless of who's speaking.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Those are great events for the beginning of a campaign and newer candidates,” said Terry Shumaker, a Hillary Clinton supporter and a former co-chair of Bill Clinton’s campaign in New Hampshire. “It doesn’t take a lot of staff. The event is built – you just pretty much have to show up, make your remarks and take questions.”

These pre-packaged events, however, can only take a candidate so far.

“The real point of graduation is, can they start doing events where they’re responsible for their own audience?” Cullen added. “Some of them never get to that point.”

Setting the stage

Back in the 1960s, when Rath was getting his start working on political campaigns as a student at Dartmouth, his pre-event responsibilities mostly consisted of showing up somewhere in Grafton County a few hours before the event and making some coffee.

“The advance was not nearly as glamorous,” he said, now with the benefit of decades of presidential campaigns under his belt.

Today, Rath and others said campaigns live and die by their ability to solicit interest and size up a potential crowd before an event even begins. A candidate can use his or her list of supporters (or in some cases, a list of voters rented from another campaign) to send invitations to precisely the kind of voters they want to attend.

“It’s not just where you go, it’s how you get the people in the room that you want there,” Rath said. “That’s become much more focused and pinpointed as we have data. ‘Oh, you should call Voter X because he or she is likely to be a Romney supporter.’ ”

With larger venues, it becomes especially important for campaigns to figure out how many people they think they can get to show up. Too few people to fill a room, and they risk looking like they’re lacking interest.

“You want to make the point that you are cresting here, that you have momentum,” Rath said.

Too many people, on the other hand, and they run the risk of getting into trouble with local authorities. Though, as Shumaker can attest, that’s not always necessarily a bad thing.

Recalling a Clinton campaign event back in October 1991 at a Merrimack venue, Shumaker said: “The place was so full you couldn’t move, the fire marshal threatened to close the event down.” When the press heard about it and pushed out reports over the wires, he said, “the national campaign was ecstatic.”

Both Rath and Shumaker said it’s important, too, to strike a balance between creating an environment that allows for robust press coverage without allowing the media circus to overtake the event. Clinton’s team used a press pooling system to cover some of the private stops during her first New Hampshire visits, and other campaigns’ staffers have privately floated the possibility of pooling events to keep the media logistics more manageable.

“You don’t want the gaggle to get in the way of the others, you’ve got to think that through. You want the coverage, but you don’t want to make the voters unhappy with it,” Rath said. “You’ve got to be very careful with the care and feeding of the press.”

Scaling back

The Clinton campaign, in particular, has drawn some criticism for its approach thus far on the campaign trail. During her first visit to New Hampshire as a 2016 presidential candidate, Clinton stuck to small gatherings at supporters' homes, roundtables at a small business and NHTI, and a meeting with Democratic legislators at the party's headquarters in Concord this time around.

The contrast between 2008 and 2016 isn't lost on the campaign or its closest supporters. Last time around, Clinton launched her campaign here with larger public events. Vlacich says the initial roll-out with smaller events is meant to breed more meaningful discussions.

"While that might result in us not necessarily being able to see thousands of people as you would in a gym, you're able to have that more intense conversation," Vlacich said.

Shumaker, who's been through campaign cycles with both Clintons, said balancing the need for a certain level of security with access is a challenge – but not necessarily a new one. When Bill Clinton was running for re-election in the mid-1990s, Shumaker said, the president's secret service teams came up with all sorts of new security approaches to allow him to mingle with crowds without being too inhibited by bodyguards.

Now, Shumaker said Hillary Clinton's high profile – and a heightened sensitivity to security, overall – also necessitates a certain layer of protection for the candidate.

"You just have to grin and bear it," Shumaker said. "It's a sign of the times. We're learning how to work with it."

Playing host

Outside of diner stops or town halls, there's also the living rooms, the backyards and – in some cases – the barnyards. For candidates who are really looking to solidify their first-in-the-nation credentials, it's hard to overstate the importance of getting an influential local to invite them into their home.

These events are ideal for making personal connections with potential voters who can then go and tell all of their friends about the presidential hopeful they just met, strategists on both sides say.

"If a really important supporter or somebody you want to be a supporter wants you to do a house party at (their) house, it would probably be unwise not to do it," Shumaker said. "And also people are generally able to make sure that house is full."

If that supporter also happens to own one of New Hampshire's famous political farms, even better. Luckily for those on both sides, each party has one of their own: For the Democrats, it's been former State senator Peter Burling's farm in Cornish; for Republicans, it's been former state lawmakers' Doug and Stella Scamman's farm in Stratham. These settings can offer the best elements of a New Hampshire campaign – a connection to a politically active host, an atmosphere that feels personal but still offers plenty of space for crowds, and a great backdrop for photos.

In Burling's case, the events at his place also acted as prime fund-raising opportunities for the House Democratic Caucus. When it came to preparing food, setting up chairs or otherwise preparing, Burling also said he was lucky to have plenty of help.

“At the very least there were 100 active Democrats who were eager to help and participate in whatever event there was,” Burling said. “I started out with one of the largest armies of volunteers anybody in the country could assemble.”

Doug Scamman said he hasn’t yet finalized plans to host another party at his farm this year.

“People keep asking me if we’re going to, we haven’t decided whom we’re going to support yet,” he said in an interview a few weeks ago.

Like Burling, he doesn’t see the ordeal of hosting candidates to be too much of a burden, and he likes giving crowds – in one case, several thousand who turned out to see George W. Bush – another chance to see a candidate.

“I think people put a little stock in the fact that we’ve studied candidates and we feel strongly about it,” Scamman said. “To allow people who come and listen to see what candidates have to say, and they decide if they agree with us or not.”

And while Burling said he, too, hasn’t finalized any plans for hosting a party this year, he’s watching eagerly as the Democratic field – while substantially smaller than the Republican one – starts to take shape.

“One of the reasons I’m so delighted to see Bernie Sanders and Martin O’Malley get into the Democratic primary – that’s going to make all of this possible,” Burling said of traditional New Hampshire campaign festivities. “Otherwise, I think it’s very easy to have Secretary Clinton’s campaign become a scripted, controlled event.”

France Laying Groundwork to Recognize 'Palestine'

Indications the French do not intend to bring a Middle East peace resolution to the UN Security Council in the coming months were strengthened Tuesday after Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius met his Palestinian Authority counterpart and made no mention of the resolution in a statement after the meeting. Following a meeting in Paris between Fabius and PA Foreign Minister Riad al-Malki, the French Foreign Ministry issued a statement that indicated Paris was beginning to set the groundwork for future French recognition of "Palestine." "The meeting," according to the statement "also provided an opportunity to prepare for the first French-Palestinian intergovernmental seminar, the first session of which will be aimed at strengthening our relations in the political, economic and cultural spheres."

US may Pull Out Sinai Force Keeping IL-Egypt Peace

The Obama administration is quietly reviewing the future of America's three-decade deployment to Egypt's Sinai Peninsula, fearful the lightly equipped peacekeepers could be targets of escalating Islamic State-inspired violence. Options range from beefing up their protection or even pulling them out altogether, officials told The Associated Press. The American forces have helped marshal peace in the peninsula since Egypt's 1979 historic peace treaty with Israel. They mainly monitor and verify compliance, and have little offensive capability. Egypt has battled militants in northern Sinai for years, but attacks against its military and police have expanded since the July 2013 coup of Islamist President Mohammed Morsi. Egypt's army under current President Sissi is trying to snuff out the insurgency. For the United States, the fighting is troublesome, centered in the heart of the volatile Middle East near key maritime trading routes and alongside the most durable peace yet established between Israel and an Arab state. And it risks putting the so-called Multinational Force and Observers in the cross-hairs.

Pal. Hunger Striker: Resolve my Case or back to Fast

Palestinian security prisoner on a two-month hunger strike emerged from a coma Tuesday and warned he will step up his fast if Israel does not resolve his case within 24 hours, a Palestinian group said. The detainee, 31-year-old Mohammed Allaan, "declared in front of his doctors that if there is not any solution to his case within 24 hours he will ask for all treatment to stop and will stop drinking water," the Palestinian Prisoners' Club said in a statement. A lawyer by profession, Allaan has been held in administrative detention — a preventative security measure when intelligence suggests suspects may be involved in terror activities — since last November over his alleged membership in the Islamic Jihad terror group. He has been on hunger strike since June 18, taking only water, and lost consciousness Friday morning at the Barzilai Medical Center in Ashkelon, where he is being treated. Allaan was awakened from his coma and his condition has stabilized, doctors at Barzilai said Tuesday. Doctors had been giving Allaan water and salts intravenously, and he had also been connected to a respirator.

Five Israelis Hurt from Stones in East Jerusalem

A bus and two private cars were pelted with stones on Tuesday evening in the At-Tur neighborhood in East Jerusalem, leaving five people lightly wounded. One Arab Israeli and four Jewish Israelis, passengers who were on the bus, were wounded. Three Jewish teens aged 16-17 who were lightly hurt from broken glass, and a woman in her 50s from At-Tur, were taken to the Hadassah Medical Center in Jerusalem's Ein Karem. A fifth person was very lightly hurt and was not taken to hospital. Damage was caused to the windshields of the vehicles. Israeli security forces were searching the area for the perpetrators.

Jerusalem Post

US 'Concerned' over Treatment of Arab-Americans

US State Department spokesman John Kirby on Tuesday expressed concern over the treatment of Palestinian-Americans traveling to Israel. According to the US State Department's website, "many Palestinian nationals or dual nationals seeking to enter via Ben-Gurion have been sent back to the United States upon arrival." "Others have been allowed to enter Israel but told they cannot depart Israel via Ben-Gurion without special permission, which is rarely granted," the website explains. "The US government seeks equal treatment and freedom to travel for all US citizens regardless of national origin or ethnicity," Kirby announced. "Specifically, the US government remains concerned at the unequal treatment that Palestinian-Americans receive at Israel's borders and checkpoints."

Zionist Union: Talk of Ashkenazi Joining 'Premature'

Even though recent days have seen senior officials from the Zionist Union party issue calls to former Israel Defense Force Chief-of-Staff Gabi Ashkenazi to join the party, a senior party official clarified Tuesday that as of now, no negotiations were taking place with the retired general. The offers extended to Ashkenazi were contingent on him being cleared of wrongdoing by the attorney general in what has been called the "Harpaz affair" in which claims were made that documents were forged in order to prevent now Construction Minister Yoav Galant from succeeding Ashkenazi as head of Israel's military. "As long as the attorney general hasn't made the final decision not to prosecute (Ashkenazi) there is nothing to talk about. It's premature. As far as I know, no one is holding substantial talks with him on our behalf," said the senior official.

Huckabee in Israel: 'Lose the Land, Lose the Peace'

Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee reiterated Israel's connection to Judea and Samaria, and stated that peace cannot be possible with ongoing incitement in Palestinian schools, during a special interview with Ynet on Wednesday. Huckabee dismissed criticism of Israel's settlement policy, saying, "I would love to see a true peace in the world, but the question is does Israel have a right to build bedrooms for the expanding number of people who are coming here, who are making aliyah, to make sure there people have a secure land they can defend; I don't know why anyone on this earth would think that they should surrender that right. "Land for peace has not worked for Israel, They lose the land and they lose the peace."

Netanyahu Scoring an Own Goal against Israel with Danon Appointment

Danny Danon is as right wing as one can be: He opposes the two-state solution, wants to annex the entire West Bank but give no civil rights to the Palestinians and in general, he's the wet dream of every Israeli hater. So why is Netanyahu sending him to represent Israel at the UN?

By Ben Dror Yemini

Danny Danon is a serious man, who has a very clear and solid worldviews. He's not just another right-winger, he is the rightest of the right. He supports annexing the territories; he supports the further expansion of settlements, and not just in the main blocs; he is actually against the term "settlement blocs"; he is against the two-state solution; he staged a campaign against Netanyahu's too soft - in his opinion - policy against Hamas; and above all, Danon is a perfect representation of the wet dream of every Israeli hater. This is how they love to hate us. Now, Danon is moving to Israel's display window. They can't possible ask for a better gift.

Danon caused quite a lot of problems for Netanyahu in the Likud party, so Netanyahu had to get rid of him. When faced with the choice between Netanyahu's narrow political interests and Israel's national interests - Netanyahu once again chose Netanyahu. Israel loses.

It's not that an excellent ambassador at the UN, a combination of Abba Eban and Yaakov Herzog, would have made Sweden vote in favor of Israel. But Israel's ambassador to the UN is a sort of a symbol. So far, Danon represented the dazed right wing, now he's representing Israel.

Ron Prosor, the current ambassador, is doing an amazing job. He's not nice, professionally. Far from it. He knows how to be blunt and aggressive. But he also knows that speaking in support of outposts, for example, is like scoring an own goal against the national interest.

Israel is facing a massive campaign of demonization and de-legitimization, but the problem is not with the extremists in the core of the BDS movement - they're a lost cause. The fight against them, however, is not. When their true faces are revealed - they're against peace, they're against the two-state solution, they want the destruction of Israel, they lie incessantly - they can be fought against.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But what exactly is Danon going to say? That he's also against the two-state solution? That he is both in favor of annexation and against giving civil rights to Palestinians? It would be a hard sale even to the worshipers at the Orthodox synagogues of New York. But this is what Danon is selling.

Israel's biggest defenders in North America are Professor Alan Dershowitz and Irwin Cotler. They know how to deal with every claim against Israel. Well, almost. Because there is still no serious audience, and that includes supporters of Israel, that is willing to buy the positions held by our new ambassador to the UN.

Danon might have been able to serve as the Likud's emissary to the Chabad institutions in Brooklyn, but an official representative of Israel?

When Avigdor Lieberman said Israel should accept John Kerry's peace deal draft a year and a half ago, it was Danny Danon who put his foot down to Netanyahu and clarified he will not allow that to happen. When Naftali Bennett is talking about annexing Area C of the West Bank, Danon is talking about an annexation of even more territories. So Netanyahu decided to appoint him, of all people, to represent Israel?

It was only a few weeks ago that Netanyahu declared the anti-Israel campaign was a serious threat. He's right. But it was also Netanyahu that fired Danon, because he knows his positions only serve to bolster the anti-Israel campaign. It's easy to understand why Netanyahu wants to get rid of him. But why is he punishing Israel?

I wonder what's next. Is Daniella Weiss on her way to become Israel's ambassador to the European Union?

Fractured American Jewish Community Is First Victim of Iran Nuclear Deal

Netanyahu and AIPAC have sparked a battle royal of Jew vs. Jew, with the most riveting skirmishes playing out in the local Jewish Federations.

By Chemi Shalev

In the campaign to convince American Jewish groups to come out against the Iran nuclear deal, Israeli opposition leader Isaac Herzog has emerged as a strategic asset.

In some of the heated deliberations taking place in national Jewish organizations and local Jewish Federations across America, opponents of the deal with Tehran are using Herzog as a trump card to challenge the motives and loyalties of its supporters: How can a good Jew defend Obama's deal, they ask, when Herzog and the rest of Israel oppose it?

Herzog may have subsequently dissociated himself from the all-out war that Benjamin Netanyahu and AIPAC are waging against the Obama administration in Congress, but the nuance is lost in the fierce firefights that have broken out among American Jews since the July 14 Vienna signing of the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action (JCPOA) between the P5+1 countries and Iran. It is a battle royal that is taking place in the boardrooms of Jewish organizations from coast to coast, in synagogues, community centers and social gatherings, behind closed doors or out in the open, in polite debate or, increasingly, in heated emotional dispute. It pits Jews against Jews, conservatives vs. liberals, hawks and doves, Republicans and Democrats, donors against professionals, rabbis against their flock and, in recent days, against one another.

For every statement for or against there is an immediate rebuttal, for every argument a counterargument, for each manifesto a harsh rebuke. Both sides swear allegiance to the greater good of both Israel and America, but as time goes by, the acrimony grows acute, resentment festers, the bitterness strikes roots. Whether the deal is as good as the Obama administration claims or as bad as Netanyahu says, it has already claimed its first victim: a fractured American Jewish community.

Already divided in recent years against the backdrop of unprecedented tensions between Obama and Netanyahu and growing disenchantment with many Israeli policies, the community is polarizing, perhaps, as some claim, even splitting at the seams. And it is doing so out in the open, for the world to see.
Along with its internal convulsions, American Jews are also the subject of intense external scrutiny, justifiable and malicious. A few minutes after New Jersey Senator Bob Menendez predictably announced on Tuesday that he would be joining his Jewish colleague from New York Chuck Schumer in opposing the Iran deal, he was subjected to a harsh torrent of insults and diatribes on social media that were mostly anti-Jewish in nature. These manifestations of anti-Semitism are then cultivated and inflated by cynical Iran deal critics and artificially linked to legitimate if sometimes injudicious remarks made by Obama and other administration officials.

While the pro-Israel lobby ducks under cover of this alleged incitement, the community reels from the reemergence of long dormant insinuations and accusations of dual loyalties and undue influence. GOP activists, meanwhile, stoke these flames in the hope that next time around, Jews will finally see the error of their ways and vote Republican.

On the national level, AIPAC has set the tone, with mainstream organizations such as the American Jewish Committee and the Anti Defamation League following suit; J-Street and smaller organizations stand mostly alone in support of the deal. Many Jewish professionals and executives concur with criticism of the Iran deal, but even those who don't are wary of their conservative donors, whose voices are often louder and financial pressures more direct than those of their liberal counterparts. Some activists feel compelled to speak out, fearing that silence will render them irrelevant on the most dramatic Jewish issue of the day; others are wary of accusations that they were ignoring the collective opinion of Herzog and other Israelis or repeating the sins of their forefathers who stood by as the Holocaust engulfed the Jews of Europe.

The most riveting showdowns by far are taking place in the 151

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jewish Federations that have traditionally steered clear of divisive political issues, preferring to stick with fundraising for Israel and Jewish education while providing social services to their community. The Federations' foray into disputed territory has sparked dissent and outrage among Obama supporters and among some of his opponents as well: a few have threatened to reassess their contributions. Many Federation bigwigs are concurrently active in AIPAC: in recent weeks, the powerful Washington-based lobby has made a point of beginning conference calls with activists with a tally of the Federations that have joined the fight and those that are still sitting on the fence. Some Federation officials have complained of direct pressures being exerted by the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem or in its name.

To date, 18 Federations have come out against the Iran deal, with most urging their members to lobby members of Congress to vote it down. The list of fighting Federations is slightly more than 10% of the total number, but it includes most of the big hitters, including Chicago, where a fierce battle was waged between opposing sides; Los Angeles, which was forced to issue an acknowledgement of the "complexity" of the issue and the "diversity" of opinions after its original statement of opposition sparked a fierce backlash, along with Boston, Miami, Philadelphia and other major Metropolitan areas. The biggest of them all, however, the New York UJA-Federation, has decided to maintain neutrality and steer clear of the divisive battle.

It's hard to tell with which side enjoys more support in the community. The very definition of the target audience is in dispute: does it include all self-professed Jews or only those who participate in communal life or take an interest in Israel. The only reliable poll, at least in this writer's view, was conducted by Professor Steve Cohen and published in the Jewish Journal a few days after the JCPOA was signed. It showed solid support for the nuclear deal, but that was before Netanyahu, the Republicans and right wing pundits sank their teeth into it, and before AIPAC and other groups began spending tens of millions of dollars advertising its dangers and pitfalls. Among American Jews, like their Israeli brethren, fear and suspicion have a home turf advantage over optimism and hope.

Jewish officials I have spoken to in recent days are worried, perhaps even scared: they feel helpless despite the earthquake beneath their feet and the irreparable damage that it may cause. Many are frustrated that Netanyahu has chosen to lead the charge without devoting a second thought to how it might weaken the Jewish community. In a few months Netanyahu will try to enlist American Jews to do battle against the boycott movement, one senior Jewish figure told me, but he could be facing a demoralized and disoriented community that has alienated and distanced many of its members while wasting precious resources and limited goodwill on a campaign that was doomed from the outset.

Associated Press: "More Clinton White House Records to be Released"

By Ken Thomas

July 15, 2014, 12:05 p.m. EDT

The National Archives says it plans to release more documents from former President Bill Clinton's administrationon Friday, part of a months-long disbursement of White House records.

About 20,000 pages of records from Clinton's two terms have been released since February. The papers are being closely monitored by media organizations and historians as former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton considers a second presidential campaign.

About 1,000 pages of memos, transcripts and speech drafts will be disseminated Friday by the National Archives through the Clinton Presidential Library in Little Rock, Ark.

Previously released papers have shed light on the Clinton administration's unsuccessful attempt to overhaul the health care system, Republicans' sweeping victories in the 1994 mid-term elections and Bill Clinton's handling of foreign policy.

Washington Post: "Leading the State Department's 'Virtual Student Foreign Service' internship program"

By Partnership for Public Service

July 15, 2014, 9:56 a.m. EDT

For the past four years, 32 year-old Bridget Roddy has been the mastermind behind a Department of State internship program that enables students to work virtually on projects in countries as far flung as Azerbaijan, Bahrain, Botswana, Cambodia and Egypt.

Launched by former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, the Virtual Student Foreign Service is an eInternship program that enables college and graduate students to engage with the department's ongoing diplomatic efforts. Since the program's inception, more than 1,200 eInterns have made vital contributions to the mission and work of the State Department.

"The Virtual Student Foreign Service is a key tool to drive innovation, support new initiatives and bring in fresh ideas and perspectives to government by tapping in to an immense resource pool of talented volunteers – U.S. students," said Roddy.

Students work remotely an average of 10 hours per week on their eInternship projects, which last the duration of the academic year running from fall through spring semesters. Roddy said the flexibility of the program enables students to continue with their classes, work and other commitments.

The scope of work can range from research and analysis, redesigning websites, building a mobile app or contributing to reports on a wide-range of issues such as human rights, economics and the environment.

Past projects include researching and drafting public health information to communicate about emerging diseases to the Vietnamese people, identifying strategies to improve scientific collaboration between the United States and Mongolia, facilitating weekly, virtual meet-ups to identify and discuss journalism trends with Egyptian youth, and digitally mapping the dangerous effects of air pollution in south China mainland.

Projects for the upcoming academic year range from creating a database of Bahrain's publicly available economic data and covering Botswana's general elections to conducting research and analysis related to Cambodia's migrant labor force.

"The Virtual Student Foreign Service has opened up a pool of students to us who may not have the financial means to participate in a full-time internship in D.C," said Dan Sheerin, who heads the State Department's diplomatic innovation division. "These students are bringing in new perspectives, ideas and skills and are helping the department do some significant initiatives that we wouldn't have the capacity to do without them."

Applications are currently open on USAJOBS.gov for the 2014-2015 academic year, and there are 323 projects available, which Roddy said is 50 more than last year.

Roddy also noted that applications have almost doubled every year since the program's launch.

"The program started with one sentence and now has grown to be the largest virtual internship program at State," she said.

"This program had a very limited start, and Bridget has been instrumental in making it much larger and much more successful. She did that through hard work, some creative thinking, collaboration and innovation," said Sheerin.

Sheerin said one reason for this growth is due to Roddy's idea to expand the program to 11 agencies that have overseas activities, including the U.S. Agency for International Development, Environmental Protection Agency, Smithsonian Institution and National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

"People want to be part of this because they understand the opportunity it provides to bring students in to help further the diplomatic efforts of our colleagues working on the ground around the world," said Sheerin.

Roddy, whose father was in the Foreign Service, has always wanted to find new ways of supporting and contributing to the important work of the State Department. Roddy strongly believes her work leading the Virtual Student Foreign Service is allowing her to do this.

"Through this program, young people with diverse backgrounds are introduced to the work of the State Department and the broad career opportunities. The program also encourages participation by civil society. It is one more way students can participate in government and we can all benefit greatly by their participation."

Politico: "Mideast crisis strains Clinton legacy"

By Katie Glueck

July 15, 2014, 11:03 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton often points to the 2012 cease-fire between Israel and Hamas as one of her biggest accomplishments as secretary of state.

She may have to add an asterisk to that story.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The truce Clinton helped forge has fallen apart less than two years later, and Israel and the Palestinian militant group that runs the Gaza Strip are again deep in military conflict. The parties briefly considered a ceasefire agreement from Egypt, but by Tuesday morning it looked unlikely to take hold, and hostilities continued.

The developments over the last several days underscore the challenge Clinton faces should she try to use her State Department record as a plank on which to run for president. With crises flaring up all over the world, foreign policy achievements are often fleeting. In Clinton's case, some of her proudest moments have the potential to be tarnished by events beyond her control.

Clinton's efforts to reset the U.S. relationship with Russia, for example, were once billed as a success. She has since had to defend that approach, especially following Russian President Vladimir Putin's aggressive steps against Ukraine, and she now criticizes Putin at every turn. Negotiations over Iran's nuclear program are another case where she continues to walk a fine line: on one hand touting success in bringing Tehran to the table; on the other, expressing skepticism about the still-unfolding talks, creating distance for herself should they fail.

When it comes to the Israelis and Palestinians, close observers say Clinton achieved what was possible then in a complicated, often-cyclical conflict, and that that's how she should frame her record.

"I think she can talk about it in terms of what the context was at the time, what the reality of Gaza [was]" said Dennis Ross, a veteran Middle East hand who served as a special adviser to Clinton at State. "And the fact that there are no simple answers to Gaza."

Ziad Asali, the president of the American Task Force on Palestine, echoed that sentiment: "She could point to [the cease-fire] as an accomplishment … But it is an accomplishment that did not stand the test of time."

Clinton was a highly visible secretary of state who logged visits to 112 countries during her four years on the job, often trying to repair relationships strained under the Bush administration. Insulated from the political fray, Clinton saw her approval ratings soar during her time at Foggy Bottom.

Foreign policy analysts are now debating her legacy, with some calling her among America's best-ever secretaries of state and others arguing that she lacks a signature achievement or doctrine.

Clinton has laid out her side in her new memoir, "Hard Choices," which recounts her State Department days. The book offers a detailed account of the final moments leading up to the 2012 cease-fire agreement, a deal in which the Egyptian government, led then by the Muslim Brotherhood's Mohamed Morsi, played a crucial role. That year, after days of clashes between Hamas militants and Israel, the latter looked poised for a ground invasion into Gaza as retaliation for Hamas rockets aimed at Israeli cities.

The Clinton memoir's section on the cease-fire highlights anxieties that persisted about such a deal, noting that she wondered at the time "how long — or even if — the cease-fire would hold," concluding the chapter on the issue by noting that it "held better than anyone expected."

On her book tour in the United State and Europe, and in several speeches before the book's release, she has singled out the deal repeatedly as one of which she is particularly proud — and still intact. In a C-SPAN interview that aired over the July 4 weekend, right before hostilities broke out in a concerted fashion, Clinton was asked about her "favorite" story from the book. She offered several anecdotes, but noted the Gaza ceasefire first.

"It was a very tense period of time and we were successful," she said. "We got an agreement, we got a cease-fire and to this day it has held, but it's the kind of story that could have gone wrong at any point."

The new fighting between Israel and Hamas was triggered by the kidnapping and murder of three Israeli teens, followed by the apparent retaliatory killing of a Palestinian teen. Israel has launched airstrikes in Gaza, while Hamas is fighting with rockets. Israel's security cabinet on Tuesday accepted a ceasefire proposal laid out by Egypt, but Hamas rejected it, saying it hadn't been consulted, and fighting continued.

Clinton hasn't publicly offered her prescription for today's situation in the Middle East. But one Clinton adviser said that the duration of the cease-fire she helped achieve last time was fairly standard for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, where attempts to reach a lasting peace deal have gone nowhere in recent years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

William Daroff, the senior vice president for public policy at the Jewish Federations of North America, said Clinton deserves credit for 18 months of "relative peace."

"Eighteen months is better than 17 months," Daroff said. "But there was never the expectation that this would be the peace to end all peaces."

The situation in Gaza and Israel comes amid deepening turmoil in Iraq, Syria and other parts of the Middle East.

Khaled Elgindy, a fellow at the Brookings Institution who has advised the Palestinians in negotiations with Israel, said that the last ceasefire was "important, to the extent that it was adhered to," though he gave the lion's share of the credit to the Egyptians.

"The process repeatedly fails," Elgindy said. The U.S. has frequently sought to serve as a peace broker, so it "has to share some of the blame. That includes Hillary Clinton as well as her boss, President Obama, and her successor, John Kerry, and their predecessors, going back to President Clinton and before that. There are historical problems with the way the U.S. has managed this process and we need to acknowledge those."

Nonetheless, having gone through that cease-fire negotiation, Clinton can present herself as someone with the fortitude to take on the challenge posed by the seemingly endless conflict, said Michael Oren, who was serving as Israel's ambassador to the United States in 2012.

Oren, now the ambassador-in-residence at the Atlantic Council, praised Clinton as "very formidable and indefatigable" during the last crisis.

"We can judge — we have to judge — her accomplishments by what was achievable then," he said. The "fact that [the cease-fire] hasn't held up is no reflection on her, because there's always going to be a breakdown, eventually, with anything in this area."

National Review: "Charlie Cook: 40 Percent Chance Hillary Doesn't Run"

By John Fund

July 15, 2014, 10:32 a.m. EDT

Analyst Charlie Cook, a 40-year veteran of Washington politics who often reflects the consensus of political handicappers in Washington, told a National Journal audience in Washington today that he is increasing the chances that Hillary Clinton doesn't seek the Democratic nomination in 2016 to 40 percent, up from 30 percent. "She didn't have a great time on the book tour, and people in their late 60s usually don't make a nine-year commitment (to run and serve as president) easily," he said. He described running for president in the modern era as "a horrific marathon process of groveling to people you may not even like."

A 2016 campaign without Hillary would open up the Democratic nomination to candidates ranging from Massachusetts senator Elizabeth Warren and Maryland governor Martin O'Malley on the left to former Indiana senator Evan Bayh (who expressed interest in running last week) on the right.

Cook also said he would be surprised if Jeb Bush ran for the Republican nomination in 2016 because the party's base "is moving away from him on the two issues he cares about most: immigration and education with a strong element of support for the Common Core in it." Cook also said that the weak economy and President Obama's failure to accomplish more in office gives Republicans a 60 percent chance of retaking the U.S. Senate this fall.

Washington Post opinion: Catherine Rampell: "Celebrities — Chelsea Clinton or Kim Kardashian — are paid what the market will bear"

By Catherine Rampell

July 14, 2014, 8:08 p.m. EDT

Talons drawn, the media have descended upon Chelsea Clinton. Again.

Not for her frizzy hair, now smoothed with a killer blowout, or for that preteen metal mouth, now braces-free and pearly white.

This time the attacks are over how much money she makes — for her network television fluff pieces and well-attended gigs on the lecture circuit — despite her stick-thin résumé.

"The former First Daughter has never run for office, held a public policy job or done philanthropic work outside her family business," sneered the New York Daily News. "But that hasn't stopped the speaking fees from rolling in — along with a reported $600,000 salary as 'special correspondent' for NBC News."

Likewise, upon learning that Clinton Fille pulls in $75,000 per speaking engagement, the New York Times's Maureen Dowd asked, "Why on earth is she worth that much money? Why, given her dabbling in management consulting, hedge-funding and coattail-riding, is an hour of her time valued at an amount that most Americans her age don't make in a year?"

To which my reaction is: Since when do you need talent or skills to be a well-paid celebrity?

Lest there be any confusion, most compensation — but especially compensation that's accompanied by a flock of flashbulbs — is determined not by some intrinsic measure of worldly achievement or moral worth but by what the market will bear.

Witness famous-for-being-famous reality star Kim Kardashian.

Kardashian vastly out-earns Clinton and more accomplished public figures such as Nobel laureate Toni Morrison. The new Mrs. Kanye West charges $100,000 per appearance, according to the fine celebrity journalists at OK! Magazine, and at those gigs no one even expects her to deliver prepared remarks on eradicating waterborne illnesses or racial tensions. (In fact, it wouldn't surprise me if her contracts explicitly forbid such pontification.) On some occasions, Kardashian has commanded as much as $500,000, her reported payout for attending the recent Vienna Opera Ball. It's not clear what talents Kardashian possesses that make her "worth" $500,000 per appearance, except maybe a talent for identifying people willing to pay her $500,000 per appearance.

It's more than that, of course. Hollywood celebrities like Kardashian — and political personalities like Clinton or Sarah Palin — can command big appearance fees because the organizations hiring them derive some value from the appearance, too.

Several years ago, I did a back-of-the-envelope calculation to determine why nightclubs might be paying "Jersey Shore" starlet Nicole "Snooki" Polizzi the head-scratchingly high fee of $25,000 merely to drink, dance and socialize for a few hours. It turned out that once you took into account the extra revenue streams that Snooki's name brought in — from cover charges, bottle service and publicity in glossy magazines — her attendance might actually have been worth several multiples of what she charged clubs.

The exact numbers probably no longer hold up today, since in recent years Snooki's star, if not her tan, has faded. But the same principles apply to other celebrities and political scions getting big bucks for appearances on TV and red-carpet events.

After all, having a brand name like Chelsea Clinton keynote your conference or college lecture series can attract better attendance, bigger donations and more press coverage. Televising her recognizable visage can likewise draw in valuable eyeballs. Same goes for other politicians' children, such as Jenna Bush Hager, Meghan McCain and Ron Reagan, who have also been paid contributors for the NBC family of channels. What these political starlets lack in actual journalistic training they make up for in name recognition and precious political connections, both of which — fairly or not — are highly valuable to broadcast outlets.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Whatever the optics, I don't begrudge Kardashian or Clinton the money they can make by charging the market rate for their services; I instead blame audiences for endowing these celebrity brands with value and cash-strapped state schools for wasting money on star appearances that could instead be used for scholarships.

If there is any objection I have to Clinton's speaking gigs, it's not the size of her paycheck. It's the possibility that her hosts and employers are hiring her in order to buy influence with a possible future president (Clinton Mère), an aspect of Chelsea Clinton's lucrative speaking career that for some reason has not been emphasized in most media reports. This possibility is particularly troubling given the family's resistance during the 2008 primaries to releasing information about donations to the Clinton Foundation, where Clinton's speaking fees reportedly go. When it comes to the Clintons, exposure is easy to come by; transparency, less so.

Schenectady Daily Gazette (N.Y.): "Tickets go fast to see Clinton in Saratoga"

By Justin Mason

July 15, 2014

On foot several blocks away and with only minutes remaining before the Northshire Bookstore's scheduled opening Monday, Teri Morrow wasn't leaving anything to chance.

The city resident figured tickets for former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton's book signing later this month would go fast and that she might not have enough hustle to get there while some were still left.

At a red light, she politely knocked on a random motorist's window and asked if she could get a lift down to the store.

Hitching a ride turned out to be overkill: Morrow easily nabbed two copies of Clinton's memoir, "Hard Choices," after waiting in line for only about five minutes. But that didn't diminish her enthusiasm to see the first lady-turned-New York senator-turned-member of the Obama cabinet.

"I think she's very Machiavellian," Morrow said outside the bookstore. "My god, she's done a lot in her life. She's an impressive person."

Only 1,000 tickets were available for the signing and they were going fast Monday morning. A crowd of roughly three dozen people was waiting outside the Broadway entrance to purchase the book to receive the complimentary ticket.

Within the first hour of business, Northshire had already sold 200 copies of the political memoir, which has been at the top of the New York Times best-seller list. By later afternoon, 500 more copies had been sold.

Tight Controls

The event will be tightly controlled. Customers must have a ticket, wristband and Clinton's book to enter onto the line; there's also a limit of one signature per customer, with no personalization.

People attending the signing won't be allowed to pose for pictures with Clinton, but can take a photograph from a designated area in the store. And no bags or personal items will be allowed in the event space.

Though Clinton is no stranger to Saratoga Springs -- she made several appearances as the state's junior senator and again as head of the State Department -- her visit this time around comes as she's the presumptive favorite to run for president on the Democratic ticket in 2016. A Quinnipiac University National Poll conducted last week found that 58 percent of Democrat or Democratic-leaning voters would select her in a primary over U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, Vice President Joe Biden and New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo.

Clinton was also given the edge over potential Republican candidates. U.S. Rep. Paul Ryan and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush -- both trailing Clinton by seven percentage points -- were the closest potential GOP rivals, according to the poll.

No doubt, Clinton's chances at becoming the nation's first female commander-in-chief resonated with Northshire customers rushing to the store after it publicly announced her book signing Monday morning. Joan Malone of East Greenbush bought a pair of the books for her adult sons, one of whom is Phillip Malone, a Democratic candidate for the state's 107th Assembly District this fall.

"It's very exciting" she said. "She could be our next president."

Clinton, who still hasn't indicated whether she'll run for the Oval Office, launched her memoir with a flurry of signings last month. Many of her large-city signings drew large crowds, including at a Barnes & Noble in New York City, where customers lined up more than eight hours in advance of her appearance.

Since the book's release June 10, Clinton has done signings from coast to coast. Some media pundits have already likened the events to a thinly-veiled trial run for her presidential campaign.

But if "Hard Choices" is a precursor, Clinton might want to consider retooling her strategy. A Boston Globe reviewer described it as "a book that is destined to be purchased but not read, a volume given but not opened."

"It may even sell a lot of copies, but only because a good number of people may be willing to spend $35 for the privilege of joining the queue at Costco for a brisk hello and an India-ink autograph on the title page," wrote Globe reviewer David Shribman last month.

Intriguing Figure

Indeed, customers at Northshire seemed more intrigued about the prospect of meeting Clinton than the content of her memoir. Amy Marlette of Ballston Spa purchased one copy when the store first opened, only to venture back an hour later for second -- a copy so her wife could also meet Clinton.

"I'll probably have to come back for two more books later," she said, alluding to a pair of family members who she predicted will also want to see Clinton.

For Sue Paciola of Broadablin, the book was an impulse buy. She was browsing through Northshire when she heard about Clinton's forthcoming appearance.

"But I'd also like to see what she has to offer," she said of the book.

Newsday: "Schumer disputes claim he coached Lazio vs. Hillary Clinton"

In 2000, Sen. Charles Schumer so feared being upstaged by Hillary Clinton that he coached her GOPopponent for senator from New York, Rick Lazio.

That's the claim of Lazio, according to a new anti-Clinton book to be published July 22 -- and Schumer denies it.

Lazio has not responded to an email query.

The book is "Clinton, Inc.: The Audacious Rebuilding of a Political Machine, " by Daniel Halper, the online editor of the neocon Weekly Standard.

According to the NY Post story by its Washington bureau chief Geoff Earle, Lazio said: "I thought he was generally . . . He was supportive. Quite helpful to me behind the scenes and encouraging."

Not so, said Schumer spokeswoman Meredith Kelly.

"Sen. Schumer was a die-hard Hillary supporter from the moment she announced she was running for the Senate. He and Mr. Lazio had a fine relationship and worked well together in the New York delegation, but Mr. Lazio's recollection of the campaign just doesn't match reality," she said.

Here's Obama in 2007:

Barack Obama, 2007

Thank you so much. To the great Governor of Iowa and Lieutenant. Governor of Iowa. To my dear friend Tom Harkin for the outstanding work that he does. To the congressional delegation of Iowa that is doing outstanding work and to Nancy Pelosi , Madam Speaker, thank you all for the wonderful welcome and the wonderful hospitality.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

McCain Spokesperson Avoids Question on Gas Prices (MSNBC 08/05/08 7:38am)
NICOLE WALLACE: […] John McCain would fire, in a nanosecond, anyone that dared to play the race card […] John McCain is very hopeful. He said last Friday that he's looking to the future and he hopes that, from this point forward [race] will not be a factor.

JOE SCARBOROUGH: Some republicans think the ads with Britney Spears and Paris Hilton are childish, that it's unbecoming of a presidential candidate […]. Should a presidential candidate really run those types of ads […]?

WALLACE: John McCain is anything but not childish. He is trying to have a deadly serious argument about how crucial it is that we begin drilling now […].

SCARBOROUGH: […] Why do you have to have Paris Hilton in an energy ad?

MIKA BRZEZINSKY: Why do you have to have two skanky celebrities? […]

WALLACE: We were not making a point about pornography. We were making a point about drilling and we were making a point about taxes —

BRZEZINSKY: Using two skanky celebrities.

WALLACE: Here we are talking about it seven days later. The ad was meant to draw our attention to what we think is a real gap between his celebrity and his ability to draw 200,000 screaming Europeans and being wrong on the policies that people care about.

MIKE BARNICLE: […] Does John McCain see the ads before they hit the air?

WALLACE: Sure. This is his campaign. You know, I think this is something he's involved in in every level […].

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BARNICLE: So he knew who Paris Hilton—he saw that and said, you know….

WALLACE: Sure.

SCARBOROUGH: Not on the internet, but he had heard. His staffers had told him—don't let him admit again that he doesn't—

BRZEZINSKI: I just don't think Paris Hilton or whatever the other one is would generate a crowd of 200,000 in Berlin to listen about the world.

[…]

SCARBOROUGH: […] John McCain is still saying, still believing that Barack Obama would rather lose a war in Iraq if that's what was required to win the presidency.

WALLACE: Mmhmm.

SCARBOROUGH: That's extraordinarily harsh. Do you really believe that he would willing to have US troops die [sic] so he could advance his political career?

WALLACE: Well, look. The natural extension of what I understand to be his current position on the surge is that he still opposes it. […] I think some of what [Obama's] facing now is a result of coming back from Europe, at odds with Admiral Mullen on a conditions vs. unconditional withdrawal; at odds with General Petraeus as far as whether the surge has worked or has not worked and, for whatever logistical reasons, which I accept, not visiting those wounded troops in Germany.

So, I think there is a worldview that people are very concerned about. I think it illustrates either, at best, a lack of knowledge, at worst, wrong judgment when it comes to how to end the war in Iraq.

BARNICLE: How is he at odds with Admiral Mullen?

WALLACE: Well he said that an unconditional withdrawal would be dangerous. He said that on Sunday before Barack Obama departed for the war zone. I believe probably hopeful that he would change his mind.

He came back. I think he fudged it a little bit, as he often does, but he still came back committed to a 16-month timetable.

BARNICLE: But Admiral Mullen has also said the troops' strength is so stretched so thin—something very similar to what Barack Obama has said…. I don't understand how they're at odds.

WALLACE: Well, look. You know I always think there are discussions to be had, but I think there is a black and white distinction between what John McCain believes is the right way to end this war and victory, with a conditions-based withdrawal, that's frankly where the Iraqis are too. I know that got a little muddied.

And I think there is a yes or no answer to the question, 'Did the surge work?' which I again—I didn't read everything this morning. He may have wriggled around on that too, but I understand his answer on the surge to have been, 'No way. Not a good idea,' and he still has about eight different explanations for why we've been successful. Not all of them include the surge.

SCARBOROUGH: […] how long has John McCain been serving in congress, either in the house or the senate?

WALLACE: […] many years.

SCARBOROUGH: […] How long has Barack Obama been serving in Washington?

WALLACE: 15 minutes.

SCARBOROUGH: […] So how can you blame the guy that's been in Washington for 15 minutes with higher gas prices than the guy [sic] that's been in Washington probably since you were in kindergarten?

WALLACE: Well, look. Admittedly we don't have much to work with, but I think you have to look at someone's record for the best indication of where they will lead and elections are about the future, but we care a lot more, sitting here, about the past than voters do. They look to the future and the best way to figure out what he's going to do in the future is to look at his record.

SCARBOROUGH: His 15-minute record.

Crist Pushes McCain's Energy Plan (ABC 08/05/08 7:14am)
[Clip of Obama's tire inflation remarks]
DEAN REYNOLDS: McCain supporters ridiculed that idea, passing out tire gauges, with the words, 'Obama's Energy Plan.'

JOHN MCCAIN: We're not gonna achieve energy independence by inflating our tires.

REYNOLDS: McCain favors a gas tax holiday for consumers and, though he used to oppose offshore drilling as well, now he's a big fan of the idea, an about face, which was followed by a million dollars worth of donations to his campaign from the oil and gas industry in June.

[Clip of Obama's oil ties ad]

REYNOLDS: The Obama campaign noticed, but, with polls showing energy eclipsing concerns about even the Iraq war in several major battleground states, the pressure to come up with a plausible plan is mounting on both campaigns.

[...]

CHARLIE CRIST: [...] Senator Obama seems to be playing follow the leader when he talks about offshore oil drilling. [...]

HARRY SMITH: [...] you have our own energy department who say it'll be ten years before we see a drop of that oil

CRIST: Well, I disagree with that respectfully. I've talked to people in the business who say that, within a year and a half they can have oil coming out of the Gulf of Mexico, helping people at the pump, reducing this problem. Senator McCain understands that. He's talked to those executives as well.

You know, people that actually can get the job done get it done quickly, in a way that helps people and that's what we have to do. We have to have a leader who understands that and Senator McCain certainly does.
SMITH: So it's gonna be nukes and offshore drilling and that's gonna solve our energy problem.

CRIST: Well, I think it's all hands on deck. I think it's nuclear. Senator McCain will be at a nuclear plant today. Senator Obama opposes that. Senator McCain understood, before Senator Obama, that drilling and raising our domestic supply of oil is important but he also understands that conservation, wind, solar, nuclear, tide energy: all of these are things that we have to be exercising in order to make America strong.

Good Morning America Debunks McCain's Drilling Claims and Attack ads (ABC 08/05/08 07:12am)

JOHN MCCAIN: "I don't support drilling offshore of Florida or California."

TAPPER: "Today however:"

MCCAIN: "We need to drill more, drill now, and pay less at the pump."

[McCain attack ad on Obama]

TAPPER: " False."

EXPERT: "It's not any one person or country, we've seen prices rise for oil for the last few years. "

[…]

TAPPER: "And what about the Obama charge that John McCain wants to give oil and gas companies a four billion dollar tax break. Well Robin, that's barely true. Senator McCain wants to lower the corporate tax rate from 35% to 25%. That would help oil and gas companies, it would also help every other company."

[…]

ROBIN ROBERTS: "And now John McCain is receiving quite a bit of attention. In fact Monday we saw him in South Dakota shaking hands with bikers and his campaign was even passing out tire gauges to, of course, mock what Senator Obama said. Someone here in the studio said it's like Senator McCain found his mojo."

COKIE ROBERTS: "Well I think he had to find a way to basically shout above the media coverage of Barack Obama. And his way of doing it has been to make little jokes. […] You're going to have McCain trying to get in here and say watch out for this guy. You don't know who he is, he's risky. And he's playing to voter's fears. […]"

Colbert Scrutinizes the 'Celeb' Ad (MSNBC 08/05/08
STEPHEN COLBERT: Nation, with weeks to go before the conventions, both presidential candidates are doing anything for publicity. First, Obama goes on a world tour, then McCain washed up on the shore in Montauk [image of 'monster of Montauk' appears over Colbert's shoulder]. [...] Electing a celebrity is something the Republican Party would never do [image of Reagan, Schwarzenegger and Sonny Bono].

[...] The ad even led to a furious phone call from Paris Hilton's grandfather. Apparently when he heard McCain had made video with Paris, he assumed the worst. [...] This ad is a disaster for the McCain campaign [...]. Everything in the ad was true, but it was still a mistake for McCain [...].

[Britney Spears] has the same strong policy positions as John McCain.

BRITNEY SPEARS: I think we should just trust our president in every decision that he makes.

COLBERT: What a maverick. Of course, they aren't exactly the same. I think Britney knows the difference between Sunnis and Shia. Plus, Britney has got the necessary toughness.

[Also thinks Lieberman is creepy]

McCain may have been a prisoner of war for five years, but Britney was a Mouseketeer. [...] John McCain, because of your own ad your only hope is to accept this nomination while wearing an albino snake. If nothing else, it'll make you look tan.

The Atlantic: “Hillary Clinton: 'Failure' to Help Syrian Rebels Led to the Rise of ISIS”

By Jeffrey Goldberg

August 10, 2014, 12:01 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] The former secretary of state, and probable candidate for president, outlines her foreign-policy doctrine. She says this about President Obama's: "Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

President Obama has long-ridiculed the idea that the U.S., early in the Syrian civil war, could have shaped the forces fighting the Assad regime, thereby stopping al Qaeda-inspired groups—like the one rampaging across Syria and Iraq today—from seizing control of the rebellion. In an interview in February, the president told me that “when you have a professional army ... fighting against a farmer, a carpenter, an engineer who started out as protesters and suddenly now see themselves in the midst of a civil conflict—the notion that we could have, in a clean way that didn’t commit U.S. military forces, changed the equation on the ground there was never true.”

Well, his former secretary of state, Hillary Rodham Clinton, isn’t buying it. In an interview with me earlier this week, she used her sharpest language yet to describe the "failure" that resulted from the decision to keep the U.S. on the sidelines during the first phase of the Syrian uprising.

“The failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad—there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle—the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled,” Clinton said.

As she writes in her memoir of her State Department years, Hard Choices, she was an inside-the-administration advocate of doing more to help the Syrian rebellion. Now, her supporters argue, her position has been vindicated by recent events.

Professional Clinton-watchers (and there are battalions of them) have told me that it is only a matter of time before she makes a more forceful attempt to highlight her differences with the (unpopular) president she ran against, and then went on to serve. On a number of occasions during my interview with her, I got the sense that this effort is already underway. (And for what it's worth, I also think she may have told me that she’s running for president—see below for her not-entirely-ambiguous nod in that direction.)

Of course, Clinton had many kind words for the “incredibly intelligent” and “thoughtful” Obama, and she expressed sympathy and understanding for the devilishly complicated challenges he faces. But she also suggested that she finds his approach to foreign policy overly cautious, and she made the case that America needs a leader who believes that the country, despite its various missteps, is an indispensable force for good. At one point, I mentioned the slogan President Obama recently coined to describe his foreign-policy doctrine: “Don’t do stupid shit” (an expression often rendered as “Don’t do stupid stuff” in less-than-private encounters).

This is what Clinton said about Obama’s slogan: “Great nations need organizing principles, and ‘Don’t do stupid stuff’ is not an organizing principle.”

She softened the blow by noting that Obama was “trying to communicate to the American people that he’s not going to do something crazy,” but she repeatedly suggested that the U.S. sometimes appears to be withdrawing from the world stage.

During a discussion about the dangers of jihadism (a topic that has her “hepped-up," she told me moments after she greeted me at her office in New York) and of the sort of resurgent nationalism seen in Russia today, I noted that Americans are quite wary right now of international commitment-making. She responded by arguing that there is a happy medium between bellicose posturing (of the sort she associated with the George W. Bush administration) and its opposite, a focus on withdrawal.

“You know, when you’re down on yourself, and when you are hunkering down and pulling back, you’re not going to make any better decisions than when you were aggressively, belligerently putting yourself forward,” she said. “One issue is that we don’t even tell our own story very well these days.”

I responded by saying that I thought that “defeating fascism and communism is a pretty big deal.” In other words, that the U.S., on balance, has done a good job of advancing the cause of freedom.

Clinton responded to this idea with great enthusiasm: “That’s how I feel! Maybe this is old-fashioned.” And then she seemed to signal that, yes, indeed, she’s planning to run for president. “Okay, I feel that this might be an old-fashioned idea, but I’m about to find out, in more ways than one.”

She said that the resilience, and expansion, of Islamist terrorism means that the U.S. must develop an “overarching” strategy to confront it, and she equated this struggle to the one the U.S. waged against Soviet-led communism.

“One of the reasons why I worry about what’s happening in the Middle East right now is because of the breakout capacity of jihadist groups that can affect Europe, can affect the United States,” she said. “Jihadist groups are governing territory. They will never stay there, though. They are driven to expand. Their raison d’etre is to be against the West, against the Crusaders, against the fill-in-the-blank—and we all fit into one of these categories. How do we try to contain that? I’m thinking a lot about containment, deterrence, and defeat.”

She went on, “You know, we did a good job in containing the Soviet Union but we made a lot of mistakes, we supported really nasty guys, we did some things that we are not particularly proud of, from Latin America to Southeast Asia, but we did have a kind of overarching framework about what we were trying to do that did lead to the defeat of the Soviet Union and the collapse of Communism. That was our objective. We achieved it.” (This was one of those moments, by the way, when I was absolutely sure I wasn’t listening to President Obama, who is loath to discuss the threat of Islamist terrorism in such a sweeping manner.)

Much of my conversation with Clinton focused on the Gaza war. She offered a vociferous defense of Israel, and of its prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, as well. This is noteworthy because, as secretary of state, she spent a lot of time yelling at Netanyahu on the administration's behalf over Israel’s West Bank settlement policy. Now, she is leaving no daylight at all between the Israelis and herself.

“I think Israel did what it had to do to respond to the rockets,” she told me. “Israel has a right to defend itself. The steps Hamas has taken to embed rockets and command-and-control facilities and tunnel entrances in civilian areas, this makes a response by Israel difficult.”

I asked her if she believed that Israel had done enough to prevent the deaths of children and other innocent people.

“[J]ust as we try to do in the United States and be as careful as possible in going after targets to avoid civilians,” mistakes are made, she said. “We’ve made them. I don’t know a nation, no matter what its values are—and I think that democratic nations have demonstrably better values in a conflict position—that hasn’t made errors, but ultimately the responsibility rests with Hamas.”

She went on to say that “it’s impossible to know what happens in the fog of war. Some reports say, maybe it wasn’t the exact UN school that was bombed, but it was the annex to the school next door where they were firing the rockets. And I do think oftentimes that the anguish you are privy to because of the coverage, and the women and the children and all the rest of that, makes it very difficult to sort through to get to the truth."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She continued, "There's no doubt in my mind that Hamas initiated this conflict. … So the ultimate responsibility has to rest on Hamas and the decisions it made."

When I asked her about the intense international focus on Gaza, she was quick to identify anti-Semitism as an important motivating factor in criticism of Israel. "It is striking … that you have more than 170,000 people dead in Syria. … You have Russia massing battalions—Russia, that actually annexed and is occupying part of a UN member-state—and I fear that it will do even more to prevent the incremental success of the Ukrainian government to take back its own territory, other than Crimea. More than 1,000 people have been killed in Ukraine on both sides, not counting the [Malaysia Airlines] plane, and yet we do see this enormous international reaction against Israel, and Israel's right to defend itself, and the way Israel has to defend itself. This reaction is uncalled for and unfair."

She went on, "You can't ever discount anti-Semitism, especially with what's going on in Europe today. There are more demonstrations against Israel by an exponential amount than there are against Russia seizing part of Ukraine and shooting down a civilian airliner. So there's something else at work here than what you see on TV." Clinton also blamed Hamas for "stage-managing" the conflict. "What you see is largely what Hamas invites and permits Western journalists to report on from Gaza. It's the old PR problem that Israel has. Yes, there are substantive, deep levels of antagonism or anti-Semitism towards Israel, because it's a powerful state, a really effective military. And Hamas paints itself as the defender of the rights of the Palestinians to have their own state. So the PR battle is one that is historically tilted against Israel."

Clinton also seemed to take an indirect shot at administration critics of Netanyahu, who has argued that the rise of Muslim fundamentalism in the Middle East means that Israel cannot, in the foreseeable future, withdraw its forces from much of the West Bank. "If I were the prime minister of Israel, you're damn right I would expect to have control over security, because even if I'm dealing with [Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud] Abbas, who is 79 years old, and other members of Fatah, who are enjoying a better lifestyle and making money on all kinds of things, that does not protect Israel from the influx of Hamas or cross-border attacks from anywhere else. With Syria and Iraq, it is all one big threat. So Netanyahu could not do this in good conscience."

She also struck a notably hard line on Iran's nuclear demands. "I've always been in the camp that held that they did not have a right to enrichment," Clinton said. "Contrary to their claim, there is no such thing as a right to enrich. This is absolutely unfounded. There is no such right. I am well aware that I am not at the negotiating table anymore, but I think it's important to send a signal to everybody who is there that there cannot be a deal unless there is a clear set of restrictions on Iran. The preference would be no enrichment. The potential fallback position would be such little enrichment that they could not break out." When I asked her if the demands of Israel, and of America's Arab allies, that Iran not be allowed any uranium-enrichment capability whatsoever were militant or unrealistic, she said, "I think it's important that they stake out that position."

What follows is a transcript of our conversation. It has been edited for clarity but not for length, as you will see. Two other things to look for: First, the masterful way in which Clinton says she has drawn no conclusions about events in Syria and elsewhere, and then draws rigorously reasoned conclusions. Second, her fascinating and complicated analysis of the Muslim Brotherhood's ill-fated dalliance with democracy.

JEFFREY GOLDBERG: It seems that you've shifted your position on Iran's nuclear ambitions. By [chief U.S. negotiator] Wendy Sherman's definition of maximalism, you've taken a fairly maximalist position—little or no enrichment for Iran. Are you taking a harder line than your former colleagues in the Obama administration are taking on this matter?

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: It's a consistent line. I've always been in the camp that held that they did not have a right to enrichment. Contrary to their claim, there is no such thing as a right to enrich. This is absolutely unfounded. There is no such right. I am well aware that I am not at the negotiating table anymore, but I think it's important to send a signal to everybody who is there that there cannot be a deal unless there is a clear set of restrictions on Iran. The preference would be no enrichment. The potential fallback position would be such little enrichment that they could not break out. So, little or no enrichment has always been my position.

JG: Am I wrong in saying that the Obama administration's negotiators have a more flexible understanding of this issue at the moment?

HRC: I don't want to speak for them, but I would argue that Iran, through the voice of the supreme leader, has taken a very maximalist position—he wants 190,000 centrifuges and the right to enrich. And some in our Congress, and some of our best friends, have taken the opposite position—absolutely no enrichment. I think in a negotiation you need to be very clear about what it is going to take to move the other side. I think at the moment there is a big debate going on in Tehran about what they can or should do in order to get relief from the sanctions. It's my understanding that we still have a united P5+1 position, which is intensive inspections, very clear limits on what they can do in their facilities that they would permitted to operate, and then how they handle this question of enrichment, whether it's done from the outside, or whether it can truly be constrained to meet what I think our standard should be of little-to-no enrichment. That's what this negotiation is about.

JG: But there is no sign that the Iranians are willing to pull back—freezing in place is the farthest they seem to be willing to go. Am I wrong?

HRC: We don't know. I think there's a political debate. I think you had the position staked out by the supreme leader that they're going to get to do what they want to do, and that they don't have any intention of having a nuclear weapon but they nevertheless want 190,000 centrifuges (laughs). I think the political, non-clerical side of the equation is basically saying, "Look, you know, getting relief from these sanctions is economically and politically important to us. We have our hands full in Syria and Iraq, just to name two places, maybe increasingly in Lebanon, and who knows what's going to happen with us and Hamas. So what harm does it do to have a very strict regime that we can live under until we determine that maybe we won't have to any longer?" That, I think, is the other side of the argument.

JG: Would you be content with an Iran that is perpetually a year away from being able to reach nuclear-breakout capability?

HRC: I would like it to be more than year. I think it should be more than year. No enrichment at all would make everyone breathe easier. If, however, they want a little bit for the Tehran research reactor, or a little bit for this scientific researcher, but they'll never go above 5 percent enrichment—

JG: So, a few thousand centrifuges?

HRC: We know what "no" means. If we're talking a little, we're talking about a discrete, constantly inspected number of centrifuges. "No" is my preference.

JG: Would you define what "a little" means?

HRC: No.

JG: So what the Gulf states want, and what the Israelis want, which is to say no enrichment at all, is not a militant, unrealistic position?

HRC: It's not an unrealistic position. I think it's important that they stake out that position.

JG: So, Gaza. As you write in your book, you negotiated the last long-term ceasefire in 2012. Are you surprised at all that it didn't hold?

HRC: I'm surprised that it held as long as it did. But given the changes in the region, the fall of [former Egyptian President Mohamed] Morsi, his replacement by [Abdel Fattah] al-Sisi, the corner that Hamas felt itself in, I'm not surprised that Hamas provoked another attack.

JG: The Israeli response, was it disproportionate?

HRC: Israel was attacked by rockets from Gaza. Israel has a right to defend itself. The steps Hamas has taken to embed rockets and command-and-control facilities and tunnel entrances in civilian areas, this makes a response by Israel difficult. Of course Israel, just like the United States, or any other democratic country, should do everything they can possibly do to limit civilian casualties.

JG: Do you think Israel did enough to limit civilian casualties?

HRC: It's unclear. I think Israel did what it had to do to respond to the rockets. And there is the surprising number and complexity of the tunnels, and Hamas has consistently, not just in this conflict, but in the past, been less than protective of their civilians.

JG: Before we continue talking endlessly about Gaza, can I ask you if you think we spend too much time on Gaza and on Israel-Palestine generally? I ask because over the past year or so your successor spent a tremendous amount of time on the Israel-Palestinian file and in the same period of time an al Qaeda-inspired organization took over half of Syria and Iraq.

JG: I understand that secretaries of state can do more than one thing at a time. But what is the cause of this preoccupation?

HRC: I've thought a lot about this, because you do have a number of conflicts going on right now. As the U.S., as a U.S. official, you have to pay attention to anything that threatens Israel directly, or anything in the larger Middle East that arises out of the Palestinian-Israeli situation. That's just a given.

It is striking, however, that you have more than 170,000 people dead in Syria. You have the vacuum that has been created by the relentless assault by Assad on his own population, an assault that has bred these extremist groups, the most well-known of which, ISIS—or ISIL—is now literally expanding its territory inside Syria and inside Iraq. You have Russia massing battalions—Russia, that actually annexed and is occupying part of a UN member state—and I fear that it will do even more to prevent the incremental success of the Ukrainian government to take back its own territory, other than Crimea. More than 1,000 people have been killed in Ukraine on both sides, not counting the [Malaysia Airlines] plane, and yet we do see this enormous international reaction against Israel, and Israel's right to defend itself, and the way Israel has to defend itself. This reaction is uncalled for and unfair.

JG: What do you think causes this reaction?

HRC: There are a number of factors going into it. You can't ever discount anti-Semitism, especially with what's going on in Europe today. There are more demonstrations against Israel by an exponential amount than there are against Russia seizing part of Ukraine and shooting down a civilian airliner. So there's something else at work here than what you see on TV.

And what you see on TV is so effectively stage-managed by Hamas, and always has been. What you see is largely what Hamas invites and permits Western journalists to report on from Gaza. It's the old PR problem that Israel has. Yes, there are substantive, deep levels of antagonism or anti-Semitism towards Israel, because it's a powerful state, a really effective military. And Hamas paints itself as the defender of the rights of the Palestinians to have their own state. So the PR battle is one that is historically tilted against Israel.

JG: Nevertheless there are hundreds of children—

HRC: Absolutely, and it's dreadful.

JG: Who do you hold responsible for those deaths? How do you parcel out blame?

HRC: I'm not sure it's possible to parcel out blame because it's impossible to know what happens in the fog of war. Some reports say, maybe it wasn't the exact UN school that was bombed, but it was the annex to the school next door where they were firing the rockets. And I do think oftentimes that the anguish you are privy to because of the coverage, and the women and the children and all the rest of that, makes it very difficult to sort through to get to the truth.

There's no doubt in my mind that Hamas initiated this conflict and wanted to do so in order to leverage its position, having been shut out by the Egyptians post-Morsi, having been shunned by the Gulf, having been pulled into a technocratic government with Fatah and the Palestinian Authority that might have caused better governance and a greater willingness on the part of the people of Gaza to move away from tolerating Hamas in their midst. So the ultimate responsibility has to rest on Hamas and the decisions it made.

That doesn't mean that, just as we try to do in the United States and be as careful as possible in going after targets to avoid civilians, that there aren't mistakes that are made. We've made them. I don't know a nation, no matter what its values are—and I think that democratic nations have demonstrably better values in a conflict position—that hasn't made errors, but ultimately the responsibility rests with Hamas.

JG: Several years ago, when you were in the Senate, we had a conversation about what would move Israeli leaders to make compromises for peace. You've had a lot of arguments with Netanyahu. What is your thinking on Netanyahu now?

HRC: Let's step back. First of all, [former Israeli Prime Minister] Yitzhak Rabin was prepared to do so much and he was murdered for that belief. And then [former Israeli Prime Minister] Ehud Barak offered everything you could imagine being given under any realistic scenario to the Palestinians for their state, and [former Palestinian leader Yasir] Arafat walked away. I don't care about the revisionist history. I know that Arafat walked away, okay? Everybody says, "American needs to say something." Well, we said it, it was the Clinton parameters, we put it out there, and Bill Clinton is adored in Israel, as you know. He got Netanyahu to give up territory, which Netanyahu believes lost him the prime ministership [in his first term], but he moved in that direction, as hard as it was.

Bush pretty much ignored what was going on and they made a terrible error in the Palestinian elections [in which Hamas came to power in Gaza], but he did come with the Roadmap [to Peace] and the Roadmap was credible and it talked about what needed to be done, and this is one area where I give the Palestinians credit. Under [former Palestinian Prime Minister] Salam Fayyad, they made a lot of progress.

I had the last face-to-face negotiations between Abbas and Netanyahu. [Secretary of State John] Kerry never got there. I had them in the room three times with [former Middle East negotiator] George Mitchell and me, and that was it. And I saw Netanyahu move from being against the two-state solution to announcing his support for it, to considering all kinds of Barak-like options, way far from what he is, and what he is comfortable with.

Now I put Jerusalem in a different category. That is the hardest issue, Again, based on my experience—and you know, I got Netanyahu to agree to the unprecedented settlement freeze, it did not cover East Jerusalem, but it did cover the West Bank and it was actually legitimate and it did stop new housing starts for 10 months. It took me nine months to get Abbas into the negotiations even after we delivered on the settlement freeze, he had a million reasons, some of them legitimate, some of them the same old, same old.

So what I tell people is, yeah, if I were the prime minister of Israel, you're damn right I would expect to have control over security [on the West Bank], because even if I'm dealing with Abbas, who is 79 years old, and other members of Fatah, who are enjoying a better lifestyle and making money on all kinds of things, that does not protect Israel from the influx of Hamas or cross-border attacks from anywhere else. With Syria and Iraq, it is all one big threat. So Netanyahu could not do this in good conscience. If this were Rabin or Barak in his place—and I've talked to Ehud about this—they would have to demand a level of security that would be provided by the [Israel Defense Forces] for a period of time. And in my meetings with them I got Abbas to about six, seven, eight years on continued IDF presence. Now he's fallen back to three, but he was with me at six, seven, eight. I got Netanyahu to go from forever to 2025. That's a negotiation, okay? So I know. Dealing with Bibi is not easy, so people get frustrated and they lose sight of what we're trying to achieve here.

JG: You go out of your way in Hard Choices to praise Robert Ford, who recently quit as U.S. ambassador to Syria, as an excellent diplomat. Ford quit in protest and has recently written strongly about what he sees as the inadequacies of Obama administration policy. Do you agree with Ford that we are at fault for not doing enough to build up a credible Syrian opposition when we could have?

HRC: I have the highest regard for Robert. I'm the one who convinced the administration to send an ambassador to Syria. You know, this is why I called the chapter on Syria "A Wicked Problem." I can't sit here today and say that if we had done what I recommended, and what Robert Ford recommended, that we'd be in a demonstrably different place.

JG: That's the president's argument, that we wouldn't be in a different place.

HRC: Well, I did believe, which is why I advocated this, that if we were to carefully vet, train, and equip early on a core group of the developing Free Syrian Army, we would, number one, have some better insight into what was going on on the ground. Two, we would have been helped in standing up a credible political opposition, which would prove to be very difficult, because there was this constant struggle between what was largely an exile group outside of Syria trying to claim to be the political opposition, and the people on the ground, primarily those doing the fighting and dying, who rejected that, and we were never able to bridge that, despite a lot of efforts that Robert and others made.

So I did think that eventually, and I said this at the time, in a conflict like this, the hard men with the guns are going to be the more likely actors in any political transition than those on the outside just talking. And therefore we needed to figure out how we could support them on the ground, better equip them, and we didn't have to go all the way, and I totally understand the cautions that we had to contend with, but we'll never know. And I don't think we can claim to know.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JG: You do have a suspicion, though.

HRC: Obviously. I advocated for a position.

JG: Do you think we'd be where we are with ISIS right now if the U.S. had done more three years ago to build up a moderate Syrian opposition?

HRC: Well, I don't know the answer to that. I know that the failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad—there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle—the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled.

They were often armed in an indiscriminate way by other forces and we had no skin in the game that really enabled us to prevent this indiscriminate arming.

JG: Is there a chance that President Obama overlearned the lessons of the previous administration? In other words, if the story of the Bush administration is one of overreach, is the story of the Obama administration one of underreach?

HRC: You know, I don't think you can draw that conclusion. It's a very key question. How do you calibrate, that's the key issue. I think we have learned a lot during this period, but then how to apply it going forward will still take a lot of calibration and balancing. But you know, we helped overthrow [Libyan leader Muammar] Qaddafi.

JG: But we didn't stick around for the aftermath.

HRC: Well, we did stick around. We stuck around with offers of money and technical assistance, on everything from getting rid of some of the nasty stuff he left behind, to border security, to training. It wasn't just us, it was the Europeans as well. Some of the Gulf countries had their particular favorites. They certainly stuck around and backed their favorite militias. It is not yet clear how the Libyans themselves will overcome the lack of security, which they inherited from Qaddafi. Remember, they've had two good elections. They've elected moderates and secularists and a limited number of Islamists, so you talk about democracy in action—the Libyans have done it twice—but they can't control the ground. But how can you help when you have so many different players who looted the stuffed warehouses of every kind of weapon from the Qaddafi regime, some of which they're using in Libya, some of which they're passing out around the region?

So you can go back and argue either, we should we have helped the people of Libya try to overthrow a dictator who, remember, killed Americans and did a lot of other bad stuff, or we should have been on the sidelines. In this case we helped, but that didn't make the road any easier in Syria, where we said, "It's messy, it's complicated, we're not sure what the outcome will be." So what I'm hoping for is that we sort out what we have learned, because we've tried a bunch of different approaches. Egypt is a perfect example. The revolution in Tahrir Square was not a Muslim Brotherhood revolution. It was not led by Islamists. They came very late to the party. Mubarak falls and I'm in Cairo a short time after, meeting the leaders of this movement, and I'm saying, "Okay, who's going to run for office? Who's going to form a political party?" and they're saying, "We don't do that, that's not who we are."

And I said that there are only two organized groups in this country, the military and the Muslim Brotherhood, and what we have here is an old lesson that you can't beat somebody with nobody. There was a real opportunity here to, if a group had arisen out of the revolution, to create a democratic Egyptian alternative. Didn't happen. What do we have to think about? In order to do that better, I see a lot of questions that we have to be answering. I don't think we can draw judgments yet. I think we can draw a judgment about the Bush administration in terms of overreach, but I don't know that we can reach a conclusion about underreach.

JG: There is this moment in your book, in which Morsi tells you not to worry about jihadists in the Sinai—he says in essence that now that a Muslim Brotherhood government is in charge, jihadists won't feel the need to continue their campaign. You write that this was either shockingly sinister or shockingly naïve. Which one do you think it was?

HRC: I think Morsi was naïve. I'm just talking about Morsi, not necessarily anyone else in the Muslim Brotherhood. I think he genuinely believed that with the legitimacy of an elected Islamist government, that the jihadists would see that there was a different route to power and influence and would be part of the political process. He had every hope, in fact, that the credible election of a Muslim Brotherhood government would mean the end of jihadist activities within Egypt, and also exemplify that there's a different way to power.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The debate is between the bin Ladens of the world and the Muslim Brotherhood. The bin Ladens believe you can't overthrow the infidels or the impure through politics. It has to be through violent resistance. So when I made the case to Morsi that we were picking up a lot of intelligence about jihadist groups creating safe havens inside Sinai, and that this would be a threat not only to Israel but to Egypt, he just dismissed this out of hand, and then shortly thereafter a large group of Egyptian soldiers were murdered.

JG: In an interview in 2011, I asked you if we should fear the Muslim Brotherhood—this is well before they came into power—and you said, 'The jury is out." Is the jury still out for you today?

HRC: I think the jury would come back with a lesser included offense, and that is a failure to govern in a democratic, inclusive manner while holding power in Cairo. The Muslim Brotherhood had the most extraordinary opportunity to demonstrate the potential for an Islamist movement to take responsibility for governance, and they were ill-prepared and unable to make the transition from movement to responsibility. We will see how they respond to the crackdown they're under in Egypt, but the Muslim Brotherhood itself, although it had close ties with Hamas, for example, had not evidenced, because they were kept under tight control by Mubarak, the willingness to engage in violent conflict to achieve their goals. So the jury is in on their failure to govern in a way that would win the confidence of the entire Egyptian electorate. The jury is out as to whether they morph into a violent jihadist resistance group.

JG: There's a critique you hear of the Obama administration in the Gulf, in Jordan, in Israel, that it is a sign of naiveté to believe that there are Islamists you can work with, and that Hamas might even be a group that you could work with. Is there a role for political Islam in these countries? Can we ever find a way to work with them?

HRC: I think it's too soon to tell. I would not put Hamas in the category of people we could work with. I don't think that is realistic because its whole reason for being is resistance against Israel, destruction of Israel, and it is married to very nasty tactics and ideologies, including virulent anti-Semitism. I do not think they should be in any way treated as a legitimate interlocutor, especially because if you do that, it redounds to the disadvantage of the Palestinian Authority, which has a lot of problems, but historically has changed its charter, moved away from the kind of guerrilla resistance movement of previous decades.

I think you have to ask yourself, could different leaders have made a difference in the Muslim Brotherhood's governance of Egypt? We won't know and we can't know the answer to that question. We know that Morsi was ill-equipped to be president of Egypt. He had no political experience. He was an engineer, he was wedded to the ideology of top-down control.

JG: But you're open to the idea that there are sophisticated Islamists out there?

HRC: I think you've seen a level of sophistication in Tunisia. It's a very different environment than Egypt, much smaller, but you've seen the Ennahda Party evolve from being quite demanding that their position be accepted as the national position but then being willing to step back in the face of very strong political opposition from secularists, from moderate Muslims, etc. So Tunisia might not be the tail that wags the dog, but it's an interesting tail. If you look at Morocco, where the king had a major role in organizing the electoral change, you have a head of state who is a monarch who is descended from Muhammad, you have a government that is largely but not completely representative of the Muslim party of Morocco. So I think that there are not a lot of analogies, but when you look around the world, there's a Hindu nationalist party now, back in power in India. The big question for Prime Minister Modi is how inclusive he will be as leader because of questions raised concerning his governance of Gujurat [the state he governed, which was the scene of anti-Muslim riots in 2002]. There were certainly Christian parties in Europe, pre- and post-World War II. They had very strong values that they wanted to see their society follow, but they were steeped in democracy, so they were good political actors.

JG: So, it's not an impossibility.

HRC: It's not an impossibility. So far, it doesn't seem likely. We have to say that. Because for whatever reason, whatever combination of reasons, there hasn't been the soil necessary to nurture the political side of the experience, for people whose primary self-definition is as Islamists.

JG: Are we so egocentric, so Washington-centric, that we think that our decisions are dispositive? As secretary, did you learn more about the possibilities of American power or the limitations of American power?

HRC: Both, but it's not just about American power. It's American values that also happen to be universal values. If you have no political—small "p"—experience, it is really hard to go from a dictatorship to anything resembling what you and I would call democracy. That's the lesson of Egypt. We didn't invade Egypt. They did it themselves, and once they did it they looked around and didn't know what they were supposed to do next.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I think we've learned about the limits of our power to spread freedom and democracy. That's one of the big lessons out of Iraq. But we've also learned about the importance of our power, our influence, and our values appropriately deployed and explained. If you're looking at what we could have done that would have been more effective, would have been more accepted by the Egyptians on the political front, what could we have done that would have been more effective in Libya, where they did their elections really well under incredibly difficult circumstances but they looked around and they had no levers to pull because they had these militias out there. My passion is, let's do some after-action reviews, let's learn these lessons, let's figure out how we're going to have different and better responses going forward.

JG: Is the lesson for you, like it is for President Obama, "Don't do stupid shit"?

HRC: That's a good lesson but it's more complicated than that. Because your stupid may not be mine, and vice versa. I don't think it was stupid for the United States to do everything we could to remove Qaddafi because that came from the bottom up. That was people asking us to help. It was stupid to do what we did in Iraq and to have no plan about what to do after we did it. That was really stupid. I don't think you can quickly jump to conclusions about what falls into the stupid and non-stupid categories. That's what I'm arguing.

JG: Do you think the next administration, whoever it is, can find some harmony between muscular intervention—"We must do something"—vs. let's just not do something stupid, let's stay away from problems like Syria because it's a wicked problem and not something we want to tackle?

HRC: I think part of the challenge is that our government too often has a tendency to swing between these extremes. The pendulum swings back and then the pendulum swings the other way. What I'm arguing for is to take a hard look at what tools we have. Are they sufficient for the complex situations we're going to face, or not? And what can we do to have better tools? I do think that is an important debate.

One of the reasons why I worry about what's happening in the Middle East right now is because of the breakout capacity of jihadist groups that can affect Europe, can affect the United States. Jihadist groups are governing territory. They will never stay there, though. They are driven to expand. Their raison d'être is to be against the West, against the Crusaders, against the fill-in-the-blank—and we all fit into one of these categories. How do we try to contain that? I'm thinking a lot about containment, deterrence, and defeat. You know, we did a good job in containing the Soviet Union, but we made a lot of mistakes, we supported really nasty guys, we did some things that we are not particularly proud of, from Latin America to Southeast Asia, but we did have a kind of overarching framework about what we were trying to do that did lead to the defeat of the Soviet Union and the collapse of Communism. That was our objective. We achieved it.

Now the big mistake was thinking that, okay, the end of history has come upon us, after the fall of the Soviet Union. That was never true, history never stops and nationalisms were going to assert themselves, and then other variations on ideologies were going to claim their space. Obviously, jihadi Islam is the prime example, but not the only example—the effort by Putin to restore his vision of Russian greatness is another. In the world in which we are living right now, vacuums get filled by some pretty unsavory players.

JG: There doesn't seem to be a domestic constituency for the type of engagement you might symbolize.

HRC: Well, that's because most Americans think of engagement and go immediately to military engagement. That's why I use the phrase "smart power." I did it deliberately because I thought we had to have another way of talking about American engagement, other than unilateralism and the so-called boots on the ground.

You know, when you're down on yourself, and when you are hunkering down and pulling back, you're not going to make any better decisions than when you were aggressively, belligerently putting yourself forward. One issue is that we don't even tell our own story very well these days.

JG: I think that defeating fascism and communism is a pretty big deal.

HRC: That's how I feel! Maybe this is old-fashioned. Okay, I feel that this might be an old-fashioned idea—but I'm about to find out, in more ways than one.

Great nations need organizing principles, and "Don't do stupid stuff" is not an organizing principle. It may be a necessary brake on the actions you might take in order to promote a vision.

JG: So why do you think the president went out of his way to suggest recently that that this is his foreign policy in a nutshell?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HRC: I think he was trying to communicate to the American people that he's not going to do something crazy. I've sat in too many rooms with the president. He's thoughtful, he's incredibly smart, and able to analyze a lot of different factors that are all moving at the same time. I think he is cautious because he knows what he inherited, both the two wars and the economic front, and he has expended a lot of capital and energy trying to pull us out of the hole we're in.

So I think that that's a political message. It's not his worldview, if that makes sense to you.

JG: There is an idea in some quarters that the administration shows signs of believing that we, the U.S., aren't so great, so we shouldn't be telling people what to do.

HRC: I know that that is an opinion held by a certain group of Americans, I get all that. It's not where I'm at.

JG: What is your organizing principle, then?

HRC: Peace, progress, and prosperity. This worked for a very long time. Take prosperity. That's a huge domestic challenge for us. If we don't restore the American dream for Americans, then you can forget about any kind of continuing leadership in the world. Americans deserve to feel secure in their own lives, in their own middle-class aspirations, before you go to them and say, "We're going to have to enforce navigable sea lanes in the South China Sea." You've got to take care of your home first. That's another part of the political messaging that you have to engage in right now. People are not only turned off about being engaged in the world, they're pretty discouraged about what's happening here at home.

I think people want—and this is a generalization I will go ahead and make—people want to make sure our economic situation improves and that our political decision-making improves. Whether they articulate it this way or not, I think people feel like we're facing really important challenges here at home: The economy is not growing, the middle class is not feeling like they are secure, and we are living in a time of gridlock and dysfunction that is just frustrating and outraging.

People assume that we're going to have to do what we do so long as it's not stupid, but what people want us to focus on are problems here at home. If you were to scratch below the surface on that—and I haven't looked at the research or the polling—but I think people would say, first things first. Let's make sure we are taking care of our people and we're doing it in a way that will bring rewards to those of us who work hard, play by the rules, and yeah, we don't want to see the world go to hell in a handbasket, and they don't want to see a resurgence of aggression by anybody.

JG: Do you think they understand your idea about expansionist jihadism following us home?

HRC: I don't know that people are thinking about it. People are thinking about what is wrong with people in Washington that they can't make decisions, and they want the economy to grow again. People are feeling a little bit that there's a little bit happening that is making them feel better about the economy, but it's not nearly enough where it should be.

JG: Have you been able to embed your women's agenda at the core of what the federal government does?

HRC: Yes, we did. We had the first-ever ambassador for global women's issues. That's permanent now, and that's a big deal because that is the beachhead.

Secretary Kerry to his credit has issued directions to embassies and diplomats about this continuing to be a priority for our government. There is also a much greater basis in research now that proves you cannot have peace and security without the participation of women. You can't grow your GDP without opening the doors to full participation of women and girls in the formal economy.

JG: There's a link between misogyny and stagnation in the Middle East, which in many ways is the world's most dysfunctional region.

HRC: It's now very provable, when you look at the data from the IMF and the World Bank and what opening the formal economy would mean to a country's GDP. You have Prime Minister [Shinzo] Abe in Japan who was elected to fix the economy after so many years of dysfunction in Japan, and one of the major elements in his plan is to get women into the workforce. If you do that, if I remember correctly, the GDP for Japan would go up nine percent. Well, it would go up 34 percent in Egypt. So it's self-evident and provable.

Politico: "Hillary Clinton takes on Obama"

By Maggie Haberman

August 10, 2014, 11:55 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton has taken her furthest and most public step away from President Barack Obama, describing his decision against helping build a "credible" force that could battle the Assad regime in Syria early on as a "failure."

In an interview with The Atlantic, she also rejected the core of Obama's self-described foreign policy doctrine and stood firmly with Israel in the Gaza conflict.

The interview was conducted early last week before Obama authorized airstrikes in Iraq, and it is one of the longest Clinton has given on policy since she stepped down as Secretary of State early in 2013. At the end of the week, Obama, in his own one-on-one interview with New York Times columnist Tom Friedman, reiterated his view that early arming of Syrian rebels in that conflict was a "fantasy." He's expressed that view repeatedly over recent months.

The Clinton interview — lengthy and detailed — is consistent with a view of American exceptionalism that she has discussed throughout her book tour this summer.

Syria, where the civil war has contributed to the current conflict in Iraq, was on track to become a clear flash point between Clinton and Obama before she even left the administration. But her comments make clear how much of a divide there is between the two on the topic.

"The failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad — there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle—the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled," Clinton said in the interview with The Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg last week, amid images of a world on fire across American television screens.

The temptation will be to characterize Clinton as calibrating against a president whose poll numbers are sinking and as a the globe has plunged into chaos, with a downed jet in Ukraine and the U.S. pulled back into military action in Iraq, where Islamic State fighters have gained strength and where conflict has threatened Kurdish allies of the U.S.. And there is no question she is making these remarks as Obama's agenda is being dictated by world events, and as critics are questioning his goal of trying to minimize U.S. intervention overseas.

His foreign policy doctrine as a whole has been slammed by his critics as too timid, too slow to respond, too passive instead of proactive.

Yet the reality is that Clinton has always been more of a hawk than Obama, and the interview is less about her triangulating away from him than talking about her views on policy. For an almost-certain presidential candidate who has viewed the world through a different lens than the president and whose aides have insisted she is being blunter about her views than the canned version of herself in the 2008 presidential campaign, the separation from him was, as Goldberg himself notes, only a matter of time.

A recent POLITICO battleground poll showed Clinton's own numbers as Secretary of State have taken a hit, coming after months of Republican focus on Benghazi but also as international events have dominated the news.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Obama's self-described foreign policy doctrine — "Don't do stupid shit," or "Don't do stupid stuff," if, as Goldberg noted, uttered in public — Clinton was blunt: "Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle. … I think he was trying to communicate to the American people that he's not going to do something crazy. I've sat in too many rooms with the president. He's thoughtful, he's incredibly smart, and able to analyze a lot of different factors that are all moving at the same time. I think he is cautious because he knows what he inherited, both the two wars and the economic front, and he has expended a lot of capital and energy trying to pull us out of the hole we're in."

She added, "I think that that's a political message. It's not his worldview, if that makes sense to you."

On the question of the raging conflict between Israel and Hamas in the Gaza Strip, she said, " If I were the prime minister of Israel, you're damn right I would expect to have control over security [on the West Bank], because even if I'm dealing with [Mahmoud] Abbas, who is 79 years old, and other members of Fatah, who are enjoying a better lifestyle and making money on all kinds of things, that does not protect Israel from the influx of Hamas or cross-border attacks from anywhere else."

A source familiar with the interview said Clinton's team gave the White House a warning that it had taken place. Clinton aides would not explain the timing, other than describing the interview as one intended to promote her book, "Hard Choices." It may not have been a specific effort to escape from the creeping shadow of global chaos that has stretched over the White House, but it will be viewed that way.

Still, the comments were with a columnist who is widely viewed as the pre-eminent voice of the moderate-right foreign policy establishment.

And Clinton did not denounce the president - she made clear she "advocated" for arming the Syrian rebels, but acknowledged there was no way to know with absolute certainty whether it would have made a difference.

"I did believe, which is why I advocated this, that if we were to carefully vet, train, and equip early on a core group of the developing Free Syrian Army, we would, number one, have some better insight into what was going on on the ground," she said.

"Two, we would have been helped in standing up a credible political opposition, which would prove to be very difficult, because there was this constant struggle between what was largely an exile group outside of Syria trying to claim to be the political opposition, and the people on the ground, primarily those doing the fighting and dying, who rejected that, and we were never able to bridge that. … So I did think that eventually, and I said this at the time, in a conflict like this, the hard men with the guns are going to be the more likely actors in any political transition than those on the outside just talking. And therefore we needed to figure out how we could support them on the ground, better equip them, and we didn't have to go all the way, and I totally understand the cautions that we had to contend with, but we'll never know. And I don't think we can claim to know."

The topic of Syria has been fraught between the Clintons and Obama for much of the last 18 months. At a closed-press event for Sen. John McCain's institute last year, as POLITICO first reported, Bill Clinton, in a question-and-answer session with the senator, said that Obama should act more forcefully to help the Syrian rebels and that any president risked looking like a "total fool" if they over learned from public opinion polls.

With Goldberg, Hillary Clinton pushed back when he asked whether Obama could be accused of "underreaching" in his foreign policy approach.

"You know, I don't think you can draw that conclusion," she said. "It's a very key question. How do you calibrate, that's the key issue. I think we have learned a lot during this period, but then how to apply it going forward will still take a lot of calibration and balancing."

Still, over the last 18 months, Clinton has crept around the edges of separation from the unpopular president in whose Cabinet she served, but the interview marks the most declarative daylight between them. Clinton discussed the suggested plan to arm Syrian rebels, an idea she and then-CIA head Gen. David Petraeus both pushed, as one of the fights she'd lost internally.

But now she is using the word "failure," a pointed description that, according to several people familiar with her thinking, dovetails with her frustration with the administration in recent months.

A number of Democrats have privately insisted for months that while they expected Clinton to move away from Obama on the margins of foreign policy, it would be risky to separate too broadly. That risk? Affronting Democrats who did not support her in the 2008 presidential primary against Obama, and whose backing she'll need.

Clinton pointed to growing anti-Semitism in Europe as she defended Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, and said, “I think Israel did what it had to do to respond to the rockets. … Israel has a right to defend itself. The steps Hamas has taken to embed rockets and command-and-control facilities and tunnel entrances in civilian areas, this makes a response by Israel difficult.”

Her successor, Secretary of State John Kerry, was caught on a hot mic on “Fox News Sunday” appearing to criticize Netanyahu’s description of the Gaza operation as “pinpoint,” given the number of civilian casualties.

“I don’t know a nation, no matter what its values are — and I think that democratic nations have demonstrably better values in a conflict position — that hasn’t made errors, but ultimately the responsibility rests with Hamas,” said Clinton.

“There’s no doubt in my mind that Hamas initiated this conflict. … So the ultimate responsibility has to rest on Hamas and the decisions it made.”

Yet, Clinton has clearly decided that she disagrees with Obama on specific issues, and that the greater danger is in silence.

Poll after poll has shown that the American public has little stomach for conflict abroad, or for engaging U.S. troops in drawn-out battles.

When Goldberg noted that she “symbolizes” a type of foreign policy engagement that has dwindled in popularity in the U.S., Clinton said, “That’s because most Americans think of engagement and go immediately to military engagement. That’s why I use the phrase ‘smart power.’ I did it deliberately because I thought we had to have another way of talking about American engagement, other than unilateralism and the so-called boots on the ground.”

She added, “You know, when you’re down on yourself, and when you are hunkering down and pulling back, you’re not going to make any better decisions than when you were aggressively, belligerently putting yourself forward. One issue is that we don’t even tell our own story very well these days.”

Goldberg said he considers defeating communism and fascism to be “a big deal,” to which Clinton exclaimed, “That’s how I feel! Maybe this is old-fashioned. OK, I feel that this might be an old-fashioned idea — but I’m about to find out, in more ways than one.”

Goldberg interpreted that declaration from Clinton as essentially a statement of candidacy. Clinton has made similar asides in other interviews, but reading the tea leaves about whether she is going to run sort of misses the point — everything in her actions suggests she already is.

Politico: “Barack Obama rebukes Syrian ‘fantasy’”

By Nick Gass

August 10, 2014, 12:48 p.m. EDT

In a wide-ranging interview with The New York Times, President Barack Obama defended his administration’s foreign-policy approach in the Middle East. In Syria, Obama said the idea that arming rebels would have made a difference has “always been a fantasy.”

The president’s interview with op-ed columnist Thomas Friedman, published online Friday, offered an inherent rebuke of Hillary Clinton, whose memoir revealed that the former secretary of state wanted to arm moderate Syrian rebels in the nascent stages of the war. In a newly published interview with The Atlantic given before Obama’s interview, Hillary Clinton said the failure to build a strong rebel force against the Assad regime “left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled.”

The president, though not mentioning his former secretary of state by name, said such a plan was unlikely to work and was never going to happen.

"This idea that we could provide some light arms or even more sophisticated arms to what was essentially an opposition made up of former doctors, farmers, pharmacists and so forth, and that they were going to be able to battle not only a well-armed state but also a well-armed state backed by Russia, backed by Iran, a battle-hardened Hezbollah, that was never in the cards," the president said.

When asked to explain the U.S. military response to the humanitarian crisis unfolding in the mountains of northern Iraq, Obama said there's "an obligation" to prevent genocide of the Yazidis at the hands of the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant. Obama repeated the line that he doesn't want the U.S. to become the Kurdish air force, adding that it's up to Iraqis to unify and maintain a stable government.

"We're not going to let [ISIL] create some caliphate through Syria and Iraq, but we can only do that if we know that we've got partners on the ground who are capable of filling the void," Obama said.

Politico: "Clinton hint at future fuels 2016 talk"

By Katie Glueck

August 10, 2014, 1:05 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton says she expects her view of America's role in the world to be tested in the future "in more ways than one," a comment fueling speculation about her presidential ambitions.

In a wide-ranging foreign policy interview with The Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg the former secretary of state and possible Democratic presidential frontrunner agreed with Goldberg when he said that America's defeat of "fascism and communism is a pretty big deal."

"That's how I feel! Maybe this is old-fashioned," she said, adding, "Okay, I feel that this might be an old-fashioned idea, but I'm about to find out, in more ways than one."

In Goldberg's view, that was a likely nod at a 2016 run.

But Clinton — who has been on tour promoting "Hard Choices," her new memoir about her time at the State Department — has in other interviews made similar comments about her future, though nothing concrete about a White House run.

She also has indulged "hypothetical" questions about what a secretary of state would bring to the presidency.

A spokesman for Clinton did not immediately respond Sunday to an emailed request for comment on her statement.

Washington Examiner: "Hillary Clinton distances herself from President Obama's foreign policy"

By Rebecca Berg

August 10, 2014, 1:12 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton is stepping away from President Obama on foreign policy.

The likely Democratic presidential candidate is distancing herself more sharply than ever before from some important facets of President Obama's foreign policy that evolved under her watch as secretary of state.

That includes calling the administration's lack of engagement in Syria a "failure" and questioning Obama's guiding doctrine.

In an interview with the Atlantic magazine published Sunday, Clinton diverged notably from her public record of support for decisions made by the White House during her tenure, as she acknowledged key areas of disagreement between her and President Obama.

Indeed, Clinton outright dismissed President Obama's guiding doctrine on foreign policy, characterized repeatedly in media reports as, "Don't do stupid stuff," rejecting that it could even be considered an "organizing principle."

“Great nations need organizing principles, and ‘Don’t do stupid stuff’ is not an organizing principle," Clinton said.

But, she qualified, "I think that that's a political message. It’s not [Obama's] worldview."

"I think he was trying to communicate to the American people that he’s not going to do something crazy," Clinton said, adding that she considers Obama "incredibly smart" and "thoughtful."

Still, Clinton was willing to offer up her own organizing principle: "Peace, progress, and prosperity."

Clinton also used strikingly harsh language — including the word "failure" — to assess the administration's efforts to prevent the growth of ISIS, the jihadist group with roots in Syria which is now driving conflict, and threatening genocide, in the Kurdistan region of Iraq.

The United States has responded within the past week with airstrikes and relief drops. But, Clinton said, the current situation might have been prevented had the U.S. aided groups fighting the oppressive government led by President Bashar Assad, a position Obama opposed.

"I know that the failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad—there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle — the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled," Clinton said.

Clinton's remarks hint at a political conundrum she would face should she run for president. While her tenure as secretary of state would be central to her claim to the presidency, Clinton will also need to tactfully create separation between her individual role and the administration for which she worked, which has been dogged by low approval ratings and could be a drag on her bid.

Clinton is currently wrapping up a nationwide tour to promote her memoir, Hard Choices, which detailed her tenure as secretary of state. She plans to spend the last three weeks of August in the Hamptons with former President Clinton.

The Hill: "Hillary Clinton: PR battle 'tilted against' Israel"

By Jesse Byrnes

August 10, 2014, 1:34 p.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton ratcheted up her language supporting America's strongest Middle East ally, saying the world opinion is "historically tilted against Israel."

Clinton said this week in a sweeping interview published in The Atlantic on Sunday that the nearly month-long conflict in Gaza has been "effectively stage-managed" by the terrorist group Hamas.

"It's the old PR problem that Israel has," Clinton said. "Yes, there are substantive, deep levels of antagonism or anti-Semitism towards Israel, because it's a powerful state, a really effective military. And Hamas paints itself as the defender of the rights of the Palestinians to have their own state."

"So the PR battle is one that is historically tilted against Israel," she added.

Since fighting began July 8, more than 1,900 Palestinians and 67 Israelis have been killed, many on the Palestinian side being civilians, according to The Associated Press. Thousands have been wounded.

"There's no doubt in my mind that Hamas initiated this conflict" for political leverage, Clinton said, noting the difficulty placing blame for civilian deaths in the "fog of war."

"The ultimate responsibility has to rest on Hamas and the decisions it made," she said, later adding, "I would not put Hamas in the category of people we could work with."

Clinton, who in her book Hard Choices touts her diplomatic work securing the last long-term cease-fire in 2012, noted that her husband, former President Bill Clinton, who is "adored in Israel," got Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to give up territory and highlighted her own ability to work with the Israeli leader.

"Dealing with Bibi is not easy, so people get frustrated and they lose sight of what we're trying to achieve here," she said.

When asked why Secretary of State John Kerry had spent so much time focusing on the Israel-Palestinian situation while Islamic extremists captured large portions of Iraq and Syria, Clinton was frank on the U.S. commitment to Israel.

"As the U.S., as a U.S. official, you have to pay attention to anything that threatens Israel directly, or anything in the larger Middle East that arises out of the Palestinian-Israeli situation. That's just a given," she said.

McCain is "Aggressive," More of a Neocon than Bush, "More Confrontational" than Bush (MSNBC 06/26/08 7:39am)
RICHARD C. HOLBROOKE: We've just seen a step forward in North Korea. We have a presidential campaign in which this is a big, big difference between the two candidates.

JOE SCARBOROUGH: you are exactly right, I mean John McCain's position is even tougher than, I don't know if you'd say more conservative but it's more of a neocon approach than even George W. Bush's . . .

HOLBROOKE: You just made a very important point for the voters . . . I've been taking the McCain positions and the Obama positions and looking at them and what's really interesting is that McCain, on issue after issue, McCain is taking positions tougher than Bush, there's kind of an aggressive. He knows his issues but—on Russia, he wants to kick Russia out of the G8. You can't do that. On Iran he says the only thing worse than war with Iran is a nuclear Iran. On Iraq we know his positions. He is taking very, very hard line positions.

SCARBOROUGH: Let's underline this point right now . . . John McCain's positions are even further, let's say more confrontational than Bush's. There is a greater distance between Obama and McCain than Obama and Bush.

Highlight #2
Romney Talks McCain and Partisanship, State of Republican Party (CNN, 06/25/08, 7:24am)
JOHN ROBERTS: John McCain is launching a new line of attack this morning, his campaign released a memo just a couple of hours ago saying, Barack Obama has consistently put his party and his own self interests ahead of the nation. This comes after Karl Rove said that the democratic candidate was quote "arrogant".

[…]

MITT ROMNEY: […] The fact, and reality is that he's not a very experienced person. He's not someone who has shown, if you will, the kind of leadership that I think America needs right now in such a critical time. He has consistently voted with his party on the most partisan issues and put his party's and his personal interests ahead of those of the nation. And I think been unable during his career, at any time, to reach across the aisle, find compromise, find ways to get things done, other than simply toeing the party line. I think people feel we've had too much of that in Washington and that's in part why I think John McCain will be successful. His reputation and record is as a leader, who reaches across the line, sometimes, you know, he's thumbed his nose at his own party and said, look you guys are wrong. He does what he thinks is right.

[…]

ROMNEY: John, there's no question there are a number of republicans, and that's John McCain included, who are willing to reach across the aisle and work with democrats. […]

ROBERTS: You know, there's an interesting column that Robert Novak has got out there today. He's talking about this group of people called the Obama-cons, conservatives who may support Barack Obama. And he suggests that Senator John McCain is at risk of losing some conservative votes, not necessarily because they agree with Senator Obama's positions, but because they do not like the Bush administration and they are looking for something different. And he quotes a conservative, Larry Hunter, who says quote, "The Republican party is a dead rotting carcass with a few decrepit old leaders stumbling around like zombies in a horror version of weekend with Bernie, handcuffed to a corpse." Do you agree with any of that? Is that what the Republican party is these days?

ROMNEY: Gee, I don't think so. You know you're going to find some discontents in any party. And are there things that our party could do better? Absolutely. And are there opportunities for new ideas and strong leadership? Absolutely. And I think John McCain represents that. At the same time, I think you're finding in our party that people are rallying strongly around Senator McCain. I've had the chance to speak now at convention in Maine, Nevada, and frankly all over the country, Texas. And people are enthusiastic about Senator McCain, in party because they recognize how critical the times are right now and how wrong Barack Obama is. Look, he's a very nice fellow, but on the issues of the day he's just simply wrong. […]

BRIAN KILMEADE: Governor, when you talk about six party talks, there's a lot of people who think that we should not have been in them, there's a lot of democrats in particular that say, let's just go and talk to our enemies. Does John McCain subscribe to the six party talks? I know you're also a worker, trying to get John McCain in that White House.

MITT ROMNEY: Well, Senator McCain recognizes that in order for us to make progress in negotiations diplomatically with other nations, we have to strength at our side. That when you bargain with a position of strength, that when you have leverage, you're able to get more done. When you're dealing with a nation like Iran for instance, that it's critical to have Europe combined with us, in putting in place the kind of sanctions to get Iran to move. And the same is true in regards to North Korea. You have to have our friends around the world, and even some of those, if you will, are partners with the same interests, come in together and put in pressure on a regime like Kim Jong Il's regime. The idea of just showing up and saying, hey let's talk, no preconditions, no pressure, no leverage, that's something that accomplished virtually nothing. I think history has shown that where that was done, America's interests were not advanced.

CLAYTON MORRIS: Governor, you just mentioned leverage, the President mentioning leverage in asking how it was actually working in North Korea and he said you had to do it with leverage. John McCain in an interview about a week ago said, he didn't think the United States had sufficient leverage. Where's the disconnect there between John McCain and the Bush White House?

ROMNEY: Well, actually I don't think it's a disconnect. The President indicated that the United States alone doesn't have the kind of leverage on a nation like North Korea that the United States has if we're combined with Russia, and South Korea, and China, and Japan. And particularly China, 2/3rds of the trade that goes on in North Korea goes on with China. And so when China sits at the table, which they did last Fall. Which they're saying you know, we're going to pull back on our shipments of gasoline into North Korea. That's a message that's heard loud and clear by Kim Jong Il.

GRETCHEN CARLSON: Governor, I want to ask you a quick question, this of course was breaking news this morning, but I do want to ask you about the gas situation in the United States. Because, it's interesting to watch our political season this year, who would have known that this would become the hot topic now. You would like to point out that you feel that John McCain and Senator Barack Obama have very differing plans when it comes to how to control high gas prices.

ROMNEY: Well, there's no question about that. Barack Obama I think, pretty consistently through his career has proven that he puts the partisan interests of the left-wing of the Democratic party first. And with regards to energy, that means he has to be, and he is, anti-nuclear power. He stands in favor of putting a new tax on coal and natural gas, those are of course the two big domestic sources of energy that we have to tap into. He's against offshore drilling, ANWR drilling, and so forth. John McCain, on the other hand , is saying look, we got to get ourselves off of our dependence on foreign sources of energy. And so John McCain is saying, look, let's explore drilling offshore, let's think again about ANWR. Let's certainly fast-track nuclear power plants. Everybody agrees we ought to have all of the renewable sources of energy that we can. Solar, wind power, agriculturally based sources of energy. We all agree on that. But we also need those additional sources, which John McCain supports and of course, Barack Obama, unwilling to part with the partisan part of his party. He's unwilling to take those steps.

Romney on Energy and Green Technology (MSNBC 06/26/08 8:03am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: . . . you're a Michigan guy. Tell me, why can't Americans make a car like Toyota that gets fifty miles to the gallon?

MITT ROMNEY: It's one of the great imponderables . . . we have been so far behind on the technology front . . . and I'd like to see us as a nation invest dramatically more in terms of energy efficiency. That's something I think you're going to see coming out of a McCain White House . . . investments in technology to help us become energy independent.

[. . .]

ROMNEY: We haven't had an energy policy. We haven't been investing in technology to find new sources of energy . . . we got to be far more committed to spending the research dollars it takes to find new sources of energy . . . we can do that and that's why I'm convinced that John McCain's right. We need more drilling, more nuclear power, clean burning coal, you need all of the sources that really have great promise for us to finally get us energy indepndent.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: But doesn't he need to demand it? . . . at this point I think that the criticism has been that there hasn't been real leadership on this issue? . . . what does John McCain need to do to really draw the line on this?

[. . .]

ROMNEY: Well, I think you're going to see over the course of this campaign that people are going to listen to both candidates and people are going to make their assessment as to what they really think about the candidates when they've heard from them. And this is a little early and I think with time . . . people are going to recognize the Barack Obama consistently puts the partisan interests of his party and his own personal interests . . . ahead of the country.

Highlight #3
Shrum: McCain has the Style of Dole and the Substance of Bush (MSNBC 06/26/08 7:12am)
BOB SHRUM: And I'm not sure so far that John McCain has shown he's a much better candidate than President Ford was.

JOE SCARBOROUGH: Really?

SHRUM: Right now, John McCain, who I said was the strongest Republican nominee . . . is coming across as a combination, stylistically, of Bob Dole, and, substanitvaly, of George Bush.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: That's how I see.

SCARBOROUGH: What's happened to him?

SHRUM: . . . they had three or four months where they had the nomination consolidated and they didn't seem to do anything with it. They didn't seem to come up with a long-term game plan. They didn't seem to come up with a big positive argument about how he does represent change. Maybe he is just so determined to spend his time talking about the Iraq War, talking about international policy, not really addressing the economy and placating the Republican base that he's never going to do it.

SCARBOROUGH: But as long as the news is good out of Iraq, which it has been, at least over the last couple weeks . . . Americans don't care about Iraq, they don't want to hear about Iraq. . .

Pfotenhauer Talks McCain and Oil and Energy (FNC, 06/25/08, 8:51am)
BRIAN KILMEADE: First off, Nancy, you're getting a lot of grief foe, according to Barack Obama, Senator McCain's getting some grief because he used the term "psychological effect" when it comes to drilling at home, not a financial effect.

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Well that just reveals ignorance of the future markets. I mean on the one hand, people complain about speculators, on the other hand Obama wants to dismiss the role that they play on oil prices. So, when we announce that we are no longer going to be relying on foreign sources for our oil , and that we're going to take our destiny into our own hands, if you will, by increasing domestic production. That sends an immediate signal to the market, and the market reacts very very quickly. Also, Obama people, and Obama himself would like you to believe that it's going to be about a decade before we actually see oil out of the ground. They exaggerate that by about twice as long as what we've heard it to be. So about 5 years until we see that oil actually come online, but an immediate short term effect on prices is absolutely possible.

GRETCHEN CARLSON: McCain yesterday did say that he's setting a goal of weaning the U.S. off of foreign oil by 2025. Sounds like a long way off, but it's really not, right?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: It's not, you know, and if I can just say that this is really emblematic of Senator McCain. He's the type of person who has always put his country first and has been willing to take on controversial issues when they were essential to ensuring our prosperity and our peace. And this is very emblematic of him. I have to say, I think it is also emblematic of Senator Obama's unwillingness to ever break with his party leadership, to do something that is difficult but in our country's interest. And you see, he has no short term policy solutions, because he would alienate the left, the hard left part of his base.

BRIAN KILMEADE: Will you confirm some reports that say that the Senator is revisiting ANWR and might consider supporting drilling there?

PFOTENHAUER: I can't confirm that, I certainly have not heard anything along those lines.

Religion and Politics Examined, McCain's Pastor Problems Highlighted (ABC, 06/25/08, 7:16am)
DAN ABRAMS: So why is religion playing such a combustible role in this election? In part, some observers say, because we have an unusual situation where the democrat seems more comfortable talking about his faith than the republican. Obama is trying to turn that to his advantage by aggressively courting evangelicals.

[…]

ABRAMS: It's worth noting that John McCain has had pastor problems too. Choosing to renounce endorsements from John Hagee and Rob Parsley after their controversial comments came to light.

ROD PARSLEY: Islam is an anti-Christ religion.

ABRAMS: At this point John McCain has a solid lead among evangelical voters, but some observers believe that Obama may have a real shot at peeling off some moderates. Which is why you can expect Obama to keep emphasizing his faith, despite Robin, what we've seen to be the obvious risks of this strategy.

McCain is Computer Illiterate, Importance of President and Internet Examined (CNN, 06/25/08, 6:55am)
JOHN ROBERTS: It turns out that the man who could be our next president is far from computer savvy.

[…]

JEANE MOOS: We don't expect the president to be the Liberace of the keyboard. But still, should the next President of the United States know how to work a computer?

CHILD: I mean, yeah, I guess so, it would be helpful. Why not?

MOOS: Ask John McCain. Here's how he describes his computer skills.

JOHN MCCAIN: I am an illiterate that has to rely on my wife for all of the assistance that I can get.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ANNONYMOUS: Oh that's absolutely ridiculous. It's the 21st Century and you should know how to do it. He's got people to do that! He's got to be thinking of more important things.

MOOS: While Cindy McCain's been spotted scrolling her blackberry. John McCain tends to be handed a blackberry to talk on. Barack Obama on the other hand is one of those guys so intent on reading his blackberry that he could run into something. He is a blackberry fiend, says his spokesperson, has a laptop on the road and sometimes uses it to talk to his daughters, and surfs the web when he is in need of important information such as sports scores. A far cry from this guy [Bush]

GEORGE BUSH: I hear there's rumors on the internets. And on of the things I've used on the Google is […]

MOOS: Just the other day President Bush did it again.

BUSH: They can go on their computers and dial up volunteer.org .

MOOS: At least John McCain isn't still dialing up, he knows to leave off the "the". But McCain's admission that he was computer illiterate was fodder for debate at something called the Personal Democracy Forum. The online expert who had worked for John Edwards got into it with the internet expert for the McCain campaign. […] But when McCain's guy said this, "John McCain is aware of the internet" became a joke on the internet. But do we really want a president that sits around the oval office googling all day? This 74 year old likes to Google.

74 YEAR OLD WOMAN: I mean this is such an easy thing to learn, I taught myself how to use the computer.

MOOS: At least John McCain knows the difference between a laptop and a lap dance. Even if jokers made a mockup of McCain's real website with "How does this thing work?" and "Should I double click here?"

Local Highlight #1
STEVE WOLFORD: Along with supporters, there were also a number of protestors at UNLV for McCain's visit. A group of disabled veterans asked McCain to "walk the walk" by supporting the troops and green energy to create jobs in Nevada.

Obama & Netanyahu's "Make Nice" Meeting: Bad for Peace, Bad for Israel

By Rabbi Michael Lerner

When Israeli Prime Minister Netanyahu and President Obama meet in the White House today, their goal will be to make amends in light of Netanyahu's unprecedented attempts to manipulate the U.S. Congress and the American public into opposition to the Iran Nuclear deal negotiated by six countries including the U.S.

But instead of Netanyahu repenting for what he has done and now agreeing to support the deal, the chutzpah-filled leader of Israel will seek new military weaponry from the U.S. and Obama has already made clear that he will be agreeing to new advanced military weapons. The Israelis seek U.S. weapons that will allow them to blast through the mountains under which some of Iran's peaceful-use nuclear energy has been developed. Their stated reason: to provide them with a way to strike at Iran should they determine that the terms of the nuclear deal be violated by Iran.

This is bad news for peace. The likely scenario that will result once Israel ahs this technology is not hard to imagine. Israel wlll wait till after the 2016 elections, and then sometime in the following two years strike at Iranian sites where Iran is developing nuclear capacities for peaceful usage. It will use the new weapons to destroy those sites where Israel "suspects" that this is happening, and announce that it has classified information that proves to them that these sites violated the deal and that it had to strike in order to protects its own security.

Iran might plausibly be expected to strike back at Israel, and the U.S. would soon be pulled into yet another Middle East War (hopefully by that time the U.S. will have already defeated ISIL, ISIS, the Islamic State). Israel could then sit back and watch the U.S. attempt to destroy much of Iranian society, as it did with Iraq. There is no potential Democratic or Republican nominee for President willing to say that s/he would not be dragged into such a war.

Netanyahu, to sweeten the package, will likely announce some "confidence building measures" that might reduce tensions with the Palestinians living under Israeli military occupation. Perhaps he will announce a partial freeze on new construction of housing for Israeli settlers in Arab East Jerusalem and the West Bank, or perhaps a reduction in the number of check points through which Palestinians must pass to go from one Palestinian town to another in the Occupied Territories. While this might play well with the U.S. media, most of the rest of the world, not to mention the Palestinian people, understand these as token gestures that mean very little. Palestinians are not seeking a slightly less oppressive Occupation—they want an end to this 48 year Occupation. Think of this as more analogous to Jefferson David, head of the Confederacy during the U.S. civil war 1861-65 announcing that the Confederate states had decided to give all slaves a full day and a half off of work every week. But the slaves wanted emancipation and freedom, not a slightly better work schedule as slaves. The anger and outrage that burst into public view with the recent (and in my mind quite tragic) slaying of some Israeli citizens by random Palestinians (and a far greater number of Palestinians in response by Israel) will likely reappear periodically until the Occupation itself ends. Yet Prime Minister Netanyahu won reelection by promising the Israeli public that he would not allow a Palestinian state to emerge under his rule, which can continue for another 4.5 years.

So why doesn't Obama make the ending of the Occupation a condition for delivering these new weapons to Israel? The more cynical answer is that he is concerned to prevent losses to the Democratic Party in the next election that might come from some section of American Jews defecting toward Republicans who would certainly denounce such a demand. Others believe that some Democrats who supported the Iranian nuclear deal only did so once Obama promised these weapons to Israel, and they might join Republicans in undermining the deal should Obama stand up for an end to the Occupation.

But an equally persuasive analysis points to Obama's consistent refusal to stand for any principle in a principled way. One day he speaks for environmental sanity at the U.N. but only after opening the Arctic to new drilling for oil and gas, then cancels the pipeline from Canada on the grounds of his caring about the environment but then reveals the terms of the Trans-Pacific Partnership that will give multinational corporations the ability to sue any country that is imposing environmental restrictions that might cut into their profits. It has been this way on every important issue, from health care to ending U.S. wars to challenging America's economic elites—one step forward and one step back. Some dare call this his wimpy-ness, others his psychological background that makes him want to please everyone (and ending up pleasing very very few). But whatever the reasons, the upshot is bad for the world, and in this case, bad for Israel (which really needs peace rather than the U.S. being an enabler for further conflict with Israel's neighbors), the Palestinians, and for the American people.

If Obama had any backbone or self-respect, here's what he'd do: 1. Publicly present the U.S. plan for what a peace agreement should look like--one like that proposed by Tikkun which provides for significant compromises on both sides but also provides both sides with adequate security from the extremists on the other side, and equal dignity and national self-determination. That might be a valuable step for a President who bemoans the inability to control the gun lobby in the U.S. but in true hypocritical fashion supplies the rest of the world with armaments that are used against civilians 2. Tell Netanyahu that the U.S. is not going to deliver any new military hardware till Israel stops all expansion of settlements and begins the process of dismantling the mechanisms of the Occupation of the West Bank 3. That the U.S. will support full Palestinian membership in the U.N. and 4. That the U.S. will not do business with or buy products from any of the West Bank Israeli settlements or any company helping Israel enforce or extend the Israeli West Bank settlements.

Of course, Obama doesn't have the backbone to do any of this. No wonder, then, that Netanyahu can insult Obama, have members of his cabinet say that Obama is an anti-Semite, come to the U.S. and do something no other foreign leader has ever done (namely, try to go over the head of the President to manipulate the Congress and the public into supporting what Israel wants even though what they wanted was insane from the standpoint of global nuclear security), and then, when he fails to torpedo the Iran nuclear deal, comes here and demands a reward of more military hardware so that Obama can "prove" that he isn't anti-Israel.

Yet this most arrogant behavior is only possible because Obama won't stand up for the best interests of Israel and the U.S.--namely, ending the Occupation (and hence the struggle between Israel and Palestine) and using our economic and diplomatic power to achieve that goal. This weakness makes Obama an enabler of the Middle East's neighborhood bully. Yet we know that bullies do not have a long shelf-life, which is why we Jews who want Israel to survive would appreciate a US President who could use all the tools the most powerful country in the world has at its disposal to reverse Israeli policy before it creates a global consensus that Israel should not be permitted to exist--something we do not want to see happen!

Russia Offers Turkish Navy Hovercrafts, Missile Defense System Technology

By Thomas Barrabi @TBarrabi t.barrabi@ibtimes.com on May 07 2015 10:24 AM EDT

State-owned Russian arms company Rosoboronexport has offered to collaborate with Turkey to create amphibious hovercraft for the Turkish Navy's use, a company spokesman said Thursday. A spokesman for the Russian arms exporter said Russia and Turkey also conducted joint tests of a missile defense system and reached several arms deals with Turkish firms.

"We have been cooperating on the creation of smaller amphibious hovercraft, as well as the integration of combat systems of Russian manufacture with Turkish naval platforms," Rosoboronexport spokesman Anatoly Aksyonov said, according to Russian news agency TASS .

Rosoboronexport operates at Russian President Vladimir Putin's behest and accounts for the vast majority of Russia's arms sales. Aside from the amphibious hovercrafts, Turkish officials also expressed interest in the acquisition of Russian short-range missile defense systems, Aksyonov said. Turkey would be responsible for the manufacture of the systems.

News of Turkey's purported collaboration with the Russian arms exporter came weeks after Russian officials disclosed military contracts with China and Thailand. Chinese officials finalized their purchase of Russia's S-400 air defense systems in September 2014 and became the first country other than Russia to possess the system, Rosoboronexport CEO Antoly Isaykin confirmed to

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Russian-owned Sputnik News last month.

"I will not disclose the details of the contract, but yes, China has indeed become the first buyer of this sophisticated Russian air defense system," Isaykin said.

Top Russian officials, including Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev and Trade Minister Denis Manturov, held high-level meetings with Thai officials last month, during which the two sides discussed the potential sale of Russian military aircraft. The meeting took place at the same time Thai officials met with Chinese representatives for a defense summit, Reuters reported.

Western nations have expressed growing concern in recent months about a marked uptick in Russia's military activity, both in Eastern Europe and abroad. Russia's armed forces have conducted extensive military exercises that reached as far as the Arctic.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Stung in 2008, Hillary Clinton Builds a Formidable Team in Iowa // NYT // Trip Gabriel - July 25, 2015

Two or three days a week, for up to five hours, Liz Mueller plants herself in a coffee shop called Uncle Nancy's.

She posts to Facebook, makes calls and meets one on one with people over bottomless mugs of flavored black coffee. Her goal is to become known throughout this farming community of 15,000 as "the Hillary girl."

Ms. Mueller, who at 24 is already a disciplined veteran of political campaigns in Virginia, New York and Arkansas, is one of Hillary Rodham Clinton's 47 paid organizers in Iowa, a sizable and growing army. The formidable infrastructure, larger than any other candidate's for either party in Iowa, shows Mrs. Clinton's determination not to leave anything to chance in the state with the first nominating contest, where she suffered a bruising setback in her last presidential run.

That is no surprise, given that Mrs. Clinton hired a campaign manager, Robby Mook, who rose through the ranks of field organizing, which has revolutionized modern campaigns.

"One of the things that I learned last time is it's organize, organize, organize," Mrs. Clinton said in a recent interview with CNN. "And you've got to get people committed, and then they will follow through, and then you bring more people."

What the news media sometimes misses in mocking Mrs. Clinton's visits to Iowa, which have included many small encounters in coffee shops and homes, is that the events are designed to build her organization by enlisting volunteers. She is "the closer" at house parties to which the campaign invites prospective recruits, said Jerry Crawford, a senior Clinton adviser in Iowa.

With Mrs. Clinton returning to the state for three days on Saturday, she had house parties scheduled in Carroll and the Beaverdale section of Des Moines, which was nicknamed "Obamadale" during the 2012 race for its deep well of Democratic activists.

At a recent house party in a former Grange hall in Newton, which Mrs. Clinton did not attend, about 45 Democrats and independents were asked to sign commitment cards to caucus for Mrs. Clinton, or to check boxes indicating that they would volunteer to "Knock on doors!" or "Be a captain!"

Jane Johnson, a retired music teacher, came after Ms. Mueller had pursued her on Facebook and invited her for a chat at Uncle Nancy's.

In 2008, Ms. Johnson caucused for Barack Obama, who won in Iowa as Mrs. Clinton finished third. “He figured out how to get little people involved in his campaign,” Ms. Johnson said. “I think Hillary has learned that. This time she’s on the ground, meeting with people where they work, where they socialize.”

What the campaigns of President Obama showed, especially in key states where the margin of victory could be as thin as two percentage points, is that organizing can be the most potent campaign tool of all.

“Getting people engaged in the campaign is how you win,” said Marlon Marshall, who runs Mrs. Clinton’s national field organizing efforts.

The Clinton campaign says it has opened 10 field offices and recruited more than 7,000 volunteers in Iowa.

No state is more of a proving ground. The Iowa caucus system and yearlong intraparty competition pare the electorate for each candidate to only the most committed supporters.

“Most of the best Democratic campaign leaders have worked in Iowa at some point,” said Mr. Crawford, a Des Moines lawyer. “The experience here has been viewed as the gold standard.”

Mrs. Clinton’s Iowa caucus director, Michael Halle, worked for the Obama campaign here in 2008 and 2012. He is a protégé of Mr. Mook, Mrs. Clinton’s campaign manager. While working on the 2004 presidential campaign of Howard Dean, Mr. Mook adopted the organizing techniques of labor groups like the United Farm Workers.

Rather than having paid organizers responsible for all of the recruiting, Mr. Halle said, the Obama campaign used volunteers to bring in other volunteers, usually people in their circles. He called it a “paradigm shift.”

In 2012, the concept was turbocharged with digital technology, most notably a platform called VoteBuilder, which logged every door knock and phone call.

Now the Clinton campaign has further adapted the model, dividing the most committed volunteers into “engagement directors,” who are responsible for bringing in new volunteers, and “captains,” who oversee specific tasks like canvassing.

“Engagement directors help focus on building our internal organization, and the captains work on building relationships with supporters out in the communities,” said Michelle Kleppe, the Iowa organizing director, who reports to Mr. Halle.

The careful, ground-up organizing seems designed to counter the kind of threat to Mrs. Clinton that has emerged from Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, whose hard-left policies have inspired huge crowds at rallies. Many at the Clinton house party in Newton said Mr. Sanders was the candidate they were most drawn to. “I like everything he says,” said Dean Lane, who farms 1,800 acres of corn and soybeans.

“I’m a pretty wealthy farmer,” he added. “I think it’s ridiculous the way we treat poor people. Nobody wants to pay a dime in taxes.”

Few of the 45 in attendance signed the Clinton commitment cards or said they were ready to volunteer for her.

Amid the generous pouring of rosé and trays of local Maytag blue cheese, the house party seemed likely to leave a lasting glow with attendees when the time came to choose between Mrs. Clinton and an alternative. Ms. Mueller considered it a success because she had met many people she intended to contact over and over until the caucuses next year.

The challenge for Mr. Sanders, who is months behind Mrs. Clinton in organizing in Iowa, is to channel the passion of the many who turn out to hear him speak into a campaign infrastructure. His campaign says it has hired 33 organizers and also has 10 field offices in Iowa.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The misconception is that there’s not organizing going on around” the impressive crowds, said Pete D’Alessandro, the campaign coordinator for Mr. Sanders in Iowa.

A third Democratic candidate, former Gov. Martin O’Malley of Maryland, plans to hire staff “across the state” by the end of the summer, his Iowa director, Jake Oeth, announced in a recent memo. In addition, a “super PAC” supporting Mr. O’Malley, Generation Forward, is gearing up to “knock on doors across Iowa soon,” according to its Facebook page.

Most of the Republicans in the party’s field of 16 have small staffs in Iowa and have scarcely begun to organize.

But for Mrs. Clinton, stung by the lessons of 2008, it is never too early to develop an outreach plan for the state that can grow and be tinkered with as the caucuses approach.

“If we do our job in Iowa — if Hillary were to win in Iowa and New Hampshire — I’d kind of think it’s over,” Mr. Crawford said of the Democratic nominating race. “If she had won Iowa last time, it would have been over.”

Clinton says she's confident about proper handling of emails // AP // Catherine Lucey - July 25, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton said Saturday she never knowingly sent or received classified information using her private email server and did not know what messages were being cited by intelligence investigators as examples of emails containing classified information.

Clinton spoke briefly about the email matter after a Democratic gathering at the Madison County Historical Complex in which she stressed her commitment to a variety of issues, including her support for pre-kindergarten education and abortion access. Reporters raised the topic of the email during a brief news conference.

"I am confident that I never sent or received any information that was classified at the time it was sent and received. What I think you're seeing here is a very typical kind of discussion, to some extent disagreement among various parts of the government, over what should or should not be publicly released," she said.

The front-runner for her party's nomination said she wanted the information in question to be made public as soon as possible and suggested there was confusion over the issue.

"I think there's so much confusion around this that I understand why reporters and the public are asking questions, but the facts are pretty clear. I did not send nor receive anything that was classified at the time," she said.

Intelligence investigators told the Justice Department in a letter this week that secret government information may have been compromised in the unsecured system she used at her New York home during her tenure as secretary of state.

Asked if the Justice Department should investigate, Clinton said: "They can fight over it or argue over it. That's up to them. I can tell you what the facts are."

In addition to alerting the Justice Department to the potential compromise of classified information, the inspector general of the U.S. intelligence community sent a memo to members of Congress indicating that "potentially hundreds of classified emails" were among the 30,000 that Clinton had provided to the State Department.

The office said it also raised that concern with FBI counterintelligence officials and was recommending changes in how the emails are being reviewed and processed for public release. The State Department is reviewing 55,000 pages of emails with the goal of releasing all of them by Jan. 29.

The intelligence inspector general, I. Charles McCullough, and his counterpart at the State Department, Steve Linick, said that McCullough's office found four emails containing classified information in a limited sample of 40 emails.

Whether the Justice Department would investigate the potential compromise the intelligence inspector general highlighted was not clear. The referral to the Justice Department does not seek a criminal probe and does not specifically target Clinton.

In its letter to congressional oversight committees, the inspector general's office said that it was concerned that "these emails exist on at least one private server and thumb drive with classified information and those are not in the government's possession," Andrea Williams, a spokeswoman for McCullough, said earlier this week.

The letter said none of the emails was marked "classified" at the time it was sent or received but that some should have been handled as such and sent on a secure computer network.

Clinton has said she used the private server at her home as a matter of convenience to limit her number of electronic devices.

New York Times corrects 'criminal' aspect of Clinton email story // Politico // Dylan Byers - July 25, 2015

The New York Times report claiming that inspectors general had sought a criminal investigation relating to Hillary Clinton's personal email account was finally changed early Saturday morning, one day after all parties involved in the story—the two inspectors general, the Justice Department, and the Clinton campaign—issued public statements disputing the language in the Times report.

"[G]overnment officials who initially said the request was for a criminal investigation later said it was not a 'criminal referral' but a 'security referral' pertaining to possible mishandling of classified information," the Times noted in its correction. The Times also updated its headline, removing the word "criminal" from "Criminal Inquiry Sought in Hillary Clinton's Use of Email."

In a new article on Saturday, about four emails on Clinton's private server "that contained government secrets," the Times also provided a lengthy explanation for the language.

"The discovery of the four emails prompted [the Intelligence Community Inspector General] to refer the matter to F.B.I. counterintelligence agents, who investigate crimes related to the mishandling of classified information," the article reads. "On Thursday night and again Friday morning, the Justice Department referred to the matter as a 'criminal referral' but later Friday dropped the word 'criminal.' The inspectors general said late Friday that it was a 'security referral' intended to alert authorities that 'classified information may exist on at least one private server and thumb drive that are not in the government's possession.'"

"Irrespective of the terminology, the referral raises the possibility of a Justice Department investigation into Mrs. Clinton's emails as she campaigns for president," the report continues. "Mishandling classified information is a crime. Justice Department officials said no decision had been made about whether to open a criminal investigation."

Sources with knowledge of the situation had likewise told the On Media blog on Friday that the error was caused by misinformation provided to the Times by a Justice Department official. But numerous emails to the On Media blog from journalists, political operatives and even Times staffers expressed surprise at how long it took the Times to correct the report.

On Friday, the Justice Department, the Intelligence Community and State Inspectors General all issued statements saying that the referral was not "criminal" in nature, and the Clinton campaign issued a statement calling the Times report about a criminal inquiry "false."

Eileen Murphy, the Vice President of Corporate Communications at the Times, has not responded to repeated requests for comment on the corrections to the article.

The "criminal" correction is the second correction the Times has added to its story. As previously reported, the Times initially reported that the two inspectors general had asked the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation "into whether Hillary Rodham Clinton mishandled sensitive government information on a private email account she used as secretary of state." That clause, which suggested Clinton was a target in the potential criminal probe, was later changed to eliminate that suggestion: the inquiry was now into "whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection with the personal email account."

In a new statement on Saturday, Clinton spokesperson Nick Merrill announced that Clinton has agreed to appear at an October public hearing before the House Benghazi Committee. But his statement began with a dig at the Times: "Friday began with the printing of a story that was false," he wrote. "Entities from the highest levels of two branches of government have now made that clear."

Aides for Hillary Clinton and Benghazi Committee Dispute Testimony Plan // NYT // Michael S. Schmidt and Maggie Haberman - July 25, 2015

Amid renewed controversy surrounding Hillary Rodham Clinton's use of private email for government work, a dispute erupted on Saturday over when and how she would publicly testify before the House select committee investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks on the American diplomatic outpost in Benghazi, Libya.

Mrs. Clinton's aides announced Saturday morning that she had accepted an invitation to testify on Oct. 22. But a spokesman for the Republican-led committee said hours later that no agreement had been reached.

And by day's end, it was not clear what exactly they were arguing over.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton said she accepted the committee's invitation on Friday, the same day that inspectors general for the State Department and the nation's intelligence agencies said they had discovered classified information on the private email account Mrs. Clinton used while she was secretary of state. The inspectors general said the secret information should never have been stored outside secure government systems.

Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton's presidential campaign, said in a statement Saturday that the campaign had reviewed the statements by the inspectors general.

"We want to ensure that appropriate procedures are followed as these emails are reviewed while not unduly delaying the release of her emails," Mr. Merrill said. "We particularly do not want their release to be hampered by bureaucratic infighting among the intelligence community. More emails are slated to be released by the State Department next week, and we hope that release is as inclusive as possible."

But the committee's spokesman issued a statement a few hours later asserting that Mrs. Clinton's lawyer, David Kendall, had stipulated that acceptance of the October date would depend on the committee's agreeing to question Mrs. Clinton only about the Benghazi attacks, not about her private email account, and on a commitment that the date of the hearing would not change.

"Secretary Clinton's campaign may want to reach out to her lawyer," the committee spokesman, Jamal Ware, said. "As of last night, Mr. Kendall was still negotiating conditions for her appearance."

Mr. Merrill, however, responded with a second statement disputing this. "We have made clear that we understand emails are in their jurisdiction," he said. "So unless the committee now believes emails are no longer in its jurisdiction, we are in agreement."

The Benghazi committee, in the course of its investigation, discovered that Mrs. Clinton had used her personal email account for State Department business.

Mrs. Clinton has said for months that she kept no classified information on the private server she had set up in her house so that she would not have to carry both a personal phone and a work phone. Her campaign said on Friday that any government secrets found on the server had been classified after the fact.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the two inspectors general said on Friday that the information they found was classified when it was sent and remains so. Information is considered classified if its disclosure would be likely to harm national security. The investigators said the information was not marked as classified but should have been stored only on government computer networks with special safeguards.

“This classified information never should have been transmitted via an unclassified personal system,” Steve A. Linick, the State Department inspector general, said in a statement signed by him and I. Charles McCullough III, the inspector general for the intelligence agencies.

Saturday’s testy back-and-forth seemed to boil down to a spat about who should have announced Mrs. Clinton’s agreement to testify. It also pointed up how contentious the subject of her email account remains — and that it is only likely to grow as 2016 draws near.

The Oct. 22 date would give the committee months to receive from the State Department, and then digest, troves of email traffic involving Mrs. Clinton’s aides. And her testimony would take place when more people were focused on her campaign.

But her testimony also is expected to be public, as pressed for by her aides, who were pleased with how she fared in January 2013 when she last testified before Congress in relation to the Benghazi attacks. The committee had sought to question Mrs. Clinton in private about the emails.

Mr. Kendall told the committee on May 4 that Mrs. Clinton was willing to testify the week of May 18. But the committee chairman, Representative Trey Gowdy, Republican of South Carolina, never scheduled the hearing. He said he would not call her to testify until the State Department had turned over all the documents he had requested.

Since then, Mr. Gowdy has repeatedly criticized the State Department for withholding documents. This month, he postponed the testimony of several of Mrs. Clinton’s aides, saying he could not question them until he had all of the relevant documents from the State Department.

The inspectors general said the State Department had agreed to allow intelligence officials with expertise in Freedom of Information Act releases to play a role in the review. But the inspectors general said the department had still not created a process for resolving disputes between the department and other parts of the government about differences over how to classify documents.

“There have been recent examples, such as the Senate Intelligence Committee’s report on torture, where release of information was delayed because of disagreements among agencies,” Mr. Merrill said in his statement, “and we hope that will not happen here.”

Clinton may testify to Benghazi committee in October // WaPo // Anne Gearan - July 25, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton’s campaign said Saturday that she will testify on Oct. 22 before the House select committee investigating her role in connection with the deaths of four Americans in Benghazi, Libya — an assertion that was almost immediately challenged by a spokesman for the committee.

Clinton campaign spokesman Nick Merrill announced the date and said her testimony would be public.

But Jamal Ware, a spokesman for the committee, said the timing is not set because of ongoing negotiations with Clinton’s lawyer over ground rules.

The wrangling is of a piece with months of back-and-forth between the Republican-led committee and Clinton, whose allies accuse the panel of conducting a fishing expedition for damaging material that might be used against her as she runs for president in 2016.

U.S. Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens and three others were killed when militants overran two U.S. compounds in Benghazi in September 2012, in the waning months of Clinton’s term as secretary of state. She has said that she had no direct role in security decisions surrounding the U.S. facilities, but Republican critics claim that her State Department denied protections that might have prevented the attack.

As of Friday, Clinton’s attorney, David Kendall, was still negotiating terms for his client’s appearance, Ware said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“On the grounds of simple fairness and in order to make appropriate preparation possible, the scope of the questioning [should] be consistent with the scope set forth in the resolution establishing the Select Committee on the Events Surrounding the 2012 Terrorist Attack in Benghazi,” Kendall wrote Friday, according to an excerpt of the letter that the committee released Saturday.

Clinton had long offered to testify in public, but the committee chairman, Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), had initially said he preferred a private interview. Although Gowdy said he was trying to keep the session from becoming a circus, Clinton’s team objected on grounds that a closed session could allow Republicans to selectively leak unflattering details.

Gowdy has also said that he needs more documents from the State Department before he questions Clinton.

The committee on Saturday appeared to reject Kendall’s terms, which included that the scope of questioning be limited and that the hearing date, once set, would not change.

Ware also said in the news release that Kendall had previously agreed that Clinton would answer questions about “her unusual e-mail arrangement,” referring to her use of a private e-mail system for government business, including a server in her home.

“The Committee will not, now or ever, accept artificial limitations on its congressionally-directed jurisdiction,” Ware said in the statement. “Once there is an agreement on the date and a better understanding of how, if at all, Secretary Clinton’s lawyer’s latest writing differs from previous ones, the Committee will announce said hearing date.”

Clinton’s lawyer has also accused the committee of trying to drag out its investigation into 2016 to use it as a cudgel against the Democratic front-runner.

Her campaign also said Saturday that it does not want any delay in the release of Clinton's e-mails from the private account she used while she was secretary of state because of “bureaucratic infighting among the intelligence community.”

The inspector general of the intelligence community said he had found information that should have been classified in a small sample of Clinton’s e-mails and made a “security referral” to the Justice Department under a federal law that requires the FBI to be alerted to any possible compromise of national security information.

Clinton addressed questions about her e-mails after a Democratic Party event in Iowa on Saturday, telling reporters, "I am confident that I never sent nor received any information that was classified at the time it was sent or received."

She said she had "no idea" what the e-mails cited by the inspector general were about and that it was her desire to be transparent with the e-mails that had led to the dispute.

"What I think you're seeing here is a very typical kind of discussion, to some extent a disagreement between various parts of the government, over what should or should not be publicly released," she said.

Clinton turned over 30,000 e-mails to the State Department after her use of a private e-mail system became an issue. The e-mails are being reviewed for release to Congress and the public.

Clinton Sent Classified Information Over Email While at State Department, Review Finds // WSJ // Byron Tau - July 25, 2015

A government intelligence watchdog found that Hillary Clinton sent at least four emails from her personal account containing classified information during her tenure as secretary of state.

In a letter to members of Congress on Thursday, the inspector general of the intelligence community concluded that Mrs. Clinton's email contains material from the intelligence community that should have been considered "secret"—the second-highest level of classification—at the time it was sent. A copy of the letter to Congress was provided to The Wall Street Journal by a spokeswoman for the inspector general.

The four emails in question "were classified when they were sent and are classified now," said Andrea Williams, a spokeswoman for the inspector general. The inspector general's review covered about 40 emails in Mrs. Clinton's inbox, which suggests the trove of more than 30,000 emails may contain more potentially confidential, secret or top-secret information.

The inspector general referred the matter to the Federal Bureau of Investigation's counterintelligence division. An official with the Justice Department said Friday that it had received a referral to open an investigation into the potential mishandling of classified information. Initially, a Justice Department official said Friday morning the investigation was criminal in nature, but the department reversed course hours later without explanation.

The inspectors general of both the intelligence community and the State Department released a joint statement Friday afternoon saying that they made a counterintelligence referral to the FBI, not a criminal one.

The disclosures roiled her presidential campaign. Mrs. Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination, said on Friday in New York that there were "inaccuracies" in reports about her email usage, but didn't offer specifics. She noted that she has voluntarily released 55,000 pages of email and offered to testify before a congressional committee.

"Maybe the heat is getting to everybody," Mrs. Clinton said. "We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right, and I will do my part. But I'm also going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues that really matter to American families."

The investigation concluded that Mrs. Clinton should have used a secure network to transmit the emails in question. The information in four of Mrs. Clinton's emails "should never have been transmitted via an unclassified personal system," the inspectors general determined.

It isn't clear whether Mrs. Clinton was aware she was sending classified information. "None of the emails we reviewed had classification or dissemination markings," wrote Inspector General I. Charles McCullough in the letter to Congress.

The joint statement from the inspectors general indicated the referral to the FBI was routine. It said the intelligence community inspector general is required by law "to refer potential compromises of national security information" to appropriate security officials.

The emails in question left government custody and were on both Mrs. Clinton's personal home email server as well as a thumb drive of David Kendall, Mrs. Clinton's personal attorney. The concerns about classified information being in private hands led the intelligence community watchdog to alert law-enforcement officials about potential loss of classified information.

Because the information allegedly mishandled in Mrs. Clinton's email archive remains classified and unavailable to the public, it is difficult to know the severity of the breach.

"Realistically, I don't think there's any serious concern about anything criminal in this case," said Mark Zaid, a lawyer who specializes in national-security law. "But it raises a whole host of administration questions for the State Department and will also have political fallout separate from the legal questions."

The federal law governing removal of classified information provides for up to a year for prison for "knowingly" mishandling or removing classified information. Most high-profile investigations into the mishandling of classified information have ended in plea agreements without jail time.

Mrs. Clinton's email arrangement involving a personal server has sparked several lawsuits, a congressional probe and several inspectors general investigations. The arrangement was legal at the time for unclassified information, but discouraged by Obama administration and State Department guidance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The State Department is facing lawsuits from news organizations and advocacy groups over access to her records, while the Republican-run House committee investigating the Benghazi attacks has repeatedly requested that her email server be turned over to a third party for forensic examination.

Members of Congress immediately seized on the latest disclosure, calling for a renewed investigation into Mrs. Clinton's email arrangement.

"If Secretary Clinton truly has nothing to hide, she can prove it by immediately turning over her server to the proper authorities and allowing them to examine the complete record," House Speaker John Boehner (R., Ohio) said in a statement.

Experts on government classification have noted that as head of the State Department, Mrs. Clinton had wide latitude to determine within her own department what information was classified and what information wasn't. But she also had an obligation to respect classification determinations made by other agencies, including intelligence services and other cabinet departments.

"Within the State Department, her classification authority is supreme. The only caveat to that is that not all the information in the State Department originates within the State Department," said Steven Aftergood, director of the Project on Government Secrecy at the Federation of American Scientists. "If it comes from CIA or other agencies, she is normally obligated to respect the classification judgments of those agencies."

The State Department has long played down concerns about the classified material found in Mrs. Clinton's emails, saying that information is often reclassified. The State Department said on Friday that it didn't believe any of the emails Mrs. Clinton sent during her time in office contained classified material.

"To our knowledge, none of them needed to be classified at the time," said Mark Toner, a department spokesman. Mr. Toner acknowledged that the department had determined that many of her emails now contained classified information, but believed it was unclassified at the time.

Thousands of pages of Mrs. Clinton's emails already have been posted online, and the State Department is reviewing thousands more for public release. In one instance, classified information has already been released to the public, the inspector general found.

Hillary Clinton to Testify Before Benghazi Panel // WSJ // Byron Tau - July 25, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has agreed to testify before a House committee investigating the deaths of four Americans in a 2012 terrorist attack in Benghazi, Libya.

Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination, said Saturday that she had accepted House Select Committee on Benghazi Chairman Trey Gowdy's invitation for an October appearance before the Republican-led panel.

A spokesman for the Benghazi committee said negotiations over Mrs. Clinton's appearance were ongoing and that her attorney's proposed ground rules for her testimony could yet derail an October date.

The committee said David Kendall, an attorney for Mrs. Clinton, was insisting that the questioning remain about only the Benghazi attacks and not Mrs. Clinton's use of personal email and that the hearing date would be fixed regardless of future developments. Republicans on the panel said they haven't agreed to those conditions and would push her on her use of a personal server.

"Her email arrangement clearly falls within the scope of the Select Committee's jurisdiction, which is charged by the House under the Resolution to look at Executive Branch efforts to comply with congressional oversight as well as the administration's response in the aftermath of the tragic attacks in Benghazi," said Jamal Ware, a spokesman for the Republicans on the committee.

Mr. Kendall didn't respond to a request for comment.

Mr. Merrill disputed the characterization that Mrs. Clinton wouldn't answer questions about her emails.

"We have made clear that we understand emails are in their jurisdiction. So unless the Committee now believes emails are no longer in its jurisdiction, we are in agreement," Mr. Merrill said in an email. He added: "We have no doubt Hillary Clinton can handle any question that they throw at her. And as the committee notes, her attorney has stated flatly that her emails are a part of that. Nothing about that has changed."

The committee has been investigating the attack on an American diplomatic facility in Benghazi that occurred while Mrs. Clinton was serving as secretary of state. That attack killed U.S. Ambassador to Libya Christopher Stevens and Foreign Service Officer Sean Smith, as well as Central Intelligence Agency contractors Tyrone Woods and Glen Doherty.

The attack occurred in the midst of President Barack Obama's re-election campaign and has been a flash point for criticism of the administration's foreign policy and Mrs. Clinton's management of security issues at the State Department.

Emails released by the State Department this year show that Mrs. Clinton received warnings from her top aides about the deteriorating security conditions in Libya in the months and years leading up to the attack.

Obama administration officials also initially blamed the attack on a spontaneous demonstration in response to an anti-Islamic Internet video before later acknowledging that it was likely carried out by an organized terrorist group.

The committee also has been investigating Mrs. Clinton's decision to use a personal email server while serving as head of the State Department. Mr. Gowdy, a South Carolina Republican, has repeatedly called for Mrs. Clinton turn over the server to a neutral third party to ensure that all relevant emails were in the hands of the committee.

Republicans on Capitol Hill have been pushing Mrs. Clinton to appear more than once to answer questions about the server. Mr. Gowdy requested a private transcribed interview with Mrs. Clinton in March to discuss her email arrangement.

Representatives for Mrs. Clinton haven't agreed to a closed-door session with the panel, saying there was "no reason" any questions couldn't be answered in public.

The select committee has also been probing the role that Sidney Blumenthal , a close confidante of the Clinton family, played during Mrs. Clinton's time at the State Department. The committee subjected Mr. Blumenthal to eight hours of closed-door testimony last month, probing his business dealings and professional relationship with Mrs. Clinton.

Democrats have charged that the committee's work has moved far away from its original mandate of investigating the terrorist attacks and has become a partisan tool to investigate a Democratic candidate for president.

"This Benghazi select committee has become the committee to investigate Hillary Clinton. Period," said Rep. Elijah Cummings, the top Democrat on the panel, in June.

The committee has previously said a final report on the attacks likely isn't due before next year.

Hillary Clinton Says She Didn't Use Personal Email Account to Send or Receive Secret Data // WSJ // Colleen McCain Nelson - July 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton said she didn't use her personal email account to send or receive classified information when she was Secretary of State, disputing a government intelligence watchdog's finding that her emails contained material that should have been considered secret.

Although the inspector general of the intelligence community concluded Mrs. Clinton sent at least four emails that included classified information, the front-running Democratic presidential hopeful was adamant on Saturday that she had sent only unclassified material from her personal account. “The facts are pretty clear: I did not send nor receive anything that was classified at the time,” Mrs. Clinton told reporters in Iowa.

The inspector general revealed its findings in a letter to Congress this week, reporting the emails in question contained material from the intelligence community that was classified when it was sent.

Mrs. Clinton said she didn’t know which specific emails had been flagged, but she suggested that perhaps the information had been classified at a later date. “What I’m hearing from the discussion that’s going on is that something that wasn’t classified should have been or maybe now should be,” she said. “That’s a very different issue.”

A spokeswoman for the inspector general has said the four emails “were classified when they were sent and are classified now.”

Mrs. Clinton cast questions about her emails as little more than an interagency squabble over which emails should be made public under freedom of information laws. “What I think you’re seeing here is a very typical kind of discussion, to some extent disagreement, among various parts of the government over what should or should not be publicly released,” she said.

The debate among government agencies “has nothing to do with me,” Mrs. Clinton added. “They can fight over it or argue over it. That’s up to them.”

The inspector general has referred the matter to the counterintelligence division of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The Justice Department initially said it had received a referral to open a criminal investigation but later reversed itself and said it wasn't a criminal referral.

Mrs. Clinton said very few issues had emerged in the 55,000 pages of emails she turned over from her own personal server. “We’re talking about four or fewer,” she said.

The inspector general has reviewed only about 40 of Mrs. Clinton’s emails, though, suggesting that more secret or top-secret information could be found in the thousands of pages that remain. The inspector general wrote that Mrs. Clinton should have used a secure network to transmit the four emails in question and that they shouldn’t have been transmitted with an unclassified personal system.

More bickering between Clinton team, House Benghazi panel // AP // Ken Thomas - July 25, 2015

The bickering has flared once more between Hillary Rodham Clinton's team and the Republican-led House committee investigating the Benghazi attacks, this time over negotiations for the former secretary of state's possible testimony.

A spokesman for the Democrat's presidential campaign, Nick Merrill, said Saturday she would testify in a public session Oct. 22 before lawmakers examining the deaths of four Americans in the 2012 attacks in Libya. Not so fast, the committee said.

Committee spokesman Jamal Ware said in an interview that the committee and Clinton's lawyer were "still in negotiation" and nothing has been finalized, including the date of an appearance and the terms under which she would testify.

Any Clinton testimony is likely to reverberate through the 2016 race. The committee is investigating the deaths of U.S. ambassador and three other Americans in the attack on the diplomatic facility in Libya. At the time, Clinton was the country's top diplomat.

In recent months, the inquiry has devolved into a political fight over Clinton's emails and private computer server. Republicans have seized upon revelations that Clinton chose to use a private email server, instead of a government one, and later deleted thousands of emails she said were not related to her work.

On Friday, government investigators disclosed that they had recently alerted the Justice Department to the potential compromise of classified information from Clinton's server.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The inspector general of the U.S. intelligence community sent a memo to members of Congress saying that "potentially hundreds of classified emails" were among those that Clinton had provided to the State Department.

Clinton last testified at two congressional hearings in January 2013, when she denied that the Obama administration tried to mislead the country about the Sept. 11, 2012, attacks. She took responsibility for the department's missteps and said it was attempting to strengthen security at diplomatic posts worldwide.

Hillary Clinton denies sending classified info from private server // Politico // Hadas Gold - July 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton said she is confident none of the emails she sent using her private email server while secretary as state contained information that was classified when she sent them.

Clinton, speaking to reporters Saturday after a presidential campaign event here, said she has “no idea” which are the four emails an inspector general review has determined were classified “secret” at the time.

“I am confident I never sent nor received any information that was classified at the time it was sent and received,” Clinton said. “What I think you’re seeing is a very typical kind of discussion to some extent, disagreement among various parts of the government over what should or what should not be publicly released.”

Clinton went on to say that she turned over 55,000 pages of emails to help the State Department, which had asked all living former secretaries to do the same in order to help with their record-keeping efforts. Clinton then said it was her own desire for transparency that had led to the arguments over levels of classification.

“Then I said, ‘Well let’s make it public.’ If I just turned it over, we would not be having this conversation, but when I said, ‘Hey I want this to be public’, it has to go through the FOIA process.

“That’s what’s going on here. I’m going to continue to say I want it to be made public as soon as it possibly can. And we will do whatever we can to try to get that process to move along,” she said.

Reports surfaced late this week that an inspector general review had found that at least four emails Clinton had kept on her server were classified “secret” at the time — a finding that calls into question her assertion in March that she took care to avoid sending classified materials.

News of the inspector general’s review was first reported late Thursday night by the New York Times — prompting a furious pushback from the Clinton campaign. The Times altered its initial story after complaints from the Clinton camp, along with the Justice Department’s clarification that the inspector general had not requested a criminal investigation.

Clinton said the question over classification is a common disagreement in the government.

“[T]he argument is over ‘this should’ve been done’ or ‘this now should be done.’ That has nothing to do with me. That is a discussion among various agencies within the government,” Clinton said. “This material is all on the unclassified system of the State Department. If we were not asking for it to be made public, there would not be a debate. This is all about my desire to have transparency and make the information public.”

Asked whether she thought the Justice Department should investigate the emails, Clinton said it’s up to them.

“They can fight or argue over it, that’s up to them. I can just tell you what the facts are, and there’s nothing contradicted in those facts I’m telling you by anything anyone has said so far,” she said.

Hillary Clinton agrees to appear before Benghazi panel // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti and Rachael Bade - July 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton agreed on Friday to appear at an October public hearing before the House Benghazi Committee, her campaign spokesman Nick Merrill said in a statement.

But the House Select Committee on Benghazi is pushing back against the 2016 Democratic frontrunner's Saturday-morning announcement.

A panel Republican source said although GOP staff and Clinton's legal team have been discussing dates for the past week or so — and seem to have settled on Oct. 22 — her lawyer David Kendall has asked for two basic conditions they've not agreed to: that the date not be moved and that the panel keep its questions within certain parameters.

"There is no agreed-upon date because there are no agreed upon conditions," said a Benghazi Republican source. "It's a leak by Nick Merrill because he wants you all to stop talking about her classified information."

Merrill, in response, disputed this characterization.

"We have no doubt Hillary Clinton can handle any question that they throw at her. And as the committee notes, her attorney has stated flatly that her emails are a part of that," he told POLITICO. "Nothing about that has changed."

But the negotiations between Clinton's lawyer and the committee do not appear settled. The panel released a statement Saturday afternoon saying it "will not, now or ever, accept artificial limitations on its congressionally-directed jurisdiction."

"Accordingly, once there is an agreement on the date and a better understanding of how, if at all, Secretary Clinton's lawyer's latest writing differs from previous ones, the Committee will announce said hearing date," said communications director Jamal Ware in the statement.

That both sides are trading dates and discussing conditions, however, is significant. Rep. Trey Gowdy of South Carolina, who is leading the investigation into the events of Sept. 11, 2012 — when four Americans, including U.S. Amb. Chris Stevens, were killed in Benghazi, Libya — initially requested private meetings with the former secretary of state, but Clinton's camp had long insisted on a public hearing.

Democrats have accused Gowdy of continuously delaying the hearing in hopes of dragging the investigation into the 2016 presidential election cycle. But Gowdy has said he needs all the relevant documents first, since he only gets one bite at the apple — and the State Department has come under fire for its slow pace in producing key emails.

News of their discussions came hours following reports that an inspector general review found that at least four emails Clinton had kept on her server were classified "secret" at the time — a finding that calls into question her assertion in March that she took care to avoid sending classified materials. The Clinton camp's statement on Saturday morning did not directly address this finding.

News of the inspector general's review was first reported late Thursday night by the New York Times — prompting a furious pushback from the Clinton campaign, which continued to attack the story on Saturday morning. The Times altered its initial story after complaints from the Clinton camp, along with the Justice Department's clarification that the inspector general had not requested a criminal investigation.

"Friday began with the printing of a story that was false. Entities from the highest levels of two branches of government have now made that clear," Merrill said.

"We have had a chance to review the statement released by the Inspectors General of the State Department and Intelligence Community outlining their concerns with regard to the State Department's review and release of Hillary Clinton's work emails," he added.

"None of the emails we reviewed had classification or dissemination markings, but some included [Intelligence Community]-derived classified information and should have been handled and transmitted via a secure network," Intelligence Community Inspector General I. Charles McCullough III said in a letter to congressional committee leaders Thursday.

Clinton aides deny that she knowingly handled classified information improperly, and point to a dispute between government agencies over what should be classified.

"We want to ensure that appropriate procedures are followed as these emails are reviewed while not unduly delaying the release of her emails. We particularly do not want their release to be hampered by bureaucratic infighting among the Intelligence Community. More emails are slated to be released by the State Department next week, and we hope that release is as inclusive as possible," Merrill said.

"There have been recent examples, such as the Senate Intelligence Committee's report on torture, where release of information was delayed because of disagreements among agencies, and we hope that will not happen here," he said.

Clinton addressed the controversy directly at a campaign event in Iowa on Saturday.

"I am confident I never sent nor received any information that was classified at the time it was sent and received," she said. "What I think you're seeing is a very typical kind of discussion to some extent, disagreement among various parts of the government over what should or what should not be publicly released."

The Benghazi committee is pushing back against the notion that they scheduled the hearing specifically because of the news of Clinton's classified emails. GOP panel sources said discussions about dates and a public hearing for Clinton were ongoing well before Thursday's news.

Although Kendall, Clinton's lawyer, approved the October date Friday, he also asked that the date wouldn't change and for assurances that questions would remain within certain parameters.

The former requirement is significant because the panel has pushed back not only Clinton's hearing but also interviews with top Clinton staff, such as Huma Abedin, because, Gowdy has said, the State Department hasn't turned over relevant documents. Republicans say they can't formulate their questions until they have all of Clinton and her staff's relevant communications. The department counters that document production just takes time, though even federal judges have blasted State in recent days for the slow pace.

The sources say the latter requirement — limiting the scope of questions — is the bigger issue, particularly if Clinton's lawyers seek to limit the panel from looking into her involvement with the Clinton Foundation or her email practices, which they believe may have influenced U.S. Libya policy and, therefore, happened that tragic day.

And until those conditions are agreed upon, having a date means nothing.

"You don't ask a girl to dance then set a wedding date," the source said. "We've gone from eating snow cones to picking out baby names in 24 hours."

Even before the the GOP announced its pushback to the Clinton announcement, Democrats sniped that the date could change:

"Given how Republicans have denied scheduling hearings and other events [in] the past, however, all we can confirm at this point is that the date was offered and accepted, not that the Republicans will stick to it," said a Benghazi Democratic spokesperson.

Republicans, Hillary Clinton Team Bicker Over Scope of Benghazi Hearing // Bloomberg // Chris Strohm - July 25, 2015

House Republicans and the presidential campaign of Hillary Clinton sparred Saturday over the details of having her testify publicly before a House panel investigating the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya.

The tensions came one day after a report from the U.S. intelligence community's inspector general that a personal e-mail account used by Clinton when she was secretary of state contained some information that should have been classified and secured. The inspector general said no e-mails reviewed by its office were labeled as classified.

The latest squabble centered on the ground rules for an expected public hearing with Clinton before the House Select Committee on Benghazi. The committee is investigating actions taken by Clinton, a 2016 Democratic presidential candidate, following the attacks that left U.S. Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens and three others dead.

Clinton's spokesman, Nick Merrill, said on Saturday that Clinton had reached an agreement with the panel's chairman, Republican Representative Trey Gowdy of South Carolina, to testify on Oct. 22.

The claim was quickly challenged by the committee's spokesman, Jamal Ware, who said there was no deal yet and that the two sides were still hashing out the timing and scope of Clinton's appearance. Ware said in an e-mailed statement that negotiations were "ongoing" between the committee and Clinton's lawyer David Kendall.

Clear Front-Runner

Holding a hearing in late October would come little more than three months before voters head to the polls to start choosing the Democratic nominee for president. Clinton leads her nearest Democratic competitor by about 40 percentage points, according to an average of recent polls by Real Clear Politics.

Some of the tension apparently has to do with how far the committee can go in questioning Clinton's use of a private e-mail account and server while she was secretary of state. The account contained some information that should have been classified and transmitted over a secure network, according to a report from the U.S. intelligence community's inspector general, Charles McCullough III.

The federal watchdog asked the FBI to review whether potentially classified material had been jeopardized during a State Department review of the documents in preparation for releasing them publicly.

Classified Material

The FBI referral followed a June 29 memo that McCullough and the State Department's inspector general sent to Undersecretary of State Patrick Kennedy, saying that hundreds of e-mails in Clinton's private account may improperly have contained classified material.

The Benghazi panel believes that Clinton's e-mail arrangement falls within the scope of its jurisdiction, Ware said.

"The committee will not, now or ever, accept artificial limitations on its congressionally-directed jurisdiction or efforts to meet the responsibilities assigned to the committee by the House of Representatives," Ware said.

Merrill said in response that Clinton's camp has "made clear that we understand e-mails are in their jurisdiction. So unless the committee now believes e-mails are no longer in its jurisdiction, we are in agreement."

More Clinton e-mails are expected to be released by the State Department next week, Merrill also said.

"We want to ensure that appropriate procedures are followed as these e-mails are reviewed while not unduly delaying the release of her e-mails," he said. "We particularly do not want their release to be hampered by bureaucratic infighting among the intelligence community."

Hillary Clinton to Lay Out Climate, Renewable Energy Policy in Iowa // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein - July 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrat Hillary Clinton will unveil her policy agenda on climate and renewable energy on Sunday and Monday in Iowa, the center of the U.S. ethanol industry.

"We also have to finally get serious about climate change and clean renewable energy," Clinton said Saturday, She spoke at an event in a private home in the Des Moines neighborhood of Beaverdale, a center of Democratic activism in the state that will hold the first presidential nominating contest of 2016.

"It is not only the obviously right thing to do -– there is a lot of economic opportunity," said Clinton.

Comparing her climate objectives to the ambitious goals that former President John F. Kennedy set at the beginning of the 1960s on travel to the moon, Clinton said she she plans to "set some really ambitious goals for our country that, once again, I know we can meet."

Iowa is the nation's largest producer of ethanol, a renewable fuel that in the U.S. is made mostly from corn. It accounted for 28 percent of U.S. fuel ethanol production in 2014, according to the Renewable Fuels Association.

Clinton, frontrunner for the 2016 Democratic nomination, has been gradually laying out her policy proposals. On Friday she spoke of a plan to raise capital gains taxes and discourage the "hit-and-run" tactics of some activist investors.

Hillary Clinton Says She Didn't Send or Receive Information Classified at the Time // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein - July 25, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton said Saturday that she neither sent nor received materials considered classified at the time through the private e-mail account she used while serving as secretary of state.

"I am confident that I never sent nor received any information that was classified at the time it was sent and received," she told reporters in Winterset, Iowa, after news emerged this week that a federal watchdog had asked the FBI to review whether potentially classified material in her e-mails had been jeopardized during a State Department review of the messages ahead of public release.

"The facts are pretty clear," she said, reiterating her campaign's message on Friday as news of the referral unfolded.

The current confusion, Clinton said, comes from disagreements between federal agencies about whether certain information should have been characterized as classified at the time.

"What I think you're seeing here is a very typical kind of discussion—to some extent disagreement—among various parts of the government over what should or should not be publicly released," she said.

In a line of argument similar to the defense from the candidate and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, about some of the Clinton Foundation's controversial donors, Hillary Clinton said the debate over whether some messages should have been classified had only become an issue because of her request that the State Department release her e-mails in the interest of transparency.

"If I just turned it over, we would not be having this conversation," she said. "But when I said, 'Hey, I want it to be public,' it has to go through the FOIA [Freedom of Information Act] process. That's what's going on here. And I am going to continue to say that I want it to be made public as soon as it possibly can. And we will do whatever we can to try to get the process to move along."

Clinton ducked a question about whether the Justice Department should investigate the possible transmission of classified materials through unsecured channels.

"They can fight over it or argue over it. That's up to them," she said, holding up her palms to the reporters questioning her. "I can just tell you what the facts are. And there is nothing contradicted in those facts by anything that anybody has said so far."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A report from the federal watchdog said the office had found four e-mails out of a sample for 40 containing classified intelligence community information that should have been marked and handled at the secret level.

Asked whether she knew what those four e-mails were, Clinton said, "I have no idea."

Clinton: I did not send or get classified emails on private account // Reuters // Alana Wise - July 25, 2015

U.S. presidential candidate Hillary Clinton said on Saturday that she did not use a private email account to send or receive classified information while she was secretary of state, in response to a government inspector's letter this week.

"I did not send nor receive anything that was classified at the time," Clinton said at a campaign stop in Iowa.

The email controversy has dogged Clinton's bid for the presidency, fuelling worries that the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination has tried to sidestep transparency and record-keeping laws.

At least four emails from the private email account that Clinton used while secretary of state contained classified information, Inspector General Charles McCullough, who oversees U.S. intelligence agencies, told members of Congress in a letter on Thursday.

Clinton said on Saturday she had "no idea" what were the emails mentioned in the letter.

McCullough's letter said a sampling of 40 of about 30,000 emails sent or received by Clinton found at least four that contained information the government had classified as secret.

The information was classified at the time that the emails were sent, McCullough said.

The use of her private email account, linked to a server in her New York home for work, has drawn fire from political opponents since coming to light in March.

Republicans have accused Clinton of trying to avoid disclosure laws through her use of private systems.

The frontrunner to represent the Democratic Party in the November 2016 election, Clinton has repeatedly said she broke no laws or rules by eschewing a standard government email account.

While Clinton faces little competition for the Democratic Party's nomination, several recent polls have found a majority of voters find her untrustworthy, a perception potentially exacerbated by controversy over her emails.

Exclusive: AFL-CIO may delay endorsement of Clinton as 2016 presidential candidate – sources // Reuters // Luciana Lopez - July 25, 2015

In a possible setback for Hillary Clinton, the AFL-CIO's political committee has recommended the nation's largest labor union federation delay endorsing a candidate for the 2016 presidential race as it seeks to push her to be more supportive of its policies on issues such as trade and wages.

The committee on Monday voted unanimously to support the proposal, three union sources told Reuters. The recommendation will be presented at a July

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

29-30 meeting of the executive council of the federation, which will make the final decision. It could reject the recommendation and still go ahead with an endorsement, though one of the sources said that is unlikely.

The move highlights the pressures Clinton is facing to take a tough stand against the Trans-Pacific Partnership, a proposed free trade deal backed by President Barack Obama but vigorously opposed by unions who see it as detrimental to jobs and wages in the U.S. Unions also want her to back labor-friendly policies on other issues, such as the minimum wage and the Federal Reserve.

The length of any delay in an endorsement may depend on how satisfied union leaders are with Clinton's stance on TPP over the next few months.

Clinton, as well as Democrat rivals for the party's nomination in the presidential race, Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley, and one of the candidates in the Republican race, Mike Huckabee, will be grilled by union leaders on the TPP and other issues at next week's meeting.

"There will not be an endorsement now," said a source who was at the political committee meeting on Monday. "There will be a lot of healthy discussion about how we approach the election."

QUELLING REVOLT

Delaying an endorsement would also give the affiliated unions time to hear from their members and let the democratic process play out as labor eventually coalesces behind a candidate, the source said.

An endorsement now from the AFL-CIO would be a major boon to Clinton. It would provide her with both a symbolic and practical boost given labor's traditional role in raising money and mobilizing voters for the Democratic Party. That would be especially helpful to Clinton as she seeks to build a broad coalition within her party to fend off a challenge on her left from Vermont Senator Sanders, who has eaten away at her lead in recent polls.

While the federation, an umbrella group of 56 unions representing more than 12.5 million workers, is expected to support the eventual Democratic nominee, an early nod could help Clinton build grassroots support so that she could go into a presidential election from a stronger position.

A request for comment to the AFL-CIO was not immediately returned. Its President Richard Trumka said earlier this year that it was "conceivable" that the AFL-CIO would not endorse any candidate in the 2016 race.

The federation has been trying to quell a revolt in its ranks as some local unions have declared their support for Sanders, who is known for his progressive stance and who has spoken out strongly against the TPP.

In contrast, Clinton has simply said that any final trade agreement needs to include strong worker protections and that she will reserve judgment until a completed deal is presented. Negotiators from the U.S, and 11 other nations from the Pacific Rim, including Japan, Vietnam, Malaysia, Australia, Mexico and Canada, are meeting in the next week in Hawaii in an attempt to reach a final agreement.

The trade deal will likely be the top issue at the two-day gathering of the AFL-CIO, which represents workers in a wide range of occupations, from brick layers to machinists to nurses.

The issue is a difficult one for Clinton, who was secretary of state in Obama's first term and an influential player in the administration's effort to build stronger ties with Asia. Obama administration officials view the TPP as a crucial part of its "pivot" to Asia.

But Clinton has found some support, as well. The American Federation of Teachers earlier this month announced its endorsement of her – despite a request from Trumka recently that the affiliated unions hold off on such moves until the federation makes its own pick. The endorsement was contentious within the AFT, with a number of members posting angry comments to the union's Facebook page after the decision was announced.

Even if the federation holds off on its endorsement, more of the affiliated unions could pick candidates soon.

At a meeting of the Utility Workers Union of America in Florida this week, Bernie Sanders won 65 percent of the vote in cell phone poll of the 400 elected delegates to the convention. Clinton won 23 percent, with Martin O'Malley taking 7 percent and the combined Republican field winning 5 percent.

Still, some labor leaders suggest Sanders is highly unlikely to get official AFL-CIO backing unless he brings off a shock win and defeats Clinton to become the party's nominee. Most unions are expected to endorse Clinton if, as widely expected, she gets the nomination.

"At the end of the day there's not going to be a split," Thomas Buffenbarger, president of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, told Reuters earlier this month. "I don't see any union running to any Republican candidate."

Clinton, congressional Benghazi panel at odds over appearance date // Reuters // Bill Trott - July 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign said on Saturday the former secretary of state will testify on Oct. 22 before a House committee investigating the 2012 Benghazi, Libya, attacks, but a spokesman for the panel said no date had been set.

Republican Representative Trey Gowdy, chairman of the Benghazi investigation committee, had sought to hear from Clinton on the attacks, in which four Americans were killed, and her use of a private email account while she was America's top diplomat.

A spokesman for Clinton, the front-runner in polls for the Democratic nomination in next year's presidential election, said she had accepted an offer from the committee to testify on Oct. 22.

"Earlier this week we were pleased for Secretary Clinton to receive an offer from Congressman Gowdy to appear before the committee in a public hearing in October, and yesterday accepted his invitation," campaign spokesman Nick Merrill said in an emailed statement. He said the date was Oct. 22.

A few hours after the Clinton campaign announced her planned appearance, Jamal Ware, spokesman for the Benghazi committee, said the date was not firm.

"Secretary Clinton's campaign may want to reach out to her lawyer, Mr. David Kendall, with whom the Committee has had ongoing conversations," Ware said in a statement. "As of last night, Mr. Kendall was still negotiating conditions for her appearance."

Ware said the conditions proposed by Kendall were that the date of her testimony not change once it was set and that questioning of Clinton stay within parameters set by the resolution that established the committee.

However, a Democratic spokesman for the Benghazi committee said Gowdy's staff had proposed dates in October and that Clinton's attorney had accepted Oct. 22.

Clinton was secretary of state at the time of the Sept. 11, 2012, attacks by Islamic militants on U.S. diplomatic facilities in Benghazi, which resulted in the deaths of Ambassador Chris Stevens and three other Americans.

Congressional Republicans have scrutinized Clinton's handling of the incident and criticized the lack of security at the U.S. compound.

Clinton has also been engulfed in a controversy over her use of a private email server instead of a government account while she was secretary of state.

At least four emails out of some 30,000 from that private account contained classified information, according to a government inspector's letter to Congress this week.

House Benghazi panel says no date set for Clinton testimony // Reuters // Eric Beech - July 25, 2015

The U.S. House committee investigating the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya, said on Saturday that no date has been set for Hillary Clinton's testimony before the panel, contradicting a Clinton campaign spokesman who said the former secretary of state would appear on Oct. 22.

"Secretary Clinton's campaign may want to reach out to her lawyer, Mr. David Kendall, with whom the Committee has had ongoing conversations. As of last night, Mr. Kendall was still negotiating conditions for her appearance," the committee said in a statement.

Clinton campaign, Republicans clash over Benghazi testimony // CNN // Dan Merica - July 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton's campaign said Saturday morning that she will publicly testify before the House Select Committee on Benghazi on Oct. 22. But a committee spokesman later said the former secretary of state's lawyer was demanding limitations on the questioning, casting doubt over whether she'll appear.

Clinton was invited to appear before the committee investigating the Sept. 11, 2012 terrorist attack earlier this week, and the former secretary of state and 2016 presidential candidate accepted that invitation on Friday, campaign spokesman Nick Merrill said.

Merrill said Clinton was "pleased" to receive the invitation to a public hearing from committee chairman Rep. Trey Gowdy. A Democratic Benghazi Commitee spokesperson told CNN that Gowdy offered several dates in October.

But Jamal Ware, the select committee's communications director, disputed that a date had been set, saying that Clinton's lawyer, David Kendall, was insisting that the scope of the questioning be limited to the Benghazi attack -- and not other subjects, such as Libya and her use of a private email server, as Ware claims Kendall had previously agreed to -- and that the hearing date would not change.

"The committee will not, now or ever, accept artificial limitations on its congressionally-directed jurisdiction or efforts to meet the responsibilities assigned to the committee by the House of Representatives," Ware said in a statement. "Accordingly, once there is an agreement on the date and a better understanding of how, if at all, Secretary Clinton's lawyer's latest writing differs from previous ones, the committee will announce said hearing date."

A message left with Clinton's campaign regarding Ware's statement was not immediately returned Saturday afternoon.

The latest development on Clinton's testimony comes after a protracted back and forth between the Republican-controlled committee and Clinton's allies on Capitol Hill and in Washington. Republicans contend that the committee is solely interested in looking into the terrorist attack that killed four Americans -- including Ambassador Christopher J. Stevens -- while Clinton was secretary of state. Clinton's supporters argue that Gowdy's committee has become nothing more than a political arm of the Republican Party, looking to score points against Clinton ahead of the 2016 presidential campaign.

Clinton agreed to testify before the committee in May. Gowdy, however, rejected that offer and asked the secretary to appear twice -- once on her exclusive use of a private email server while at State and another in regard to the Benghazi attack.

Kendall, who has spearheaded Clinton's communication with the committee, said the former first lady would only testify once on both topics and offered to do it during the week of May 18 or later.

The date came and went, however, with no testimony.

When it became clear Clinton would have to testify before the committee, her allies and campaign aides had hoped that testimony would happen earlier rather than later in the hopes of not allowing Gowdy to drag the testimony into the heat of the 2016 contest. Clinton's aides, however, have told reporters that they are confident the former senator would be able to hold her own in front of the committee.

The top Democrat on the committee, Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, accused Gowdy last week of overstepping the bounds of his committee.

"It appears that much of the Select Committee's work has been shelved while Republicans pursue every possible avenue of political attack against Secretary Clinton," Cummings said in a letter to Gowdy. "These actions by the Select Committee -- which lack any legitimate basis -- serve only to delay its work further into the election season and subject it to increasingly widespread criticism for its highly partisan actions."

Gowdy has maintained, however, that he is only interested in getting to the bottom of the Benghazi attack and Republicans have complimented him for leaving politics out of it.

Clinton's email gained renewed focus on Friday after the inspector general for the intelligence community has informed members of Congress that some material Hillary Clinton emailed from her private server contained classified information, but it was not identified that way when they were sent. Because it was not identified, it is unclear whether Clinton realized she was potentially compromising classified information.

The story emboldened Republicans on Friday to call for Clinton to turn over the private email server she used as secretary of state.

"The number of questions surrounding Secretary Clinton's unusual email arrangement continues to grow," Gowdy said in a statement on Friday. "The best -- the only way -- to resolve these important factual questions is for her to turn over her server to the proper authorities for independent forensic evaluation."

Clinton turned over 55,000 pages of emails to the State Department earlier this year and the Benghazi committee is in the process of going through those messages.

Clinton on emails: 'The facts are pretty clear' // CNN // Eugene Scott - July 25, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Saturday said she did not send classified emails from her private server while she was secretary of state.

"I am confident that I never sent nor received any information that was classified at the time it was sent and received," Clinton told reporters in Winterset, Iowa.

She added that the latest controversy is an example of disagreement among various parts of the government about what should or should not be publicly released.

Clinton's remarks come after The New York Times reported Thursday night that inspectors general for the intelligence community and the State Department had asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation into Clinton's possible mishandling of classified email. But the paper significantly revised its story the next day to say the matter was referred to Justice to examine whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection with Clinton's account -- but not necessarily by Clinton.

On Friday, CNN reported that the inspector general for the intelligence community had informed members of Congress that some material Clinton emailed from her private server contained classified information, but it was not identified that way.

Because it was not identified, it is unclear whether Clinton realized she was potentially compromising classified information. The IG reviewed a "limited sampling" of her emails, and among those 40 reviewed, found that "four contained classified (intelligence community) information," wrote the IG Charles McCullough in a letter to Congress.

The inspector general's office has confirmed it has asked the Justice Department to look into how the State Department handled the classification of documents, but emphasized it was not requesting a criminal investigation.

Clinton said she has no idea what are the four specific emails the inspector general was talking about in his letter to Congress.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"But the facts are pretty clear," Clinton said. "I did not send or receive anything that was classified at the time."

Clinton told reporters she turned over 55,000 pages of emails to help the State Department, because officials asked all former secretaries to provide any information possible to help with their record keeping.

"So I did, but then I said, 'Okay, so let's make it public,'" she said. "Now if I had just turned it over, we would not be having this conversation."

Clinton said her desire to make things public requires that it goes through the public records request process.

"If we were not asking for it to be made public, there would not be a debate. This is all about my desire to have transparency and make the information public," she said.

All of the emails are already on the unclassified system of the State Department, Clinton said.

"The vast majority of anything that I sent or received was already on the State Department system, the unclassified State Department system," she said. "In order to respond to freedom of information requests, you'd have to go through the same process."

Hillary Clinton agrees to testify before Benghazi committee in October // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald - July 25, 2015

For more than four years, Wyatt Cenac held one of the most coveted jobs in American comedy, serving as a writer and on-air contributor for “The Daily Show.” But in 2012, Cenac quit that job, even though he had no new gig lined up to replace it. On a recent episode of Marc Maron’s “WTF” poodcast, Cenac revealed that his departure was the product of an emotionally traumatizing fight he’d had with Jon Stewart, over whether or not one of the host’s jokes was racially insensitive.

In 2011, African-American pizza magnate Herman Cain was – briefly – a leading candidate for the Republican presidential nomination. Among Cain’s signature policies was a proposal for all congressional bills to be limited to three pages. On “The Daily Show,” Stewart mocked the anti-intellectualism of Cain’s proposal by impersonating the candidate, saying in an approximation of Cain’s own loud, affectedly southern voice, “Bills will be three pages! If I am president, treaties will have to fit on the back of a cereal box! From now on, the State of the Union address will be delivered in the form of a fortune cookie! I am Herman Cain, and I do not like to read.”

Cenac told Maron that the bit made him cringe.

“I don’t think this is from a malicious place, but I think this is from a naïve, ignorant place,” Cenac said he remembered remembered thinking, when he first watched the segment.

“I represent my community, I represent my people,” Cenac continued. “I gotta be honest if something seems questionable, because if not, then I don’t want to be in a position where I am being untrue not just to myself but to my culture, because that’s exploitative.”

In a writer’s meeting, Cenac told Stewart that the voice reminded him of Kingfish, an African-American caricature from the show “Amos ‘n’ Andy.” According to Cenac, Stewart then “exploded.”

“He got incredibly defensive. I remember he was like, ‘What are you trying to say? There’s a tone in your voice.’ I was like, ‘There’s no tone. It bothered me. It sounded like Kingfish.’ And then he got upset. And he stood up and he was just like, ‘F— off. I’m done with you.’ And he just started screaming that to me. And he screamed it a few times. ‘F— off! I’m done with you.’ And he stormed out. And I didn’t know if I had been fired.”

Spokespeople for “The Daily Show” did not immediately respond to msnbc’s request for comment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Stewart would later apologize for yelling at Cenac, but maintained his belief that the voice was an exaggeration of Cain's, and not a racist caricature, a position shared by at least some black commentators at the time.

Cenac said the dispute devastated him. The comedian told Maron that his father was murdered when he was very young, and that the loss left him looking for substitute father figures for the rest of his life. Cenac said he had hoped that Stewart might serve as a personal mentor. But the host kept his relationship with the show's writers strictly, coldly professional, according to Cenac, who said the shouting match was the first real conversation the two had ever had.

"It's a sobering moment when you see that this person you've turned into a hero is just a mortal," he said of the encounter.

Cenac's disappointment with Stewart was exacerbated by the sense of isolation that came with always being the only African-American in the writer's room. After the fight, Cenac walked to the baseball field across from the studio and broke down.

"I was shaking, and I just sat there by myself on the bleachers and f—— cried. And it's a sad thing. That's how I feel. That's how I feel in this job. I feel alone," he said.

He stayed on the show for a year after the incident but never stopped feeling sad and uncomfortable with what had happened.

When Stewart announced his retirement, Cenac sent him an email offering his congratulations, and thanked Stewart for giving the opportunity to contribute to the show.

"He wrote back. And it seemed like a nice fence-mending," Cenac said. "We tossed back and forth a joke about football."

Recently, Cenac received an invitation to appear on Stewart's final episode as host of "The Daily Show," which will air on August 6. Cenac told Maron that he didn't want to attend because he and Stewart had never resolved what had happened between them.

He ended up writing Stewart a long email, laying out all his feelings on the fight and the tense year that followed.

"He thought that fight we got into was just two people having an argument. And so the emotion of it, he never really saw," Cenac said. "He apologized as much as he could, for if I felt hurt and he said, 'I'd love for you to be at the last show because I helped to build this thing' … And I appreciated that. I still don't know if I'm going to show up."

Hillary Clinton: Emails were not marked as classified // MSNBC // Kristen Welker - July 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Saturday said she's confident nothing marked classified was relayed in her private emails while she was secretary of state.

Two inspectors general have asked the Department of Justice to investigate whether classified information was mishandled in relation to Clinton's use of a private email account.

The Justice Department mistakenly told reporters that the request was for a criminal investigation, then corrected itself and said the request was not a criminal referral.

Clinton, who is seeking the Democratic presidential nomination, said "there was a disagreement between various agencies" as to whether the four emails in question should have been classified when they were sent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I did not receive anything that was marked as classified,” Clinton told reporters after a campaign event in Winterset, Iowa.

“What I think you’re seeing here is a very typical kind of discussion, to some extent disagreement, among various parts of the government over what should or should not be publicly released,” Clinton said.

Clinton has been under fire by critics for her use of a private email kept on a private server while she served as secretary of state. Clinton has said she wanted the emails to be public, and turned over 55,000 pages of emails to the State Department for release.

A Justice Department official said Friday afternoon that “The Department has received a referral related to the potential compromise of classified information,” but noted that it was not a criminal referral.

In a joint statement, the two inspectors general who made the referral said that it was “a security referral made for counterintelligence purposes.”

But, they added, they found that a sample of 40 of Clinton’s emails from Clinton’s server contained four with classified information that should “never have been transmitted via an unclassified personal system.”

Hillary’s inconceivably stupid capital-gains tax scheme // NBC // Larry Kudlow - July 25, 2015

In her latest economic speech, Clinton proposes doubling the capital-gains tax rate on the profit made from asset sales (stocks, bonds, real estate) held a day less than one year up to two years. Right now, if you take a capital gain a day more than one year, you are taxed at a 20 percent rate. Actually, it's 23.8 percent when you include the health-care surtax. So under Clinton's brilliant new play, you'd be taxed at 43.4 percent — the top individual cap-gains rate of 39.6 percent plus the 3.8 percent Obamacare surtax.

That means, instead of keeping 80 cents on the additional dollar of profit, you'd only keep 56.6 cents — a 30-percentage-point reduction in the take-home-pay reward for taking an extra dollar's investment risk.

This will create a tall barrier to investment — what we don't need. If you tax something more, you get less of it.

Clinton complains about too much "short-termism" in the economy. But her program might well create more of it. That's because she has a sliding tax-rate scale, whereby assets held two to three years would be taxed at 39.8 percent and assets held three to four years at 35.8 percent. And you don't get back to the statutory 20 percent cap-gains rate unless you hold an asset for six-plus years.

Who's going to lock themselves into that? What if new investment opportunities arise? Want to convert your current holding into cash so you can invest in your brother-in-law's start-up? Maybe it's the next Facebook. Who knows? The point is, the Clinton plan exacts a huge tax penalty on the movement from old capital to new.

Read MoreClinton rakes in Wall Street cash amid tough talk

The late Jude Wanniski called this re-oxygenating the economy. Ms. Clinton would snuff that out. Her short-termism fear will lock us into long-term economic stagnation.

By the way, the numbers are actually worse, because capital gains are already taxed as corporate profits. What investors pay is a double tax.

So let's go back to Hillary's top cap-gains rate of 43.8 percent. The government takes 35 percent of your profit in corporate taxes, leaving 65 cents to be taxed a second time as capital gains at the new 43.8 percent rate. That results in a take-home profit of 37 cents on the dollar.

Is that enough to reward the risk of investing in the next Uber? Except for Mayor Bill de Blasio, who hates Uber, most people would say no.

But that's Hillary's plan.

How powerful is the capital-gains tax? The non-partisan Tax Foundation rates it among the top three economic-growth influences on the economy, along with full cash-expensing for new investment in plants and equipment and the corporate tax. And compared with the rest of the world, the U.S. has fallen far behind in terms of this investment-tax-penalty grouping.

This is government tinkering at its worst. The reality is that Hillary Clinton is attempting to punish success and redistribute income.

Did someone say tax the rich? Clinton proposes an income threshold of $484,850 for married couples filing jointly. Oh my gosh! Successful economic activists! Let's get 'em!

Ironically, history shows that periods of higher capital-gains tax rates produce less revenue as a share of all federal revenue and as a fraction of GDP. Hillary's not even redistributing efficiently.

And then there's what some call the "Charles Gibson effect." Gibson interviewed then-Senator Obama in 2008 for ABC News. Obama said he'd raise the cap-gains tax from 15 percent to 28 percent. But Gibson reminded Obama that when Bill Clinton and George Bush lowered cap-gains tax rates, revenues actually increased. In other words, the Laffer curve. But Obama said it didn't matter because he wanted to be "fair."

It also doesn't matter to Hillary. She wants to beat Bernie Sanders, or at least cuddle up to the Vermont socialist. What nonsense. Bad economics and bad politics. Voters will understand this.

Personal income, corporate profits, capital gains, dividends — everything. But that still leaves me with a double-tax problem for investment and savings. So it's probably time to blow up the corporate-tax code altogether. That would get us to the 4-percent-plus growth path advocated by some of the Republicans on the campaign trail.

And that would get us some "long-termism" economic growth — just what the country yearns for.

Hillary Clinton Says She's 'Confident' She Did Not Send or Receive Classified Information // ABC // Liz Kreutz - July 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton today brushed off a new investigation into whether she sent or received classified information on her personal email address while at the State Department, telling reporters she is "confident" she did not.

"First, let me say that I am confident that I never sent nor received any information that was classified at the time it was sent and received," Clinton told reporters at the Third District Democrats Summer Wine Down in Winterset. "I think you're seeing here is a very typical kind of discussion, to some extent disagreement, among various parts of the government over what should or should not be publicly released."

Clinton went on to explain that she did not have to make all of her emails available to the public when she turned them over to the State Department, and argued that the new investigation is only a consequence of her doing so.

"If I just turned it over, we would not be having this conversation. But when I said, 'Hey, I want it to be public,' it has to go through the FOIA process. That's what's going on here," Clinton said. "This is all about my desire to have transparency and to make the information public."

Clinton's comments come amid a new development into Clinton's controversial use of a private email address while at the State Department.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Internal investigators for the intelligence community say that of the 55,000 emails Clinton turned over to the State Department, at least four –- and potentially hundreds more –- included classified national security information when they were sent on her private email account and home server.

The investigation has renewed questions about whether Clinton did send classified material over email, something she adamantly denied back in March when it was first revealed that she used her private server for business.

Today Clinton doubled down on her beliefs, saying, "The facts are pretty clear: I did not send nor receive anything that was classified at the time."

Clinton also revealed today that she is planning to testify before the House Committee investigating the Benghazi terrorist attacks in late October. During the hearing, which will be public, Clinton will likely also take questions on her use of email.

Dispute Continues Over Hillary Clinton Testifying Before Benghazi Panel // TIME // Zeke J. Miller - July 25, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's campaign and the House Benghazi Committee remain at loggerheads over the conditions under which she would testify before the committee, probing the killing of four Americans in the September 2012 attack in Libya.

Clinton campaign spokesman Nick Merrill announced Saturday that Clinton had agreed to testify before the committee in a public hearing in October, but the committee's communications director, Jamal Ware, said no agreement had in fact been reached.

"Earlier this week we were pleased for Secretary Clinton to receive an offer from Congressman Gowdy to appear before the committee in a public hearing in October, and yesterday accepted his invitation," Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill said in a statement.

"Secretary Clinton's campaign may want to reach out to her lawyer, Mr. David Kendall, with whom the Committee has had ongoing conversations," Ware said. "As of last night, Mr. Kendall was still negotiating conditions for her appearance."

According to Ware, Kendall had two conditions for Clinton testify: that the questions be limited in scope to the Benghazi committee's jurisdiction, and that the date remain firm despite the State Department's alleged slow production of documents to the committee.

In recent months the committee has expanded its purview into investigating Clinton's use of a private email server rather than a government email account. On Friday, a pair of inspectors general announced that they had found messages containing classified information among the 30,000 emails Clinton has turned over from the server, contrary to Clinton's assertion in March. The inspector general for the intelligence community also notified the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the possible compromise of classified information being kept outside of government control, in reference to Clinton's private server.

Ware said the committee believes that the email issue is well within its purview.

"Her email arrangement clearly falls within the scope of the Select Committee's jurisdiction, which is charged by the House under the Resolution to look at Executive Branch efforts to comply with congressional oversight as well as the administration's response in the aftermath of the tragic attacks in Benghazi," he said.

A public hearing would mark a small victory for Clinton, who has pushed to testify in public, despite committee chairman Rep. Trey Gowdy's hopes for her to testify in a classified setting.

Clinton Aide: Hillary Clinton To Testify Before Benghazi Committee In October // HuffPo // Sam Levine - July 25, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton will publicly testify before the House Select Committee on Benghazi on Oct. 22, a Clinton spokesperson told The Washington Post on Saturday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That date was disputed by Jamal Ware, the committee's communications director, who said in a Saturday statement that the panel and Clinton's lawyer were still negotiating the conditions of her appearance as of Friday evening.

“Secretary Clinton's campaign may want to reach out to her lawyer, Mr. David Kendall, with whom the Committee has had ongoing conversations. As of last night, Mr. Kendall was still negotiating conditions for her appearance," Ware said in the statement.

A Clinton spokesman did not return a request for comment.

Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), the committee's chairman, asked Clinton in March to appear before a closed-door meeting of the committee to discuss her use of a private email server. Clinton, a Democratic candidate for president, has indicated for months that she is willing to appear before the panel, but would like to do so in public. Clinton's team preferred a public hearing to a private one out of concern that Republicans on the committee would selectively leak unflattering details, the Post reported.

The committee is reviewing 55,000 pages of emails that Clinton voluntarily turned over. In June, the panel interviewed former Clinton confidant Sidney Blumenthal about some of the messages in a session that largely focused on domestic politics.

Gowdy's committee is charged with conducting a full investigation of all of the events surrounding the 2012 attack on the U.S. mission in Benghazi, which killed four, including Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens. Critics say that the committee is just a vehicle for Republicans to attack Clinton.

Hillary Clinton's campaign says she will testify before Congress about Benghazi terrorist attacks in October // NY Daily News / / Cameron Joseph and Denis Slattery - July 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton's campaign said Saturday that a deal is in place for the Democratic presidential front-runner to testify about the Benghazi terrorist attacks before Congress in October.

The committee’s response: Not so fast.

Jamal Ware, a spokesman for the House committee investigating the attacks, said details were still being hashed out — and took a jab at the Clinton team.

“Secretary Clinton’s campaign may want to reach out to her lawyer, Mr. David Kendall,” Ware said. “As of last night, Mr. Kendall was still negotiating conditions for her appearance.”

The committee is investigating Clinton’s actions during the attacks when she was Secretary of State. The attacks left U.S. Ambassador to Libya J. Christopher Stevens and three others dead.

Clinton had offered to testify publicly, leaving at issue the timing and the scope of questions from the committee, headed by Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.).

“Finally, earlier this week we were pleased for Secretary Clinton to receive an offer from Congressman Gowdy to appear before the committee in a public hearing in October, and yesterday accepted his invitation,” a Clinton campaign spokesman, Nick Merrill, said.

The back and forth over Clinton’s testimony comes as she faces intensified scrutiny for using a personal email account and private computer server while secretary of state.

The Justice Department was asked to launch an investigation into whether potentially classified information was contained in some of the emails, though the emails were not labeled by the State Department as classified.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Since the use of the private email account was revealed in March, Clinton has staunchly denied she ever sent or received any classified emails.

Another batch of emails Clinton turned over to the State Department is scheduled to be released to the public next week.

“We want to ensure that appropriate procedures are followed as these emails are reviewed while not unduly delaying the release of her emails,” said Merrill, the Clinton spokesman.

Hillary Clinton to Testify Before Congress About Benghazi Emails // Gawker // Brendan O’Connor - July 25, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has accepted an invitation to testify before the Republican-led committee investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Libya now ominously referred to as “Benghazi,” the New York Times reports.

According to a Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Clinton’s presidential campaign, the candidate accepted the committee’s invitation to testify in October on Friday, the Times reports. Also on Friday, the inspectors general for the State Department and the nation’s intelligence agencies announced that they had discovered classified information on Clinton’s private email account.

“We have had a chance to review the statement released by the inspectors general of the State Department and intelligence community outlining their concerns with regard to the State Department’s review and release of Hillary Clinton’s work emails,” Merrill wrote in an emailed statement.

“We want to ensure that appropriate procedures are followed as these emails are reviewed while not unduly delaying the release of her emails,” the statement continued. “We particularly do not want their release to be hampered by bureaucratic infighting among the intelligence community. More emails are slated to be released by the State Department next week, and we hope that release is as inclusive as possible.”

The Times reports that Clinton’s testimony is expected to be public. Clinton last testified before Congress on Benghazi in January 2013.

There appears to be some confusion in Washington, however, over whether Clinton has actually agreed to appear. “Secretary Clinton’s campaign may want to reach out to her lawyer, Mr David Kendall, with whom the committee has had ongoing conversations,” the Benghazi committee said in a statement on Saturday. “As of last night, Mr Kendall was still negotiating conditions for her appearance.”

But Merrill told the Times that this was incorrect. “As the committee’s own statement says, we have made clear that we understand emails are in their jurisdiction,” he said. “So unless the committee now believes emails are no longer in its jurisdiction, we are in agreement.”

Hillary Clinton accepts invitation to testify before Benghazi committee // Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood - July 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton accepted on Friday an invitation to testify before the House Select Committee on Benghazi in October.

Chairman Trey Gowdy asked Clinton to appear before the committee earlier this week, according to campaign spokesman Nick Merrill.

Merrill also disputed media reports that Clinton had handled classified information improperly on her private email server, which prompted two inspectors general to refer the matter to the Justice Department for a possible criminal investigation.

"Friday began with the printing of a story that was false," Merrill said in a statement. "Entities from the highest levels of two branches of government have now made that clear."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gowdy had asked Clinton to testify before the committee about her use of personal email address and server to shield her official communications from the government network and her role in the security failures that led to the 2012 terror attack in Benghazi.

Clinton has been forced to respond to questions about her emails, among other points of controversy, in the early days of her campaign as details of the unusual arrangement have emerged.

She has repeatedly maintained that she broke no laws by using a personal account and that no classified information passed through the server.

But a report in the New York Times Friday indicated hundreds of the private emails she chose to give the State Department could contain classified intelligence.

Clinton has not yet appeared before the Benghazi committee, whose sole purpose is to investigate the circumstances surrounding the attack.

O'MALLEY

O'Malley college debt was self-inflicted by unwise decisions // Baltimore Sun // Jerry Rodkey - July 25, 2015

Former Gov. Martin O'Malley's college debt unfortunately mirrors those of many who fail to plan, prioritize, work, sacrifice, save and live within their means ("O'Malley's $339,200 college debt," July 20).

While working for the federal government, and with a wife who was a "stay-at-home mom," our three children were free of college debt within 18 months after they completed their undergraduate and post-graduate degrees.

They attended in-state schools, had summer jobs and began saving for college while in middle school. My sons served as college resident hall advisers. All applied for numerous scholarships; all received one or more.

All pursued degrees sought in today's job markets. After my daughter completed her undergraduate degree, she accepted a position with AmeriCorps to teach at-risk students in Colorado. Upon fulfilling her commitment, she received money that was sufficient to pay off the balance of her college loans. She is currently working part-time while enrolled in a full-time master's degree program.

As for myself, I performed odd jobs within my neighborhood while in middle school, had a part-time job at a hospital while attending high school, and worked in factories during my college summer and Christmas breaks.

I commuted to a state university for two years then sold my car after successfully competing for a partial two-year ROTC scholarship that enabled me to reside on campus during my last two years. I incurred a four-year, active duty military obligation that resulted in an army career.

I am extremely proud of the work ethic, values, sacrifices and accomplishments of my children. I'm thankful to God that they, unlike Mr. O'Malley, were humble and fiscally prudent. The formula for success is well known. Unfortunately, too many lack the will and determination to implement it.

SANDERS

For Bernie Sanders, a lot riding on a Louisiana visit // WaPo // John Wagner - July 25, 2015

Louisiana traditionally doesn't rank up there with Iowa and New Hampshire as important destinations for presidential candidates at this point on the calendar. But Bernie Sanders has a lot riding on a swing through the Bayou State this weekend.

In seeking the Democratic nomination, the independent senator from Vermont has acknowledged that one of his key challenges is demonstrating an ability to connect with black voters. Sanders, who has emerged as the leading alternative to Hillary Rodham Clinton, represents a state that is 95 percent white. Unlike most of his Democratic rivals, his elections have never required much outreach to the African American community.

Sanders is also fresh off an awkward experience last weekend at the liberal Netroots Nation conference in Phoenix, where both he and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley were heckled by protesters aligned with the Black Lives Matter movement. To many in the crowd, Sanders seemed dismissive as activists demanded specific prescriptions for dealing with police brutality and other issues. At one point, Sanders offered to leave the stage.

Which brings us to this weekend: Sanders has four events booked in a state where one-third of the population is black.

He is scheduled to appear in Baton Rouge on Saturday night at a national gathering of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, a storied African American civil rights organization whose first president was Martin Luther King Jr.

From there, the self-described democratic socialist heads to New Orleans to address a Jefferson-Jackson dinner later that night sponsored by the Louisiana Democratic Party. There is certain to be a sizable African American turnout there as well. And on Sunday, Sanders has both a house party and large-scale rally planned in the New Orleans area.

In recent weeks, Sanders has seen his crowds swell into the thousands at rallies around the country. But they have been largely white. This isn't surprising in Iowa and New Hampshire, the first two presidential nominating states, which have small minority populations. But the same has been true in larger locales around the country.

In Louisiana, Sanders has an opportunity to demonstrate a broader appeal.

"If he's going to be considered a serious candidate, he needs to make inroads in the black community," said state Rep. Randal L. Gaines, a member of the Louisiana Legislative Black Caucus.

Gaines said Sanders has come to the attention of a lot of Democrats in the state, particularly younger ones, in just the last 30 days. Clinton, by contrast, is well known, both for her own political career and for that of her husband, who was the governor of neighboring Arkansas before he became president.

The Sanders campaign sees potential here. The 73-year-old senator has a long history on civil rights, having attended the 1963 March on Washington and witnessed King's "I Have a Dream" speech in person.

During a swing through New Hampshire last month, Sanders pledged "a significant expansion" in outreach to minority voters and suggested his economic message should resonate.

"The views that we hold are important to all Americans … but to be honest with you, they're probably more relevant to black and Hispanic voters … because the poverty rate in those communities is even higher than whites," Sanders told reporters.

Sanders cited his support to raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour and offer free college tuition as examples.

During appearances in Texas this week, Sanders also spoke out about the case of Sandra Bland, the 28-year-old African American woman found dead in her jail cell 60 miles northwest of Houston after being arrested for a traffic stop. Her family has disputed a medical examiner's finding that the death was a suicide.

Sanders will also be watched closely in coming days to see what he has to say about gun violence in the wake of Thursday's fatal shootings in a movie theater in Lafayette, La. His record on Capitol Hill is mixed when it comes to gun control, an issue of interest to black voters.

African Americans are a key constituency in the Democratic nominating process. Once the process moves beyond Iowa and New Hampshire, their influence will be felt, starting with the South Carolina primary.

As he tries to build bridges, aides say Sanders will make stops in several other Southern states in coming weeks, including in South Carolina.

Bernie Sanders is in with the enemy, some old allies say // WaPo // David A. Fahrenthold - July 25, 2015

It was one of the first political events Bernie Sanders ever went to in Vermont: a 1971 discussion by a small group of left-wingers, the Liberty Union Party.

These people were not winners, in the electoral sense. The closest they had come to winning a statewide race, at that point, was losing by 56 points. So someone in the audience asked: Why don't you become Democrats? Why not sacrifice third-party purity for a chance at actual power?

Sanders — a transplanted Brooklynite, known in Vermont for his overheated writing and underwhelming carpentry — spoke up from the crowd. The sacrifice wasn't worth it.

"He felt strongly that you worked outside the Democratic Party," said Jim Rader, a longtime friend who took Sanders to the meeting. "He felt there were too many compromises that had to be made, too many compromises of political principles."

Last week, 44 years later, a group of socialists gathered in a Vermont library to have a strikingly similar debate. This time, they were deciding whether they could support Bernie Sanders himself.

Sanders was not at this meeting. The scruffy socialist of the '70s — who later became a mayor, congressman and U.S. senator — is out on the campaign trail now, drawing huge crowds as a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination.

In Vermont, the socialists' speaker said his answer was no. The purest socialist in mainstream American politics was no longer pure enough.

"When Sanders decided to run as a Democrat," that was the last straw, said Jim Ramey at the meeting of the International Socialist Organization's Burlington branch. "People on the left should not support him."

The story of Bernie Sanders's life in politics is the distance between those two meetings.

Sanders got his start on Vermont's left fringe. In multiple third-party runs for office, he learned the craft of politics, which has been the only steady work he has ever had. Sanders also developed the same policy ideas that still define him: taxing the rich, expanding the safety net for the poor and weakening the influence of Wall Street.

But if Sanders kept the fringe's ideas, he quickly discarded its small-bore tactics — and began making allies, and compromises, that would bring him bigger audiences and higher office.

The result is that Vermont is strewn with dissatisfied socialists, denouncing Sanders for perceived sins that go back to the '70s.

And Bernie Sanders is running for president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“A very skilled and savvy politician,” said Rader, who later worked in Sanders’s congressional office, so close to Sanders that they shared one well-used necktie. “He’s not a purist. He’s consistent. He holds very deep convictions. But he is not a purist.”

Sanders was born in Brooklyn, the son of a paint salesman, and became involved in left-wing politics at the University of Chicago. He arrived in Vermont in a wave of newcomers, back-to-the-landers. They didn’t make a habit of asking one another where they had come from.

“He was poor as a church mouse back then … living in an apartment that I always referred to as dark, stark and cluttered,” said Darcy Troville, a friend from those early days. Sanders had been divorced years before. He had a son, whose mother and he never married. “I was wondering how he ended up with this baby alone. I didn’t know what he did for work,” Troville said.

If Bernie Sanders had a great talent at that time, it was not obvious.

He wrote for the Vermont Freeman, a counter-culture newspaper, for $10 or $15 a story, including an especially strange piece about dark sexual fantasies. Sanders also did some carpentry. Nobody remembers the writing or the woodworking well.

The thing Sanders was good at, it turned out, was politics.

But even that wasn’t clear right away.

“We didn’t have a chance in hell,” John Bloch said, recalling a meeting of the Liberty Union Party in 1971, when members were seeking nominees to run for the U.S. Senate. “I said, ‘Is there anybody that can be lion bait for the Senate race? We need a body.’ ”

Sanders volunteered.

In his first radio interview as a candidate, he later recalled, his nervous knees knocked the table so loudly that the microphone picked it up. “A strange thumping noise traversed the airwaves,” Sanders wrote in his 1997 autobiography, as the sound engineer waved at him to stop it.

The message that Sanders used in that campaign is present in this one. “Wealth=power, lack of wealth=subservience. How could we change that?” he recalled in his autobiography, called “Outsider in the House.” “The ideas I was espousing were not ‘far out’ or ‘fringe.’ Frankly, they were ‘mainstream.’ ”

Maybe. But Sanders wasn’t. He got 2 percent of the vote.

In 1974, Sanders ran for Senate again. Four percent.

In 1976, he ran for governor. Six percent. He was getting better at debates and retail politics. And at this rate, he would be up to an electoral majority in only … 44 more years.

So, in 1977, Sanders quit the party.

In the media, he called Liberty Union “a failure.”

“I didn’t really think he had a right to do that,” said Doris Lake, a former House candidate who had campaigned alongside Sanders in his first race. She meant bad-mouthing the party. “We were still keeping it alive.” Not for the last time, Sanders had alienated one of the true believers with whom he had started out.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Enough was enough,” Sanders told himself, he recalled in his autobiography. “My political career was over.”

Trouble was, his other career was worse.

Sanders made slide shows with audio for Vermont schools. But his operation was so painfully low-tech that he was stymied by the need for a “beep” to tell the teacher to advance to the next slide. He couldn’t afford a professional beep. “He tried banging a pot lid with a spoon,” friend Terry Bouricius said. That wasn’t a beep. Finally: “His son’s walkie-talkies, if you pushed both the buttons at the same time, it would make a beep sound.”

Sanders also tried to be a documentary filmmaker, with a movie about a personal role model: Eugene V. Debs, leader of the Socialist Party of America. Sanders did his hero’s voice himself: “One class is small and rich and the other lahwge and poor,” he read in his Brooklyn accent, according to audio discovered by Mother Jones magazine. He continued: “One consists of capitalists, and the other of work-uhs.”

Debs was from Indiana.

“I said, ‘Bernie, you’re not going to sell this thing. The soundtrack, Debs has a Brooklyn accent you can cut with a knife,’ ” Bloch, his friend, remembered saying. Vermonters wouldn’t understand it. “He said, ‘They’ll luuhn.’ ”

It still wasn’t much of a living. Sanders’s landlord raised his rent, and he moved in with a friend.

Then that friend, a University of Vermont professor, persuaded him to go back into politics — running for Burlington mayor as an independent, without the baggage of a larger party behind him. This time, Sanders focused on local issues: a waterfront development, fighting a tax increase, keeping a hill open for snow-sledding.

He won by 10 votes. That year, Sanders recalls, his friends chipped in and bought him something a mayor needs: a leather briefcase. He was 40 years old.

Sanders first faced strong opposition from Republicans and Democrats. He did some things that his old allies liked — he hung a picture of Debs in City Hall, he criticized U.S. policy in Central America, he set up an office to increase affordable housing, and he tried make cable TV cheaper for the poor.

But he still alienated some on the left, at times, by acting like a mayor instead of a socialist.

In 1983, for instance, some of Sanders’s old allies planned to block the gates of a General Electric plant in Burlington that made guns for military helicopters. They would demand that the factory start making something peaceful instead.

“He said he would have us arrested,” said Greg Guma, who had known Sanders since 1972. “Then the day came. And he did.” The socialist mayor sat quietly on a guardrail, watching them being handcuffed.

In the same period, Sanders also began a political relationship with the Democratic Party. He still denounced the party as ideologically bankrupt, part of a closed and corrupt two-party system.

But, when big elections came, he also campaigned for its candidates, as he did for Walter Mondale in 1984.

That lost him another socialist ally.

“The friendship could not stand him storming around the state for Fritz Mondale,” said Peter Diamondstone, one of Sanders’s friends from the Liberty

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Union Party and Doris Lake's husband.

In the good old days, Diamondstone used to stay over at Sanders's house in Burlington, and the two men stayed up late shouting political arguments at each other.

One such row had been over whether all children should be allowed to vote. Diamondstone said yes. Sanders said only after puberty. "I said, 'Waddya want, the town clerks to start doing examinations?" Diamondstone remembered yelling.

Now, that was over. Diamondstone staked out a Mondale event. He caught Sanders coming in and handed his friend a leaflet that called him a "Quisling."

Since then, as Sanders rose through the political ranks, Diamondstone has continued to run as a third-party candidate for state and federal offices. He has run 16 times. He has never won. He has never even cracked 6 percent.

"It was who we were. I mean, he was the best politician. But I watched how he changed. And those changes seemed to be related to moving to the right" to build a bigger following, Diamondstone said. "I was myself, and he was himself. He became a Democrat. And I stayed where I was."

Sanders served as mayor of Burlington for eight years, leaving office in 1989. Later that year, he and Frank Kochman — his old publisher, from his threadbare days as a $15-per-story writer — found themselves alone at a party, looking out over Lake Champlain.

"He's looking off in the distance, and he says … 'I think I ought to run for governor or Congress.' I said, 'Bernie, I don't think that you'll ever get elected governor,' " Kochman said.

The state might not want to be governed by a socialist. But it might send one to Washington. "Congress," Kochman said. "I think you got a real shot."

Sanders ran, and now it appeared that his courting of the Democrats paid off.

Their big guns stayed out of the way, apparently assured that Sanders was close enough to being a Democrat already. With the help of the National Rifle Association, which hated the Republican incumbent, Sanders won.

His association with Democrats continued to pay off.

By 1991, Sanders — although still officially an independent — was part of the Democratic caucus in Congress, climbing the party's seniority ladder. He has not faced a serious challenge from a Democrat in all the elections since.

"Why would you run against him, you know what I mean?" said Jeff Weaver, a longtime Sanders staffer and current campaign manager. For Democratic leaders in Congress, he said, Sanders "was a more reliable vote than a lot of other people down there who had a 'D' after their name."

But, in this election, Sanders is running as a Democrat — officially, fully, within the party system he decried for so long. Sanders said the party's structure makes it easier to get on ballots, into debates and into the media.

He has said that if he loses in the Democratic primary, he will not run as an independent.

"His decision to run this election in the Democratic primary was completely informed by Ralph Nader," said John Franco, a longtime friend who is a lawyer in Burlington. He said Sanders did not want to draw votes away from a Democrat and elect a Republican in the process, as happened when Nader ran and George W. Bush won in 2000. "That really turned out swimmingly," Franco said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What about those on the left who think Sanders has sold out by refusing to go it alone?

"Frankly, those people — they have their meetings in a phone booth," Franco said.

Or, at least, in an upstairs meeting room at the Burlington public library.

There were 28 people there at the International Socialist Organization meeting Wednesday night. They called one another "comrade." They praised Nader for having the guts to challenge the two-party system in 2000. No matter who got elected instead.

"My first vote was for Ralph Nader," said Patrick St. John, 32.

"Good for you!" somebody called out, and meant it.

Ramey, a forklift operator for a chocolate company, was in charge of answering the question: "Should the Left Support Bernie Sanders?" He listed some of Sanders's policy goals: a higher minimum wage. Equal pay for women. Free college tuition. A single national health-care system.

"I'm not going to lie. That would be pretty good," Ramey said.

But it wasn't good enough, he said, because of Sanders's choice of tactics: He was running as a Democrat. Which meant that he could lose and deliver his voters to Hillary Clinton, a mainstream Democrat with ties to Wall Street and big business. Deliver them to the system they all wanted to defeat.

"Warts and all, the [Sanders] campaign has a lot going for them," Ramey said. "But the Democratic Party is not a wart." It is a fatal flaw, he said.

So, if Sanders wasn't good enough, what should the socialists do? They didn't settle on a plan. After an hour of discussion, a man in a straw hat stood up.

"I'm tired of being powerless!" said Albert Echt, 66. He wanted to support Bernie Sanders, warts and all. "Let's jump on Bernie's coattails. . . . That would actually be doing something, instead of sitting around!"

The room was not moved. The moderator called on the next person who had raised a hand. Echt, frustrated, walked out.

"They're such fools!" he told a reporter, in a too-loud whisper, as he left.

The meeting broke up amicably without him. In the next week, Sanders was planning big rallies in Iowa and Louisiana. The socialists had a plan to meet again on Thursday in Burlington.

Bernie Sanders heads to Louisiana // Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood - July 25, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders will head to Louisiana this weekend for a series of campaign events that will include a town hall and a civil rights convention.

The Vermont Independent is set to host his town hall meeting Sunday at the same venue where Gov. Bobby Jindal launched his presidential campaign earlier this month, according to the New Orleans Advocate.

Sanders, who has drawn impressive crowds to campaign events around the country in recent weeks, will likely be forced to confront the shooting that claimed two lives in a Lafayette movie theater earlier this week.

The Democratic presidential candidate will head to Baton Rouge for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference's annual convention before departing for New Orleans to attend the state party's Jefferson-Jackson Dinner.

Democrats woo activists in key Des Moines neighborhood // AP // Catherine Lucey- July 25, 2015

Four years ago, the Beaverdale neighborhood in Des Moines organized big for President Barack Obama's re-election, building an uber-volunteer group skilled at phone-banking, door-knocking and boosting caucus and general election participation. The volunteers dubbed their leafy neighborhood Obamadale.

Now the 2016 Democratic presidential hopefuls are visiting this liberal stronghold, trying to rename it once more.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley hung out at a local bar Friday night and Hillary Rodham Clinton visited a house party Saturday afternoon. But they may have to keep wooing for a while. The neighbors are split among the candidates or undecided.

"I think Obamadale is still kind of an open target for candidates at this point," said Brad Anderson, a resident who served as Obama's state director in 2012.

Anderson said that in the last presidential election, the Obamadale group "over-performed by every metric that was set." The group of about 20 core activists and dozens more participants got training from the campaign and put in long hours working the phones and going door to door. They turned out big numbers on caucus night and again in the November general election, when the incumbent Obama won the state. Their organizing methods were so successful that they were sent to other areas to boost participation.

"You get off work and clock in volunteering," recalled founding member Kimberly Boggus, 36. "Phone banks Monday and Wednesday. Saturdays and Sundays were canvassing."

Political engagement is a longtime tradition in the neighborhood. Located a short drive from downtown, the tidy streets are lined with small Tudor-style homes, known as Beaverdale Bricks. The shopping district features a candy shop and an independent bookstore. People mark the seasons with community gatherings and festivals.

It's the kind of group any Democratic hopeful would like to scoop up. Clinton featured a local organizer in her announcement video and has picked up some key support here, including backing from the local Democratic state Sen. Janet Petersen. O'Malley has visited more than once, and played his guitar in a local tavern in the spring.

"It's great to be in Beaverdale," O'Malley told dozens packed into a local pub Friday night. "You guys have been terrific to me."

He stood on a chair for a lengthy question-and-answer session that touched on raising the minimum wage and banking reform before accepting a guitar from an audience member and leading the enthusiastic crowd in song.

Clinton spoke to about 200 people in a Beaverdale backyard Saturday afternoon, calling the area "one of the most active, productive, effective areas in the whole state, not just in Polk County or Des Moines."

She also told the crowd that she planned to release policies on climate change and renewable energy in Iowa on Sunday and Monday.

Back in the 2008 race, Obama had strong support in Beaverdale and spent July 4, 2007, here. Beaverdale Democrats said Clinton's campaign was less active in the area during that campaign, when she placed third in the Iowa caucuses. But many said that she appears more committed to grassroots organizing here, as she is across the state.

"Her campaign this time around feels more like Obama '08, more grassroots, bottom up," said Petersen, who endorsed Obama in 2008.

For now, it looks like the Obamadale gang will not lock arms behind one candidate for the caucuses. Boggus is with O'Malley, "somebody that I relate to."

But Sean Bagniewski, 31, who was featured in the Clinton video and hosted the Saturday house party, said "there's quite a bit of support for Hillary right now."

Bagniewski said he was thrilled to have the event at his home. "It takes a little bit longer to get their support over here, but when you get their support, they are in whole hog," he said.

Rose Mary Pratt, 67, another member of the group, said she was still weighing her decision.

"I've had calls from all campaigns," she said. "Because I'm an activist they want my commitment early."

"I like all of them. Hillary's my generation; I want to see a woman president. That's meaningful to me. I think O'Malley is a new voice in the party and he's quite articulate in his statements. I could go there. "

As for Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, she said, "I'm an old liberal, so he says all the things I like to hear."

Sanders has not done an event here, though Pratt said she saw him in the coffee shop several months ago and chatted with him. Sanders' Iowa director, Pete D'Alessandro, said the campaign will organize in the neighborhood and Sanders probably will come for an event.

Whatever happens in the February caucuses, activists agree they'll come together later on for the party nominee.

"We go our separate ways, we support the people that are more in mind with what we think," said Ben Guise, 69. "We're really close friends, all of us. We will have no trouble transitioning back."

Netroots disruption energizes black activists // Politico // Maya Park and Daniel Strauss - July 25, 2015

Protesters who hijacked a presidential forum in Arizona last Saturday demanding that the candidates spend more time addressing problems in the black community left feeling dissatisfied.

But a week later, what at the time felt like a disastrous disruption has supercharged the Black Lives Matter movement — and pushed Hillary Clinton and her rivals for the Democratic nomination to speak to the concerns of an African-American community that is enraged by high-profile incidents of police misconduct and is demanding that its voice be heard.

“We’re not having this conversation because [the protesters] haven’t been polite,” NAACP President Cornell William Brooks told POLITICO on Friday. “We’re having this conversation because the presidential candidates are not being sufficiently precise.”

At the forum, hosted by the liberal activist group Netroots Nation, protesters clashed with Bernie Sanders and Martin O’Malley, commandeering the stage as they accused the two Democrats of ignoring police brutality against blacks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley at one point said, "black lives matter, white lives matter, all lives matter" — a statement that offended many in the Black Lives Matter movement, who recall the phrase being used to diminish their cause.

Sanders came across as defensive, saying he spent 50 years "fighting for civil rights" and "if you don't want me to be here that's OK."

"During the action, you saw Bernie Sanders trying to talk us down, trying to speak over us," Angela Peoples, one of the organizers of the protest at Netroots and the co-director of GetEqual, an LGBTQ rights advocacy group. "Basically it was as if he was trying to pretend that there weren't 15 people in the room screaming 'black lives matter."

Rep. James Clyburn (D-SC), a leading member of the Congressional Black Caucus, said that the protesters should have let the candidates speak.

"If I ask you a question, I must want your answer. And so if I ask you a question and talk over your answer, what have I done?" Clyburn said, stressing the importance of substance over symbolism and cautioning against anyone who wants to "make a headline rather than make headway."

Yet, as Peoples noted, all three major Democratic candidates have spent the week showing their concern for the black community.

Clinton, who skipped Netroots Nation, used a Facebook chat on Monday to emphasize that "everyone in this country should stand firmly behind" the notion that "black lives matter."

Sanders began working the phrase 'black lives matter' into his stump speech and social media efforts, while O'Malley apologized and has made sure to repeatedly say he's "listening and speaking to leaders" from the Black Lives Matter movement.

The candidates were acknowledging that, Brooks said, "the campaign rhetoric has not risen to the level of reality."

Seizing the moment, the Black Lives Matter group —a movement organizing action on topics important to the black community and racial injustice — decided to quickly put together a summit in Cleveland, Ohio. The summit describes itself as "hundreds of Black freedom fighters from around the country" coming together to coordinate and build a new coalition for action in the black community. The conference offers panels on, for instance, self defense and organizing for black activists.

It comes after national attention fell on Sandra Bland, a 28-year-old African-American woman from Chicago who was pulled over by a Texas state highway patrolman for not signaling before changing lanes and then was jailed for not putting out her cigarette in her car, even though that's not illegal. She died in jail, allegedly by hanging herself.

Bland's death has further galvanized black leaders to demand that their concerns be heard. Many appreciate how the Democratic candidates talk about the black community's economic disadvantages, but want them to more explicitly tie those gaps to racism — while others note that Bland was a college graduate.

"We get that the solution to the structural racism that black folks are facing is connected to fair wages, issues of access to education," Peoples said. "The piece that's missing is talking about how the legacy of racism, anti-blackness, and racial violence plays out in all of those issues."

There were also setbacks. Sanders, for instance, reportedly skipped a meeting with Black Lives Matters protesters during the Netroots Nation weekend and ended up sending campaign manager Jeff Weaver instead. That resulted in some grumbling.

"Bullshit — I'm sorry," Jamal Simmons, a Democratic consultant, said. "If he was scheduled to meet with activists, then he should have met with activists. You can't not show up. You gotta show up."

Other black leaders said that merely showing up wouldn't be enough, either.

"The day is over for [the candidates] saying 'I believe in justice,' and 'Everyone should have equality, whether black or white, male or female, young or old,'" Rep. Emanuel Cleaver (D-Mo.) said in a phone interview from Nairobi on Friday.

Talking about how economic inequality affects African Americans is fine, legislators, activists and strategists said — but specific plans to address it are better.

For instance, Clyburn said, Sanders should offer a plan for dilapidated schools and Medicaid expansion in states that have resisted Obamacare.

"Yes, the criminal justice stuff is big," said Democratic strategist and pollster Cornell Belcher. "If you're talking to African-American women who will be a plurality in a lot of these Democratic primary states, education and not losing a lot of young people to crime and violence is still tops. And yeah, they have angst economically about jobs."

Of the three main Democratic candidates, Clinton has been the most assertive in speaking to those issues.

Earlier in the year, she unveiled a set of criminal justice reform proposals with mentions of the Michael Brown shooting in Ferguson, Missouri, Tamir Rice in Cleveland, Ohio, and Trayvon Martin in Florida. On Thursday, Clinton continued to beat that drum, saying in a panel at South Carolina's influential Brookland Baptist Church, "It's essential that we all stand up and say, loudly and clearly, that yes, black lives matter.'"

Speeches like that have helped Clinton stay visible in the African-American community, Belcher said.

"I think that most of the polling that you see right now is that Sanders and O'Malley are not very well known figures in the community," Belcher said. "What's important is for you to build a strategy around how to introduce yourself in the black community in a way that resonates with the value of the community and that's not hopefully tone-deaf which is what Bernie came across with."

It's something O'Malley seems to have realized. On Wednesday, he released a statement saying his "heart breaks for Sandra Bland and her family" and called for a "thorough and independent investigation of the traffic stop, the arrest and Ms. Bland's tragic death in custody."

He also called Harvard Law Professor Charles Ogletree on Wednesday to discuss the Black Lives Matter movement and topics important to the African-American community, as part of a series of discussions ahead of unveiling his criminal justice platform.

"We had a robust and informative and strikingly candid conversation about the past, present, and future," Ogletree said, adding he expected to talk more with O'Malley going forward.

Meanwhile, Sanders has made sure to try and offer more specifics in media interviews and over social media.

"We have more people in jail than any other country on Earth," Sanders said in an MSNBC interview on Wednesday. "Millions of lives have been destroyed because people are in jail for non-violent crimes, so we have to take a look at mandatory minimums and the drug policy and the militarization of police forces all over the country. We have to take a look at use-of-force policy. That is what you saw in that dreadful and painful video of Sandra Bland."

"We've got a lot of work in front of us," Sanders added.

Marco Rubio Is Ticked Off About The Iran Deal (And He Wants Everyone To Know) // ABC // Ines de la Cuetara - July 25, 2015

He hasn't been as outspoken as some GOP contenders in condemning Donald Trump, he's been reluctant to criticize other Republicans and he was off the campaign trail for a bit over the past week getting over a cold.

But when it comes to Iran, Marco Rubio, the Florida senator and presidential candidate, is speaking up, loud and clear.

"The Iranian regime and the world should know that a majority of members in this Congress do not support this deal and that the deal could go away on the day President Obama leaves office," a noticeably angry Rubio told Secretary of State John Kerry on Thursday.

Rubio added: "The Iranian regime and the world should know this deal -- this deal is your deal with Iran."

That same day, in one of three national television interviews since the hearing, Rubio made it clear that as president he would "absolutely" re-impose sanctions on Iran.

"What the President is using is a national security waiver. He's in essence saying, 'I'm using this waiver to prevent the sanctions from still being imposed'," Rubio said in an interview on Fox News. "The next President could just lift that with the stroke of a pen."

Although many other Republicans candidates have also been critical of the deal to keep Iran's nuclear ambitions in check, the issue seems to send Rubio fuming. On Wednesday, Rubio said President Obama had "no class" for going "on comedy shows to talk about something as serious as Iran", referring to the President's interview on the Daily Show with Jon Stewart.

As a member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Rubio has made his opposition to the deal a pillar of his campaign, emerging as one of the its harshest and most outspoken critics.

One of the outside groups backing his presidential bid, the Conservative Solutions Project, has already released two ads criticizing the deal, calling it a "bad deal" and claiming it would give Iran "a clear path to a nuclear bomb."

At the Senate hearing, Kerry told Rubio he was confident the next president would have enough common sense to not arbitrarily end the deal if it was being properly implemented.

"If you think the Ayatollah is going to come back and negotiate again with an American, that's fantasy," Kerry said. "You're never going to see that because we will have proven we're not trustworthy."

"The fantasy is in believing that they're going to even live to the accord," Rubio shot back in an interview with CBS on Friday. "This is a country that has a long history, at least the leaders of Iran do, of violating agreements and of always having a secret nuclear program."

WALKER

In Iowa, Donald Trump Takes Aim at Scott Walker, for a Change // NYT // Trip Gabriel - July 25, 2015

To the list of Republican rivals he has insulted, Donald J. Trump on Saturday added a new name: Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, whom he accused of mismanaging his state's budget and creating a disaster for its roads, schools and hospitals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Walker, who has been restrained in criticizing Mr. Trump's provocative remarks compared with other Republican presidential candidates, is leading in the polls in Iowa, a fact that seemed to gall Mr. Trump, the golf course entrepreneur and former reality star.

"I can't believe I'm in second place,'' Mr. Trump told several hundred people who filled a high school auditorium and an overflow room to see him. "Folks, will you please put me in first place so I feel better?"

Mr. Trump's criticism of Senator John McCain's war record one week ago at an Iowa forum set off a furious round of attacks between him and other Republicans. On Saturday, he said he felt free to add Mr. Walker to his hit list after a Walker supporter called Mr. Trump "DumbDumb" in a fund-raising appeal.

"I said, 'Finally, I can attack him,' '' Mr. Trump said to laughter.

He went down a list of criticisms that seemed the result of an overnight opposition-research effort. "Wisconsin is doing terribly,'' he said. "The roads are a disaster because they don't have any money to rebuild them, and they're borrowing money like crazy.''

He cited figures for the state's budget deficit. "I wrote this stuff all down but I don't need it because I have a really good memory," he said.

He also accused Mr. Walker of flip-flopping on the Common Core education standards, having once supported them. "Scott Walker changed when he saw he was getting creamed, so now he's not in favor,'' he said.

Mr. Trump gave $10,000 to Mr. Walker's re-election campaign last year, something he alluded to in a meandering, backhanded way: "I've been nice to Scott Walker," he said. "He's a nice guy. He came up to my office three or four months ago and presented me with a plaque because I helped him with his election. I liked that he was fighting.

"I didn't know what the hell he was doing, but he was fighting, and I like a fighter," Mr. Trump added. "Does that make sense?"

The leader in national polls of the Republican candidates, Mr. Trump dropped in to Oskaloosa, about 70 minutes east of Des Moines, and treated the crowd to a picnic lunch of hamburgers and pulled pork. He was applauded and cheered throughout a one-hour, free-associative speech, especially when he bragged that he had barred reporters from The Des Moines Register from the event after its editorial page called on him to quit the race for the good of the Republican Party.

Talking to reporters after his speech, Mr. Trump seemed to set his characteristic hubris aside when discussing the Republican debate on Aug. 6, presumably to lower expectations for his performance. He said he had no debating experience compared with the politicians he is likely to face on stage.

"I'm going to be there much to the chagrin of many people, but I'm no debater,'' he said. "From what I've heard, everyone is going to come after me.''

Yet he said he was not undertaking any debate preparation. "I am who I am,'' he said.

Trump goes on the attack again, with Scott Walker as his latest target // WaPo // David Weigel - July 25, 2015

First Donald Trump questioned whether Sen. John McCain was truly a war hero.

The he revealed to a South Carolina crowd the personal phone number of Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.), one of his rivals for the Republican presidential nomination.

On Saturday Trump went for the hat trick, gleefully insulting Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker because one of Walker's fundraisers called the billionaire real estate mogul 'DumbDumb.'

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Finally, I can attack!” Trump said at a packed rally at Oskaloosa High School. “Wisconsin’s doing terribly. It’s in turmoil. The roads are a disaster because they don’t have any money to rebuild them. They’re borrowing money like crazy. They projected a $1 billion surplus, and it turns out to be a deficit of $2.2 billion. The schools are a disaster. The hospitals and education was a disaster. And he was totally in favor of Common Core!”

The mention of the state-driven education standards — from which Walker, like many Republican governors, has walked away — incited a prolonged boo. That was not enough for Trump, who told a story about Walker giving him a “beautiful plaque” out of gratitude for campaign donations and wondered if “Wisconsin paid for it.”

Republicans’ hopes of banishing Trump from their presidential primary may have wilted in the heat of the Iowa summer. On his first visit to the caucus state since the McCain insult, Trump drew a crowd of 1,300 in a city of 11,463. He cleaned up his remarks about veterans, from the stage and in the crowd. He talked with characteristic gusto about “killing in the polls and” securing a spot in the party’s first sanctioned debate, scheduled for Aug. 6.

“I’m going to be there,” Trump told reporters, “much to the chagrin of many people.”

Trump did all of this at a four-hour spectacle — the Make America Great Again Rally and Family Picnic — that felt like a New York cinematographer’s idea of an “Iowa event.” A campaign bus stood unused until Trump posed in front of his, giving a double thumbs-up before hopping into an SUV. The outdoor barbecue was so large that Trump endorser Tana Goertz — who had been a contestant on Trump’s NBC series, “The Apprentice” — asked the crowd to gorge themselves a little more. “Mr. Trump can’t take all this food home on the plane,” she said.

As they lined up for the speech, conservative Iowans fell into two camps. One group adored Trump’s brio, but wished he hadn’t gotten personal with McCain (R-Ariz.). The larger camp egged Trump on for again refusing to play nice. Although a Washington Post/ABC News poll showed Trump’s ratings slipping after his comments about McCain, the crowd in Oskaloosa saw another reason to trust him. Some Republican voters, who had dutifully turned out for “anti-establishment” candidates and been disappointed, insisted that Trump was just the man to blow up the system.

“The dude’s badass, no question about it,” said Dave Moore, 30, a National Guard veteran and welder. “Republicans keep sending chihuahuas to a pitbull fight and being nice, and the only time they’re mean is to each other.”

The McCain spat, Moore said, was an example of that. “People applied that to all soldiers,” he said. “Trump was trying to protect his people.”

That was Trump’s official line. In the seven days since he suggested that merely being “captured” did not make McCain a hero, Trump has alternately denied that he said it, talked up his work for veterans, and said that he was only responding to McCain for calling opponents of immigration reform “crazies.”

Trump deployed all of those arguments here Saturday. One of his warm-up speakers, 20-year Navy SEAL Brad Nagel, insisted that Trump respected veterans, unlike “people who think we’re crazies.” (McCain had not been referring to veterans.) Event staffers who found veterans in the crowd handed them “Veterans for Trump” signs. Late into his 56-minute speech, Trump beckoned to someone offstage, and a woman in a black dress delivered a stack of paper wrapped in a red bow.

This, Trump said, represented one day of “more than 700 letters from veterans, thanking me.” They appreciate his charity, he said, and trust him to reform Veterans Affairs, even though he did not serve.

“I might not have been a great soldier,” Trump said. “I don’t know. Maybe I would, maybe I wouldn’t.”

Trump’s cleanup seemed to do the trick. Tammy Sparks, 54, came to the event because she interpreted the comment as an insult to her father, a prisoner of war during World War II.

“I heard he’d been saying some bad stuff about prisoners of war, and I was so irritated,” Sparks said. “One of the guys in suits explained it to me. And when Mr. Trump saw me again, he said, ‘That was not what I meant.’ ”

Others said there was nothing to apologize for as far as McCain was concerned. “He’s done nothing for veterans, nothing to secure our borders,” said Randy Binns, who wore a hat and pin commemorating his service in the 1991 and 2003 Iraq invasions. “If he was running again, I’d tell him to get out of town.”

In Oskaloosa, Trump told his main audience, of 700, about his Thursday visit to the U.S.-Mexico border. He told an overflow audience that President Obama had failed POWs by winning Bowe Bergdahl’s release from the Taliban but not getting Iran to turn over hostages.

He also won cheers for telling how he denied credentials to the Des Moines Register, Iowa’s largest newspaper, after its editorial board called on him to quit the race. In a back-and-forth with reporters, with the Register’s team kept outside his event, Trump proved that he was comfortable being playful with the facts.

“I didn’t ban them,” he insisted. “They just couldn’t get credentials.”

Trump slams Walker as governor leads in early voting Iowa // AP // Thomas Beaumont - July 25, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump opened up a line of attack Saturday on Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, accusing the leader in recent polls in Iowa of running his neighboring state into financial trouble.

It's the latest broadside against a rival of the outspoken New York billionaire. Last week, Trump went after South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham for calling him a "jackass." The New York businessman has characterized other candidates as unfit for the office and said the party's 2008 nominee, Sen. John McCain, was not a war hero in spite of his years as a prisoner in Vietnam.

Spurred on by a raucous audience of more than 1,000 at a central Iowa high school, Trump said Walker has an advantage in Iowa because he's from a neighboring state but that the edge is undeserved because Walker has mismanaged Wisconsin's budget.

"He grew up right next door. A little advantage, right?" Trump said. "Except Wisconsin is doing terribly."

Trump faulted Walker, popular for stripping public employees of many of their collective bargaining rights, for falling short of budget projections and changing his position on Common Core education standards. The voluntary state-based benchmarks for achievement in math, reading and language arts are unpopular among a segment of conservatives who view them, if incorrectly, as a federally mandated curriculum.

Walker showed tacit support for the standards during his first term when he signed budgets that paid for implementing them. Last year, he called for their repeal and replacement with standards set in Wisconsin.

"He was totally in favor of Common Core, which I hate, I hate," Trump said. Walker changed course on the topic, his rival said, when he saw "he was getting creamed."

Trump said Walker deserved the criticism because a top fundraiser to the governor referred to Trump in a recent fundraising email as "Dumb dumb."

Trump criticized Graham, a close friend of McCain, after Graham chided Trump for faulting McCain for being shot down as a Navy fighter pilot during the Vietnam War. McCain, held as a prisoner of war for five years, was heralded by Republicans as a war hero during his 2008 campaign.

"I'm very disappointed in him for one reason. He's done a bad job with the vets," said Trump, who has sharply criticized Congress for inaction on calls for improvements for services under the Department of Veterans Affairs.

While Graham and other GOP presidential candidates have sharply criticized Trump for his comments about McCain, Trump held up a stack of paper during his Iowa speech that he said were letters of support he'd received from veterans.

Before Trump arrived at the event, hundreds lined the sidewalk in front of the high school. At the end was a catered picnic lunch of hamburgers, hot dogs, potato salad, chips and cold drinks.

Standing in the 90-degree sun, Jill Jepsen held a sign that said, "The Beltway talks, Trump works!"

"He works, and he doesn't back down," said Jepsen, a political independent from Oskaloosa. "He'll get things done."

At the National Governors Association meeting in West Virginia, two Republicans gave Trump's campaign little chance of succeeding.

"At the end of the day, I don't think (Trump) will do very well in Iowa because Iowans like leaders who are humble and hardworking, and people who go to all parts of the state," Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad said when asked about the reality TV star.

Oklahoma's governor, Mary Fallin, said she didn't think Trump would be the next president "because I think the people of our nation want to see someone who will be able to bring people together to get things done."

Asked about Trump, North Carolina Gov. Pat McCrory said: "You see some outspoken people who jump up in the polls, but then they also falter very quick. It'll be interesting to see if that same dynamic occurs."

Not one to suffer criticism silently, Trump denied press credentials for Saturday's event to reporters at The Des Moines Register after the newspaper published an editorial calling him a "feckless blowhard" who is "unfit to hold office" and saying that he should leave the race.

Register editor Amalie Nash said Friday that the paper's editorial board is independent of its news reporters and editors.

Trump on debates: 'I'm going to be in the lion's den' // CNN // Eugene Scott - July 25, 2015

Real estate magnate Donald Trump might be an expert when it comes to bear markets and bull markets, but put him on the debate stage next month amid a crowd of determined GOP contenders and, in the candidate's words, he's "going to be in the lion's den."

"I'm by far number one, so I'm going to be there. But I'm not a debater. I create jobs. I've never stood at a podium and debated a bunch of people," Trump told reporters Saturday at Oskaloosa High School in Oskaloosa, Iowa.

He added: "From what I hear, every one of them's going to come at me. For two hours, I'm going be in the lion's den, but I don't do that for a living."

And: "I hear everyone saying I'll be great at debate. I don't know if I'll do good. I look forward to debate, but I've never done it before."

The remarks, a rare moment of public self-doubt for the brash and cocky mogul, come as Trump continues to lead 2016 GOP contenders in national polls while his Republican contenders anxiously await a chance to knock him down.

Fox News, which on Aug. 6 is sponsoring the first debate, has said it will only invite the top 10 finishers in recent opinion polls to its event. However, CNN's first debate on Sept. 16 will be split into two parts: One will have the candidates that national polls rank as the top 10 GOP contenders, and the other with the candidates who didn't make that cut.

Currently, it appears Trump is a lock to make the top 10.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Trump told reporters Saturday that because he is not a politician, he will have the least experience of those participating.

"They say Jeb Bush hasn't been on stage lately. I haven't been on stage my whole life. And nobody talks about that," he said. "I have to be honest. I am who I am."

Trump takes aim at Walker in Iowa // CNN // Eugene Scott - July 25, 2015

Donald Trump has spent much of the early days of his presidential campaign taking on Jeb Bush.

But in Iowa on Saturday, the real estate mogul took shots at Scott Walker, who's long stood atop polls in the Hawkeye State, home to the critical first-in-the-nation caucuses.

Trump -- who is in second place in Iowa polls behind Walker -- slammed the Wisconsin governor's leadership.

"Wisconsin is doing terribly. It's in turmoil," Trump said at Oskaloosa High School in Oskaloosa. "The roads are a disaster because they don't have money to rebuild them."

He also accused Walker's administration of borrowing due to a budget deficit, and painted him as a supporter of Common Core education standards, which are opposed by much of the Republican base.

"Schools are a disaster. Hospitals and education are a disaster," Trump said. "And he was totally in favor of Common Core, which I hate."

Walker recently has been a fierce opponent of Common Core, leading Trump on Saturday to label him a flip-flopper.

A Monmouth University poll of Iowans released Monday and conducted over last weekend showed Walker continues to maintain a solid lead in the Iowa Republican caucus, though Trump has gained an edge over the rest of the field and now stands alone in second place.

Of likely caucus attendees, 22% told pollsters that they'd support the Wisconsin governor in next winter's matchup, but 13% said they would back Trump, who has suddenly catapulted to the front of some national polls. Trump only earned 4% of Republicans' support in a Des Moines Register/ Bloomberg survey conducted in May, a month before Trump announced his campaign and made a string of controversial comments that came alongside his rise.

Trump's remarks come one day after a fundraiser for Walker's campaign called Trump "DumbDumb."

Gregory Slayton, a New Hampshire venture capitalist who served in the George W. Bush administration, challenged Trump's intelligence in a fund-raising invitation, The Wall Street Journal reported Friday.

"As you've seen Gov Walker is now well ahead of everyone not named DumbDumb (aka Trump) in the national polls," the email invitation said.

Slayton told the paper that intelligence is not required to gain the wealth that Trump has acquired.

"I didn't mean that to be public but obviously I stand behind it," he said. "Look, this is a great country. Guys who are not that smart can get rich, it's wonderful. But Donald Trump is not going to be president of the United States ever, period, end of story."

Also on Saturday, Trump made reference to the Des Moines Register, to which his campaign denied press credentials following a negative editorial this week in which the paper called for Trump to drop out of the race.

"We have so many people standing outside ... actually, the Des Moines Register is standing outside, too," Trump said, to laughter.

Jennifer Jacobs, the Register's chief political reporter, tweeted that Henry Hahn, another reporter for the paper, was in the main auditorium covering the event. She said the campaign staff was polite to her earlier Saturday, but that the candidate himself was "silent" when he saw her.

Could North Carolina be Scott Walker's big prize? // CBS // Jacqueline Alemany - July 25, 2015

March Madness is about to get a whole new meaning in North Carolina come next year.

With two Floridians, two Texans and an Ohio governor in the Republican presidential race, three delegate-rich presidential primary states might be left uncontested by the rest of the expansive GOP field.

What's a candidate looking for a big early win to do? Head toward Tobacco Road.

North Carolina state legislators voted this week to hold the state's 2016 primary on March 15 of next year, bringing to a close a lengthy squabble over when to hold the primary. But the change also has serious implications for the huge field of Republican presidential candidates as they draw up their nomination roadmaps. North Carolina has in recent years held its primary in May, and by May, the nominee is usually a foregone conclusion. There hasn't been a competitive Republican primary in May in 40 years.

But assuming there is no clear nominee by early March, "There is real opportunity here," said State Sen. Andrew Brock, a co-sponsor of the bill moving the primary to March. "You can win with 15 or 16 percent of the vote. You're going to have to run a campaign. And it doesn't benefit one candidate or another in this race who is looking in our state."

March is full of big primary states packed with delegates, but three of the biggest have hometown candidates that could take those states off the map: Ohio's governor John Kasich just joined the race, Florida has Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio, and Texas has Rick Perry and Ted Cruz all claiming support back home.

That leaves North Carolina as the biggest primary prize in March: 72 delegates will be at stake in a winner-take-all contest.

Republican candidates are taking notice. Supporters of Scott Walker and Rand Paul have been jockeying behind the scenes for months to establish a North Carolina primary date that favors their preferred candidate. While Paul supporters weren't banking on the Kentucky senator winning the state, they had hoped to make the state's primary proportional, giving him a chance to nab some of its delegates.

Walker has greater ambitions for North Carolina, too. The Wisconsin Governor made a detour last month to address the North Carolina GOP convention in Raleigh, and he was slated to make a second trip this weekend before canceling his plans to attend the funeral of one of the Marines slain in last week's Chattanooga shootings.

Sources told CBS News that the Walker campaign also made it known to allies in the state legislature -- namely state Sen. Bob Rucho, a powerful state Republican -- that a March 15 winner-take-all contest would be its preference. According to one source, Walker "put the squeeze" on Rucho to make North Carolina an early winner-take-all primary.

"The 15th was communicated to Senator Rucho as the preferred date by the Walker campaign," said another GOP source involved in the maneuvering. "If you're Walker, you're not going to go to Florida - why would you spend money there? You got Kasich's Ohio on the same day. You're not going to put a lot of resources there. North Carolina is a big fish."

Moving the primary to March marked a change of heart for Rucho, who was locked in a dispute earlier this year with national Republican officials over his desire to move the primary to February - showcasing the state early in the nomination process. But that would have been in flagrant violation of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican National Committee rules protecting February for the first four voting states: Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada.

The Walker campaign declined repeated requests for comment.

Though multiple North Carolina Republicans said Rucho has been pulling the strings for Walker behind the scenes, Rucho denies being an outright supporter of the governor, despite heaping praise on him.

"I was very pleased to watch and see Governor Walker and see the message he put out," Rucho told CBS News, praising Walker's conservative record in Wisconsin. "My feeling is lot of people can talk about what they would like to do, but very few of them can actually achieve it."

North Carolina might seem an unusual cultural fit for the Wisconsin governor as he plots his nomination strategy, but Republicans in the state say his appeal is rooted in his tough-minded approach to the slashing the state budget in Madison.

The high-profile battles over union benefits and voter ID laws during Walker's first term beginning in 2010 mirrored similar fights in North Carolina, and won Walker fans down south.

Former North Carolina GOP Chairman Claude Pope, who has supported changing the date of North Carolina's primary, told CBS News that the state is thrilled to have a chance at the national spotlight once again, pointing to Ronald Reagan's North Carolina upset over Gerald Ford in 1976.

"He had not yet won a state at all during 1976, and he was primarying a sitting president," Pope told CBS News. "So he kept losing and losing and it wasn't until he won North Carolina and got enough momentum. Not enough to get the nomination - but enough to make a significant impact and that propelled him to set up the stage for a win in 1980."

Donald Trump on Scott Walker: 'Finally, I Can Attack' // ABC // Jessica Hopper, Alec Goodwin, and Cristina Ochoa - July 25, 2015

Donald Trump came under fire all week for questioning John McCain's status as a war hero and for giving out Lindsey Graham's personal cell phone number, but today he might have found a couple of safe targets for his attacks: GOP rival Scott Walker and the scandal swirling around Hillary Clinton and her email.

"I don't know how a person with that cloud over their head could be running for president," Trump said of Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner in the race for the White House.

Trump said if the allegations are true that Clinton sent classified email from her private server, it's "criminal."

Trump went on to compare Clinton and her email scandal to the downfall of Gen. David Petraeus, who was forced to resign as director of the CIA after it was revealed he was having an extramarital affair and had shared classified information with his lover.

"They destroyed him. He's like a ruined man," Trump said of Petraeus.

Trump argued that Petraeus "did much less than Hillary in terms of information, in terms of importance and in terms of volume," of the classified material leaked.

Trump didn't reserve all his criticism for Clinton. He moved onto Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker. He said that the state of Wisconsin is doing "terribly" and accused Walker of being a flip-flopper.

"He was totally in favor of Common Core," Trump said. "Scott Walker changed when he saw he was getting creamed."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump said he was retaliating for nasty comments made by a Walker fundraiser.

"Today I read this horrible statement from his fundraiser guy about Trump, and I say, 'Finally, I can attack. Finally,'" Trump said.

Trump, currently leading the GOP race nationally in the polls, is trailing Walker in Iowa. And Trump let the more than 1,000 people filling an Oskaloosa auditorium know that it was bothering him that he wasn't in first place in the Hawkeye state.

"I can't believe I'm in second place," Trump said. "Folks, will you please put me in first place, so I feel better."

Before Trump arrived in Oskaloosa, people waited in the heat for two hours to catch a glimpse of the billionaire mogul and reality television star. Trump's whirlwind week of criticizing Sen. John McCain's war hero status and giving out Sen. Lindsey Graham's phone number didn't seem to deter people from coming to hear him speak.

"One thing I really like is he's not afraid to say what he thinks and stand up for it," said Karen Lambert of Des Moines, Iowa. "I'm tired of the Republicans just caving for pressure and they really need to stand their ground and I think that Trump is someone who will do that."

Lambert is undecided on who her favorite candidate is in the Republican field, but she said she appreciates Trump for not always being politically correct.

"I really feel like the GOP leadership has completely ignored the roots, the grassroots, the base of their party and they're trying to be Democrats and we really need a conservative option," she said.

Carl Drost, a native of Oskaloosa, called Trump, the "epitome of the American dream."

"I want to shake his hand before he gets out of here today," Drost said.

Drost, a Vietnam veteran, wasn't bothered by Trump's comments about McCain last week.

"He's kind of outspoken and I've been president of the school board for a couple of years and sometimes being outspoken is not real positive and that needs to be done to let people know what's going on," Drost said.

Trump didn't back down from his comments made about McCain, reiterating that he believes McCain has done little for veterans. To highlight how much Trump says veterans love him, he called for a box of letters to be brought to the stage that contained what he called "one day of letters, about a half a foot wide stack."

Of his candidacy, Trump said he was in it for the long haul. He joked that there were other more relaxing things he could be doing, but he wants to be president.

"I love you people. I love Iowa, but it's hot as hell in this room. I could be doing something else right now," said Trump, generating laughter in the room.

In a press conference following his speech, Trump talked about his campaign's future and his preparation for the first GOP debate, which is scheduled for Aug. 6.

"I'm going to be there, much to the chagrin of everyone. I never did that before. I never stood at a podium and debated a large number of people and from what I heard, every one of them is going to come at me," Trump said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump said he knows he'll likely be in the "lion's den."

"I don't know if I'm going to be good," Trump said of the debate. "Politicians do it every night, but they don't produce jobs."

PAUL

Senator Rand Paul makes history in small N.H. town // Boston Globe // James Pindell - July 26, 2015

US Senator Rand Paul on Saturday became the first presidential candidate in recent history to visit this small town nestled in the White Mountain National Forest.

In a state that boasts a presidential candidate visit nearly every day since this spring, Warren gets little attention from White House hopefuls.

"This is a really big deal for Warren," said Bob Giuda, the town's moderator. "We often feel a bit ignored by the presidential campaign because we are a small town a bit out of the way, but his visit will have people talking for a while."

This marked Paul's second visit to the town, where the common has displayed a rocket since 1971. He campaigned there in 2007 for his father, former US representative Ron Paul of Texas, when he ran for president.

Paul said that coming to Warren was just the latest example of how he is willing to campaign where others won't. He recently spoke at historically black colleges and campaigned in Detroit, Missouri, and Maryland.

The Kentuckian spent Saturday campaigning in northern New Hampshire for his own presidential aspirations. He also held town hall meetings in West Lebanon and Littleton, visited the North Haverhill town fair, and was scheduled to attend an evening event Saturday night in Tilton.

On Sunday he will host a meet-and-greet at a Windham diner.

But on Saturday afternoon, Paul spent about an hour at the Moose Scoops ice Cream store, where he bought two scoops in a waffle cone. He also signed a taxpayer pledge, in which he appeared with a giant ax with the words "ax the tax."

At the Warren town hall, across the common, a couple celebrated their 34th wedding anniversary.

Bryan Flagg, the owner of the Moose Scoops Ice Cream store and the local weekly newspaper, said that Paul's visit highlights the importance of smaller communities.

"It is small towns where government policies can have a big impact," Flagg said. "His visit here says he respects us. I hope we can have others visit."

Has Rand Paul stalled? // The Hill // Niall Stanage - July 25, 2015

A year ago, Rand Paul, the libertarian-minded senator from Kentucky, was among the leading potential candidates in the GOP presidential race, topping at least three national polls in spring and early summer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now, he is stuck in seventh place in the RealClearPolitics (RCP) national average, with less than 6 percent support.

The Kentuckian's campaign, once the subject of intense media interest, is struggling for attention, and faces the danger that it could fizzle.

"There are so many new entrants into this sweepstake that I think he has been overshadowed by all the attention given to every new declaration of candidacy," said Ross Baker, a professor of political science at Rutgers University. "I think he, and his message, are getting lost — and it shows the dangers of a too-early announcement."

One dynamic of the race since Paul announced his candidacy on April 7 is particularly stark. Back then, most pollsters were not even including Donald Trump's name on the menu of choices for Republican voters. The one poll that had done so, from Fox News, had given the mogul 3 percent support.

Now Trump sits atop the field with an 18.2 percent RCP average.

Paul's standing in the first states to vote, Iowa and New Hampshire, is better than in the national polls, but not strong enough to suggest he will mount a serious challenge to the frontrunners.

Paul is fourth in the RCP average in New Hampshire, behind former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Trump and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker. In Iowa, he is tied for third with Trump, behind Walker and Bush. Walker's support is more than twice as high as Paul's.

The issue for candidates like Paul — and others — is not just Trump's poll ratings. The businessman is so adept at creating controversy that he denies all but the very biggest candidates the spotlight.

"Donald Trump is taking all the oxygen out of the debate," said David Winston, a longtime Republican strategist and pollster. "That is a short-term dynamic, but when people aren't talking about your ideas, that is a challenge."

Still, Winston stressed that this did not mean all was lost for Paul or for other candidates who are now starved of attention. The first GOP debate, set for Cleveland on Aug. 6, provides an opportunity for them to break through — and for Trump to stumble of his own accord or be sidelined by rivals.

Paul is also more adept than some others at garnering media attention himself. He has proven this in the past, particularly in his use of filibusters to protest Obama administration policies on national security. Last week alone, he pushed an amendment to defund Planned Parenthood and illustrated his desire to replace the existing tax code with a video in which he attacked the current version with a chainsaw, fire and a wood chipper.

Meanwhile, his campaign is pushing back against the perception that he is anything less than a leading candidate.

"Recent polls continue to show Rand Paul in the top tier," Sergio Gor, a spokesman for the Paul campaign told The Hill. "A new Economist poll in the last couple weeks had Rand in second place behind only Trump, and the Real Clear Politics average of polls show Rand in third and fourth place in Iowa and New Hampshire ahead of other Republicans like [Sen. Marco] Rubio, [New Jersey Gov. Chris] Christie and [Sen. Ted] Cruz."

Gor also insisted that Paul had "laid out the boldest proposals" of any candidate, including a flat tax.

Still, it remains to be seen whether Paul can expand on the constituency that backed his father, former Rep. Ron Paul (R-Texas), in his two most recent presidential runs, in 2008 and 2012.

Ron Paul came second in the 2012 New Hampshire primary with 23 percent support and third in Iowa with 22 percent. Either of those results would be at the very high-end of expectations for his son at the moment.

"It's just gone kinda quiet," said Jamie Burnett, a longtime GOP strategist in New Hampshire, referring to chatter about Paul in the state. "It's just odd but people aren't talking about Rand Paul — or Ted Cruz — right now."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Burnett, who is not affiliated with any campaign but who personally favors Bush, added that he was always skeptical that Rand Paul could really pull together much more support than Ron Paul.

“I’ve always believed that … his support is capped; that there was a ceiling to it,” he said. “He was going to have a really hard time broadening his appeal where he could peel off enough mainstream conservatives.”

The news agenda, many people believe, has also not done Paul any favors. Over the past year, foreign policy issues such as the rise of ISIS and the negotiations over Iran’s nuclear program have become more prominent. Paul, who is not so isolationist as his father but nonetheless favors a markedly restrained foreign policy, has problems with the base in that regard.

“He has got a very different view that is clearly, within the party, controversial,” said Winston. “He is going to have to work through an explanation of how his policies will address terrorism, ISIS, Iran possibly getting a nuclear weapon. That is one of the challenges he faces.”

Still, Paul could gain steam if other candidates falter. And even some observers unaffiliated with his campaign warn that it’s much too early to write him off.

“Maybe some people expected more out of a Rand Paul campaign — that it was going to be bigger, more flamboyant,” said Craig Robinson, a former political director for the Republican Party of Iowa. “But these are the months when campaigns need to be on the ground, working and organizing — and sometimes that doesn’t get a lot of headlines. It’s clear to me that his campaign is functioning very well in Iowa.”

Rand Paul defies McConnell to defund Planned Parenthood // Washington Examiner // Barbara Boland - July 25, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky., announced late Friday that he will "use every Senate rule" to force his Senate colleagues on the record after fellow Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., blocked his amendment to defund Planned Parenthood.

If Paul gets enough senators to sign his petition, he can go around McConnell and force a vote.

"I'm prepared to use every Senate rule at my disposal to force my colleagues on record whether they like it or not," Paul wrote Friday night. "Under Senate rules, if enough Senators are willing to stand with me and sign a petition demanding a vote, there will be no stopping you and me."

"The more I learn about Planned Parenthood's racket, aborting unborn children and then selling off their organs, the more my head spins," he wrote. "I'm not about to let Planned Parenthood off the hook. And I'm not about to let politicians and our media sweep this scandal under the rug."

Paul is referencing two recent undercover videos which show Planned Parenthood officials haggling the price of aborted fetal organs. In one video, Planned Parenthood Dr. Deborah Nucatola says: "You know, we've been very good at getting heart, lung, liver, because we know that, so I'm not gonna crush that part, I'm going to basically crush below, I'm gonna crush above, and I'm gonna see if I can get it all intact," describing how she alters the abortion procedure to best harvest whatever organs are in demand.

"One video even showed Planned Parenthood officials squabbling over the price of aborted baby parts because one official joked she wanted to buy a Lamborghini," Paul wrote.

Planned Parenthood is the largest abortion provider in the U.S. About 45 percent of Planned Parenthood's 2014 revenue — $540.6 million — was provided by taxpayer-funded government health services grants, an analysis of their annual report reveals.

Paul's petition to defund Planned Parenthood is his second buck to fellow McConnell's leadership; after Paul defied McConnell in May and killed a segment of the Patriot Act that enabled NSA mass data collection on Americans.

Rival Republican presidential candidate Sen. Ted Cruz, R-Texas, garnered headlines with a viral video where he accused Sen. Majority Leader McConnell on the Senate floor this week of "flat-out" lying for the last-minute addition of an amendment that would extend the unpopular Export-Import Bank, while excluding amendments he had offered to a "must-pass" highway bill.

Paul's two amendments, one to defund Planned Parenthood, and another to arm service members on military bases, were also blocked using a maneuver called "filling the tree" that was a favorite of Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., during his time as Senate Majority Leader.

The multi-billion highway bill the senators wished to add their amendments to is considered "must-pass" legislation because it will fund highways, roads and mass transit systems over the next ten years.

Paul hopes he can garner the signatures for his bill and win support from the pro-life community, after he earned kudos in April when he turned a "rape and life of the mother" abortion question around on a reporter and asked: "Why don't we ask the DNC: Is it okay to kill a seven-pound baby in the uterus? You go back and you ask Debbie Wasserman Schultz if she's OK with killing a seven-pound baby that is just not yet born."

The Senate will be in session Sunday and voting could extend throughout the week, depending on what maneuvers the senators make.

CRUZ

First on CNN: Billionaire brothers give Cruz super PAC $15 million // CNN // Theodore Schleifer - July 25, 2015

Two low-profile Texas brothers have donated $15 million to support Sen. Ted Cruz, a record-setting contribution that amounts to the largest known donation so far in the 2016 presidential campaign.

Farris and Dan Wilks, billionaires who made their fortunes in the West Texas fracking boom, have given $15 million of the $38 million that the pro-Cruz super PAC, Keep the Promise, will disclose in election filings next week, according to sources outside the super PAC with knowledge of the giving.

The siblings earned their riches with the sale of their company Frac Tech for $3.5 billion in 2011, and since then have shuffled large contributions to the leading social conservative nonprofit groups that aren't required to reveal their donors. But they will no longer be able to avoid detection after giving a historically large and early donation that now make the brothers two of America's most prominent political donors.

"Our country was founded on the idea that our rights come from the Creator, not the government. I'm afraid we're losing that," Farris Wilks, a 63-year-old pastor in the small town of Cisco, said in a statement to CNN. "Unless we elect a principled conservative leader ready to stand up for our values, we'll look back on what once was the land of opportunity and pass on a less prosperous nation to our children and grandchildren. That's why we need Ted Cruz."

Keep the Promise is technically four separate committees that give three families more control over their own super PAC. Most of the attention has focused on Robert Mercer, a New York hedge fund magnate who gave the second-most money to conservative groups in 2014 than any other Republican donor. Mercer has given $11 million of the $38 million raised, according to a leader of the super PACs. Another $10 million comes from Toby Neugebauer, a Houston investor and a personal friend of Cruz's. The involvement of the Wilks brothers was first reported by National Review.

Together, their donations give Cruz and his allies more money than any other Republican except Jeb Bush, a surprising achievement for a firebrand senator more embraced at a Tea Party rally than at a black-tie business gala.

Friends and associates of the Wilks brothers say they are unaffected and unassuming, depicting them as hometown-loving Texans who morphed into billionaires over the course of a decade. Intensely private, those close to the pair say they are nervous about the spotlight that will shine on their church and their family thanks to the donations.

"If Dan and Farris walk into a room, they don't want ever to be known, to be announced. They just come in and sit in the back," said Luke Macias, a Texas political strategist who has worked with the family. "They are normal people. They dress normal. They show up normal."

Several other Republican donors will make seven-digit contributions to super PACs, which can accept unlimited donations, that will dwarf sums recorded in 2012: Norman Braman, a Florida auto dealer, will reportedly give up to $10 million to Marco Rubio's. Several Jeb Bush supporters are expected to have given $1 million to his and to be eager to give more. But the Wilks family's $15 million donation -- split between two people -- is likely to be the largest gift to a candidate on next week's reports.

Unlike some other mega-donors with an affinity for the ideological slugfest, the brothers shun giving that is meant purely for firepower in partisan fights. They choose specific projects over broad platforms. Through their $100 million family philanthropy, The Thirteen Foundation, the brothers gave nearly $19 million as part of their tithing to religious and conservative nonprofit groups like the Family Research Council and Online for Life in 2013, according to the most recent tax filings.

Driven mostly by their opposition to abortion and their fear that their religious sect -- which interprets every word of the Bible literally -- is under attack, Dan and Farris Wilks have slowly become more accustomed to funding campaigns. As recent billionaires, however, they haven't yet risen to the profile of the other conservative siblings that have revolutionized outside spending: the Koch Brothers.

Now, though, they are prepared to step right into the middle of a potentially nasty Republican nomination fight that could cost hundreds of millions of dollars.

"We need a true leader in Washington," Farris' younger brother, Dan, 59, said in the statement. "A leader that will stand up for biblical morals. We need a leader who is proud of America, not one who apologizes for us. We need a leader who encourages hard work, not one who tells people who don't work that they should make the same living as people who do. We need a leader who will make sure America doesn't end up a socialist nation."

Born to a poor family that once lived in a former goat shed, Farris and Dan Wilks spent their careers as brick-builders with their own masonry business. In 2002, they founded Frac Tech, which became one of the best positioned companies to capitalize on the growth of fracking, a controversial practice that involves the removal of natural gas or oil from rock formations.

Slowly, they marched toward a bigger role in the fracking industry. When competing Texas frackers looked to freeze the brothers out from the companies that distribute the sand needed to drill, the siblings opened their own sand quarry to thrive. Just as the West Texas fracking business began to boom, the brothers invested in their own line of trucks and became some of the largest fracking truck-producers in the country.

In 2011, they cashed out -- and began to buy enormous amounts of land in Montana for elk hunting and fly fishing. As of last year, they owned more than 310,000 acres of land in the state, making them Montana's largest private landowners, according to The Billings Gazette.

Today, Forbes pegs their net worth at about $1.4 billion each.

At the heart of their life, still, is the Assembly of Yahweh, which preaches a mix of Christianity and Judaism and holds the Bible as infallible. A different Wilks family member gives a sermon many Saturdays. Last week, it was Farris' turn.

"He was a pastor before he was a billionaire and he continues to pastor after being a billionaire," said Mat Staver, a prominent conservative activist close with the family.

It is not yet clear how the brothers plan to spend their money in the Cruz super PAC, or whether any strings are attached to the $15 million contribution. But the pair are said to have a particular desire to fund breakthroughs in social media and digital organizing, eyeing long-term opportunities to mobilize Christian voters on emerging or created-from-scratch platforms online.

Much of their giving is directed by Jon Francis, a family son in-law who heads The Thirteen Foundation, but those who have pitched projects to the brothers say that their philanthropy is very much a family affair. It is not uncommon for entrepreneurs to face questions from a half-dozen Wilks family members when asking for money.

That includes Republican presidential candidates. The brothers have been familiar with Cruz since he used the office of Texas solicitor general to launch several high-profile legal fights to defend Christian causes. But other Republican presidential candidates, aware of the Wilkses' net worth, have nevertheless courted their checkbook. The candidates most aggressively pining for their support, according to multiple people familiar with the outreach, were Wisconsin governor Scott Walker and former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee.

The Wilks family's eventual pledge to Cruz was driven by his emphasis on preserving Christian organizations' ability to operate amid cultural victories for the left. But it was also motivated by the Texas senator's ability to speak about policy in the entrepreneurial terms that the brothers use when evaluating projects.

"One of the pleasures of doing business with them is they kind of treat like you like you might be the next Wilks," said Jeremy Boering, a California filmmaker who has successfully won grants from them.

Boering said that's the philosophy that Cruz pitched to Farris Wilks -- and why he's funding him.

"He thinks he's one of the only guys in the movement that seems to authentically wants to preserve the market, authentically preserve the way of life that allows people to move from bricking walls to being a billionaire," Boering said.

Report: Ted Cruz super PAC gets $15 million from two billionaire donors // USA Today // Deirdre Shesgreen - July 25, 2015

Two billionaire brothers who made a fortune in the fracking business have donated $15 million to a super PAC supporting Sen. Ted Cruz's presidential bid, according to CNN.

Citing unnamed sources, CNN reported that Farris and Dan Wilks are by far the biggest donors to Keep the Promise, a pro-Cruz PAC. The brothers founded Frac Tech, a hydraulic fracturing and oil field services business in 2002, and then sold it in 2011 for $3.5 billion, according to Forbes.

Farris Wilks, who is also pastor of the Assembly of Yahweh 7th Day Church near Cisco, said he and his brother support Cruz because the country needs "a principled conservative leader."

"Our country was founded on the idea that our rights come from the Creator, not the government. I'm afraid we're losing that," Wilks said in a statement to CNN. "Unless we elect a principled conservative leader ready to stand up for our values, we'll look back on what once was the land of opportunity and pass on a less prosperous nation to our children and grandchildren."

The Wilks' contributions — along with other funds raised by the PAC — will become public in filings due to the Federal Election Commission at the end of this month.

Cruz's allies have created several PACs to boost his presidential ambitions, all with similar names: Keep the Promise PAC, Keep the Promise II and Keep the Promise III.

Super PACs can raise unlimited sums but are required to operate independently of the candidates they support.

CHRISTIE

Chris Christie Claims He Will Pursue the Trans-Hudson Tunnel Project as President // NYT // Rick Rojas - July 25, 2015

Several days of severe delays for rail commuters trying to cross the Hudson River this week has been a painful reminder of the deteriorating state of the tunnels that carry the trains and brought renewed attention to a decision made years ago to halt a project that might have helped improve the situation.

In a radio interview that will be broadcast this weekend, Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey made clear his reasoning for blocking the construction of a new tunnel and other infrastructure in 2010 that was intended to increase passenger service capacity between his state and Manhattan. He said it was a regional project that would have left New Jersey taxpayers to bear the brunt of its cost.

The governor, a Republican candidate for president, added that if he were to make it to the White House, he would push for an equitable solution.

“If I am president of the United States, I call a meeting between the president, my secretary of transportation, the governor of New York and the governor of New Jersey and say, ‘Listen, if we are all in this even Steven, if we are all going to put in an equal share, then let’s go build these tunnels under the Hudson River,’ ” Mr. Christie said in an interview with the radio talk show host Larry Kudlow, which will be broadcast on Saturday on WABC-AM.

“Then, everyone has an incentive to have the project run right, to run efficiently because everybody is on the hook,” Mr. Christie added.

The governor’s comments — and his hypothetical phrasing — has attracted the attention of his critics, who say his statements emphasize how little he has done to help improve transportation.

“This is not a hypothetical issue, this is a real issue, and he could be doing something about it,” said Martin Robins, the founding director of the Alan M. Voorhees Transportation Center at Rutgers University, who was the director of the tunnel project during the mid-1990s. “The question is, what has he done, what will he do in the next 18 months as the governor of New Jersey?”

Commuters have faced severe delays several days this week, including on Friday, because of electrical problems in the aging tunnels beneath the river.

In a separate statement on Friday, Mr. Christie placed blame for the delays on Amtrak. “N.J. Transit commuters were victimized by nearly an entire week of extreme delays and cancellations for one reason only: Amtrak’s indifference to New Jersey commuters and its abject neglect of the infrastructure that New Jersey and our entire region relies upon,” he said.

Amtrak did not directly respond to Mr. Christie’s pointed remarks, but a spokesman did say the agency “regrets and apologizes for the inconvenience.”

“These power failures demonstrate the urgent need for a funding solution so we can build and renew the infrastructure needed to keep this region and the economy moving,” the spokesman, Craig Schulz, said in a statement.

The governor has argued that he recognized the need for additional rail capacity across the Hudson, as long as the cost does not disproportionately fall on New Jersey. But his critics said they were surprised by Mr. Christie’s response on Friday, saying they struggled to recall a previous instance when he had acknowledged the issue and its severity.

Christie knocks candidates for being 'vague' on entitlement reform // CNN // Ashley Killough - July 25, 2015

Chris Christie is positioning himself as the candidate in the race who's offering specific policy proposals, while other candidates, he says, are being "vague."

Holding a town hall event in Davenport, Iowa, on Friday, the New Jersey governor appeared to single out one candidate in particular, though not by name.

"I heard a candidate complain the other day that, you know, 'my positions' -- meaning that candidate's positions -- 'on comments I made about entitlement reform are being misconstrued by the press.' Well, it's much harder to be misconstrued by the press if you're specific," Christie said. "If you continue to speak in generalities, then you're going to have other people interpret what you mean."

Meanwhile, Christie said, "we've put forward more detail than any other candidate in this race."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His comments come one day after Jeb Bush argued that he was "taken out of context" when he said Thursday night that entitlement programs like Medicare should be "phased out." He emphasized that he wants to reform such programs and replace them with more sustainable policies, and floated the idea of raising the retirement age.

But Bush, who says he's planning to outline more policy proposals in the coming weeks, did not go into great detail.

Asked later Friday if Christie was specifically referring to Bush, the governor said he was talking about "everybody who's not talking about it."

"Everybody who doesn't talk about this stuff says they're mischaracterized," he continued, talking to reporters after shaking hands and meeting voters at the Davenport Street Fest. "Be specific. Then you won't be mischaracterized."

For his part, Christie made a major policy speech earlier this summer listing a series of policy proposals on entitlement reform. For one, he'd like to means test Social Security and raise the retirement age for Social Security by two months every year until it hits 69.

"People don't have to interpret what I mean about Social Security," he said Friday. "It won't be mischaracterized ... the more vague you are because you're trying to have it both ways, the more you're subject to that kind of misinterpretation."

He was asked by a voter at the town hall if he would still raise the retirement age for people who work manually intensive jobs and can't work as long. Because of improvements in medicine, Christie argued that even laborers will be able to work for longer periods in their lives.

"I think that if you give it 25 years, which is what we're giving it, you're going to see advances in medical science ... and pharmaceutical treatments that are going to allow us to even have manual laborers who will be able to work longer, much longer than they're able to work now," he said.

"Even to 65?" the voter asked

"Yeah, listen, I think so. I really do. There will always be early retirement available for some people," he said, noting how people can take that now in Social Security.

Democrats, who zeroed in on Bush's comments about Medicare, were also quick to jump on Christie's comments on Friday.

The Democratic research group American Bridge blasted out video of Christie's town hall as "proof that Republicans really do believe that the problem isn't income inequality, it's that all those workers just don't put in enough effort."

Chris Christie Fires Back At Gun Rights Activist In Iowa // HuffPo // Samantha-Jo Roth - July 25, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R) got into a heated exchange with a skeptical voter who accused the presidential candidate of being “anti-gun” during a town hall on Saturday, citing New Jersey’s tough gun control laws.

Responding to the man, who did not identify himself but mentioned he was part of the Iowa Gun Owners organization, Christie defended his record, refuting every claim the voter mentioned, and, at times, even raising his voice.

“Come up with one fact that shows one thing I’ve done as governor in New Jersey that’s done anything, anything not to support the rights of legal gun owners,” Christie said as the crowd gathered inside a local community college auto body shop erupted in applause. “Don’t come in front of this group of people and lie about my record, which is what you did.”

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R) got into a heated exchange with an activist over gun control in Iowa on Saturday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The voter accused Christie of proposing to ban .50-caliber rifles, requiring a government-issued ID for every firearms purchase and setting up a statewide firearms registry of guns and gun owners. Christie responded harshly, holding true to the theme of his campaign, "Telling it like it is."

"I don't know where you're getting your information from, but your information is wrong," Christie told the man.

Christie noted that he vetoed the .50-caliber ban, the statewide ID system and the law that was passed to reduce magazine sizes from 15 to 10.

The man in the crowd then asked if Christie is planning on pardoning Brian Fletcher, a North Carolina man who is facing prison time after telling a police officer in New Jersey that he had a gun in his vehicle, which is the customary and legal thing to do in his home state. Christie said he hasn't made a decision yet, but is reviewing the situation.

"I'm not going to make that decision in 15 minutes nor should I. Nor should you want me to," Christie said. "I see you shrugging your shoulders, why are you shrugging your shoulders about? You have your point of view, but have some facts about it."

The confrontation lasted over five minutes, as others in the crowd seemed to shift uncomfortably in their seats. The voter brought up an ad that ran in 1995, which shows Christie criticizing his opponent for wanting to repeal the assault weapons ban in New Jersey. Christie pointed out that his views have changed over the last 20 years.

"If you haven't changed your mind once in 20 years on any issue, then I'll tell you, you're not a thinking, breathing, living human being," Christie said as the crowd applauded.

"If you want to debate me, come to the top 10, run for president and come to Cleveland on Aug. 6, and I'll happily debate you," he added.

In Iowa, Christie's favorability ratings are under water. A recent poll of Iowa caucus-goers shows 45 percent of registered Iowa voters have negative feelings about Christie, while only 24 percent view him favorably.

At the town hall, Christie continued to blame New Jersey's Democratic-controlled legislature for anti-gun measures occurring in his state.

"As governor and as president, you're not an emperor or dictator," Christie said. "You want better gun laws, elect a Republican legislature, and these laws will be changed."

GRAHAM

John McCain to campaign in New Hampshire with Lindsey Graham // WaPo // James Hohmann - July 25, 2015

John McCain will spend next weekend campaigning around New Hampshire with his pal Lindsey Graham.

The Arizona senator, who twice won the state's Republican primary, will headline a barbecue at the VFW post in Littleton on Aug. 1 for the dark horse GOP presidential candidate and South Carolina senator, according to the Graham campaign. Then the duo will travel to additional events, which campaign officials said are still being planned.

McCain's trip will be his first foray out on the campaign trail since Donald Trump, leading in the national polls of Republicans, suggested he is not a true war hero because he got captured by the North Vietnamese. Graham responded by calling Trump a "jackass." Trump retaliated by announcing Graham's personal cellphone number on national television during a rally in South Carolina.

That prompted Graham to destroy his cellphone, but it has also generated buzz that could give him enough momentum to get into the first Republican debate on Aug. 6 on Fox News.

McCain has already been helping Graham, one of his best friends. They recently appeared together at an event in New York to oppose President Obama's deal with Iran. And McCain has helped Graham raise money. They share a hawkish foreign policy, and Graham was an all-in surrogate during McCain's run for president in 2008. Along with former senator Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), they called themselves "the three amigos."

Several of Graham's senior staff are veterans of McCain's 2008 campaign. Campaign manager Christian Ferry was McCain's deputy manager. Senior adviser Jon Seaton was McCain's national field director. Communications director Brittany Bramell also worked in McCain's communications shop.

John McCain to campaign with Graham in New Hampshire // Politico // Katie Glueck - July 25, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Sen. Lindsey Graham is getting an assist in New Hampshire from a man with a track record of success in the Granite State: Sen. John McCain will campaign with him there next weekend.

McCain, the Arizona Republican and 2008 GOP nominee, saw his presidential run take off in New Hampshire that year after a string of setbacks. Next weekend, he will join Graham, who is perhaps his closest colleague in the Senate, for a swing through the first-in-the-nation state that begins Saturday at a VFW hall in Littleton, N.H.

The Arizona senator also won the 2000 New Hampshire primary and remains a respected figure among many Republicans there.

Graham (R-S.C.), who is lagging in the polls, is a vocal advocate for a muscular foreign policy and robust national security strategy. McCain, who shares those views, will help him amplify that message.

While this will be McCain's first early-state campaign trail foray on behalf of Graham, there is plenty of overlap between their worlds: Graham's campaign is run by several veterans of McCain's orbit, and the two appeared together last week at a New York City fundraiser for Graham, as well as at a town hall centered on highlighting their concerns about the Obama administration's nuclear deal with Iran.

John McCain to Campaign for Lindsey Graham Next Week // TIME // Zeke K. Miller - July 25, 2015

Arizona Sen. John McCain, the 2008 Republican presidential nominee, will campaign for the first time on behalf of his friend Sen. Lindsey Graham in New Hampshire next week.

According to a Graham spokesperson, McCain, who won the 2000 and 2008 New Hampshire primaries, will appear with the South Carolina senator at a barbecue at a VFW hall in Littleton, N.H. on Saturday, Aug. 1. The pair will campaign in the state throughout the weekend.

McCain's in-person assistance is critical for Graham, who is casting his message as the natural successor to McCain's "straight talk," combining a hawkish foreign policy with calls to reform the immigration system, preserve the environment and modernize entitlement programs. It comes as a bevy of 2016 contenders are hoping to deploy a "tell-it-like-it-is" campaign in the Granite State.

The pair traveled extensively together in 2008, when Graham was a ubiquitous presence on McCain's campaign bus and plane. Together with former Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, the trio branded themselves as "the three amigos." (The three were united in New York last week at an event opposing President Barack Obama's nuclear agreement with Iran.)

In an interview with TIME last month, McCain praised Graham for being a "happy warrior" on the campaign trial.

"He's been on it with me for so long, he knows that one of the things that's important about a campaign is to enjoy it, and that enjoyment many times will transmit itself to the voter," McCain said. "He's going to be a happy warrior. He already is. And sometime that's very helpful in getting support, particularly when sometimes the face-to-face contact is what you get with voters in Iowa, and particularly New Hampshire."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2012, McCain held off endorsing anyone until the day after the Iowa Caucuses, when he appeared with former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney at a joint New Hampshire town hall as the eventual GOP nominee, and McCain's once bitter primary rival, sought to consolidate the party's support.

SANTORUM

Rick Santorum's slow build: campaigning 'has a way of weeding out candidates' // Guardian // Ben Jacobs - July 25, 2015

Rick Santorum spent the summer of 2011 crisscrossing Iowa, meeting handfuls of voters. For a long time he was mired at the bottom of the polls in the Republican primary, but his hard work paid off. The former Pennsylvania senator, an ardent social conservative, won Iowa and 10 other states in the race for the presidential nomination, finishing second to Mitt Romney.

A second-place finish is normally a springboard to frontrunner status in the GOP primaries next time round. But this summer, Santorum is doing the same thing, with the same low fundraising numbers and threadbare campaign.

The difference is that instead of being driven in the passenger seat of a pickup truck owned by a campaign aide, Santorum is travelling from town to town in a two-SUV caravan, driven by young staffers equipped with earpieces.

Santorum's campaign is relatively informal. Recently, he went into the back of Misty's Malt Shop in Keosauqua, Iowa, and made a milkshake for the Guardian. Not long afterwards, he could be spotted in Des Moines airport, alone, before flying back to his northern Virginia home.

In an interview with the Guardian, Santorum sounded relatively confident about his prospects despite having lower fundraising numbers in the last quarter than all but two other serious Republican candidates.

In his opinion, "the most important thing is getting to the finish line and, for me, the best way to get the finish line is to get to the start line". He said he was confident his campaign had "the money we need to do what we want to do" and was "way ahead of where we were four years ago".

Santorum also seemed to be taking a strategic decision to de-emphasize fundraising.

"I don't spend all my time raising money," he said. "Most candidates are not now doing seven or eight town hall meetings a day, they are spending most of their time on the phone, going to fundraisers, doing those things.

"That's the way they want to run their campaign and they can have nice reports which show lots of money. I'll show lots of caucus captains and lots of volunteers and impressions that while people may not say 'I'm for you now' [they might say] 'You're on my list and I might find myself supporting you on caucus night.'"

Santorum has also differentiated himself from other candidates with a relatively low-key approach at campaign events and at larger gatherings such as the Family Leadership Summit, a GOP presidential cattle call held in Ames, Iowa, last weekend. While others went for applause lines, Santorum consistently pushed his message of "blue-collar conservatism".

At every campaign stop, Santorum asked how many working-age Americans didn't have college degrees. He would get a guess or two and then give the answer: "74%".

The economically heterodox candidate, who opposes the TPP free trade agreement and favors the renewal of the Export-Import Bank, then talked about his plans to revive manufacturing in the US and the importance of using the tax code to incentivize two-parent families.

Santorum's skepticism towards free trade strikes a unique tone in the GOP field. At a business roundtable in Fairfield, Iowa, he argued: "A level playing field is not just domestic tax policy, because manufacturers in Iowa, by and large, don't compete against manufacturers in Wisconsin, they compete against manufacturers in Mexico and China."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instead, he expressed his support for "a level global playing field".

Unlike some Republican rivals, Santorum made a point of not mentioning the campaign's insurgent force, the real-estate mogul Donald Trump, by name. Instead, in an interview which took place before Trump's controversial remarks about John McCain, he simply noted that in the past two election cycles, "almost everyone that's gone up has come down".

The former Pennsylvania senator said: "Every candidate could surprise me and go up and never come down and be the candidate that can run wire to wire. But this process has a way of weeding out candidates."

He added: "I've always been the candidate who tries to have that slow steady build and build off of that foundation."

That approach was displayed as Santorum went from voter to voter to voter. In the small town of Keosauqua, Santorum walked the block and a half from the malt shop to the bar and restaurant where he was holding an event. On the way, he stopped at every business to shake hands.

"Hi, I'm Rick Santorum and I'm running for president," he said. A waitress, eating lunch alone at the pizzeria, was unimpressed. A teller asked what he would do to help community banks. Santorum seemed excited to share his desire to repeal Dodd-Frank.

Of course, there were Iowans who didn't recognize the candidate but, upon hearing he was running for president, wanted to take selfies. At the end of the walk, Santorum arrived at his event. In a town of just over 1,000, there were seven people waiting.

This approach has some real benefits. The Guardian talked to two voters who said they were considering Bernie Sanders and Santorum, having talked to the latter.

One, Tai Ward, a fantasy sports software developer from Fairfield, said Santorum piqued his interest when he said he was a fantasy sports fan as well. Ward, who caucused for the libertarian Ron Paul in 2012, said he liked candidates who stood up to corporations and seemed genuine, a description he felt applied to Santorum. He didn't agree with Santorum on everything, but appreciated that he seemed like "he believed everything he says".

The key for Santorum is whether he can successfully woo voters one on one in small towns over the next six months. The defending champion of the Iowa caucuses was in eighth place in the most recent poll of the Hawkeye State and he is doing even worse nationally, in danger of not qualifying for the first GOP debate, on 6 August.

He told the Guardian his campaign "was better positioned from the standpoint of being able to take this race beyond Iowa" than it was at the same time four years ago. But as in that campaign, he must hope that Republicans polling ahead of him flame out and give him, the slow and steady candidate, an opportunity to pull ahead.

Santorum: Iran deal is 'greatest betrayal' of US security ever // The Hill // Jordain Carney - July 25, 2015

Former Sen. Rick Santorum on Saturday called the Iran nuclear agreement the "greatest betrayal" of U.S. national security in the history of the United States.

"This is the greatest betrayal of American national security in our history," Santorum, who is running for president, said at the National Security Action Summit in New Hampshire. "[Iran] will cheat. They will violate the agreement. They will continue to sponsor terror all over the world."

Santorum's comments come as the administration is in the middle of trying to sell Congress on the agreement, announced earlier this month.

Secretary of State John Kerry, Treasury Secretary Jacob Lew and Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz met with lawmakers in multiple closed-door briefings and public hearings this past week, and they are expected to testify again next week.

Santorum slammed lawmakers, who he suggested don't want to stand up to the administration and have "Stockholm syndrome" when it comes to Obama.

"They are so afraid to fight," he added. "They have now decided that the only way to survive is to go along with him."

Lawmakers passed legislation earlier this year that gives them the ability to review and vote on the Iran deal before congressional sanctions can be lifted. But measures from Republicans that would have required it be considered as a treaty — which includes a higher threshold for approval — were rejected.

Santorum said the fact that senators weren't able to get enough votes to back requiring that the Iran agreement be submitted as a treaty — which the administration argues it is not — underscores "how little respect they have for you and how little belief they have in themselves."

Under legislation passed earlier this year, Obama ultimately needs to convince 34 lawmakers in the Senate to back the Iran agreement, which would give him enough support to uphold a potential veto of a resolution undercutting the deal in the Senate.

So far, Republicans have largely lined up against the agreement, while Democrats remain skeptical, with only one member of Senate leadership — Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) — throwing his support behind the deal so far.

Santorum, like other Republican presidential candidates, suggested Saturday he would walk away from the Iran agreement on "day one" if he's elected.

"Go through the process of on day one, saying this agreement is no longer enforced for the United States of America," he said, adding that the next president should "draw a line" and tell the Iranian government if it crosses it "we will take actions that make sure you are no longer a threat to the rest of the world."

Santorum: Lawmakers have 'Stockholm syndrome' with Obama // Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood - July 25, 2015

Rick Santorum blasted lawmakers for their "Stockholm syndrome," implying Saturday at an appearance in New Hampshire that lawmakers have bonded to their kidnapper, the Obama administration.

Speaking at the National Security Action Summit, Santorum said the nuclear agreement with Iran was "the greatest betrayal of American national security in our history" and urged members of Congress to stand up to the president in opposition of the deal.

"[Iran] will cheat. They will violate the agreement. They will continue to sponsor terror all over the world," the former Pennsylvania senator said Saturday, according to The Hill.

Secretary of State John Kerry and other cabinet members spent much of this week trying to sell lawmakers on the agreement, which is currently awaiting rejection or approval in Congress.

Obama has promised to veto any legislation that dismantles his signature diplomatic achievement.

Other Republican candidates for president have railed against the Iran deal and suggested they would eliminate it immediately upon taking office.

If Congress approves the agreement or fails to muster the support needed to override Obama's veto, the sanctions against Iran will be lifted.

Donald Trump: I Pay My Own Way, Unlike Bush, Walker or Clinton // WSJ // Heather Haddon - July 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Donald Trump said there was no cap in the amount of money he would be willing to put into his campaign for the Republican nomination for president if his message continues to resonate with voters.

Speaking at a free-wheeling press conference following a rally in this city east of Des Moines, Mr. Trump also attacked Republican rivals Jeb Bush and Scott Walker and Democrat Hillary Clinton with accusations that they were beholden to wealthy donors.

Mr. Trump, a real-estate developer and television personality, has almost entirely self-financed his campaign so far.

“Bush is controlled by those people. Walker is controlled by those people. Hillary Clinton is controlled by those people. Trump has none of those people,” he said Saturday afternoon. “I’m not controlled. I do what’s right for the people.”

Mr. Trump was particularly pointed in his attacks of Mr. Walker. He criticized the Wisconsin governor’s handling of his state’s economy and accused him of flip-flopping his stance on the Common Core education standards.

While once friendly with the governor, Mr. Trump said he felt free to criticize Mr. Walker after a fundraising invitation sent by one of his donors called Mr. Trump a “DumbDumb.”

“I said ‘hey now, the gloves are off,’” said Mr. Trump, who called the fundraiser a “stupid person.”

A spokeswoman for Mr. Walker’s campaign didn’t immediately respond to a request for comment.

Mr. Trump spoke before more than 1,000 people who gathered for a “family picnic” and speech that his campaign sponsored. Attendees filled the auditorium of the city’s high school and spilled into a space in the neighboring middle school, with 1,300 people registering to attend, a campaign official said.

The rally was originally scheduled to be held at a city park in Oskaloosa last month, but was rescheduled for a larger facility, Mr. Trump’s state director said.

The largely white crowd ate hamburgers cooked on long grills and salads served in silver chafing dishes.

“He’s saying the things we really feel,” said Gary Staggs, a 55-year-old small business owner from Oskaloosa. “Politicians can’t say them because they are so afraid of somebody they will offend.”

Mr. Trump delivered a nearly hourly long monologue without notes that touched on the imbalance of trade with China, his wealth and Iowa’s hot weather.

“I love you people. I love Iowa. But it’s hot as hell and I’m sweating like a dog,” said Mr. Trump, who wore a full suit.

Mr. Trump stuck to his criticisms of Mexico and illegal immigration to the U.S. from his country. He called for a system of immigration based on merit, but didn’t discuss specifics of his plan when asked about it after the speech.

After being criticized by veterans groups for attacking Arizona Sen. John McCain’s war record, Mr. Trump brought on stage a stack of papers he claimed to have been sent to him from former military men who supported him. Audience members waved printed signs stating “Veteran for Trump.”

Mr. Trump has lobbed colorful attacks at rivals since declaring he was running for president last month. He said he would tone down his criticisms if he was elected president, and singled out Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and neurosurgeon Ben Carson for maintaining a civil tone towards him.

Mr. Trump declined to discuss specific in response to a wide-range of questions posed to him by reporters. He would not say if he was preparing for the debates or if he was taking pointers from policy advisers. He couldn't say who would make up a Trump cabinet.

Asked if he would join some Republicans' calls to cut Social Security benefits, Mr. Trump said it wasn't necessary because he would bring so much economic activity back to the U.S.

Flanked by a large security detail in suits, Mr. Trump stood with well-wishers who snapped photos with him as he left. He posed before a "Trump" campaign bus, but then got into a black SUV to leave Iowa by plane.

How Does Trump End? // Politico // July 25, 2015

Donald Trump's rapid ascendency to the top of the Republican polls—and the blinding media spotlight surrounding him that has rendered all other 2016 contenders seemingly mute—has baffled nearly every observer. Even his longtime friends (and enemies) are fascinated. When I reached him this week on vacation, Las Vegas developer mogul Steve Wynn, who has been on both the enemies and the friends side of that equation with Trump, said simply, "I am as mystified about it as you are." As he continued, "It certainly is a spectacular and perverse moment in political history. There's no precedent for this."

"What I am certain of," the gaming mogul averred, "is that when you and I have this conversation next year, we will both agree unequivocally how convoluted and how mercurial the events of the world are. Neither one of us will have ever predicted the political environment of America [a year from now] as surely as I know my own name."

Added Wynn, "Intervening events will be dramatic and unpredictable. That's the kind of world we're living in." The Trump boomlet, too, Wynn insisted, shall pass.

But how it shall pass is a serious point of debate among campaign observers. With some help from Politico Magazine, Wynn's challenge was put to top political thinkers: how does Trump's unprecedented campaign end? Will Trump fizzle out soon, or endure for months? Will he succumb to pressure from the RNC, the GOP establishment and other candidates? Or only earn more attention as the race drags on? And is Trump ever truly "done"—or would he jump back into the race as a third party candidate?

"Maybe people will get tired of me," Trump mused Friday in an interview with Morning Joe. Or perhaps they won't. Below appear the best predictions collected from the respondents who dared speculate about how The Donald's spectacular rise ends – Jon Ralston, Politico Magazine contributing editor.

'There's a more-than-reasonable chance that he pulls a Perot and runs as an independent.'

By Bob Shrum, Democratic presidential strategist.

Trump is ripe for a Bentsen-Quayle moment in the first debate. Bush, Rubio, et al—no longer reticent in the face of Trump's pandering to the basest elements of the base, the "crazies"—are preparing the putdown right now. The question is who gets the right opening first. But one candidate who won't be looking for the opportunity is Cruz; he's angling to take the reins of Trump's buckboard of bigotry when Trump falls off and then ride it to the nomination.

He may have to wait. Trump can be scorched in the debate; but he won't flame out because he won't run out of money, even if he is a few billion shy of ten. He can hold on indefinitely, and he's not the type to recognize reality and retreat from the race. In the end, denied a nomination he can't win, there's a more-than-reasonable chance that he pulls a Perot and runs as an independent. That's what I'm rooting for and would advise the Great Bloviator to do. The "crazies" deserve a voice, and he's it. And the GOP deserves to pay a price—the presidency—for appeasing and exploiting the

'If the GOP keeps pounding Trump instead of ignoring him, they buy him time.'

By Erick Erikson, frequent commentator, radio host and founder of the blog RedState.

Congress goes on recess in August, you have the GOP debate and people will start to take a look at all the other candidates in relation to Trump. I think he begins a decline toward Iowa. If you delve into the polling, a lot of people who are right now saying they intend to vote for Trump are really saying they just like what he is saying. As others begin to get attention, he fades. One caveat though: if the GOP keeps pounding Trump instead of ignoring him, they buy him time. The longer the party elite bash Trump, the more the base loves him.

'Donald Trump is not only not hurting the GOP, he is a boon to it.'

By Mary Matalin, Republican political strategist.

With apologies to, and respect for, my conservative friends and colleagues, Donald Trump is not only not hurting the GOP, he is a boon to it. Candidates would be well advised to pay close attention to the forensics of his approach, and apply their own unique personalities and policies to their campaign efforts. And the GOP leadership should quit insulting him, giving him an excuse to mount a third party candidacy.

Among other strategic and tactical triumphs, Trump is exhibiting in pulsing neon colors the contemporary political parallel universes of Common Sense America and Conventional Wisdom Establishment. CS America is, and has been for some time been, so over the incompetent, posturing national politicians as well as their irrelevant agenda issues and their counterproductive policies. They are aching for candidates with authenticity who will address their everyday concerns. AND do not presume a preference for their common sense world makes them redneck philistines.

Further he is exposing the multiple fallacies of CW Establishment politics, to wit: appealing to nontraditional GOP voters requires narrow and corrupt Identity Politics tactics; message resonance demands mandatory acceptance of any and all CW Politically Correct premises, including gratuitous, phony, solicitous kowtowing to the media; that strict avoidance of establishmentarian "third rail" issues is political kamikaze.

Once he gets to the debates, he will have to connect his bombastic iconoclastic antics to authentic policy prescriptions, as well as demonstrate his potential effectiveness by past performance metrics

Bottom line: he will not blow up, but could pump up overly-reserved candidacies.

'He is the voice of the GOP. Hell, he's even the hair of the GOP.'

By Paul Begala, political analyst for CNN and counselor to President Bill Clinton.

When it comes to Mr. Trump, I know this: he reflects the views of today's Republican Party. Here's proof: 64 percent of Republicans agree with the broader statement that, "President Obama is hiding important information about his background and early life." And 34 percent of Republicans go full-on birther: saying of Republicans think it's likely that president Obama is not a US citizen; that he was not born in America (Fairleigh Dickinson Univ. poll, Dec., 2014). This, of course, is an issue Mr. Trump has highlighted.

68 percent of Republicans say Mr. Trump is right on immigration. (Fox News poll, July 17, 2015). This was after he said those rather, umm, controversial things about Mexican immigrants. 22 percent of Republicans even agree with his hateful attack on John McCain—saying McCain was not a war hero (PPP Poll 7/22/15).

Mr. Trump is the face of the GOP: angry, white and male. He is the voice of the GOP. Hell, he's even the hair of the GOP.

Never, ever ever underestimate Trump's staying power and ability to dominate media attention. In a field this large he could be around for a long time—potentially a lot longer than many of the other GOP candidates who have derided his chances of being their nominee. On running as a 3rd party candidate—someone should remind the GOP that Trump is a tough as nails negotiator and he would have plenty of leverage. How long? As long as he wants.

Trump's verbal incontinence prevents him from being able to restrain himself, and as they start banging him on his liberal political background, his casino deals, rickety real estate empire, multiple bankruptcies, the Trump-U scam, and so on, Trump will respond, over and over. He can't sustain the weight of multiple attacks.

Do not underestimate Donald Trump. He is in this race to stay. He will be a defining force through the primary season. As long as there are a dozen or more other candidates, there is nobody strong enough to stop him. A man who has no shame cannot be embarrassed or hounded out of the race—no matter how many offensive, racist or ludicrous things he says. Also: the media is addicted to Trump. They hate themselves for indulging him, but they refuse to go to rehab. Hold onto your hats! This guy is for real. And he will go the distance in the GOP primary—and maybe beyond the GOP primary, as an independent candidate.

The first debate will tell us all we need to know. Does Trump come with policy points and substantive responses? Will he respect the other candidates, the format, the moderator? Will he attempt to look presidential? Or will he interrupt, call people “dummies,” and punt on any real questions? If next to Walker, Jeb, Rubio, et al he looks like a cartoon, we’ll probably see the polls reflect that. If that gives him an off ramp to exit, maybe he’ll take it. If on the other hand he performs well, why would he go anywhere?

‘He doesn’t have to be even remotely viable to be a dangerous.’

By Ed Kilgore, liberal commentator, blogger at Washington Monthly’s Political Animal and Managing Editor at The Democratic Strategist.

It’s early to predict much of anything about anybody, but I’d say Donald Trump has the ego, the money and probably the motivation to take his campaign into the general election as an independent. That doesn’t mean he’ll succeed as well as Ross Perot in 1992 or even 1996. But in a campaign that could be a very close major party barnburner, he doesn’t have to be even remotely viable to be a dangerous and impossible-to-ignore factor, especially for Republican Party elites he clearly enjoys tormenting. And his appeal is heavily concentrated in a white working class demographic that Republicans just cannot afford to lose much of—Romney won 61 percent in 2012—and still hope to win.

What else is a 70-year-old narcissist going to do with all the attention he’s mustered? Retire? Do another TV show? I don’t think so.

‘Donald Trump will ... exit before the parade of judgement days we call elections.’

By Stuart Stevens, Republican strategist and the chief advisor for the 2012 Romney presidential campaign.

Put me down in the camp of being highly skeptical that Donald Trump will be on the ballot in Iowa or NH. Running for President is a uniquely humbling experience for all involved. The process has no respect for wealth, status or power. All of that argues, to me, that Donald Trump will use the system to make the points he is making and exit before the parade of judgement days we call elections.

‘Trump's act will grow tiresome.’

By Peter Wehner, former deputy director of speechwriting for President George W. Bush.

How the Trump campaign for president ends is hard to predict, since Trump himself is a deeply erratic individual. He shifts positions literally within hours, so knowing what he'll do months from now is impossible. But I do have a better feel, I think, for how Trump will play over time with Republican voters. The short answer: Not well.

My guess is that Trump’s candidacy is best understood as a months-long political conflagration that will begin to burn itself out by the late summer. Mr. Trump is a genius at getting attention, and he's clearly tapped into a deep vein of unhappiness among Republican voters—unhappiness with the politicians and the political class, with government and the media and with the state of America. Right now he’s a vehicle for lots of people's outrage.

But Trump's act will grow tiresome. The intensity surrounding him can't be sustained. And reality will soon take hold. His own past (and recent) liberal positions—there are many of them—are going to create serious doubts among the conservative base. Mr. Trump’s lack of substance and shallowness will catch up to him. And his non-stop crudity and insults, which some people might have found amusing at first, will wear thin. (In my experience, presidential candidates who ridicule POWs who were tortured usually don’t have a lot of staying power.) People who were initially drawn to him will begin to be embarrassed by him. Even now, while he leads several national polls in a splintered field, his negatives are extreme high. They'll go higher. He’s a stunningly target-rich environment.

This is the time in a political campaign when people's impressions are fluid, their views of the candidates unsettled, and they feel they have the luxury to indulge even circus clowns. This, too, shall pass. So even if Trump doesn't lose interest in the race, more and more Republican voters will lose interest in him. For a narcissist like Trump, that's the worst possible fate.

It hard for many people to imagine now, when Trump is the focal point of American politics, but come early fall—and maybe even sooner than that—my guess is that what many people will think of when they think of Donald Trump is boring. Tedious. The crazy uncle in the attic.

If Trump doesn't end this charade, Republican voters will happily do it for him.

'I'll go with the scenario that has Trump leaving the Republican party to run as an independent candidate.'

By Anita Dunn, Democratic political strategist and the White House Communications Director from April through November 2009.

The Trump Show will last longer than your typical summer blockbuster that has a glitzy opening, gets bad reviews, makes plenty of noise, has lots of explosions, attracts a lot of eyeballs the first weekend out and then disappears until it runs endless loops on cable.

Ignore the similarities! His financial disclosure suggests a serious effort at a campaign, and he is tapping a chord with a segment of the Republican electorate that no one else is right now. So I'll go with the scenario that has Trump leaving the Republican Party to run as an independent candidate, sometime before Iowa but after a number of debates (so he gets maximum publicity but never loses a primary or caucus). Hey, he's got the money to go the independent route!

'Believe that Trump has more staying power.'

By Douglas Schoen, pollster for President Bill Clinton.

Believe that Trump has more staying power than some may think because of the profound anger the Republican base has with the Republican establishment.

A recent Quinnipiac poll in Colorado, Virginia and Iowa showed high negatives for Trump, but so, too, do Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton have high negatives—indicating that the American electorate is disaffected across the board. Trump ultimately will not be the Republican nominee, and he almost certainly won't run as an Independent, though he may well hint at the possibility.

Donald Trump in Iowa: 'Drudge is amazing' // Politico // Hadas Gold - July 25, 2015

Speaking here at a campaign event in Iowa, Republican Presidential candidate Donald Trump had high praise for a site that's an important factor among conservatives and the media: The Drudge Report.

"Drudge, who is great by the way, Drudge is amazing," Trump said as he was retelling his story of visiting the border in Laredo, Texas.

Trump had little good will for the rest of the media in his speech here in front of a packed auditorium of more than 600 people at Oskaloosa high school (with at least 400 in an overflow room). The billionaire real estate mogul opened his speech by bashing the Des Moines Register —whose reporters he had banned from the event, his team said on Friday, because the paper had published an editorial calling on Trump to drop out of the race.

"The Des Moines Register is standing outside too," Trump said to cheers from the audience. "It's a super liberal rag that's not respected around here."

(During the event, the Register's chief political correspondent Jennifer Jacobs tweeted that the paper did in fact have a reporter inside the auditorium covering the event).

Trump said the press often misquotes him and doesn't accurately report how many people come out to see him or how much he's worth.

"A lot of political press is great like 30, 35 percent," he said. "Some are so dishonest. You'll have a crowd like this and they'll say it's miniscule."

Trump also claimed that reporters have been calling him to apologize for mischaracterizing his remarks about Mexican immigrants.

Donald Trump Turns His Gaze to Scott Walker in Iowa // Bloomberg // Ben Brody - July 25, 2015

During an appearance in Iowa Saturday, real estate mogul Donald Trump turned his attention to Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, a chief rival for the Republican presidential nomination and the current front-runner in the state that holds the nation's first presidential nominating event.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Wisconsin is doing terribly," Trump said. The tycoon, who is leading the Republican pack of 16 in several national polls, said Wisconsin had seen budget deficits and high borrowing which led to poor infrastructure under Walker. "The hospitals and education is a disaster."

Trump also pointed out that Walker, who has repeatedly visited neighboring Iowa and was the first choice of 22 percent of likely Republican caucus-goers there in a recent poll, had supported the Common Core education standards that much of the GOP base now derides. Trump received support from 13 percent of people in the poll, putting him in second place.

The attacks, which focused on the record of a strong rival, contrasted with Trump's personal attacks on a past candidate and a low-polling candidate, respectively, in the past week. He told an Iowa audience on July 18 that Arizona Senator John McCain, a former prisoner of war who was the Republican presidential nominee in 2008 and who chairs the Senate Armed Services Committee, was a war hero only because he had been captured. On July 21, he gave out the personal phone number of South Carolina Senator Lindsey Graham, who attacked Trump over the McCain comments and statements on immigration, but who hardly registers in polls.

Trump said that he had been holding back on Walker, whom he called "a nice guy," until he read that an ally of the governor had insulted the businessman. A Walker fundraiser had called Trump "DumbDumb" in an event invitation, according to the Wall Street Journal.

"I say, 'Oh finally I can attack,'" Trump said in relating the story Saturday at the "Make America Great Again" rally and picnic in Oskaloosa. "I would have never done this. I didn't know. Because I hear the only one beating me in Iowa is Scott Walker, and not by that much."

He then had a request for the audience: "Will you please put me in first place so I feel better?"

Trump supporters in Iowa shrug off McCain controversy // CNN // MJ Lee and Ashley Killough - July 26, 2015

Donald Trump returned to Iowa on Saturday one week after setting off a national firestorm about Arizona Sen. John McCain's service in war.

But rather than condemn the billionaire businessman for his flamboyant attacks on other Republicans, including McCain, many Trump fans here seemed to give the presidential candidate a different message: Go get 'em.

Trump admirers showed up in droves to a rally and picnic at Oskaloosa High School, eager to catch a glimpse of the reality TV star who has dominated the 2016 campaign with both his inflammatory comments and his signature unapologetic and brash persona.

Around a dozen Trump supporters -- many of whom endured the sweltering heat outside for hours -- told CNN that they were enamored by Trump's unfiltered rhetoric, as well as the stark contrast between the New York real estate magnate and other more seasoned politicians in the GOP field.

Larry Howe, a 77-year-old retired veteran from Blakesburg, said Trump's McCain comments from last weekend never bother him.

"He's honest. He tells is like it is. A lot of people don't like that but I think we need a president that will tell it like it is," Howe said.

Tammy Runnalls, a 50-year-old Trump fan from the nearby town of Eddyville, arrived at the school at 6 a.m. to get the first spot in line.

"He doesn't need anybody's money, he's not a career politician, he's not a lawyer. I'm excited because he's not like everybody else in the field," Runnalls said. She added that Trump's McCain comments "went a little overboard," but that they didn't make her less supportive of the candidate.

At a summit in Ames, Iowa, last weekend, Trump drew widespread condemnation when he quipped that McCain was a "war hero because he was captured" during the Vietnam War.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I like people that weren't captured, OK?" Trump said.

Though Trump partly backtracked from those original comments, saying that he does in fact believe McCain is a war hero, he has not apologized to the 2008 GOP presidential nominee. He has also since gone after his GOP competitors for criticizing him for those remarks, particularly training his ire on South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham for calling Trump a "jackass."

In one of the most colorful moments of the 2016 cycle, Trump read out loud Graham's cell phone number on national television earlier this week, inviting his supporters to give the senator a call.

Even undecided voters here in Oskaloosa said they found Trump's bombastic style refreshing.

"He's really stirring things up. I do like that about him. I like his outspokenness," said Steve Wickenkan, 58, a custodian for the Oskaloosa schools who has previously supported President Barack Obama.

This weekend, Trump once again demonstrated that when critics come after him, he only hits back harder.

The Des Moines Register said Friday that its journalists had been denied credentials to Trump's Saturday rally because the paper's editorial board penned a scathing piece calling Trump a "feckless blowhard" candidate asking that he drop his White House bid.

Trump mocked the paper on Twitter, writing: "The the ultra liberal and seriously failing Des Moines Register is BEGGING my team for press credentials to my event in Iowa today-but they lie!"

His supporters egged him on, cheering when Trump gleefully kicked off his hourlong rally by noting that the Des Moines Register had been kept outside.

Crystal Breuklander, an employee of the Oskaloosa Municipal Water Department, said it was Trump's willingness to take on anybody that she found so appealing.

"I like that he will speak his mind and is not swayed by others," Breuklander, 40, said. "I like his open-mindedness, and he's not intimated by anybody."

What is Trump's actual position on illegal immigration? // CNN // Maeve Reston - July 25, 2015

Donald Trump rose to the top of the GOP presidential field by harnessing the anger of many conservative Republicans about illegal immigration. But he has softened his tone in recent days -- going so far as to say that he would favor a "merit-based system" for undocumented immigrants in the U.S.

After weeks of criticism over the harsh tone of his presidential campaign announcement -- where he claimed that Mexican immigrants were bringing drugs and crime to the U.S., and calling some of them rapists -- Trump seems to be edging toward a more moderate position.

On the campaign trail in recent weeks, Trump has shed little light on his actual plans for dealing with illegal immigration beyond generalizations that have often seemed far-fetched. Initially, he said he would build a wall and make Mexico pay for it. On Thursday, during a visit to the U.S.-Mexico border, he seemed to reverse course under questioning by CNN's Dana Bash.

"In certain sections, you have to have a wall," he said.

His position on immigration -- which has been a huge part of his appeal among conservative voters nationally -- grew even more muddled Friday when he highlighted his support for a "merit-based system" for the 11 million undocumented immigrants in the U.S.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Though he did not explain the mechanics of the system in any detail, it sounded similar to the calls by some moderate Republicans for a path to citizenship for undocumented workers, which has been an anathema to hardline conservatives.

On MSNBC's "Morning Joe" on Friday, Trump insisted that he would secure the border first and "take the bad ones" -- referring to undocumented immigrants -- "and get them the hell out."

"We give them back to Mexico or we make sure they stay where they came from," Trump told the show's hosts, noting that he would "secure the border" first. But, he added in regard to the millions of undocumented immigrants in this country, "I'm a very big believer in (the) merit system."

"I have to tell you, some of these people have been here; they've done a good job; in some cases sadly they've been living under the shadows," Trump said in his telephone interview. "We have to do something, so whether it's merit, or whether it's whatever, but -- I'm a believer in the merit system. Somebody's been outstanding, we (ought to) try to work something out."

It wasn't the first time that Trump had raised the possibility of a kinder, gentler immigration policy. In fact, a number of conservative writers have noted the irony of his appeal to the right flank of the Republican Party given his moderate statements on immigration, as well as abortion, over the years.

In a newsletter to his readers earlier this month entitled "Trump fans, it's time for an intervention," National Review columnist Jonah Goldberg noted that Trump told Fox News host Bill O'Reilly in 2011 that he favored a system where the U.S. determined which undocumented immigrants could stay in this country on a "case by case" basis. The Glenn Beck program has also cited that interview as a reason conservatives should not support the real estate magnate.

In the 2011 interview, O'Reilly had asked Trump what he would do with "15 million illegal aliens already in the United States."

"You know, it's hard to generalize, but you're going to have to look at the individual people, see how they've done, see how productive they've been, see what their references are, and then make a decision," Trump said.

O'Reilly pointed out that kind of system would take a long time and require a great deal of manpower.

"A long time," Trump responded, "but you know, you have some great productive people that came in."

Trump's harsh vitriol about immigrants from Mexico in his announcement speech also seems ironic, given his criticisms of what he cast as the "mean-spirited" tone of 2012 Republican nominee Mitt Romney on the topic.

Trump told the conservative outlet Newsmax in 2012 that Romney harmed the Republican Party's image with his hard line views on illegal immigration.

"He had a crazy policy of self-deportation, which was maniacal," Trump told Newsmax. "It sounded as bad as it was, and he lost all of the Latino vote." Trump added that the GOP should develop better policies "with respect to people wanting to be wonderful, productive citizens of this country."

Trump's visit to the U.S.-Mexico border this week brought a fresh round of scrutiny to his positions -- and left more questions than answers. He was once again effusive about his love for Mexico and said he thought he would win "win the Hispanic vote," because "thousands and thousands of Hispanics have worked for me."

When pressed by a reporter about what he would do with the 11 million undocumented immigrants in the U.S., he dodged the question: "The first thing we have to do is secure our borders and after that we're going to have plenty of time to talk about it."

That dodge once again caught the attention of the conservative blogosphere. The headline on the blog of the conservative Weekly Standard illustrated the perils for Trump on the issue: "Trump suggests he may be open to amnesty."

Republican Support for Trump Surges but his Unfavorable Ratings are Also Rising // Slate // Daniel Politi - July 25, 2015

Donald Trump is not going away anytime soon. That much is clear from the latest Economist/YouGov poll of the 2016 Republican presidential hopefuls that claims support for the real estate magnate soared to 28 percent, up from 15 percent the previous week. That means more than twice the number of Republicans describe Trump as their first choice than former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, who is backed by 14 percent of Republicans, and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who has 13 percent support.

“There is clearly a core group of registered voters who identify as Republicans that has coalesced around Trump’s tough talk and proposals,” notes YouGov. “He is even more clearly in first place than he was two weeks ago when Republicans are asked to choose among the current candidates.”

Yet it’s not all good news for Trump. Even as he solidifies his first-place slot among Republican contenders, his unfavorable ratings are on the rise. In the previous YouGov poll, Trump had the highest favorable ratings. In a week, the reality TV star has seen his favorable ratings drop 11 points to 53 percent and his unfavorable ratings rise 15 points to 42 percent. And despite the growing support, Republicans still don’t see him as the likely nominee and largely expect Bush will be the party’s candidate.

Trump's unfavorable ratings are likely to increase considering that it’s unclear how much the poll was affected by Trump’s criticism of Arizona Sen. John McCain. The poll began on the same day Trump questioned McCain’s status as a war hero so some of the respondents may not have been aware of the controversy yet.

Donald Trump is still rocketing up polls in dominating fashion // Business Insider // Maxwell Tani - July 25, 2015

Donald Trump is still the clear front-runner of the 2016 GOP presidential field.

A new Economist/YouGov poll released on Friday actually showed Trump gaining support in the last week, despite a controversy over his comments questioning Sen. John McCain's (R-Arizona) status as a "war hero."

According to the poll, the number of registered Republican primary voters who responded that Trump is their first choice jumped from 15% at the beginning of July to 28% last week. Another 10% of voters pick him as their second choice.

That puts the real-estate magnate far ahead of the next Republican candidate, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R), as well as Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R), who saw his numbers jump following his campaign announcement earlier this month.

The poll comes only a week after many analysts declared that Trump's comments about McCain would mark a turning point in his campaign.

The line of thinking was that Republican primary voters — who are generally much more hawkish — wouldn't take kindly to Trump's dismissive comments about McCain's status as a prisoner of war.

But so far, no backlash appears to have materialized. In fact, Trump has only gained support in the survey. And the poll found that 32% of GOP primary voters don't think that Trump needed to apologize.

And the YouGov poll isn't the only poll to show that Trump is still comfortably in the lead. A Monmouth University poll of GOP voters in Iowa showed that Trump's support remained unchanged following the McCain flap. And an ABC/Washington Post poll released earlier this week found him nearly doubling Bush's support, as well.

Pollsters have warned that early polls are not reliable indicators of real support that will translate into votes. Voters are still not tuned into to the election, and, at this point, candidates with high name recognition who can dominate the news cycle can see inflated support. Trump — a media sensation with decades of high-profile entertainment ventures, real-estate deals, and reality-television show experience — is perfectly positioned to take advantage of that.

Many pollsters have pointed to Trump's unfavorability rating, which remains higher than other GOP candidates in most polls. The Economist/YouGov poll showed the real-estate magnate's unfavorability ratings did rise slightly following his comments about McCain.

"The poll results with regard to candidate standing are ephemeral at this stage, primarily a function of name recognition," University of Michigan political science professor Michael Tractor, a polling expert, told Business Insider last month, as Trump began his surge. "Trump has greater name recognition than many of the others, especially the governors. But name recognition is not the same as support."

Some polls, however, have shown Trump's favorability numbers climbing. And the real-estate mogul has bulldozed his way into the forefront of issues that are hugely important in the 2016 race — especially with Republican primary voters.

Trump was one of the first 2016 candidates to call attention to the death of Kathryn Steinle, a 32-year-old woman who was allegedly murdered by an immigrant living in the US without permission.

Trump got a shout-out during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing this week from one of the witnesses, who thanked him for bringing attention to the issue of violent crime committed by immigrants living in the US illegally.

And earlier this week, House Republicans passed an immigration bill that Democrats dubbed "The Donald Trump Act."

'It sucks': The Republican criticism of their own debate process is starting to heat up // Business Insider // Maxwell Tani - July 25, 2015

When the first Republican debate takes place on next month, 10 Republican presidential candidates — including a billionaire reality-television star and a retired neurosurgeon with zero executive experience — will likely be onstage.

But six other candidates will be shut out — including, possibly, a former US senator who won 11 states in the 2012 Republican primary, a Republican senator with 20 years of congressional experience, and the governor of the state where the debate is being held.

That's because Fox News and CNN, which are hosting the first two Republican debates, decided to grant spots on the stage to the top 10 candidates based on averages of several national, nonpartisan polls.

But many Republican Party strategists and some of the candidates themselves are intensifying their criticism of how the networks are choosing candidates for the debates. Curt Anderson, a former top Republican National Committee official and now an adviser to candidate and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, argued in a Wall Street Journal op-ed this week that the RNC should "let all 16 candidates debate."

In an interview on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" on Thursday, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-South Carolina) again criticized Fox News and the Republican National Committee for sticking by those rules, which look increasingly likely to exclude him and some of the other lower-polling candidates from the August 6 debate.

"It sucks," Graham said, bluntly.

Opponents of the Fox/CNN model argue that it's unfair to rely heavily on early polls, which tend to heavily favor candidates with higher name recognition who can dominate the news cycle. Several times in making his case about the debate rules, Graham has said that Brad Pitt would likely be on the debate stage at this point if he had decided to run as a Republican.

University of Michigan polling expert Michael Traugott told Business Insider that relying on early polls to determine who gets to debate represents "a conflict between production values and the realities of early political positioning."

"In this early phase, name recognition and media coverage means a lot for recognition levels on national polls," Traugott said. "The dynamic is that media exposure is positively correlated with poll standing (a la Trump), so Graham is correct about suffering from a double whammy."

Other pollsters agreed.

"I think most pollsters agree that using our surveys more than six months before anyone even votes to decide who gets to be in the debates is a terrible process," Public Policy Polling Director Tom Jensen told Business Insider.

Donald TrumpREUTERS/Dominick ReuterBusinessman and Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump greets supporters in Bedford, New Hampshire, June 30, 2015.

Some strategists argue that the lower-tier candidates are diverse and could help bring other voters into the Republican tent.

Carly Fiorina, the former Hewlett Packard chief executive, is the only woman running on the Republican side — and it's looking like she won't make the debate stage. Ohio Gov. John Kasich, a pro-immigration-reform Republican who has also embraced the Affordable Care Act, also looks poised to be shut out unless he sees a bump from his announcement earlier this week.

The format also could prevent lesser known and lesser funded candidates who perform well in the debates from breaking out into the mainstream. Jensen noted that in 2012, a strong debate performance helped provide a needed boost for former House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Georgia), who went on to win the South Carolina primary.

"When they can't all face off against at least a few of the others or more than a few of the others ... it's hard to really measure the quality of each individual candidate or get a sense of how they would actually perform if nominated," Republican strategist Liz Mair told Business Insider.

On Thursday, Graham pointed out that he has only been able to raise his own profile by attacking Trump — who has high unfavorability ratings and who observers consider unlikely to actually win the GOP nomination.

“If my numbers go up just because I call Donald Trump a 'jackass,' that’s not why I want to rise in the polls,” Graham said on Morning Joe. “The bottom line is, I think the criteria in July of 2015 makes no sense. You’re testing celebrity and name ID.”

Indeed, attacking Trump seems to be an actual strategy by some Republican candidates to get onstage.

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R), who is teetering on the edge of the bubble, has managed to raise his media profile by bashing Trump in a series of online videos, tweets, and speeches.

rick perryScott OlsonRepublican presidential candidate and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry fields questions at The Family Leadership Summit.

As NPR has reported, there's also a statistical problem with leaning on polls. The poll numbers determining who gets onstage — Perry currently qualifies with 2.4% — are so small that the difference-making percentage point could be within the margin of error.

“There's no difference between John Kasich and Bobby Jindal except one's going to be in and one is going to be out,” Doug Usher of Purple Strategies said, according to Bloomberg Politics. “Or maybe they're both going to be out.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some observers have floated alternatives.

Mair has suggested that the Republican debates should be split up, with candidates randomly assigned to each. Pollster Stu Rothenberg has agreed.

It should be noted that the lower-tier candidates have received media coverage on Fox News and on CNN. Former Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pennsylvania), who appears unlikely to make it onto the stage despite winning nearly a dozen states in the 2012 primary, spent an hour on the Fox morning show 'Outnumbered' on Wednesday. He fielded softball questions and was interviewed by his daughter. Graham himself has sat for interviews with Fox more than 10 times this year.

And there's also a chance that some of the lower-tier candidates could benefit from the early debates. The candidates who don't make the main stage will participate in a forum airing before the official debate on Fox News. If they manage to stand out in this arena, it could boost them, allowing them a spot on the CNN debate in September.

A Fox News spokesperson declined to comment for this piece, and CNN did not respond to requests for comment from Business Insider.

GOP presidential race will dominate Sunday shows // USA Today // Deirdre Shesgreen - July 25, 2015

GOP presidential hopeful Donald Trump won't be on any of the Sunday talk shows, but the New York billionaire will be center stage nonetheless.

Featured guests—including several of Trump's rivals for the GOP nomination—will talk about Trump's controversial comments on immigration, his blistering criticism of other Republicans, and his high standing in the national polls. The Republican candidates will also, of course, tout their own presidential prospects.

On the other side of the aisle, Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders, a Vermont independent, and others will talk about the success of his populist message. And other panelists will discuss gun violence after the recent shootings in Louisiana and Tennessee, along with the controversy surrounding Planned Parenthood's handling of fetal tissue.

Here's the full lineup:

•CBS' Face the Nation: Former Texas Governor and GOP presidential candidate Rick Perry; Kentucky GOP Sen. Rand Paul, also a presidential contender; Sen. Joe Manchin, D-West Virginia; ex-Obama National Security Adviser Tom Donilon; and former House Intelligence Committee chairman Mike Rogers, R-Michigan.

•NBC's Meet the Press: Sanders; Jon Nichols, Washington correspondent for The Nation; Patrick J. Buchanan, the one-time adviser to Presidents Richard Nixon, Gerald Ford and Ronald Reagan; and Ohio Gov. John Kasich, the 16th Republican to jump into the presidential race.

•CNN's State of the Union: Perry will appear again, along with: S.E. Cupp, a CNN political commentator; Bakari Sellers, former South Carolina House of Representative; Ken Cuccinelli, former Virginia attorney general; and Neera Tanden, president of the Center for American Progress, a liberal advocacy group.

•Fox News Sunday: GOP Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky.

•ABC's This Week: Attorney General Loretta Lynch, South Carolina Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham, who is also running for president; and Cecile Richards, president of Planned Parenthood.

Presidential Race Just Started? Not According to the Spending // NYT // Nicholas Confessore, Sarah Cohen, and Eric Lichtblau - July 25, 2015

Since late last year, presidential hopefuls have been romancing donors, hiring staff and haunting the diners and senior centers of Manchester and Dubuque.

But on paper, most of the candidates spent virtually no money exploring a presidential bid until very recently. According to campaign disclosures filed with the Federal Election Commission last week, the much-promoted campaign staff they hired had other jobs. And their many, many trips to New Hampshire and Iowa had nothing to do with running for president.

Such accounting — which the campaigns defended as perfectly appropriate but some election lawyers said violated the law — has allowed would-be candidates to spend months testing the presidential waters while saving cash to use later in the primaries.

It also let them tap their most loyal donors for additional funds that will not count against the limits on contributions to their official campaigns. And it has contributed to what some experts described as a kind of campaign Wild West, with candidates and their lawyers testing or crossing legal boundaries stretched thin by the advent of "super PACs" and by Federal Election Commission deadlocks.

"We're in uncharted territory," said Kenneth Gross, a Washington election lawyer and former Federal Election Commission general counsel. "This campaign cycle more than any other, we've seen more pre-announcement activity being paid for through essentially unregulated money."

Senators Ted Cruz and Rand Paul have billed hotel rooms in New Hampshire and consulting fees for Iowa strategists to their re-election campaigns in Texas and Kentucky. Gov. Scott Walker billed fees to a Texas-based fund-raiser, hired in March, to his Wisconsin state campaign, months after he was re-elected governor and years away from a potential 2018 Statehouse bid.

Several candidates, including former Gov. Rick Perry of Texas, Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana and Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, reported to the Federal Election Commission that they spent almost nothing to explore a presidential bid until a few days before they jumped into the race. Federal law requires declared candidates to retroactively report "exploratory" expenses once they enter the race.

Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor, reported hundreds of thousands of dollars of exploratory spending, dating to May last year, on political and legal advice. But he did not report any travel expenses before June, though he traveled extensively during the winter and spring to meet with donors and attend town-hall-style meetings in early primary states.

Mr. Bush and some other White House contenders say those expenses are unrelated to their presidential campaigns and were paid for by other political organizations — typically not subject to the same disclosure rules and contribution limits as presidential candidates. The campaigns argued that any costs paid for by such groups were unrelated to exploring a presidential bid and did not need to be repaid once the candidates announced their bids.

One such group, Conservative Solutions Project, a nonprofit set up by allies of Senator Marco Rubio of Florida, picked up the tab for extensive research of Republican primary voters, the kind of expense that would-be candidates bore in the past.

Other White House contenders have assigned months' worth of expenses to campaigns for other offices.

Last summer, Mr. Paul hired Steve Grubbs, a former chairman of the Iowa Republican Party and an expert on the state's first-in-the-nation caucuses, to assist with his national political efforts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Grubbs indicated in an email that he is currently advising Mr. Paul about Iowa, and Mr. Paul's presidential campaign paid his firm, Victory Enterprises, about $200,000 during the second quarter of 2015.

But during the first quarter of 2015, Mr. Grubbs's fees — about $15,000 — came out of Mr. Paul's Senate account. A spokesman for Mr. Paul, Sergio Gor, said those earlier payments were unrelated to the senator's presidential campaign.

Mr. Cruz is not up for re-election in Texas until 2018. But his Senate campaign committee was billed thousands of dollars in meals, hotels, car services and other travel expenses in Iowa and New Hampshire.

Mr. Cruz's Senate committee also paid $12,903 in April and May to a company controlled by Bryan English, the Iowa campaign director for Mr. Cruz's presidential bid. Mr. English's LinkedIn profile states that he began working for Mr. Cruz's presidential campaign in April.

Another payment, billed to his Senate campaign in early March, appears to correspond with Mr. Cruz's trip to Iowa for the Iowa Agriculture Summit. The gathering is described on its website as "a unique forum for potential and likely presidential candidates from both major parties to discuss issues of vital importance to the Iowa and national economies."

Catherine Frazier, a spokeswoman for Mr. Cruz, said his presidential campaign intended to reimburse his Senate committee for any 2016-related expenses once they had all been identified and calculated. She also said that the dates on Mr. Cruz's reports did not necessarily reflect the actual dates the expenses were incurred, and that it was "standard practice to use the credit card payment date for all the ultimate vendors."

"We are well aware of the expenses, as they will be part of a larger reimbursement from the presidential committee to the Senate committee that will be disclosed on our next F.E.C. report," Ms. Frazier said.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, who announced in April that she would seek the Democratic nomination, was among the more conservative candidates in accounting for her spending. Her campaign reported $278,821 in exploratory expenses, including office rent, staff travel and employee salaries and benefits, which she paid for out of her own pocket.

And unlike other candidates, Mrs. Clinton maintained a low profile before entering the race in April: A tally kept by the National Journal showed only five public trips before April, four of them for paid speeches and none in the early primary states.

Mr. Walker did not enter the campaign until after the period covered by the most recent federal filings. But the committee for his campaign for Wisconsin governor, Friends of Scott Walker, collected $6 million from January to July, according to reports filed with regulators in Wisconsin.

His state committee, bound by Wisconsin law, was entitled to raise far more money per donor than a presidential campaign would be. And during the first six months of his second term, when Mr. Walker made more than 30 out-of-state trips, Friends of Scott Walker spent $5.7 million, more than five times what the committee spent during the equivalent six months of Mr. Walker's first term.

With any Wisconsin re-election bid at least three years away, Mr. Walker's committee paid out nearly $500,000 in salaries and benefits. Friends of Scott Walker also spent $114,000 on fund-raising events, 10 times what it spent on fund-raising during the equivalent period during his first term.

His Wisconsin re-election campaign paid for hotels and meals in Iowa and New Hampshire from January to April. The committee has paid $2.5 million to his direct mail fund-raising firm this year, more than Mr. Walker spent with the company during his entire 2014 re-election campaign.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Walker, Kirsten Kukowski, said the Iowa and New Hampshire expenses covered employees who "continued to assist in staffing and fund-raising for the Friends of Scott Walker committee." The direct mail firm, she said, was raising money only for his campaign for governor.

Mr. Bush's schedule in the months before he announced his candidacy was packed with the kind of appearances that would-be candidates typically use to explore their chances in a presidential race. He made three trips to New Hampshire, two to Iowa and two to South Carolina from January to May, according to public reports, and held numerous meetings with donors around the country.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But while Mr. Bush's presidential campaign reported spending more than $300,000 on "testing the waters" activity as far back as May 2014, he reported no travel expenses for himself before June 15, the day of the official announcement.

"He was traveling constantly in what appears to me to be 'testing the waters' if not actually campaigning," said Paul S. Ryan, senior counsel to the Campaign Legal Center, which has filed complaints with the Justice Department about Mr. Bush's early fund-raising and spending.

Kristy Campbell, a spokeswoman for Mr. Bush, said the travel expenses were covered by Right to Rise PAC, a political committee of which Mr. Bush was "honorary chairman," and were not related to his presidential bid. "Governor Bush has attended events as a featured guest for organizations that have a mission and philosophy he shares," Ms. Campbell said.

Mr. Jindal reported only $21,000 in spending before his official announcement on June 23, mostly on facility rentals shortly before the announcement. Yet before that date, the Louisiana governor took high-profile trips to New Hampshire and Iowa to explore a possible run.

Curt Anderson, the chief strategist for Mr. Jindal's campaign, said in an interview that those trips were paid for by two other groups, one of them a nonprofit policy organization that Mr. Jindal founded in 2013. The campaign's own low burn rate, Mr. Anderson suggested, was merely an indication of Mr. Jindal's thrift.

"We'll run a very lean operation for some time and get a foothold in the early states," Mr. Anderson said. "We're going to want every dollar."

Candidates Caught in Middle as Words Ring Hollow to Activists // NYT // Jonathan Martin and Maggie Haberman - July 25, 2015

In the space of a few hours last week, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Jeb Bush showed how their parties' two best-funded candidates are grappling with insistent, intensifying demands from activists on the left and the right who are deeply disenchanted with the political establishment.

Before a heavily African-American audience in South Carolina, Mrs. Clinton sought to outflank her Democratic rivals who have struggled with questions of race. "It's essential that we all stand up and say, loudly and clearly, that, yes, black lives matter," she said on Thursday. "And we all have a responsibility to face these hard truths about race and justice honestly and directly."

But Mrs. Clinton offered little in the way of ideas to satisfy activists in search of far-reaching solutions to systemic discrimination.

Later the same day in rural New Hampshire, Mr. Bush sought to strike a balance between his view that Republicans must be inclusive to win and a desire not to give in to what he called excessive political correctness.

"A Republican will never be elected president of the United States again unless we campaign like this," he said, spreading his arms wide. It was an implicit rejection of Donald J. Trump's incendiary remarks about immigrants.

Yet, talking to reporters after the event, Mr. Bush was nearly incredulous that Martin O'Malley, a Democratic contender and former Maryland governor, had apologized for telling demonstrators who interrupted him at Netroots Nation last weekend that "all lives matter."

"We're so uptight and politically correct now that you apologize for saying lives matter?" he said, dismissing "black lives matter" as "a slogan."

The well-organized "Black Lives Matter" movement against discrimination and police brutality, on the one hand, and conservatives uneasy about immigration and assimilation, on the other, reflect sharply different currents of anger in American life. But the demands that each constituency is placing on the leading presidential candidates reflect a growing unwillingness to accept the usual assurances, an expectation of action — and discomfiting strains on the political center.

"There's tension at the seams of both political coalitions," said Pat Buchanan, the conservative commentator, who has run Republican and third-party campaigns for president.

On the left, young black activists, furious about discrimination and inequities in criminal justice, say the usual rhetorical nods toward equality, incremental increases in funding for housing or education, and vague promises of change from mainstream political leaders are inadequate. Instead, they are confronting Democrats, imploring them to offer specific solutions for what they see as an urgent crisis.

Tia Oso, the black activist who interrupted Mr. O'Malley's speech at the progressive Netroots gathering in Phoenix, cited "an emergency."

"The most important and urgent issue of our day is structural violence and systemic racism that is oppressing and killing black women, men and children," Ms. Oso wrote on Mic.com.

And Jamilah Nasheed, a Missouri state senator from heavily black northern St. Louis, near the center of protests over the fatal shooting of an unarmed black man in Ferguson last year, said the anger was moving "beyond protest."

"You're seeing a movement now," Ms. Nasheed said, describing a "boil-over of anger and hopelessness."

Mrs. Clinton was praised for a speech on race she delivered days after the massacre at a black church in Charleston, S.C., last month. But several black leaders questioned whether her early words would translate into calls for substantive changes beyond the debate over policing.

In the eyes of many black liberals, no candidate is addressing race and poverty with the boldness of a Robert F. Kennedy.

On the right, by contrast, blue-collar conservatives have responded to Mr. Trump, who has given voice to their fears about what they see as America's identity crisis.

"It's not only illegal immigration, but mass immigration and the changing character and composition of the country that unsettles people," Mr. Buchanan said.

Mr. Trump's success so far suggests that the eventual Republican nominee could face difficulties persuading many in the party to adopt a more accommodating tone and policies toward immigrants.

A recent Washington Post-ABC poll found that his support came largely from white voters with high school diplomas, a constituency that was most likely to believe that immigration does not strengthen American society.

While Mr. Bush has continued to advocate a pathway to legal status for those in the country illegally, some of his rivals have mused about a harder line. "The next president and the next Congress need to make decisions about a legal immigration system that's based, first and foremost, on protecting American workers and American wages," Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin said in April. And in an ad aired by his "super PAC" in Iowa, Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana took on the matter of assimilation directly, saying that he was "tired of hyphenated Americans" and that immigrants must "adopt our values."

Should the two parties nominate Mr. Bush and Mrs. Clinton, heirs in the country's leading political families, it is not difficult to imagine a conservative candidate's mounting a populist third-party run, much as Mr. Buchanan once did, that taps into anti-trade and anti-immigration fervor on the right.

The enhanced expectations and louder shouting from both ends of the political spectrum are a natural outgrowth of President Obama's administration, said Michael Kazin, a Georgetown University historian. Ambitious presidents who usher in or oversee periods of sweeping change, he said, often lead to the creation of pressure groups on their own side and a fiercer backlash from the opposition.

The John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson presidencies, Mr. Kazin said, did not just spawn an idealistic generation of Democratic baby boomers. "They created the New Left and black freedom movement, both of which became quite critical of Kennedy, Johnson and the entire political establishment," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The sense, then and now, is that “their problems are not being addressed, and nobody in either party is truly addressing them,” Mr. Kazin said

But Elon James White, the founder of “This Week in Blackness,” a digital media platform, who also works with Netroots Nation, said that would have to change.

“Folks are going to have to learn,” he said, “that people are not going to sit around anymore and let this ride.”

All 2016 presidential candidates should disclose campaign bundlers // WaPo // Editorial Board - July 25, 2015

APOLLO, VOYAGER, Endeavour. These familiar names no longer belong only to space shuttles: They’re also how Jeb Bush is categorizing his top donors in the 2016 presidential race. We hope Mr. Bush will attach identities to those titles and make them public, as he has promised. We also hope other candidates who have not yet disclosed their campaign bundlers will do the same.

Mr. Bush has pledged to release the names of high-achieving individual fundraisers in October at the third-quarter Federal Election Commission deadline. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker has made the same promise. That’s a big change from 2012, when no Republican candidate volunteered any more information than the law required, and a welcome one. On the Democratic side, Hillary Clinton has already released the names of bundlers dubbed “Hillblazers” who have raised at least $100,000 for her campaign.

Candidates such as Mr. Bush and Mr. Walker are right to follow Ms. Clinton’s lead. The rest of the pack should, too. Bundlers get huge perks for their fundraising efforts — for many of President Obama’s campaign supporters, even ambassadorships. The public deserves to know who these favored backers are and how much they are giving.

In fact, even Ms. Clinton has not gone far enough. Though she has provided a blanket list of bundlers who have raised more than $100,000, she has not broken that list down by the amounts raised, as Mr. Obama did for donations above $50,000 in his two campaigns. Who is hauling more than $500,000 for Ms. Clinton? How about $1 million? We do not know. When asked, a campaign spokesman declined to provide any answers.

It’s heartening that Mr. Bush and Mr. Walker — serious contenders for the Republican nomination — have made a move toward transparency, especially when so many fell short last cycle. Today, super PACs package billions of dollars for candidates. Almost every major candidate except Bernie Sanders has at least one as a backer. “Dark money” also streams into presidential and congressional races from nonprofit corporations that can donate unlimited amounts without disclosing individual contributors.

Recently, these issues might have overshadowed bundling on the national stage, but in many ways it is as important as ever. The FEC caps individual contributions at $2,700 for good reason: to limit any one person’s influence on a race and prevent corruption. Yet bundlers retain the ability to exert power and then reap the rewards.

When Mr. Bush and Mr. Walker release the names of their bundlers, they should do it right — with a low threshold for disclosure and a breakdown of bundlers into brackets according to gross amounts raised. Ms. Clinton should also go the extra distance. And those candidates who have done nothing so far should move quickly.

No rest for the candidates in this summer of discontent // WaPo // Dan Balz - July 25, 2015

Dissatisfaction and protest are roiling the politics of summer 2015. They are evident in the response to the angry rhetoric from Donald Trump, in the crowds that come to hear Bernie Sanders bash Wall Street and in the rallies demanding racial justice. For presidential candidates, there is no safe harbor. Ignore the mood at your peril; engage it at your peril.

The discontent is real, whether economic, racial or cultural. It knows no particular ideological boundaries. It currently disrupts both the Republican and Democratic parties. It reflects grievances that long have been bubbling. It reflects, too, the impatience with many political leaders — what they say and how they say it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The economic collapse of 2008 continues to ripple through the lives of many families, despite the drop in unemployment. Steady but slow growth has not been balm enough to give these families, many of whom see a system rife with inequity, much optimism about the future. Instead, they see the American Dream as part of the nation's past.

The uproar over illegal immigration underscores the anger over what many still see as broken borders, an issue heightened by the recent killing in San Francisco of a young woman by an illegal immigrant with a criminal record who had been deported but returned to the country. But immigration also is tied to the broader cultural reaction to demographic changes that continue to remake the face of the country and generate tensions that are at the heart of political differences.

Racial issues remain front and center, whether the killings in a black church in Charleston by a young man who wanted to start a race war or repeated episodes that have raised hard questions of how police and law enforcement officials treat African Americans. All this is a reminder that, almost seven years after the election of the nation's first black president and all of the progress that made that possible, work remains to be done.

It is tempting to try to dismiss Trump for what he is — a reality TV showman who talks as much about himself as anything else. The support he is receiving in national polls, however, suggests more than just a response to a celebrity with a loud voice. He has tapped into something.

Trump is not particularly conservative — or, more accurately, he seems to have no fixed ideology. He amplifies dissatisfaction without proposing real solutions to the country's problems, other than building a big wall. Yet he speaks about things in a language so blunt and uncharacteristic of politicians that it wins visceral approval from disaffected Americans.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) says Trump brings out the "crazies" in the Republican Party on the issue of immigration. In fact, Trump's candidacy highlights the reality that there is an unresolved debate within the GOP about what to do about it. This is an argument of long standing. Each time McCain and other Republicans have stepped up to solve it with a comprehensive solution, they have been rebuffed by the party's conservative base. Trump has scratched at the wound again this summer.

Sanders, the independent senator from Vermont who is running for the Democratic nomination, seems to be an extension of the Occupy Wall Street movement that began four years ago. That movement struggled to find political traction the way the tea party movement had two years earlier. But it nonetheless had an indelible impact on the political dialogue by framing the economic debate as the 99 percent vs. the 1 percent.

Obama carefully subsumed the unrest represented by the Occupy Wall Street movement into his middle-class message in 2012. In Mitt Romney, he found the perfect foil, an opponent he portrayed as an out-of-touch plutocrat. That was enough to win reelection.

Yet four years later, the Democrats find themselves debating not just Republicans about the economy but one another, as well. They debate how far left they should move to deal with the issues of income and wealth inequality and the power of what Sanders calls "the billionaire class."

Hillary Rodham Clinton is part of the way there in responding to the economic unrest, at least rhetorically. Sanders says that she and he continue to have major disagreements on the particulars of what to do. The outpouring of support he has seen at events around the country and the recent rise in his poll numbers in New Hampshire and Iowa will keep the pressure on Clinton to keep responding. She will try to calibrate the extent of her move to the left.

The signs of discontent have flummoxed many of the presidential candidates. Each party wants this election to be about the weaknesses and vulnerabilities of the other. Yet the intraparty strife cannot easily be ignored.

Republican candidates were slow to challenge Trump's language on immigration — both those who strongly disagree with his positions and those who generally agree. Engaging Trump carries risks. He swings back hard, sometimes wildly but sometimes with the nimbleness and precision of a practiced politician.

Many Republicans want Trump to go away. But they are wary about trying to hasten his fall because they fear they will pay too high a price among those for whom he has provided a voice.

Sanders and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley went to the Netroots Nation convention a week ago, no doubt looking to find a sympathetic audience for their populist economic message. It was an event, after all, that Clinton did not attend, for the obvious reason that she likely would not have been welcomed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instead, though, Sanders and O'Malley were caught unprepared for the interruptions from the Black Lives Matter movement, and neither looked particularly adept or comfortable as they responded. Sanders seemed to throw up his hands in frustration over the interruption. Then he invoked his civil rights work as evidence that he stood with African Americans. O'Malley said that "all lives matter" and later apologized. Clinton was the lucky one for not having attended, but she will not escape the issue, either.

Few Republicans expect Trump to become their party's nominee. They worry that his candidacy alone, if left to run for months, could condemn them to another defeat in November 2016, even if he eventually disappears. Their other concern is that Trump might eventually run as an independent, in which case he could drain more than enough votes from their nominee to cost them the general election.

Not many Democrats yet think Sanders has the staying power to defeat Clinton, even if he can give her a good scare. Strange things happen in nomination contests. But Clinton's advisers vow they will not be caught by surprise by an insurgency from the left.

Even if both Trump and Sanders end up merely as interesting characters rather than long-distance runners, the unrest that has contributed to the attention they are now receiving will remain. Distrust of the political class will infect the campaign, adding to the burdens the major party nominees will carry into the general election and beyond. It is embedded in the politics of now.

2016 candidates on campaign trail miss votes and home-state duties as they juggle day job // Fox // Joseph Weber - July 25, 2015

Elected officials making a 2016 White House bid are facing questions about missing votes, hearings and other official duties so they can hit the campaign trail.

On Capitol Hill, the four Republican and one Democratic senator have since January collectively missed 208 roll call votes, with Election Day still roughly 15 months away.

Florida GOP Sen. Marco Rubio as of Monday had missed the most, 72 out of 249, or 29 percent, while Kentucky GOP Sen. Rand Paul had missed just three, according to the website GovTrack.us.

"Sen. Rand Paul never stops fighting for the people of Kentucky," campaign Communications Director Sergio Gor told FoxNews.com. "He takes his job immensely seriously. And unlike other candidates, he has missed only 1 percent of all votes."

Rubio campaign spokesman Alex Conant points out that a senator missing votes while running for president is not unusual. And he argued that Rubio is on Capitol Hill to cast "decisive" votes and continues to attend important committee meetings including this week's Foreign Relations hearing on Iran.

"As Marco travels the country talking about his agenda to help the middle class, there is no doubt where he stands on important issues before the Senate," Conant said.

Kendra B. Stewart, a professor at South Carolina's College of Charleston, said Wednesday that missing votes is generally not a liability for political candidates "unless somebody misses an excessive number and is portrayed as being lazy or not doing their job."

"It is hard to say what exactly an acceptable number of missed votes is because there is no clear line," she said. "But in general, candidates do not get much flack."

Stewart also argues that missing a vote could work for a candidate who would not want to go on the record voting either way.

In April, 2016 GOP candidate Texas Sen. Ted Cruz was criticized for attending a campaign fundraiser at home instead of taking a final confirmation vote for Loretta Lynch as President Obama's choice for U.S. attorney general.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

However, Cruz argued that he had already voted twice against Lynch being confirmed and that his absence was equivalent to another ‘no’ vote.

Political author Ira Shapiro on Thursday pointed to two cases in which White House candidates -- Senate Democratic Majority Leader Lyndon B. Johnson (1960) and Republican Senate Minority Leader Howard Baker (1980) -- mistakenly assumed they could win support for their candidacy by staying in Washington and using their leadership roles to help pass key legislation.

“They thought their position and accomplishments would give them real visibility and credibility. They didn’t realize that they needed to get out of Washington and run for president,” said Shapiro, author of “The Last Great Senate: Courage and Statesmanship in Times of Crisis?”

The four governors in the race -- all Republicans -- have faced similar criticism, particularly about leaving behind important state business just to build a campaign.

None of them has taken more heat than New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who last year as president of the Republican Governors Association, a job with enormous potential to build name recognition and a donor network, spent about one-third of his time out of the state.

And this year, prior to Christie officially announcing his bid, he was spending roughly 46 percent of his time outside of New Jersey.

"It's outrageous," said John Currie, chairman of the New Jersey Democratic State Committee. "Anyone else who skipped work so often would be fired. … If he is truly committed to seeking the presidency, he should just resign.”

A poll released last month showed Christie’s approval rating at a record-low 30 percent but also showed low marks for state legislators.

The Christie campaign declined to comment.

Christie, Louisiana’s Bobby Jindal, New Jersey’s Scott Walker and Ohio’s John Kasich all waited until they wrapped up 2016 budget negotiations before officially entering the race, weeks and months after most of the other candidates had joined, perhaps putting them at a disadvantage.

Walker, whose second term doesn’t expire until 2019, jumped in just one day after signing the state budget on July 12. And this week he was still taking care of statehouse business, signing a bill Monday that outlaws non-emergency abortions at or beyond 20 weeks of pregnancy.

All of the governors, in fact, entered the race within days of signing their respective budgets, except for Kasich who joined Tuesday, about three weeks after signing the 2016 Ohio budget.

Conant also pointed out that senators in the most recent presidential elections also missed votes during campaigns.

In the 2004 race, Democratic nominee and Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry voted 10 percent of the time that year on Capitol Hill. And he voted 36 percent the year before.

In 2008, the top Democrat candidates -- Sens. Hillary Clinton, N.Y., and eventual White House winner, Obama, then an Illinois senator -- voted 51 percent and 36 percent. They voted 77 percent and 62 percent, respectively, the year before.

The Republican presidential nominee that year, Arizona Sen. John McCain, voted 20 percent of the time in 2008 and 44 percent in 2007.

Still, the less-than-perfect records are not an indication of how senators running for president always vote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kerry's voting percentage, for example, was no less than 98 percent in 10 of the 12 previous years.

The missed-vote median score for senators currently serving is 1.6 percent.

South Carolina GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham, one of other senators running for president, has missed 24 percent of the 249 roll call votes this year but was a perfect 112-122 his first year, 2003.

Vermont Independent Sen. Bernie Sanders, running on the Democratic ticket, has missed 6 percent of his votes. And Cruz has missed 28 percent.

Shapiro argues that senators don't get a lot of criticism for being off Capitol Hill to run for president because voters are never surprised that a White House bid is the next step in their careers.

He noted many examples of senators who failed to reach the White House but came back to be long-serving and powerful senators, most notably the late Massachusetts Democratic Sen. Ted Kennedy.

Bush, O'Malley among candidates added to Register's Soapbox lineup // Des Moines Register // Brianne Pfannestiel - July 25, 2015

Six more presidential candidates have committed to speaking at The Des Moines Register's State Fair Soapbox during the 2015 Iowa State Fair.

Democrats Martin O'Malley and Lincoln Chafee will join Republicans Jeb Bush, Carly Fiorina, Rick Perry and Ted Cruz. They will speak at the following times:

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley: 4 p.m., Aug. 13.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush: 9:30 a.m., Aug. 14.

Former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee: 11:30 a.m., Aug. 15.

Former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina: 11 a.m., Aug. 17.

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry: 10 a.m., Aug. 19.

U.S. Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas: 1:30 p.m. Aug. 21.

Speeches from the soapbox, an Iowa State Fair tradition, attract national media coverage during years leading up to the Iowa presidential caucuses.

The soapbox generally operates every day of the fair, this year Aug. 13 to 23. Candidates will have 20 minutes to speak from a stage in front of the Horner Service Center on the Grand Concourse.

Anyone wishing to see the candidates at the soapbox must pay admission to the fair.

A special presentation by President George Washington, portrayed by Ron Carnegie, will kick off the 2015 soapbox. He'll speak on the importance of voting and will field questions from fair attendees.

Democratic National Committee Chairwoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz also will speak.

U.S. Fears Data Stolen by Chinese Hacker Could Identify Spies // NYT // Mark Mazzetti and David E. Sanger - July 25, 2015

American officials are concerned that the Chinese government could use the stolen records of millions of federal workers and contractors to piece together the identities of intelligence officers secretly posted in China over the years.

The potential exposure of the intelligence officers could prevent a large cadre of American spies from ever being posted abroad again, current and former intelligence officials said. It would be a significant setback for intelligence agencies already concerned that a recent data breach at the Office of Personnel Management is a major windfall for Chinese espionage efforts.

In the days after the breach of records of millions of federal workers and contractors became public last month, some officials in the Obama administration said that the theft was not as damaging as it might have been because the Chinese hackers did not gain access to the identities of American undercover spies.

Katherine Archuleta, director of the Office of Personnel Management, in Congress on Tuesday.Attack Gave Chinese Hackers Privileged Access to U.S. Systems JUNE 20, 2015

The records of the C.I.A. and some other intelligence agencies, they said, were never part of the personnel office's databases, and were protected during the breach. Officials said intelligence agencies were taking steps to try to mitigate the damage, but it is unclear what they are specifically doing.

But intelligence and congressional officials now say there is great concern that the hackers — who government officials are now reluctant to say publicly were working for the Chinese government — could still use the vast trove of information to identify American spies by a process of elimination. By combining the stolen data with information they have gathered over time, they said, the hackers can use "big data analytics" to draw conclusions about the identities of operatives.

"The information that was exfiltrated was valuable in its own right," said Representative Adam B. Schiff of California, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee. "It's even more compromising when it is used in combination with other information they may hold. It may take years before we're aware of the full extent of the damage."

The C.I.A. and other agencies with undercover officers would be cautious about immediately withdrawing spies from China because that would raise suspicions among Chinese counterintelligence operatives. A C.I.A. spokesman declined to comment.

The C.I.A. and other agencies typically post their spies in American embassies, where the officers pose as diplomats working on political affairs, agricultural policy or other issues. The American Embassy in Beijing has long housed one of the largest C.I.A. stations in the world, with intelligence officers gathering information on China's political maneuvering, economic development and military modernization.

Several current and former officials said that even if the identities of the agency officers were not in the personnel office's database, Chinese intelligence operatives could run searches through the database on everyone granted visas to work at American diplomatic outposts in China. If any of the names are not found in the stolen files, those individuals could be suspected as spies by a process of elimination.

The director of the National Security Agency, Adm. Michael S. Rogers, alluded to that problem Thursday night during an interview at the Aspen Security Forum in Colorado.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“From an intelligence perspective, it gives you great insight potentially used for counterintelligence purposes,” Admiral Rogers said. “If I’m interested in trying to identify U.S. persons who may be in my country — and I am trying to figure out why they are there: Are they just tourists? Are they there for some other alternative purpose? — there are interesting insights from the data you take from O.P.M.”

Admiral Rogers suggested another possible motive of the hackers: The data could be used for developing sophisticated “spear phishing” attacks on government officials. In those attacks, victims click on what seem to be innocent emails from known sources, allowing viruses into their computer networks.

Admiral Rogers said it was “not perhaps unrelated that in the past nine months I am watching huge spear phishing campaigns targeted at the United States,” though he would not name the countries that are the sources of the attacks.

Officials said it was not yet clear how Chinese officials were using — or might use — the stolen files, which include personal information gathered during background checks of government workers, many who now hold Top Secret clearances.

“As a practical matter, you have to assume that all of the information has been exposed and can be exploited,” said Mr. Schiff, who added that it was prudent to plan for “worst-case scenarios.”

Some former officials said they were not overly alarmed that the data breach could do long-term damage to American intelligence collection, saying it was uncertain how many hard conclusions about American spies the Chinese could draw from the millions of personnel files — a mountain of data that could become overwhelming.

“The Chinese have created their own big data problem,” said Rob Knake, a former director of cybersecurity policy issues at the National Security Council and now a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations.

Mr. Knake said the C.I.A. and other intelligence agencies would be able to adapt in the event that secrets were exposed. Still, he said, the breach had the potential for “a whole bunch of C.I.A. case officers spending the rest of their careers riding desks.”

Sophisticated computers equipped to analyze millions and even billions of files allow intelligence operatives to make use of information that was once of uncertain value.

Joel Brenner, the former head of counterintelligence for the director of national intelligence, said the Chinese could search the database with the names of suspected spies they had gathered over the years. “You run 200 of those people through, and you have a pretty good idea of what they are and are not keeping in the system,” he said.

In the United States government there is little debate that China was the source of the attack on the Office of Personnel Management, which unfolded over at least 18 months. Last month the director of national intelligence, James R. Clapper Jr., said, “You’ve got to salute the Chinese for what they did,” before retreating to say China was the “leading suspect” in the case.

One former senior C.I.A. officer and one congressional official, both speaking on the condition of anonymity because they have received classified briefings about the data breach, said the hackers also managed to get personal information of retired C.I.A. officers that was in the databases.

Current and former American officials said that the hacking of the security clearance information will be a problem for years. The highly personal and potentially embarrassing information in the background questionnaires includes details about finances, drug and alcohol use, contacts with foreigners and mental health issues.

Mr. Clapper said Friday in Aspen that O.P.M.’s contractors had fallen so far behind in conducting security clearances — partly because of the hacking — that the intelligence agency’s periodic review of employees was far behind. But he was philosophical about the breach.

“If we had the opportunity to do the same thing,” he said, “we’d probably do it.”

Is it lights out for Puerto Rico? // WaPo // Steven Mufson - July 25, 2015

For a case study in how to run a company into the ground, look no further than the Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority.

The island's government-owned electric utility has $9 billion in debt, falling sales and rising costs. Its electricity rates for consumers run 2 1/2 times the national average and higher than any U.S. state except isolated, oil-dependent Hawaii.

All that money has purchased precious little. The utility's power plants, with a median age of 44 years, lack pollution controls and violate Environmental Protection Agency mercury limits. The plants burn dirty residual fuel oil and diesel to generate about two-thirds of the island's power. And thanks to aging infrastructure, frequent and costly power failures plague customers. The calls of customers bold enough to phone the utility to complain about service are dropped more than 50 percent of the time.

Now, however, PREPA is running out of cash and its creditors — including the major bond funds Oppenheimer and Franklin Templeton — can't be put on hold.

The utility lies at the epicenter of a mounting financial crisis in Puerto Rico, frequently called "America's Greece." The territory's governor recently called the island's $73 billion of debts "unpayable." With hundreds of millions of dollars of payments looming and little cash on hand, PREPA has been thrust to the forefront of a fight over whether the Puerto Rican commonwealth should be able to resort to U.S. bankruptcy courts for protection while it restructures its debts.

That in turn is part of a larger debate over the status of Puerto Rico — tethered to the United States ever since it was seized in the Spanish-American War of 1898, yet treated neither as a state nor as a country. Bankruptcy rules are part of that. In 1984, Congress passed legislation barring municipalities, agencies and government-owned utilities in Puerto Rico from declaring bankruptcy, while allowing those located on the mainland to do so.

Amid all this, PREPA stands out as what Puerto Rican Gov. Alejandro Garcia Padilla in an interview called "the biggest mess."

A report issued by three veteran International Monetary Fund economists said the utility's poor performance not only ruined its own balance sheet but also undermined the Puerto Rican economy's competitiveness because of needlessly high electricity rates.

"As a key input cost, this cascades down to locally produced goods and services and stunts potential growth sectors such as tourism," the report said.

The cost and availability of energy "is probably the most serious issue we face today," said Eric Spackey, chief executive officer of Bluewater Defense, a manufacturer of uniforms and protective clothing for the military. "My largest fixed cost is energy, and sadly service in the area of my plant is intermittent."

Spackey said that every time there is a power failure, more than 450 machines in his complex just west of San Juan "turn off and production stops until the generator kicks in and the machines can reboot — disrupting the production flow, machine circuit boards and ultimately morale." He said that while the government is aware of the problems, he fears the liquidity crisis will only make things worse.

Problems with plants and politics

Fixing the mess at PREPA — whose chief executive and several other top officials resigned in June — will be no small task.

"This is not something where a few tweaks will do," said Anne O. Krueger, former chief economist at the World Bank and former No. 2 official at the International Monetary Fund. She helped write the report on Puerto Rico's finances.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One of the main problems is PREPA's overwhelming dependence on oil for power generation, a function of poor planning. Moreover, its antiquated power plants burn the oil inefficiently. As a result, high oil prices over the past 10 years have helped strangle the utility and at one point drove electricity rates over 30 cents a kilowatt hour.

But PREPA's problems run deeper than that and are rooted in the island's political culture.

The Krueger-led report called PREPA "an inefficient and over-staffed public enterprise using technologies decades out of date." Three-quarters of the utilities service trucks are "obsolete" and frequently out of service, said a presentation by Lisa J. Donahue, a managing director of New York-based Alix Partners who is now acting as the utility's restructuring officer.

Donahue has vowed to fix the trucks and shrink the bloated payroll, which is twice as big as the average utility payroll on the mainland, according to a June 2010 report by the Center for a New Economy.

Both of the island's political parties have been complicit; they have padded the payrolls with loyalists in equal number as part of an unwritten pact to feed off the utility's revenues. More than a thousand of these "trust employees" work more — and earn more — when their party is in power.

"So when your party is in the majority, you might be given more responsibilities, and if it is out of power then you are sent to the basement for four years," said former Puerto Rico secretary of state Kenneth McClintock, who tried in vain to reform PREPA when he was in office. He said that the political parties also raised money by pressing the utility's suppliers to buy tickets to utility raffles or social events whose earnings go to the parties.

The EPA's experience with PREPA suggests not just political meddling but a pattern of disregard of laws and regulations. In 1993, the utility was found to have committed multiple violations of air, water and storage-tank regulations. In 1997, it was fined for failing to fix those. In 1999, the EPA won a criminal case under the Clean Water Act to force the utility to comply with orders after a sulfuric acid spill. In 2004, PREPA was fined again for failing to meet terms of an earlier consent decree.

Not all of PREPA's woes are of its own making. The Puerto Rican government, no matter what party was in power, has in the past used its ownership of public utilities to extend subsidies to lure new investors or keep businesses from leaving, Eugenio J. Alemán, senior economist of Wells Fargo, wrote in a May 24, 2012, note to investors.

"In the past, some of the hotels that have gone bankrupt over the years on the island had been delinquent in their public utility bill payments and phone bills for years before the bankruptcy, but state-owned public utilities never enforced the collection of their bills from those hotel chains," Alemán said.

"This meant that public utilities would have to recoup the costs of these subsidies either by not investing or by charging a higher rate to other businesses or individuals or a combination of both strategies," he wrote. "For many decades, they did not do either. This is one of the reasons why public utilities are in such dismal conditions today."

As the commonwealth's finances have crumbled, PREPA also has had trouble collecting money owed by the government itself. According to the last report, from 2013, the government owed the utility $250 million.

Stealing electricity has grown more prevalent too, by some estimates draining as much as 15 to 25 percent of output.

Refusing to innovate

Many investors have put forth a different vision of PREPA, offering to build a variety of solar, wind, hydro and natural-gas-powered plants to make the utility's electricity cheaper and greener.

Yet PREPA, reluctant to relinquish its grip on power supplies, has turned away many of those investors. Although sunlight is plentiful and breezes steady, the island has only about 150 megawatts of wind and solar installed — barely 1 percent of total consumption. Although many wind and solar developers have signed contracts with PREPA, virtually all of them have shelved the projects for now.

In late 2012, Robert Sternthal, president of CohnReznick Capital Markets Securities, predicted that Puerto Rico would become "the next hot development spot in the U.S. solar market." After all, with nationwide tax incentives and the high cost of oil-fired electricity, solar would be significantly cheaper than business as usual.

Today, a frustrated Sternthal admits he was wrong. PREPA demanded that independent solar power developers meet "minimum technical requirements" or PREPA would close off the solar project's access to the grid for an unspecified amount of time, with no clear guidance on when a project could come back online, Sternthal wrote in a November 2013 online solar industry publication.

Complying with PREPA's requirements "is a near impossibility" and "would make nearly all of the projects uneconomic to build," wrote Sternthal, whose firm has arranged financing for more than $4 billion in renewable energy projects. By the time PREPA's finances are sorted out, the federal tax incentives for solar will probably have expired.

"To me it's astounding that you look at the world and the creation of renewables, at how many megawatts are built every day, and these guys cannot get out of their own way," Sternthal said in an interview. "They would save millions, if not hundreds of millions of dollars, a year."

Now PREPA is attracting conventional firms and financiers who see the potential for big savings and profits.

York Capital, a New York-based investment firm, and NRG, one of the country's largest electric utilities, teamed with ITC Holdings, a transmission company, and recently came up with a grand vision for Puerto Rico's electricity sector. The three firms said they would invest $3.5 billion to install a natural-gas-fired plant, about 400 megawatts of solar, and transmission lines to take power from the gas plant in the south of the island to the north.

The group would sell electricity to PREPA — without getting involved in the utility's debt headaches, its four trade unions or its aging power plants.

Within a couple of years, the group says, the island would save $1.5 billion annually, or 9 cents a kilowatt hour, more than 40 percent of retail rates — enough to pay creditors and still slash consumers' bills.

"Our interest in the project comes from being distress investors and restructuring experts," said William Vrattos, partner and head of global credit at York. "At PREPA, we felt that not only would more value be created for the PREPA bankruptcy estate or the company but also for the island and all the stakeholders."

Trying to reorganize

For now, PREPA is at the mercy of its creditors while a team hired by the Puerto Rican government scrambles to restructure — and get some financial relief.

On July 13 at Citigroup's midtown Manhattan headquarters, advisers to PREPA spelled out to a room crowded with creditors how dire the island's situation is.

Jim Millstein, former head of restructuring at the Treasury during the financial crisis, warned at the meeting that "if this turns into a donnybrook, with creditors litigating against one another and litigating with the commonwealth," it would hurt the economy and tax revenues needed to meet payments. Millstein's firm has been working with Puerto Rico's Government Development Bank.

PREPA proposed deferring principal payments and most interest payments for five years, delaying more than $600 million a year in payments and providing the utility with enough capital to build more efficient power plants that would be cheaper to operate because they wouldn't burn petroleum.

The biggest creditors initially insisted that the utility could cover interest costs by raising electricity rates about 4 cents a kilowatt hour. The utility's advisers replied that higher rates would only accelerate the fall in demand, which has sliding about 2.5 percent a year for the past decade.

Franklin Templeton and Oppenheimer have about $10 billion in Puerto Rican bonds, valued by investors because interest on such bonds is exempt from federal, state and local taxes. Together with Blue Mountain, a hedge fund, Franklin Templeton and Oppenheimer won an appeals court ruling that threw out Puerto Rican legislation that would have allowed government entities there to use bankruptcy, saying that power belonged to Congress.

But on Thursday, a group representing holders of 40 percent of PREPA's bonds — including Franklin, Oppenheimer, Blue Mountain and Knighthead, another hedge fund — made a counterproposal, offering to exchange old bonds for new ones with lower average interest rates and a mixture of deferred payments.

For PREPA, it would be a mixed bag. It would still pay $1.6 billion in the first five years but would save $2.5 billion in interest and principal payments over 10 years. Electricity rates would be lower than Hawaii's but would remain high compared with rates on the mainland.

A big obstacle to a compromise could be the two companies that insured much of PREPA's bonds — National, formerly known as MBIA, and Assured. They have guaranteed $10 billion of Puerto Rican debt; about $3 billion of that was issued by PREPA. If PREPA and its bondholders agree on terms, National and Assured, which also guaranteed mortgage securities caught in the housing collapse of 2008, would still have to pay investors in insured bonds the shortfall.

To Wolfe, co-author of the Krueger report, the PREPA crisis echoes the earlier U.S. financial crisis.

"To me, this is second example of where financial markets have completely failed because of bad information," Wolfe said. Just as ratings agencies rated sub-prime mortgages without any idea what they were rating, he said, "here investors were lending to a governmental agency, and no one knew what its financial situation was."

Spy's Release Is Unlikely to Assuage Israel on Iran Nuclear Deal // NYT // Jodi Rudoren - July 25, 2015

The two issues with perhaps the broadest consensus and resonance in Israeli politics are opposition to the Iran nuclear deal and support for the release of Jonathan J. Pollard, the convicted Israeli spy, from a North Carolina prison. Now the two could be tied together, as some in Washington appear to be highlighting Mr. Pollard's likely parole in November in hopes of quieting the vigorous campaign by Israel and some of its American supporters against congressional approval of the deal.

But while Mr. Pollard has long been bandied about as a potential diplomatic chit the United States might use to force Israeli concessions, analysts said Saturday that such a linkage had little chance of working now, and could instead provoke a backlash.

Iran is seen as too serious a threat for the kind of horse-trading suggested in previous proposals to free Mr. Pollard in exchange for compromise on the Palestinian front, they said. Mr. Pollard has been expected to get out this year in any case, having served the required 30 years of a life sentence, so efforts to portray his release as a grand gesture are already being described as cynical, cheap and misguided.

"If this is the motive, it's naïve," said Amnon Rubinstein, a law professor at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya, Israel, who joined the growing movement calling for Mr. Pollard's release in recent years. "The two things are totally separate. One is a human consideration, and one is a strategic issue, which most Israelis, including myself, regard as existential."

Aaron David Miller, a State Department veteran on Middle East affairs who is now at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, said any such move would look bad for President Obama, given that Americans remain in Iranian prisons. And he added that it would probably make Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel "fight harder" against the Iran deal "so he's not thought to have colluded."

"Pollard is apples and the Iran deal is oranges," Mr. Miller said. "The Pollard card is not just of limited value, but potentially damaging." A spokesman for the National Security Council said Friday, "There is absolutely zero linkage between Mr. Pollard's status and foreign policy considerations," denying a report in The Wall Street Journal that American officials were pressing for his release in part to allay Israel's anger over the nuclear accord. But while Obama administration officials have previously emphasized that they expect Mr. Pollard to serve out his term, on Friday a Justice Department spokesman punctuated that sentiment with the caveat, "which in this case is a 30-year sentence as mandated by statute."

That spin may be aimed not at Israel but at Democratic — and Jewish — lawmakers like Senator Chuck Schumer of New York, who has long lobbied for Mr. Pollard's release and could be among the pivotal votes in Congress on Iran. Even if it does not change either the substance or the tenor of criticism of the nuclear deal, freeing Mr. Pollard would at least remove one item from the lengthy list of complaints about Mr. Obama by Israelis and their backers.

A senior Israeli official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the delicacy of the situation, said Saturday that the government had not "been told anything at all" about developments regarding Mr. Pollard, and that he did not think it had been discussed as part of a so-called compensation package Washington might provide to appease Israel on the Iran front.

"Our longstanding position has been, we have made repeated requests over the years, that for humanitarian reasons he should be released," the official said. "It comes up routinely. I'm not aware that the issues are in any way connected."

Israel on Saturday issued a stern statement that the country would continue to criticize the nuclear agreement with Iran and could not be pressured to stop voicing its objections. The statement was in response to comments made Friday by Secretary of State John Kerry, who warned that the international community might blame Israel if Congress blocked the accord and that as a result Israel might "wind up being more isolated."

"We reject the threats directed at Israel in recent days," an Israeli official said in a statement provided Saturday to The New York Times. "The U.S. Congress will make its decision based on American interests, which include consideration of U.S. allies," added the official, who asked not to be named because of the diplomatic sensitivities. "The regrettable attempt to intimidate Israel will not prevent us from voicing our concerns about this deal, which poses direct threats to Israel's security."

Mr. Pollard, 60 and ailing, was born in Texas to a Zionist family, and shortly after being hired in 1979 as a naval intelligence analyst, started passing suitcases stuffed with classified documents to an Israeli handler, who paid him $1,500 a month, bought his wife a diamond and sapphire ring, and sent the couple on expensive European vacations.

He was disavowed by Israelis upon his 1985 arrest, but later embraced — he was granted citizenship in 1995 and, by 2013, had become the focal point of a protest movement that went beyond the original right-wing core to become a coalition of Nobel Prize-winning scientists, retired generals, celebrated authors and dovish politicians like Shimon Peres, then the president of Israel. An online petition demanding clemency drew 175,000 signatures.

Mr. Netanyahu has made the fight against Iran's obtaining a nuclear weapon the centerpiece of his career, but the Pollard case could be a close second.

In 1998, Mr. Netanyahu nearly secured Mr. Pollard's release during a summit meeting with President Bill Clinton regarding the Palestinians at Wye Mills, Md., but it was thwarted when George J. Tenet, then director of the Central Intelligence Agency, threatened to resign.

Mr. Netanyahu's aides in 2010 floated to the Obama administration the idea of trading Mr. Pollard's freedom for an extension of a 10-month freeze on construction in West Bank settlements. And last year, Secretary of State John Kerry persuaded Mr. Obama to put Mr. Pollard on the table as part of a package to save Mr. Kerry's collapsing peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians, but the negotiations fell apart for other reasons.

"It is clear that since the 1990s he's been a chip, he's been a playing card," said Michael B. Oren, Israel's former ambassador to the United States, who visited Mr. Pollard in prison in 2011 and writes about him in his new book, "Ally: My Journey Across the American-Israeli Divide." "It's become sort of built into the peace process."

In Washington, debates about how to maximize Mr. Pollard's leverage have raged; in 2014, for example, many thought freeing him only to extend the talks, rather than to move Israel on the core issues of conflict with the Palestinians, would be a mistake. As the clock ticks toward the 30th anniversary of his arrest — at the time, parole was generally mandated after 30 years for federal inmates serving life sentences — the value inevitably drops. Amir Oren, a journalist who has covered the case from its first day, said Israelis would "pocket this gesture; they will not even agree that it's a gesture, they will say it's a make-believe gesture because he was going to be released anyway."

Mr. Pollard's ex-wife, Anne, said on Israeli television Saturday night that he would want to live in Israel. With the 30-year mark approaching, Mr. Pollard "deserves to be released based on the American system of justice."

"I just want to see him out," she added. "I can't bear it anymore that he sat and lost all of his life in jail."

Oded Eran, a longtime Israeli diplomat who is now a researcher at the Institute for National Security Studies at Tel Aviv University, said the anonymous reports coming out of Washington are “a cheap shot to try and change the tone on Iran, and therefore we are not going to be swayed one way or the other.” Mr. Eran, who served in Israel’s embassy in Washington, said Mr. Pollard’s release would be a 24-hour story of national celebration, while the Iran issue “will be with us for months, if not years.”

“I want to be very clear and very categorical,” he added. “If anyone in Washington believes that this is going to change the tone of the debate on Iran, the nature of the debate on Iran, the votes on Iran, he is absolutely, categorically, misleading himself.”

Obama in Kenya: An Upbeat Tone, but Notes of Discord, Too // NYT // Peter Baker and Marc Santora - July 25, 2015

The return of the long-lost son, as President Obama is widely seen by Kenyans, had all the elements of a family reunion. They hugged, they caught up, they talked about shared interests, they agreed they should get together more often, and they had their sibling spats.

In his first visit as president to his father’s home country, Mr. Obama struck a relentlessly upbeat tone, declaring, “Africa is on the move”; praising progress toward democracy and economic growth; and marveling over the changes he saw on the streets of this locked-down capital.

But he found himself at odds with his hosts on human rights and same-sex marriage and gingerly tried to nudge them to change their ways. At a news conference, he said the fight against terrorism in Kenya should not be used to justify a crackdown on dissent and argued that no nation should discriminate against gays and lesbians, comparing it to the era of segregation of African-Americans.

“If somebody is a law-abiding citizen who is going about their business and working in a job and obeying the traffic signs and doing all the other things good citizens are supposed to do and not harming anybody, the idea that they are going to be treated differently or abused because of who they love is wrong,” Mr. Obama said. “Full stop.”

Standing to his left on the lush lawn of the colonial-era State House, President Uhuru Kenyatta accepted the advice on human rights without argument, saying Kenya was trying to improve its handling of security and liberty. “This issue of terrorism is new to us,” he said, “and as it is new, we learn with each and every step.”

But in a country where homosexuality is widely condemned, he flatly rejected Mr. Obama’s views on gay rights. “There are some things we must admit we don’t share; our culture, our society don’t accept,” he said. “It is very difficult for us to be able to impose on people that which they themselves do not accept.”

The disagreement was quickly papered over, though, as both Mr. Obama and Kenyans focused on the historic nature of his visit. While Mr. Obama came here three times before taking office, many Kenyans had bristled that he waited until the seventh year of his presidency to return.

He joked in public events that he had not wanted to make the rest of Africa jealous by coming too soon, but expressed a strong connection to Kenya. “I’m proud to be the first U.S. president to visit Kenya, and obviously, this is personal for me,” he said at a business forum. “There’s a reason why my name is Barack Hussein Obama. My father came from these parts and I have family and relatives here. And in my visits over the years, walking the streets of Nairobi, I’ve come to know the warmth and the spirit of the Kenyan people.”

He held out Kenya as a model in a fast-growing region. “Kenya is leading the way,” Mr. Obama said. “When I was here in Nairobi 10 years ago, it looked very different than it does today.”

He added, however, that the greatest threat to continued growth in Kenya is the scourge of corruption, found here from the local police officer to the highest politicians. Mr. Obama and Mr. Kenyatta released a 29-point plan for fighting corruption in Kenya. They also signed an “action plan” to bolster Kenya’s security in its fight against the Shabab, the Qaeda affiliate based in Somalia.

Mr. Obama could not get out of his armored car to wander the streets as in the past. Instead, his most intimate encounter with Kenya beyond its official leadership came during a dinner Friday at his hotel with three dozen members of his extended family.

Readers from about a dozen African countries shared their views on President Obama's time in office, pointing out successes, failures and hopes for the future.

The Effects of Obama's Presidency in Africa: Readers' Opinions

Over a buffet of Kenyan food, including chicken, fish and beef, the president heard his relatives talk about life in Kenya, and he told them a little about life in the White House. Some of them told Mr. Obama they wished he could spend more time in Kenya, and with them. He later said he spent part of the meal "begging for forgiveness" that his schedule did not allow it. "Once I'm a private citizen, I will have more freedom to reconnect," he said.

Said Obama, his uncle, said his relatives understood. "He explained to the family members the nature of his work," Said Obama said in an interview. "But he said his mind is always with them, his heart is always here."

The president generally has only remote connections to most relatives living here. He is closest to his half sister, Auma Obama, who hosted him for his first visit as a young man. Also present on Friday night was his step-grandmother, known as Mama Sarah but whom he calls Granny.

His Kenyan relatives have not been regular visitors to the White House. The only Obamas who show up in publicly released White House visitor logs are Said Obama and Sarah Obama, an aunt, who have visited just once in more than six years, and the president's half brother Abongo, also known as Roy, who has visited three times.

Indeed, the president acknowledged that some at dinner here on Friday were strangers. "In these extended families, there are cousins and uncles and aunties that show up that you didn't know existed but you're always happy to meet," the president said with a laugh. "And there were lengthy explanations in some cases of the connections. But it was a wonderful time."

Mr. Obama had a long day of activities. He addressed the sixth annual Global Entrepreneurship Summit meeting, laid a wreath at a memorial to the victims of the 1998 bombing of the United States Embassy here and attended a state dinner in the evening, where he was serenaded in English and Swahili by a group that sang a song called "Coming Home." In his toast, Mr. Obama joked that critics back home no doubt believed he had come "to look for my birth certificate," adding, "That is not the case."

He made no mention of Mr. Kenyatta's indictment for crimes against humanity. Mr. Kenyatta and his deputy, William Ruto, were charged in the International Criminal Court with instigating violence after disputed 2007 elections that killed more than 1,000. The case against Mr. Kenyatta was dropped in December, but the charges stand against Mr. Ruto, who met with Mr. Obama.

Mr. Obama referred obliquely to that violence but praised a revised constitution adopted afterward, and said the subsequent election in 2013 that elevated Mr. Kenyatta and Mr. Ruto "showed growth in the election process."

He defended his Power Africa initiative, a multibillion-dollar effort announced two years ago that has produced little electricity for a power-starved continent. "I would just point out that if you wanted to start a power plant in the United States, it doesn't take a year to get that done," he said.

Rejecting comparisons to President George W. Bush, whose efforts to curb AIDS and malaria in Africa are warmly remembered, he said, "This isn't a beauty contest between presidents."

The excitement at his visit was palpable from the gated homes with manicured lawns in grand old wealthy neighborhoods like Muthaiga and Karen to the slums of Kibera, where sewage runs in the street and families live in mud and tin shacks. "Obama is a source of inspiration to many," said Babu Owino, president of the Kenya University Students Organization. "The students here love him so much. They are die-hard fans. When they look at his background, he's someone they are able to identify with."

So much so that before the visit, Mr. Owino wrote to the American ambassador here claiming at least 17 students had threatened to commit suicide if Mr. Obama did not visit the University of Nairobi. (The president did not, but no suicides were reported.)

Mr. Obama transcended the tribal differences that have divided society. Mr. Obama's family is Luo while Mr. Kenyatta and his ruling elite are Kikuyu. But Solomon Wekesa, 31, a security guard who himself is Luya, said it did not matter to most Kenyans.

"In Obama, they see a man who does not see tribe, a man who is an open man," he said. "He sees Kenya as one nation."

Others hoped the visit would bring change. "I want Obama to push for reforms in Kenya's fight against corruption to enable the poor access to a better livelihood," said Nancy Ayako, 21, who lives in the Kibera slum settlement. "There are so many young people who have been marginalized, like slum dwellers."

But expectations may have surpassed reality. For Rogers Mogaka, a community organizer, Mr. Obama's visit came too late. "Why now?" he asked. "Look, he is not coming here to meet with the common man on the street."

He added, "There are a number of issues that we think need to be addressed that affect the common man in Kenya."

Subject: Israel and Hillary

Dear Jake,

The Obama White House-Bibi relationship is obviously deteriorating to the point of no return. It is more poisonous than US-Israeli relationship in my lifetime. Even during the Nixon/Kissinger flaps with Prime Minister Meir and then Rabin after the Yom Kippur War, including Kissinger's threat of a "reassessment" of U.S. policy; the George H.W. Bush/James Baker-Shamir period, when there was an effort to freeze loan guarantees; the Carter-Begin relationship leading up to Camp David and the Egypt-Israel Peace Treaty; or the several "reassessments" by Reagan as a result of the Israeli invasion of Lebanon and other actions, there was nothing like the public personal animosity that exists now. The Prime Minister's efforts to back-off his immediate pre-election statements about Israeli Arab voting and opposition to a two-state solution have not only been rebuffed by both the President, and most recently, White House Chief of Staff Denis McDonough, but they have effectively questioned the Prime Minister's candidness. Olive branches have been spurned. Fuel was added to the fire with the allegation of Israeli intelligence intervention in the Iran talks. There is a distinct possibility that the Administration may seek a new UN Security Council Resolution embodying the two-state solution, with 1967 lines and agreed land swaps, and some vague statements about Jerusalem.

If and when an Iran framework agreement is announced this week, this combustible situation will explode. I sent you a lengthy memo March 17 on the Iran nuclear talks, based upon my chairmanship of the Atlantic Council's Iran Task Force.

This obviously places Hillary in an extremely difficult position, caught between the President she served and the organized parts of the Jewish community, I have talked several times recently, including yesterday afternoon, with Malcolm Honlein, president of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations. They have refrained from directly criticizing the President, but he told me that he and most of his organizations are extraordinarily concerned about the situation, and highly desirous of Hillary making some statement to calm the turbulent waters. At the same time, more liberal Jews are incensed at Bibi. However, as the NYT reports today, the vehemence of the President's reaction, even to Bibi's "peace offering", is turning the tide in Israel in the Prime Minister's favor, and may do so here, as well.

Permit me to suggest some points she might make. By way of background, I have very deep connections to the State of Israel and to its elected officials and leading academics. I go to Israel two to three times a year, perhaps 50 times since my first visit in 1965. My grandfather and great-grandfather are buried in Israel, and I have scores of relatives and friends there. During the Clinton Administration, I was responsible for the economic dimension of the peace process, working with Yasir Arafat, the Jordanians and the Israeli government on initiatives like Qualifying Industrial Zones (QIZs) in Gaza and Jordan; construction of the airport in Gaza; facilitating some 50,000 Palestinian workers coming to Israel daily, and 20,000 trusted Palestinian businessmen who could enter Israel with their own cars. I co-chair with Dennis Ross the Jewish People's Policy Institute of Jerusalem(JPPI), a think tank funded by the Jewish Agency and major American Jewish federations and foundations, focusing on strategic challenges facing Israel and the Diaspora around the world.

First, she should stress the need to "lower the temperature level" of rhetoric on all sides. The overall political, military, defense relationship with Israel is too important to allow personal differences to intrude on the future direction of U.S. policy. It is time to look to the future and not fixate on campaign statements, which often in all democracies can be excessive, as they were here. Moreover, we must respect the democratic process in Israel, just as we would expect Israeli leaders to accept the election and re-election of our President. It is time to put the election behind us, and roll-up our collective sleeves and get back to work on rebuilding confidence and trying to develop the parameters to return to the negotiating table.

Second, she should stress the enduring commitment of the United States to Israel's security interests, not only direct military threats, but attacks against Israel in the form of the Boycott, Divestment, Sanctions (BDS) campaign, on campuses in the U.S. and Europe. She should express grave concern for the increase in anti-Semitism in Europe and violent attacks by radical Islamic terrorists (Obama refuses to use this term; she will need to decide what language to use and then stick with it) against Jews in Europe (Paris, Toulouse, Malmo) which conflate their hatred of Israel with Jews in their country.

Third, and critically, she should express a strong feeling that Israel MUST remain a bipartisan issue, as it has been since its formation. She should sharply criticize those in the U.S. and in Israel who are injecting Israel into a partisan context. The invitation to Bibi was not only done without prior notice to the President, but also to the Democratic leadership.

Fourth, she should reiterate the long-standing support for the two-state solution, as the only one which will ensure Israel remains a majority Jewish democratic state. Indefinite control over two million Palestinians is not in Israel's interests nor theirs. This will require compromises neither side has been willing to make, despite Secretary Kerry's herculean efforts. It is important for her to remind people that in both the year 2000 with Prime Minister Barak and in 2008 with Prime Minster Olmert, Israel offered to withdraw from 95% of the West Bank, make East Jerusalem the capital of a Palestinian state, and to allow up to 50,000

Palestinians to return to Israel for family reunions, and it was not accepted. No Palestinian leader is willing to forego their "right of return". At the same time, settlement expansion under Bibi and his insistence that Palestinians accept not just the "State of Israel" but "the Jewish State of Israel", does not create an environment for mutual sacrifice.

Fifth, she should call for all sides to avoid unilateral actions, like the Palestinian effort to seek a "war crimes" investigation against Israel in the International Criminal Court (interestingly, just this week, the ICC indicated it would also investigate Hamas); settlement expansion; and efforts to seek a new UN Resolution to supersede UN Resolution 242, with the consent of neither Israel or the Palestinians (this would be controversial with the Obama Administration, as they would see this as a preemptive action by Hillary to preempt their effort; thus she might hold her powder on this until there is more certainty what the Administration will do; still, at some point, she may have to take a position; this would not negate the need for her to advise against unilateral actions). It is time to get back to the negotiating table.

Sixth, realistically, there is no clear way to break the current impasse. Thus, she should suggest the following (I call it the diplomatic equivalent of the medical Hippocratic oath: "do no harm"; do not do anything that makes a two-state solution less possible) :

(1) There will be an expansion of settlements because couples have babies. But these should be within established settlement blocks, which in the Clinton Parameters and other plans, would be part of Israel in any peace agreement. In fact, over 80% of all settlement expansion is within the footprint of these major blocks. She should call for the Israeli government to remove settlement outposts which are illegal under their own law, and project deeper and deeper into Palestinian territory and make a two-state solution impossible. There has never been a mapping exercise with the Israelis on what they consider the parameters of the existing blocks. This should be jointly done.

(2) There should be an expansion of Israeli-Palestinian cooperation, which is important for Israel in working with the Palestinians on intelligence sharing against terrorists, and avoids an unsustainable military takeover of the whole West Bank. This could take the following forms:

(a) Establish several QIZs in the West Bank. This allows duty-free treatment of products within the QIZ into the U.S., if there is as little as 10% Israeli content. I visited the QIZ in Gaza in July 2000, and it was a beautiful thing to see. There were 30 plants employing over 1000 Gazans, and a second phase was being built. The only Israeli presence, was an unarmed Israeli soldier, who watched the products being loaded onto trucks, where they were whisked through the border and to the airport in Gaza. I also visited a QIZ in Irbid, Jordan. There are some dozen in Jordan and, I believe, around four to six in Egypt. Astonishingly, there are none in the West Bank. In late January, at the World Economic Forum in Davos, I met with the deputy prime minister of the Palestinian Authority, and raised this possibility; he was very positive.

(b) Restore the $400 million in tax revenues, the Israeli government is withholding in response to the Palestinians going to the ICC.

(c) Begin to carefully allow vetted Palestinians to work in Israel. Again, at its peak, it was well over 50,000; some estimates were as high as 100,000.

(d) Increase the territory in the West Bank under control of the Palestinian Authority.

(e) Reduce the number of check points within the West Bank, given the security fence. I have a close friend in Israel (David Harman, the son of former Israeli Ambassador to the US Abe Harman), who teaches at Bard College, Hebrew University, and al-Quds university in the West Bank. He has told me it takes up to 2 hours or more each way for some of his Palestinian students to get to class. This only increases anger in the Palestinian community.

(f) Allow carefully vetted Gazans to travel to and from the West Bank, if the PA controls the passages, along with Israelis. Also, increase the range of products that can be imported and exported from Gaza, and the range of fishing rights off the Gaza coast.

Jake, she may not wish to have all of this in one statement, and limit herself to the First through Fifth points. But she needs to say enough to be substantive.

I have sent you separately, at your request, Jewish leaders to whom she should reach out. She needs to make a statement sooner rather than later, as things are spiraling out of control.

Best wishes,

MCCAIN 'CHANGE' SPEECH NEWS

McCain Mounts Immediate Attack on Obama's Record (Washington Post 6/4/08)
By Michael D. Shear and Juliet Eilperin; A01
Republican Sen. John McCain wasted no time Tuesday night in launching his first general-election broadside against Sen. Barack Obama, casting the Democrat as an out-of-touch liberal who offers a false promise of change.

McCain Sells His Kind of Change (TIME 6/4/08)
By James Carney
Can a 72-year-old white male Republican who has served in Congress for more than a quarter century represent change to a nation that craves it? Can he win the White House in a year when his party is in widespread ill repute, and is led by the most unpopular incumbent President in the history of polling? And most importantly, can he do it against the youthful, multi-ethnic, charm-infused, walking, talking embodiment of change that is his Democratic opponent?

McCain tackles Obama and Bush in Kenner appearance (The Times-Picayune 6/4/08)
By Richard Rainey
As the polls closed on the two final Democratic primaries Tuesday, Republican presidential candidate Sen. John McCain painted himself the candidate of change who could reform a lethargic, unresponsive government, a claim his campaign hoped would have added gravitas by his speech's proximity to New Orleans.

A McCain-Clinton Ticket? (CBS blog 6/4/08)
Posted by Vaughn Ververs
Ok, so that's not going to happen, but John McCain didn't at all try to hide his flirtation with Hillary Clinton's supporters who may be, to put it mildly, upset with Barack Obama's victory. Here's some text from McCain's speech last night:

The Lime Green Monster: McCain's Speech Widely Panned (Huffington Post 6/3/08)
It may be a superficial quip with Senator McCain's speech tonight, but as Marc Ambinder of the Atlantic noted, in presidential politics, "theatrics matter." The choice of a lime green backdrop was, to put it kindly, not wise. Beyond representing a jarring visual for even the most colorblind political viewer, the set up was clearly a distraction from the speech itself. Take a look at some of the reviews:

McCain's Speech (TIME blog 6/3/08)
Posted by Joe Klein
John McCain simply can not give a formal speech--especially one with a rhetorical conceit ("And that's not change you can believe in")--in a manner that is even vaguely convincing. Everything about him screams: I. Am. Reading. A. Speech. His weird ghostly grins and false chuckling whenever the rhetoric device came around were totally distracting...and they were very much unlike John McCain, when he plays to his great oratorical strength, which is speaking off the cuff in town meeting settings.

McCain Campaign Using Hillary's "Commander In Chief" Line To Attack Obama (TPM ElectionCentral 6/3/08)
By Greg Sargent
This seems significant: The McCain campaign, as predicted, is already using Hillary's "commander in chief test" line to attack Obama.

The Drudge siren is whirring, and the Associated Press is reporting: Barack Obama has done it. The primaries are over. ... it's time for the big show. And John McCain is going to try to seize the moment--again. The first time he debuted a November campaign message on an election night, you will remember, was in February, at an Alexandria, Va., Holiday Inn.

By Matthew Palevsky
...Kowtowing to an Israeli fear of Iran, McCain used the AIPAC forum to reinforce his three most dubious and dangerous policy claims. First, that Iran posses an imminent "existential threat" to both Israel and the U.S., despite the recent National Intelligence Estimate stating that 2015 is the earliest Iran could produce a nuclear weapon. Second, that direct presidential talks with adversarial nations render zero substantive benefits. And finally, that passing the kind of sanctions that burdened Iraq for nearly a decade would somehow promote Democracy instead of Totalitarianism in Iran.

Subject: AP1000 Update

Hi John, Possible to review the info below via email? I assume that's probably a better idea than printing at hotel, but will happily print if you assume differently.

Hi Melanie,
Here's the brief state of play. (To remind—the Chinese have their own technology, French technology etc—they don't NEED us to get to their targets with nuclear—but there are folks within China that are backing these technologies.) Below is a reminder background with a high level state of play.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION ON POTENTIAL AP1000 QUESTIONS RAISED BY CHINA

Westinghouse Electric Company has a long history of working with the Chinese in nuclear power technology transfer activities beginning in 1985. That work was suspended due to the sanctions imposed following the Tiananmen Square event. Once these sanctions were lifted in 1998 by President Clinton, WEC began to discuss sales of their new advanced passive reactor technology (AP1000) to China. In 2003, WEC applied for and was granted exclusive advocacy by the Department of Commerce for its proposal to design and construct two two-unit nuclear power plants in China. In 2007, a contract to provide four AP1000 reactors, which are currently under construction at two sites, Sanmen and Haiyang, was signed between WEC and the State Nuclear Power Technology Corporation (SNPTC) of China. The value of the projects is approximately $5 billion, including up to $2 billion in U.S. export content. The four AP1000 units in China have undergone construction delays, in part due to the reactors being "first of a kind" construction and, in part due to difficulties integrating U.S. and Chinese project teams. The first unit was originally envisioned to come on line in November 2013. The Chinese government was anxious to get the first unit on line by the end of 2015 and pressed the Chinese firms, as well as the U.S. Government, in hopes that we would in turn, press WEC. The latest challenges to the Reactor Coolant Pump will push back the "on-line" date until sometime in mid-2016, but the Chinese customer has not officially make that announcement. [N.B. We believe that the RCP issue is resolved. The testing will be completed in June and then the pump will be taken apart and examined, and we expect that it will pass testing and examination.]

WEC is also seeking contracts with SNPTC to support six additional AP1000 plants as part of China's "Wave 2" of reactors and just signed a contract for the instrumentation and control portions of those reactors. With further contracts for other work with those reactors, Westinghouse estimates the procurement value of the Wave 2 reactors could be up to an additional $2.5 billion in U.S. export content. [N.B. Instead of contracting for a reactor, the Chinese are contracting across reactors for different portions of the project: instrumentation and control, fuel, pumps etc. WEC expects to see more contracts from this wave.]

WEC has told US officials that WEC and SNPTC will be looking to sign commercial agreements for scope of work in 20+ new AP1000 reactor sites by September 2015—"Wave 3." According to WEC, the Chinese may approach us to announce this during President Xi's visit to the United States as a big deliverable.

The USG, while supportive of such contracts, is concerned that a big announcement at that time may be problematic because the renewal of the U.S.-China Nuclear Cooperation Agreement (so-called 123) will still undergoing Congressional review during the time of the Xi visit. We are expecting some resistance to this Agreement from some members of Congress and a big nuclear announcement may be counterproductive to our Hill strategy. That said, we are wanting to take a "wait and see" approach to determine what the Hill reaction would be and whether or not another commercial contract would have a positive or negative effect. [N.B. The Agreement hasn't yet been signed, although both sides have agreed on text. We are each going through our interagency processes. We expect to sign around April 12/13, after the President makes his determination and the Chinese have gone through their processes. We'll then submit to the Hill. Happy to talk off line about Hill and concerns that will be raised.]

McCain's Mixed Fiscal Policy (Washington Post blog 7/8/08)
By Dan Balz
John McCain has been around Washington long enough to remember the days when Republicans constantly clashed among themselves over fiscal policy. Were they the party of Jack Kemp, of supply-side economics and big tax cuts, or the party of Bob Dole and the green eyeshade economics of deficit reduction?

McCain campaign screening questions? (MotherJones 7/8/08)
John McCain has cultivated the rep of a politician unafraid of questions. When he campaigned for president in 2000, he often hung out with reporters on his bus and fielded questions until the journalists were out of queries. In the 2008 campaign, as he did eight years earlier, McCain has held town hall meetings during which he called on attendees who were obviously not McCain supporters. (It was during one such exchange that McCain said it would be "fine" by him if U.S. troops remained in Iraq for "a hundred years.") So why then does it seem that the McCain campaign has been screening questioners during the conference calls featuring campaign aides and top-level surrogates it mounts for reporters?

Climate Change Economics (Washington Post 7/9/08)
By Peter R. Orszag; A15
President Bush and other leaders of the Group of Eight pledged yesterday to try to reduce greenhouse gas emissions 50 percent by 2050. A key consideration in evaluating climate policies is the economic cost of cutting emissions. That cost could be reduced, perhaps by a lot, depending on two key questions about domestic climate policies: whether flexibility is provided when emissions are reduced and whether allowances to emit carbon are sold or given away.

Benghazi Biopsy: A Comprehensive Guide to One of America's Worst Political Outrages

BY KURT EICHENWALD 10/21/15 AT 4:18 PM

....

Secrets, Lies and Sidney Blumenthal

Trey Gowdy was demanding answers: What is the definition of unsolicited?

At a hearing in June, the Benghazi committee's questioning of Sidney Blumenthal, a longtime associate of Hillary Clinton, had dragged on for hours. Republicans had yet to ask him a single question about the attack or anything related to it, although as the Democrats on the committee established quickly that morning, Blumenthal had never been to Libya and knew nothing about the assault. In fact, more than eight hours would pass in the hearing before a Republican asked anything about Benghazi.

They did, however, spend an enormous amount of time on Blumenthal's outside work and email communications with Hillary Clinton. According to people who have seen the transcript of the hearing—which the Republicans have refused to release—Gowdy's opening inquiries were off-topic, bizarre and totally political. He asked Blumenthal many questions about a series of articles posted on Media Matters, a liberal website, that proved embarrassing to his friend, Republican Representative Jason Chaffetz of Utah. One post said Chaffetz had attacked Clinton and Obama about Benghazi although he had voted to cut funding to the State Department for security at diplomatic outposts. Gowdy asked Blumenthal if he wrote the articles, commissioned them, edited them or read them. He inquired about his relationship to Media Matters, Democratic political commentators and organizations connected to the Democratic Party.

Eventually, Gowdy's questions turned to emails that Blumenthal had sent to Clinton. The former secretary of state had said publicly that they were unsolicited emails from an old friend. In question after question, Gowdy grilled Blumenthal about the definition of unsolicited. The meaning of the word, Gowdy proclaimed, was "unwanted"—yet Clinton had clearly made statements in her emails that she appreciated Blumenthal's input. The congressman persisted with his incorrect definition to prove Clinton lied about a topic unrelated to Benghazi until Blumenthal's lawyer suggested looking up unsolicited in the dictionary (it means "not requested," as the Democrats later pointed out). Gowdy immediately moved on to another topic unrelated to the Benghazi attack.

The hearing was littered with other irrelevant questions. Gowdy and his staff asked Blumenthal more than 50 questions about the Clinton Foundation, the charitable organization established by Bill Clinton and where Blumenthal had worked. Republicans also asked more than 45 questions about David Brock, who operates Media Matters and other related groups, and over 160 questions about Blumenthal's relationship and contacts with the Clintons.

Nine hours of questioning achieved nothing in advancing the investigation into the Libyan terrorist attack, since Blumenthal had no firsthand knowledge related to Benghazi; the closest he had come to providing information to Clinton about the area was by forwarding a report written by Tyler Drumheller, a long-retired CIA officer who had been head of the European division for clandestine operations.

So what was Blumenthal doing in front of the committee? A former White House aide to President Clinton, he had not been in government for more than 14 years. Blumenthal also had plenty of contacts from his years as a journalist—including Drumheller, whom he had mentioned in a few stories for Salon. He was a friend of Hillary Clinton and—like scores of civilians and former government officials before him—he provided information he believed to be important to the former secretary, who then passed any of it she considered worthwhile to her staff for review. Henry Kissinger, former secretary of state under Richard Nixon, played the same role for the Bush administration in the lead-up to the Iraq War. Robert Murphy, a former American diplomat, provided similar information to Kissinger during his years with Nixon. In fact, Nixon himself frequently reached out to then-President Bill Clinton to offer analysis and information. Former journalist and think tank veteran Michael Ledeen has funneled his thoughts and details of things he had learned to numerous Republican administrations and brokered introductions with people overseas. A conservative think tank scholar used his contacts to set up a meeting between senior Pentagon officials with the Bush administration and two former member of the Iranian government in December 2001. One White House official with the Bush administration even reached out to me in 2002 for information about Osama bin Laden's financial network. (As a journalist, I was required to decline the request.)

In other words, there was nothing unusual about someone like Blumenthal directing his analysis and information to Hillary Clinton. Had the secretary instructed Blumenthal to stop providing potentially valuable intelligence, it would have been not only likely unprecedented but also bordering on incompetence.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The only point in subpoenaing Blumenthal to testify was for the Republicans to traffic in Benghazi-related conspiracy theories, including one explicitly stated on Sunday by a member of the Benghazi committee, Representative Mike Pompeo of Kansas. In an appearance on Meet the Press, he said Clinton had "relied on Mr. Blumenthal for most of her intelligence" on Libya. Gowdy, in a letter he made public on October 8, made the same statement

Think about that for a moment. Either Pompeo and Gowdy were being completely disingenuous, or irrationally believe that Clinton (who was cleared to review any classified intelligence developed by the State Department, the CIA and other agencies throughout government) instead decided to make decisions based primarily on information from a man who had never been to Libya.

Andrea Mitchell, NBC's longtime diplomatic correspondent who hosted the program, responded quickly to Pompeo's assertion. "That is factually not correct," she told Pompeo. "No, it is absolutely factually correct," Pompeo responded.

"Relied on Mr. Blumenthal for most of her intelligence?" Mitchell repeated. "I cover the State Department. That is just factually not correct, and I've been as tough on this issue as anyone."

But that was not the only fantastical conspiracy theory about Blumenthal. In the October 8 letter, Gowdy claims that Blumenthal was a primary driver for the establishment of a no-fly zone over Libya based on an email he sent to Clinton in February 2011, more than a year and a half before the Benghazi attack. Gowdy fails to mention a relevant fact: This was hardly Blumenthal's idea. Diplomats who had defected from the tyrannical government of Muammar el-Qaddafi, then the Libyan leader, were calling on the United Nations to impose a no-fly zone. So had Libya's ambassador to the U.N. Britain and France were already drafting a resolution to put in place a restricted area where aircraft would be forbidden to fly. Within days, Republican Senator John McCain announced his support for the idea, and Mitch McConnell, the Senate Republican leader, said it was worth considering. But in the world of the Benghazi committee, none of these voices—major Western governments allied with the United States, the analysis of ambassadors and Libyan government exiles, and the input of American senators—were as important in making a such critical decision as an email from Blumenthal.

After ignoring the history of the no-fly zone debate, Gowdy then makes the most incredible accusation of all: that Blumenthal was using his (imaginary) role as Clinton puppet master to impose a no-fly zone so that he could make money. In the October 8 letter, Gowdy wrote that Blumenthal was pushing for war in Libya to profit from his financial stake in a company called Osprey Global Solutions. At the time, Osprey was attempting to arrange a contract to provide humanitarian assistance including housing, medical clinics and schools in five sites.

But once again, Gowdy's assertions are false. David Grange, a retired Army major general who is president and chief executive of Osprey, says Blumenthal had no stake in his company at all. In fact, Grange says he has met Blumenthal only once, for no more than 15 minutes. While Blumenthal may have played a small role brokering efforts by a third party consultant to facilitate the humanitarian assistance project, he had no contract to obtain any money, according to an executive from another corporation involved in the proposed deal. While there may have been an unpromised possibility that Blumenthal could have obtained a finder's fee, this executive says, nothing was ever paid to anyone. In the end, Grange says, Osprey "didn't make a dime" from its efforts, in large part because the situation in Libya was so chaotic; it was impossible to determine who had the authority to sign an agreement.

Ever since Blumenthal gave his testimony, he, his lawyer and Democratic members of the committee have been demanding that the transcript be made public. That document would reveal the sham of the committee, the fact that Republicans cared more about articles in Media Matters than about the Benghazi attack. It would, according to people who have seen it, prove critically embarrassing. An agreement was reached to have a vote on releasing the transcript at the next business meeting of the committee. But Gowdy canceled the meeting. More than 100 days have passed; no business meetings that would allow for the testimony to be released have been scheduled or held.

Benghazi Biopsy: A Comprehensive Guide to One of America's Worst Political Outrages

The death of four Americans stationed at the hands of al-qaeda aligned militants in the 2012 attack on the American consulate in Benghazi, Libya was a tragic lose for the US. But unlike other embassy attacks, this one has become the subject of one of America's longest congressional investigations and the root of many right-wing conspiracy theories. MARK PETERSON/REDUX

FILED UNDER: Opinion , Hillary Clinton Email , Benghazi , Hillary Clinton , Barack Obama , George W. Bush , 2016 election , Susan Rice , Christopher Stevens, Libya , Trey Gowdy , Darrell Issa , Congress , House Republicans

Moussa Koussa.

That is the name of the “classified source” in an old email from Hillary Clinton released last week by Republicans purportedly investigating the 2012 attack on the American consulate in Benghazi, Libya. Under the instructions of the Benghazi committee’s chairman, Republican Representative Trey Gowdy of South Carolina, Koussa’s name was blacked-out on the publicly issued email, as Republicans proclaimed revealing his identity would compromise national security. The media ran with it, saying Clinton had sent classified information through her personal email account.

But the CIA never said the name was secret. Nor did the Defense Intelligence Agency or the FBI. No, Koussa’s role as an intelligence source is about as classified as this column. He is the former intelligence chief and foreign minister of Libya. In 2011, he fled that country for Great Britain, where he provided boodles of information to MI6 and the CIA. Documents released long ago show Koussa’s cooperation. Government officials have openly discussed it. His name appears in newspapers with casual discussions about his assistance. Sanctions by the British and the Americans against Koussa were lifted because of his help, and he moved to Qatar. All of that is publicly known.

But, as they have time and again, the Republicans on the Benghazi committee released deceitful information for what was undoubtedly part of a campaign—as Kevin McCarthy of the House Republican leadership has admitted—to drive down Clinton's poll numbers. Republicans have implied—and some journalists have flatly stated—that Clinton was reckless and may have broken the law by sending an email that included thirdhand hearsay mentioning Koussa's name. The reality is that the Republicans continue to be reckless with the truth.

The historical significance of this moment can hardly be overstated, and it seems many Republicans, Democrats and members of the media don't fully understand the magnitude of what is taking place. The awesome power of government—one that allows officials to pore through almost anything they demand and compel anyone to talk or suffer the shame of taking the Fifth Amendment—has been unleashed for purely political purposes. It is impossible to review what the Benghazi committee has done as anything other than taxpayer-funded political research of the opposing party's leading candidate for president. Comparisons from America's past are rare. Richard Nixon's attempts to use the IRS to investigate his perceived enemies comes to mind. So does Senator Joseph McCarthy's red-baiting during the 1950s, with reckless accusations of treason leveled at members of the State Department, military generals and even the secretary of the Army. But the modern McCarthys of the Benghazi committee cannot perform this political theater on their own—they depend on reporters to aid in the attempts to use government for the purpose of destroying others with bogus "scoops" ladled out by members of Congress and their staffs. These journalists will almost certainly join the legions of shamed reporters of the McCarthy era as it becomes increasingly clear they are enablers of an obscene attempt to undermine the electoral process.

The consequences, however, are worse than the manipulation of the electoral process. By using Benghazi for political advantage, the Republicans have communicated to global militants that, through even limited attacks involving relatively few casualties, they can potentially influence the direction of American elections. The Republicans sent that same message after the Boston Marathon bombing, where they condemned Obama for failing to—illegally—send the American perpetrators to Guantanamo, among other things.They slammed the president because federal law enforcement agents read the failed underwear bomber his rights after they arrested him in 2009. Never mind that federal agents did the exact same thing under President George W. Bush when they arrested the failed shoe bomber years earlier. Republicans even lambasted Obama when he spoke about ISIS decapitating journalists, saying the president did not sound angry enough.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Richard Reid, left, was arrested in 2001 for attempting to use a bomb in his shoe to blow up a plane, authorizes arrested him, read him his rights and convicted him after a trial in Boston. However, when "underwear bomber" Umar Farouk Abdulmutallab was arrested Republicans cried foul, angered that he was read his rights, and accused President Obama of being weak on terrorism. REUTERS

But there is an enormous difference between politicizing tragedy and using the levers of government to achieve that goal. Put simply, the transformation of the Benghazi attacks into a political drama now serves as one of the most dangerous precedents in American history, one whose absurdity and irrationality can be seen just by reviewing the past. This single Benghazi committee has been “investigating” the attack for longer than Congress conducted inquiries into Pearl Harbor, 9/11, Iran-Contra, Watergate and intelligence failures in Iraq.

Worse still, Congress convened 22 hearings about the 9/11 attack that killed almost 3,000 citizens working in the World Trade Center in downtown Manhattan; this week, Congress will be holding its 21st hearing about an attack that killed four people working in Libya, with many more sessions left to come. Do Republicans actually think that terrorists killing four agents of the government who willingly assumed the risks of residing in one of the most dangerous places in the world is more important than terrorists murdering 3,000 unsuspecting civilians who were working at their offices in New York City?

In fact, no previous assault on a diplomatic outpost has received this kind of relentless expression of congressional outrage. There weren’t investigations that were anything on this scale about the attack on the U.S. Embassy in Beirut in 1983 (63 killed), on the U.S. Embassy annex northeast of Beirut in 1984 (24 killed) or on the U.S. Embassy in Sanaa, Yemen, in 2008 (18 killed). Republicans didn’t believe these exact same scenarios that took place under Republican presidents merited similar zeal to dig down to some unexposed, imaginary “truth.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The damaged U.S. Special Mission after it was attacked in Benghazi, Libya, on Sept. 11, 2012. FBI

In fact, Benghazi was just one of 21 major assaults on an American diplomatic facility in the last 20 years; the personnel murdered there were among about 90 other Americans hired by the government to work in diplomatic outposts who were killed in terrorist attacks from 1998 through 2012, according to a State Department report. Apparently, their killings—like the deaths of thousands of Americans at Pearl Harbor and in the World Trade Center—were seen as less important than murder of four people in a North African country in the midst of a government overthrow.

'Anybody but Hillary'

One important point has been universally acknowledged by the nine previous reports about Benghazi: The attack was almost certainly preventable. Clinton was in charge of the State Department, and it failed to protect U.S. personnel at an American consulate in Libya. If the GOP wants to raise that as a talking point against her, it is legitimate.

The earlier reports—two from the Senate, one from an independent board and six from the Republican-controlled House—were released before the 2014 election; after that, the House voted to form a special Benghazi committee, with the expectation that it would drag out its work until shortly before the 2016 election—four years after the armed assault took place. Despite all the work that has already been done investigating the attacks, the Benghazi committee has demonstrated that its members either have not read the reports or do not care about the conclusions they reached. Its members ask questions of witnesses that have already been answered—again and again. In fact, some of the questions that Republicans say have yet to be addressed have answers that are so well known they already appear on the Wikipedia page about the Benghazi attacks, sourced to the previous government reports.

Despite the repeated claims by Gowdy that he is objective, the conclusions he will reach are already clear; he publicly stated them before the committee was formed in May 2014. In November 2012, Gowdy released a statement proclaiming as fact that the Obama administration "intentionally misled the American people" about the Benghazi attack. About a year later, in September 2013, he put out another press release in reference to Benghazi, stating, "If you can't trust the information your government is giving you, how can you trust your government on any issue?" Eight months afterward, he was appointed to run the Benghazi committee, and in apparent disregard of his previous publicly issued conclusions, announced, "My goal is to conduct an inquiry that is rooted in fairness."

But to fully understand how political this latest Benghazi investigation has become, look at the records. Since March, the committee has issued almost 30 press releases related to Clinton; only five have been put out on every other topic combined. Then there is the committee's interim report from this past May. The word Obama—who cannot run for commander-in-chief again—is not mentioned. Neither is the word president. Or Ansar al-Sharia, the group suspected of engineering the attack. White House makes only 13 appearances. Imagine an investigation on 9/11 that did not mention Al-Qaeda, Osama bin Laden or President Bush; that is what has been done with the Benghazi committee's first public report.

It gets worse. The name Ahmed Abu Khatalla, the man arrested as the mastermind of the attack, shows up once. The word "terrorist" appears only 10 times. As for references to Clinton, the leading candidate for the Democratic nomination? Those show up 36 times in just 13 pages, an astonishing number given that the word "Benghazi" only appears 38 times. But the winner for the most mentions are the 39 references to emails from Clinton and the State Department. Clinton and her emails are referenced 49 percent more than the location where the attack took place and 197 percent more than the word terrorist.

This rampant politicization of the Benghazi tragedy has delighted Republican voters in an offensive and inappropriate way, given that the issue is about the murder of Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens and the three other brave Americans killed in Benghazi. At a recent GOP rally I attended, a speaker declared herself to be "Benghazi truth-seeking" in the same sentence in which she referenced gun rights, abortion, illegal immigration and other top conservative political issues. Political lapel buttons for candidates were sold right alongside others referencing Benghazi.

Online stores for political merchandise have entire sections committed to Benghazi. The most common items: buttons. Those manufactured before the 2014 election had Obama's face or name alongside accusations of a cover-up while the new ones reference only Clinton. The latest political buttons contain phrases like "Anybody but Hillary Because Benghazi," and "Hillary 2016: Remember Benghazi?" One has a drawing of devil-horned Clinton with the words "The Beast of Benghazi" emblazoned underneath. Other are simply ghoulish, with dripping blood and grave sites. (Benghazi buttons sold before the 2014 election frequently used the symbol of the Obama campaign with pools of blood pouring out; now the blood is shown on Clinton.) I couldn't find any that criticize the terrorists who murdered Americans; I found only two in memory of the fallen. Then there are the bumper stickers calling Clinton "The Butcher of Benghazi," or saying "People Died, Hillary Lied," "Benghazi: Hillary's Only Accomplishment," "Hanoi Jane, Benghazi Hillary" and other phrases.

Demonstrators protest the Obama administration's handling of the Benghazi attack on the University of Cincinnati campus in Cincinnati, Ohio on November 4, 2012. The politicization of the Benghazi tragedy, initiated by several Republican lawmakers, has made its way to voters; political buttons and other merchandise related to the tragedy blame Hillary Clinton for her actions in the wake of the attacks, and echo criticisms made by her opponents as she campaigns in advance of the 2016 presidential election, nearly four years after the Benghazi attacks. CHIP SOMODEVILLA/GETTY

Nothing like this happened after 9/11. Yes, there were scores of buttons and bumper stickers with words on them like “We Will Never Forget” and “America Salutes Its Fallen Heroes.” These were intended to unify the country and honor those who had died; in a widespread search, I could find none showing the blood of the murdered splattered on anyone in the Bush administration.

The Republicans’ unseemly delight in Benghazi has even spread to political fundraising. There is the Stop Hillary PAC, which broadcast an ad about Clinton and Benghazi. The Virginia GOP held a “Beyond Benghazi” fundraiser where donors had to pay $75 to attend and $5,000 to sponsor the event. A blog post before the 2014 election by the National Republican Senate Committee stated, "Americans deserve the truth about Benghazi, and it's clear Democrats will not give it to them. Donate today and elect a Republican Senate majority."

But by far the most egregious examples of Republicans trying to raise money on the backs of the dead was by the National Republican Congressional Committee, the official GOP group that works to elect Republicans to the House. In a blog post on its fundraising website, the NRCC told supporters, “House Republicans will make sure that no one will get away from Gowdy and the Select Committee.’’ The NRCC also sent out an email that contained a link that led to part of the NRCC’s site with a URL that ended with the words “Benghazicoverup-contribute.” That page directly sought money for the committee’s political efforts under the words “You’re now a Benghazi Watchdog. Let’s go after Obama and Hillary Clinton.” Beneath that, and directly next to the suggested contribution levels, was a photograph of Clinton and Obama surrounded by the sentences “Benghazi Was a Coverup. Demand Answers.”

Secrets, Lies and Sidney Blumenthal

Trey Gowdy was demanding answers: What is the definition of unsolicited?

At a hearing in June, the Benghazi committee‘s questioning of Sidney Blumenthal, a longtime associate of Hillary Clinton, had dragged on for hours. Republicans had yet to ask him a single question about the attack or anything related to it, although as the Democrats on the committee established quickly that morning, Blumenthal had never been to Libya and knew nothing about the assault. In fact, more than eight hours would pass in the hearing before a Republican asked anything about Benghazi.

Clinton adviser

Sidney Blumenthal arrives at the U.S. Capitol as a witness during the Benghazi hearings, June 16, 2015. Republicans on the committee would later tell the press Blumenthal was at the center of a conspiracy to start a war in Lybia and had been there the day of the attack; both were untrue statements. BILL CLARK/CQ ROLL CALL/AP

They did, however, spend an enormous amount of time on Blumenthal's outside work and email communications with Hillary Clinton. According to people who have seen the transcript of the hearing—which the Republicans have refused to release—Gowdy's opening inquiries were off-topic, bizarre and totally political. He asked Blumenthal many questions about a series of articles posted on Media Matters, a liberal website, that proved embarrassing to his friend, Republican Representative Jason Chaffetz of Utah. One post said Chaffetz had attacked Clinton and Obama about Benghazi although he had voted to cut funding to the State Department for security at diplomatic outposts. Gowdy asked Blumenthal if he wrote the articles, commissioned them, edited them or read them. He inquired about his relationship to Media Matters, Democratic political commentators and organizations connected to the Democratic Party.

Eventually, Gowdy's questions turned to emails that Blumenthal had sent to Clinton. The former secretary of state had said publicly that they were unsolicited emails from an old friend. In question after question, Gowdy grilled Blumenthal about the definition of unsolicited. The meaning of the word, Gowdy proclaimed, was "unwanted"—yet Clinton had clearly made statements in her emails that she appreciated Blumenthal's input. The congressman persisted with his incorrect definition to prove Clinton lied about a topic unrelated to Benghazi until Blumenthal's lawyer suggested looking up unsolicited in the dictionary (it means "not requested," as the Democrats later pointed out). Gowdy immediately moved on to another topic unrelated to the Benghazi attack.

The hearing was littered with other irrelevant questions. Gowdy and his staff asked Blumenthal more than 50 questions about the Clinton Foundation, the charitable organization established by Bill Clinton and where Blumenthal had worked. Republicans also asked more than 45 questions about David Brock, who operates Media Matters and other related groups, and over 160 questions about Blumenthal's relationship and contacts with the Clintons.

Nine hours of questioning achieved nothing in advancing the investigation into the Libyan terrorist attack, since Blumenthal had no firsthand knowledge related to Benghazi; the closest he had come to providing information to Clinton about the area was by forwarding a report written by Tyler Drumheller, a long-retired CIA officer who had been head of the European division for clandestine operations.

Chairman Jason Chaffetz, left, speaks with Rep. Trey Gowdy during a House Committee hearing on federal funding for Planned Parenthood, September 29, 2015. During his questioning of a former Clinton advisory during the Benghazi investigation, Gowdy spent hours off-topic asking the witness if he was involved in negative comments in articles about Chaffetz, leading some to wonder if Gowdy was more interested in finding a cause for the attack in Benghazi or defending Republican allies. TOM WILLIAMS/CQ ROLL CALL/GETTY

So what was Blumenthal doing in front of the committee? A former White House aide to President Clinton, he had not been in government for more than 14 years. Blumenthal also had plenty of contacts from his years as a journalist—including Drumheller, whom he had mentioned in a few stories for Salon. He was a friend of Hillary Clinton and—like scores of civilians and former government officials before him—he provided information he believed to be important to the former secretary, who then passed any of it she considered worthwhile to her staff for review. Henry Kissinger, former secretary of state under Richard Nixon, played the same role for the Bush administration in the lead-up to the Iraq War. Robert Murphy, a former American diplomat, provided similar information to Kissinger during his years with Nixon. In fact, Nixon himself frequently reached out to then-President Bill Clinton to offer analysis and information. Former journalist and think tank veteran Michael Ledeen has funneled his thoughts and details of things he had learned to numerous Republican administrations and brokered introductions with people overseas. A conservative think tank scholar used his contacts to set up a meeting between senior Pentagon officials with the Bush administration and two former member of the Iranian government in December 2001. One White House official with the Bush administration even reached out to me in 2002 for information about Osama bin Laden's financial network. (As a journalist, I was required to decline the request.)

In other words, there was nothing unusual about someone like Blumenthal directing his analysis and information to Hillary Clinton. Had the secretary instructed Blumenthal to stop providing potentially valuable intelligence, it would have been not only likely unprecedented but also bordering on incompetence.

The only point in subpoenaing Blumenthal to testify was for the Republicans to traffic in Benghazi-related conspiracy theories, including one explicitly stated on Sunday by a member of the Benghazi committee, Representative Mike Pompeo of Kansas. In an appearance on Meet the Press, he said Clinton had "relied on Mr. Blumenthal for most of her intelligence" on Libya. Gowdy, in a letter he made public on October 8, made the same statement

Think about that for a moment. Either Pompeo and Gowdy were being completely disingenuous, or irrationally believe that Clinton (who was cleared to review any classified intelligence developed by the State Department, the CIA and other agencies throughout government) instead decided to make decisions based primarily on information from a man who had never been to Libya.

Andrea Mitchell, NBC's longtime diplomatic correspondent who hosted the program, responded quickly to Pompeo's assertion. "That is factually not correct," she told Pompeo. "No, it is absolutely factually correct," Pompeo responded.

"Relied on Mr. Blumenthal for most of her intelligence?" Mitchell repeated. "I cover the State Department. That is just factually not correct, and I've been as tough on this issue as anyone."

But that was not the only fantastical conspiracy theory about Blumenthal. In the October 8 letter, Gowdy claims that Blumenthal was a primary driver for the establishment of a no-fly zone over Libya based on an email he sent to Clinton in February 2011, more than a year and a half before the Benghazi attack. Gowdy fails to mention a relevant fact: This was hardly Blumenthal's idea. Diplomats who had defected from the tyrannical government of Muammar el-Qaddafi, then the Libyan leader, were calling on the United Nations to impose a no-fly zone. So had Libya's ambassador to the U.N. Britain and France were already drafting a resolution to put in place a restricted area where aircraft would be forbidden to fly. Within days, Republican Senator John McCain announced his support for the idea, and Mitch McConnell, the Senate Republican leader, said it was worth considering. But in the world of the Benghazi committee, none of these voices—major Western governments allied with the United States, the analysis of ambassadors and Libyan government exiles, and the input of American senators—were as important in making a such critical decision as an email from Blumenthal.

After ignoring the history of the no-fly zone debate, Gowdy then makes the most incredible accusation of all: that Blumenthal was using his (imaginary) role as Clinton puppet master to impose a no-fly zone so that he could make money. In the October 8 letter, Gowdy wrote that Blumenthal was pushing for war in Libya to profit from his financial stake in a company called Osprey Global Solutions. At the time, Osprey was attempting to arrange a contract to provide humanitarian assistance including housing, medical clinics and schools in five sites.

But once again, Gowdy's assertions are false. David Grange, a retired Army major general who is president and chief executive of Osprey, says Blumenthal had no stake in his company at all. In fact, Grange says he has met Blumenthal only once, for no more than 15 minutes. While Blumenthal may have played a small role brokering efforts by a third party consultant to facilitate the humanitarian assistance project, he had no contract to obtain any money, according to an executive from another corporation involved in the proposed deal. While there may have been an unpromised possibility that Blumenthal could have obtained a finder's fee, this executive says, nothing was ever paid to anyone. In the end, Grange says, Osprey "didn't make a dime" from its efforts, in large part because the situation in Libya was so chaotic; it was impossible to determine who had the authority to sign an agreement.

Ever since Blumenthal gave his testimony, he, his lawyer and Democratic members of the committee have been demanding that the transcript be made public. That document would reveal the sham of the committee, the fact that Republicans cared more about articles in Media Matters than about the Benghazi attack. It would, according to people who have seen it, prove critically embarrassing. An agreement was reached to have a vote on releasing the transcript at the next business meeting of the committee. But Gowdy canceled the meeting. More than 100 days have passed; no business meetings that would allow for the testimony to be released have been scheduled or held.

Manipulating the Press

The Benghazi committee's secrets go well beyond what Blumenthal had to say. Unlike almost every congressional committee investigation in history, the Republican congressman has insisted that much of the relevant questioning be conducted behind closed doors. Even when directors of the CIA appear before Congress, unclassified portions of the statements and questioning occur in public, while classified information is delivered in private.

Rep. Trey Gowdy is surrounded by media as he leaves the House Republican Conference meeting in the basement of the U.S. Capitol on Friday Oct. 9, 2015. Gowdy has accused other reports on Benghazi of being biased or inconclusive—two from the Senate, one from an independent board, and six from the Republican-controlled House—maintaining there is need for yet another report. BILL CLARK/CQ ROLL CALL/GETTY

The secrecy is all the more incomprehensible given the subject matter. The committee has called previous investigations incomplete. It even suggested that the original review by an independent Accountability Review Board was rushed and tainted. The board was co-chaired by Thomas Pickering, who served in high posts under both Democratic and Republican presidents, and was selected by President George H.W. Bush as his administration's ambassador to the United Nations. His fellow chair was retired Admiral Michael Mullen, who was named as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff by President George W. Bush. The board came up with innumerable recommendations on changes that should be put in place to better protect American diplomats. The State Department rapidly adopted them.

But if the members of the Benghazi committee truly believe that the findings of the review board were inadequate, shouldn't whatever information they obtain be made public as fast as possible? Taking the Republicans at their word, why are they willing to leave diplomatic personnel potentially in grave danger by hiding whatever flaws they discover in the protection protocols?

Unless, of course, they are not pursuing issues that could lead to better protection for diplomats. Indeed, by keeping testimony secret, Gowdy, a former prosecutor, either does not care about keeping diplomats safe or considers the Benghazi committee to serve the same role as a grand jury. He refuses requests by witnesses to testify in public or to release transcripts of the questioning, suggesting that—just like in a criminal case—he does not want those who have been compelled to appear before the committee to coordinate their answers based on what they hear. The explanation is utter nonsense; unlike a prosecutor with a grand jury, the committee can neither instruct nor even request that witnesses don't speak with one another about their testimony. Even lawyers for witnesses have the right to share information about what the committee asked and what the answers were. And, of course, there is no problem with discussing classified information; that can be delivered in closed session.

However, while Gowdy has intoned that certain information was going to be treated "as if it was classified," he is making that designation himself, with no authority to do so since classification is handled by the executive branch, not Congress. Staff members of the committee who do not have security clearance attended testimony that involved such supposedly top-secret information. The government did not authorize even the transcriber of the testimony to hear classified information.

What possible reason, then, could the committee have for playing hide the ball with the testimony? Two possibilities come to mind. After the first public hearing, which was a serious and sober affair, Gowdy and the Republicans were derided by conservative zealots for failing to demand answers about every right-wing conspiracy theory or engage in the political theater of rage. "They have been beating the drums about this, and polls have shown that Americans want answers about this!" Harris Faulkner of Fox News intoned after the hearing. "I was shocked there was so little passion."

The other reason to keep the testimony secret has rapidly become clear: so that they can selectively—and often incorrectly—portray to reporters what was said in the statements. For example, prior to the committee's interview with Cheryl

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mills, Clinton's chief of staff asked to testify in public out of concern that the Republicans would leak and misrepresent details of what she said. Her request was denied, and the committee made one of its proclamations about treating the unclassified information as classified.

Yet shortly after Mills's nine hours of questioning ended, one committee member, Representative Lynn Westmoreland of Georgia, rushed to the studios of Fox News to discuss what Mills had to say. Politico published a report sourced to Republicans saying that the committee had been stunned to learn that Mills had reviewed the Accountability Review Board report by Pickering and Mullen, saying that it was "raising alarms on the right" that the independent investigation had been compromised.

These sources were either lying or woefully ignorant, not only of how government works but also of the previous information already made public. Almost all government reports—including ones as secret as independent inquiries of operational divisions in the CIA—are circulated among the relevant officials seeking comments and for help to determine any errors.

Worse still, this supposedly shocking information had been public for more than two years. In a June 4, 2013, sworn statement in another Benghazi investigation conducted by another GOP-led committee, Pickering stated that the review board had submitted an advanced copy of the report to confirm "the accuracy and the focus of our recommendations." He also stated that the review board considered some of Mills's input, adding that neither she nor Clinton had the right to edit the document, nor did they try to influence the outcome.

Pickering was not the only one to make this statement. In September 2013—again, two years before the supposedly shocking revelations in Mills's statements to the Benghazi committee—the inspector general for the State Department issued a report stating that the members of the review board had limited their contact with senior officials in the department and that they all unanimously agreed there was no attempt "to impede, influence, or interfere with their work at any time or on any level."

No matter. A new bogus script had been written and was trumpeted by the press. The Benghazi committee had discovered a deep, dark secret. In the eyes of Republicans, the review board's findings could be dismissed out of hand as corrupt.

Other false stories repeatedly found their way into the press. There was the "criminal investigation of Hillary Clinton" article that appeared in The New York Times; once the story was knocked down, the Times sheepishly acknowledged its sources included officials from Congress. (The "Clinton is under criminal investigation" story has continued; she's not.) The Daily Beast falsely reported that Blumenthal testified he was in Libya on the day of the Benghazi attack.

Articles in other publications even falsely portrayed documents obtained by the committee. For example, on June 18, Politico ran an article stating that, based on information obtained from "a source who has reviewed the email exchange" that Clinton and Blumenthal were sending emails back and forth to utilize Media Matters and the White House to neutralize criticism of her about Benghazi. But the representation to Politico was a lie: The quoted emails had nothing to do with each other, but were literally different discussions about different topics conducted days apart. The article also stated that the "sources" claimed that a particular Clinton email had never been produced by the State Department, in one of many suggestions of a cover-up. In truth, the email had been turned over by the department four months earlier. It is marked with identification numbers STATE-SCB0045548-SCB00450.

Just this week, more false statements by members of the committee that is supposed to be reserving its judgment until it hears the facts have been trotted out. Gowdy, Pompeo and Westmoreland all claimed on news shows in recent days that no previous committee had ever gained access to emails from Ambassador Stevens, one of the victims of attack Benghazi. "None of the seven previous committees bothered to access the emails of our ambassador," Gowdy said on Face the Nation. "How on earth could any of the other committees have completed their work properly without access to the senior person on the ground's emails?" Pompeo asked on Meet the Press. "We've just now gotten those emails,'' Westmoreland said. "Nobody else had requested them."

The statements were either a coordinated attempt to mislead or a universal display of ignorance. An array of emails from Stevens had been produced years ago to congressional committees investigating the Benghazi attack, including a number that expressed the ambassador's concern about the security situation for the diplomats in Libya and the violence there. The same emails were produced to the Benghazi committee on November 24 and December 9 of last year. Perhaps the State Department found additional emails. That would be likely given the millions of documents that have been demanded from the agency by the various congressional committees, all of which must be reviewed before release.

The emails are part of a broader pattern by the committee's Republicans, who have repeatedly claimed that old information is new. On October 7, Gowdy stated that the committee had questioned 50 witnesses who had never been interviewed before. That statement, like so many others, was false. Committee records show that there are only transcripts of 54 people have been interviewed or provided sworn statements. Of those, the Pickering-Mullen review board from three years ago already interviewed 23 of them. Of the remaining 31, the majority included State Department employees, current and former campaign officials, press officers, employees involved in information technology and an array of others who could not be expected to know a thing about the Benghazi attack.

But more important is who has not been interviewed. The committee has never asked a single question of the Secretary of Defense. In fact, no one from the Pentagon has testified in any hearings, and only four members of the department have been questioned at all.

The Truth About Clinton's Emails

Since March, the Benghazi committee has delved into another topic with almost zero relevance to the attack: Clinton's use of a private email system. Emails that have been produced have done nothing to refute the conclusions by all of the other government investigations of the attack. Indeed, if the Benghazi committee truly believes that the private email issue is of such importance, it needs to pass the issue to another congressional committee for investigation so that the inquiry into the terrorist attack can resume.

The email set-up for Clinton—who is widely known as technologically incompetent—has been criticized as a mistake, including by Obama and the former secretary herself. But it has been repeatedly misrepresented, not only by the committee but also in the press.

For example, the committee's interim report from May included the false—and clearly political statement—describing Clinton's use of a personal account as “the former secretary of state’s unusual email arrangement with herself.” No, this was an arrangement made with the State Department allowed under the rules listed in the Federal Register, which is why Colin Powell had the exact same set-up when he was secretary of state under former President George W. Bush. While that doesn’t mean the approach is wise, it’s hardly unusual given that a Republican who held Clinton’s job did it too.

Senior White House staffers and presidential advisers did the same thing during the Bush Administration; at least 88 officials—including the White House Chief of Staff and Karl Rove, the president’s senior advisor—used personal emails to conduct official business over a private internet domain called gwb43.com , which was maintained on a server at the Republican National Committee. More than 22 million of those emails were deleted.

As for Clinton, her first use of the personal email account for work purposes while serving as Secretary of State occurred on March 18, 2009. Before that date, she continued to utilize her Senate email address. According to current government officials, State Department experts briefed Clinton about the requirements for record preservation under the law; no evidence has yet been produced to suggest that she violated those rules. From March 18, 2009 until she left the department on February 1, 2013, government records show she sent 62,320 emails, including 30,490 that were designated as work emails. Of those, more than 90 percent were preserved on servers maintained by the federal government because Clinton sent them to accounts ending with “.gov.”

This was not, however, the only email address Clinton used. The State Department maintains a separate, closed system for classified information. With the exception of one email with a member of the British government, none of Clinton’s communications with foreign officials went through her personal email account.

Hillary Clinton has been at the center of a firestorm over the use of a private server for e-mails but she wasn't the first; Colin Powel also used a private e-mail server while working for the Bush administration, as did Karl Rove who deleted some 20,000 e-mails from public record from his account. JONATHAN ERNST/REUTERS

By comparison, Clinton’s use of her personal email was more limited than Powell’s. In his book, It Worked For Me, he wrote that he used a personal email account set up on a laptop to exchange information not only with his principal assistants and ambassadors, but also with foreign ministers overseas. Like Clinton, he used a second email account for classified information. Powell has also said he did not preserve any of the emails from his personal account from the time, either by printing them or saving them on a storage device. None of this is to suggest that Powell did anything wrong. It does, however, raise a question Republicans have yet to answer: Why is Clinton’s use of private emails a controversy, much less a scandal, if Powell’s was proper?

Critics also rage that Clinton’s emails on the non-classified personal system were not secure. Yet no one ever points out that hackers have proven the State Department’s non-classified system that she otherwise could have been using to be one of the more insecure systems in government. In 2006, unknown foreign intruders hacked into the State Department system and downloaded terabytes of information, including emails and attached documents. This year, Russian hackers gained access to

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

State's unclassified email system despite repeated efforts by American government experts to lock them out. The hackers used the State Department system as a "backdoor" to crack into the White House's unclassified system, which allowed them to obtain documents like Obama's non-public schedule. So if Clinton had used the State Department's unclassified system for the emails she sent from her personal account, they almost certainly would now be in the hands of Russian hackers.

But government records show that no hacker has been found to have gained access to Clinton's private server, something that is far easier to determine given the limited number of accounts it holds and the comparative ease of running security analytics through such a small system. Nor was there any other form of unauthorized intrusion into the email and no one else had access to the account itself. In fact, after Clinton left government, multiple hackers tried to break into the system, but failed. The server was located at Clinton's home, which is guarded by the Secret Service. Numerous security consultants, IT specialists and government experts put systems in place to prevent breaches; those systems were continuously updated to account for new spyware, malware, viruses and related hacking techniques.

Finally, despite the relentless yet failed effort to locate information sent through Clinton's email system that was deemed classified at the time, one major point has been overlooked: The Secretary of State had the power to declassify any department document she chose. Every modern president has issued rules regarding the authority to classify and declassify documents. During the Bush Administration, for example, Vice President Dick Cheney held that authority, so he often decided on his own to declassify documents that his office then provided to members of Congress and the press.

The finalized public version of the rules under Obama were issued on December 29, 2009 through a document called "Executive Order 13526-Classified National Security Information." Through that order, a senior official with the authority to deem a document in an agency or department as classified also had the power to declassify it. So the question is moot. Clinton could take a classified State Department document, declare it unclassified and send it to whomever she chose. Of course, that would not apply to classified information she received from say, the CIA—but remember, if an intelligence organization deemed the material to be secret, it would have been sent to Clinton through the closed system at the State Department and not to her personal email.

Then comes the controversy about Clinton erasing emails. The words sound terrible, but the reality is not. Think of it like this: before there were emails, government employees had work documents and personal documents. Both might be kept at home or at the office. Work documents needed to be preserved and often were stored in the national archives. Even in the event that someone filed a Freedom of Information Act request or Congress issued a subpoena, no one had to turn over every piece of paper, whether personal or not. The Federal Records Act places the responsibility of determining which documents are official and which are personal on the government official whose records they belong to. A government official must retain or turn over all work records, but has every right to take boxes of personal, private material and throw it out.The same holds true for emails.

The State Department delivered the first request for emails was delivered by the State Department on October 28, 2014 to several previous Secretaries, including Clinton; this was done as part of an effort by the agency to update its record keeping to stay in compliance with federal requirements. Powell, as he publicly stated, had none to provide because they had all been deleted. Clinton instructed her lawyers at Williams & Connolly to review all of the emails on her behalf to determine which were work related and which were not.

Multiple methods were used. First, a computerized search was conducted of every email sent to an account ending with ".gov," which would include all of the documents sent to every official government email. That found 27,500 emails, all of which were already preserved in federal systems. Then, another search was conducted using the first and last names of more than 100 officials with the State Department and others in the government. Next, manual reviews were performed in case there were unrecognized email addresses or typographical errors that would have prevented those documents from being located. In addition, the lawyers searched for a number of other specific terms, including the words "Benghazi" and "Libya." These last three steps located more than 2,900 other emails. Printouts of the 30,490 emails were then provided to the State Department. Some critics have suggested there was something untoward about the fact Clinton sent paper records. But that is the procedure that is required by the State Department in a document called the Foreign Affairs Manual.

Once all of the reviews were completed, Clinton deleted all of the remaining emails deemed to be unrelated to her work. While at first that struck me as foolish, it is now clear it was necessary. The committee, which has leaked misleading information and publicly accused Clinton of wrongdoing, was demanding access to the server so it could decide, contrary to the requirements of law, which documents should be produced. It's safe to assume that every personal, private detail of Clinton's life that might have been captured in her emails would immediately appear as "scoops" in the morning newspaper or discussed by committee members on national television.

Of course, in a world of wild Republican irrationality, suspicions exist that some of the work emails that didn't go to other government officials or into government systems might have been intentionally destroyed. But the question is, why? Why would some of Washington's most prominent lawyers take a risk that could ultimately result in disbarment by intentionally hiding work-related emails that might turn up anywhere—in the accounts of recipients, or in the accounts of people who received copies from the recipient, or even in the hands of an unknown hacker? The idea if far-fetched. But it is that kind of lunacy that has pushed the Benghazi investigation forward for so many years.

A Collapse Into Fantasy

Conspiracy theories have become a driving force in Washington, and the Benghazi investigation is no exception. What started as a legitimate, important inquiry into the circumstances and failures that led to the tragic deaths of four Americans has transmogrified into a tale of secret plots and treachery in which malicious officials manipulate the government and act as virtual co-conspirators with the terrorists who murdered their colleagues.

Protesters destroy an American flag pulled down from the U.S. embassy in Cairo September 11, 2012. Egyptian protesters scaled the walls of the U.S. embassy, tore down the American flag and burned it during a protest over a film being produced in the United States that insulted Prophet Mohammad. The protest outside the Cairo embassy occurred within hours of the attacks in Benghazi. MOHAMED ABD EL GHANY/REUTERS

This is emblematic of a phenomenon that the historian Richard Hofstadter called “the paranoid style of American politics.” As Hofstadter said in a speech at Oxford University in November 1963, “We are all sufferers from history, but the paranoid is a double sufferer, since he is afflicted not only by the real world with the rest of us, but by his fantasies as well.” Proponents of a vast Benghazi conspiracy approach the topic with absolute certainty that something sinister took place in Washington that involved far more than a bureaucratic failure to utilize the correct procedures for protecting diplomats. Policy blunders are boring; tales of conniving and evil are the stuff to engender fevered passions.

The collapse into fantasy began on the day of the Benghazi attack, but not because of the events in Libya. Many of the Benghazi-obsessed seem unaware that the chaos at that consulate was occurring across the Muslim World. The first protest exploded outside of the American Embassy in Cairo. There, Muslim protesters overran the embassy perimeter fences and stormed the compound in what CNN described at the time as “an all out assault.” They were driven, protesters said, by anger about a video posted on the Internet that they believed insulted the Prophet Mohammed. Then, angry Muslims gathered outside of the Benghazi mission and soon the attack erupted. Before those two crises played out, protests started at the American Embassy in Tunis which the participants attributed to the same Internet video. As the protesters made their way to the embassy’s perimeter walls, the police stopped them. With angry Egyptians still roaming the Cairo compound and the Benghazi consulate smoldering from arson, the next demonstration began, as protesters stormed the compound of the American Embassy in Sana’a, Yemen where they began looting and setting fires.

In other words, what the modern critics either do not realize or consider is that the American government was facing chaos in multiple diplomatic facilities around the Middle East and North Africa. Even as terrorists were attacking in Benghazi, angry Muslims who also might launch a terrorist strike were roaming the grounds of the Cairo Embassy, as they would for days to come. As each crisis calmed, another erupted.

On the day of the attacks, according to government records and testimony before other committees conducting investigations, Clinton learned of the Benghazi assault at 4:05pm. Forty-nine minutes later, a cable arrived at the State Department saying that the shooting had stopped and the compound had been cleared.

In the hours that followed, Clinton spoke with Obama, the National Security Advisor, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the director of the CIA and scores of others. At 6:41pm, she called the President of the Libyan General National Congress seeking his help. During the eight minute call, Clinton asked for the Libyan government to provide additional firefighters and security personnel to the Benghazi mission as well as guards to the U.S. diplomatic facility in Tripoli. Another eight minutes passed and she called deputy chief of mission at the American Embassy in Tripoli for an update and to reach out to any sources he had in the Libyan government to seek more assistance. . Six minutes later, she was on a conference call with eight other U.S. government officials. At 7:45pm, she joined a Secure Video Tele-Conference with senior officials with the White House, the Department of Defense and the intelligence agencies. Then she called Obama to consult with him and keep him updated on developments. At almost midnight came new information that a safe house where American personnel had taken refuge was under attack.

Over at the Pentagon, officials had taken action rapidly after word of the attack arrived.. An operations officer with the United States Africa Command who was controlling an unarmed Predator drone flying over the Libyan city of Darnah was told to redirect it to Benghazi, about an hour away. After a meeting with the White House, Defense Secretary Leon Panetta ordered two Marine FAST platoons in Rota, Spain to prepare to deploy; one was going to Benghazi and the other to Tripoli. He also dispatched a special operations unit from the United States. Finally, a team of American military commandos training in Croatia were ordered to head to Benghazi. The group, called the Commander's In-extremis Force, was formed to rapidly handle unexpected emergencies; it was the only unit close to Benghazi with the skills necessary to conduct a rescue, kill the terrorists and avoid civilian deaths.. The group got as far as the Naval Air Station Sigonella in Sicily, Italy, placing them about an hour from Benghazi. But by that point, the assault in the Libyan city was over.

In the midst of all the bedlam came the first attempt to politicize the events of that day, although the Republicans were not yet focusing their attention on Benghazi. At that point, officials inside the Cairo Embassy were working to calm the situation outside by communicating a message to the protestors that denounced the video, saying they opposed "continuing efforts by misguided individuals to hurt the religious feelings of Muslims—as we condemn efforts to offend believers of all religions."

Almost immediately Mitt Romney, the Republican nominee for President, rushed to meet with reporters with such speed that his hair was in disarray so that he could attack the statements being issued by American diplomats in Egypt who were trying desperately to save their own lives. His message: "It's disgraceful that the Obama Administration's first response was not to condemn the attacks on our diplomatic missions, but to sympathize with those who waged the attacks.'

Former Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney leaves the podium after making comments on the killing of U.S. embassy officials in Benghazi in Jacksonville, Florida on September 12, 2012. Romney rushed to address the press following news of the attacks, drawing ire from both Republicans and Democrats at the time for inserting politics into the middle of an ongoing crisis, during his presidential campaign. CHARLES DHARAPAK/AP

Democrats and Republicans lambasted Romney for inserting politics into the middle of an ongoing international crisis. But the backlash against Romney's craven effort to capitalize on the circumstances did not end the Republican focus on the attacks on American diplomatic facilities. Given the embarrassment, Romney and other Republicans largely dropped talking about Cairo.

With the news that Ambassador Stevens and several others had been killed, the GOP turned their attention to that tragedy, while essentially ignoring what was happening in Tunis and Sana'a.

As occurs in most rapidly-moving crises, American intelligence officials were struggling to sift through conflicting information to determine what had really happened. (A similar struggle led the CIA to initially—and incorrectly—conclude, that the Islamist group Hezbollah was behind the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon on 9/11.) CIA analysts had written a report stating that the evidence suggested the Benghazi attack was a spontaneous one that grew out of the protests. After those intelligence officers headed home, a senior CIA editor with knowledge of the military, but not of Libya or the events in Benghazi added a sentence saying that the weaponry possessed by the attackers suggested it was a planned attack.

By that afternoon, Clinton had heard the same thing. Notes she received for a 4:30pm meeting said a terrorist group called Ansar Al-Sharia was responsible for the attack. The embassy in Tripoli reported that the assault appeared to be pre-planned. Later, Clinton spoke by phone with the Prime Minister of Egypt, telling him they knew the events in Benghazi had nothing to do with the controversial video.

Then, that intelligence began to fall apart. Ansar Al-Sharia disavowed any role in the attack and the American intelligence analysts who covered Libya, who had been complaining about the sentence added by the senior CIA editor, began assembling a thorough review that was fully coordinated between the relevant intelligence officers in multiple agencies. That report, titled "Extremists Capitalized on Benghazi Protests" and completed on September 13, stated, "We assess the attacks on Tuesday against the U.S. Consulate in Benghazi began spontaneously,'' and added, "the attacks began spontaneously following the protests at the U.S. embassy in Cairo." It also stated that extremists connected to Al-Qaeda were involved in the attacks, although there are no known operational connections between Ansar Al-Sharia and Al-Qaeda. The statement about Al-Qaeda would prove to be wrong.

The intelligence community assembled its information into talking points for Susan Rice, the American Ambassador to the United Nations, for her to use when speaking on Sunday morning talk shows. Her statements on September 16 lined up perfectly with the information provided by the intelligence agencies; a statement from the agencies would later be released attesting to that fact

Susan Rice, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, speaks during an appearance on "Meet The Press" in Washington on September 16, 2012. Rice's statements on September 16, drawn directly from U.S. government intelligence at the time, have come to form the basis of criticisms with the administration's handling of the tragedy. WILLIAM B. PLOWMAN/NBC/NBC NEWSWIRE/GETTY

"The currently available information suggests that the demonstrations in Benghazi were spontaneously inspired by the protests at the U.S. Embassy in Cairo and evolved into a direct assault against the U.S. diplomatic post in Benghazi and subsequently its annex,'' she said. "There are indications that extremists participated in the violent demonstrations."

Rice's statement—or, more accurately, a misrepresentation of Rice's statement—became the first and most important piece of the Republicans' Benghazi conspiracy theory. It is now an article of faith among many Republicans that Rice said the Benghazi attack was caused by the video, when in fact she said no such thing. Instead, she said that the then-current intelligence suggested that the video inspired the Cairo protests—which it did. The Cairo protests then inspired the Benghazi protests and the Benghazi protests led to the attack.

While Rice perfectly cited the intelligence as it then existed and never said the Benghazi attack was the result of the video, so what if she had? Republicans have attached themselves to their own form of bizarre political correctness that requires the word "terrorist" to be uttered, even when the intelligence is unclear, and that somehow this single word will change everything. Islamic extremists attacked an American embassy and murdered the Ambassador and other diplomats. The act of using violence to advance a political or religious cause is terrorism. The motives, methods, and operational allegiances of the perpetrators were still under investigation. It was pointless to say "terrorist" if no one could identify the group responsible. Did Republicans actually consider the American people so obtuse that Islamic extremists murdering United States officials was an act of terrorism?

But the spin had begun. The administration supposedly hadn't said the attackers were terrorists; Romney even made that point in a presidential campaign debate with Obama. But the president had said three times in the two days following the attack that it was "an act of terror." Romney persisted, as if "terrorist" was a magic word that would give all new meaning to the act of terror at Benghazi. Finally, in a statement that outraged conservatives—and was in fact inappropriate—the debate moderator, Candy Crowley of CNN, told Romney he was wrong.

By that time, many Republicans believed Romney was headed for a landslide victory; Fox News and other commentators throughout the conservative media bubble repeated the mantra time and again. They dismissed the scores of polls showing he would lose as biased. Finally, when the results came in with a decisive Obama victory, just as the polls predicted, many Republicans were stunned. Soon, a new conspiracy theory emerged: Obama had won the election because he had lied about Benghazi. What precisely the lie was remained unclear, although the imaginary statement by Rice saying the attack was caused by the video and Obama's refusal to immediately use the word "terrorist" rather than "act of terror" were frequently cited.

The Pickering-Mullen review board soon issued its findings and recommendations. It concluded that "systemic failures and leadership and management deficiencies" in two bureaus of the State Department resulted in inadequate security for Benghazi. However, it also found that the intelligence community had no warning of the attack. Although Congress was not named, the board also directed some of its criticism at the legislators. A constantly inadequate budget had led State Department officials to husband resources for the highest priorities; the Benghazi mission was not one of them. Staffing was transitory, and it was not designated with the status of a temporary residential facility. The consulate's future after 2012 was deeply uncertain and it was being neglected. The review board made recommendations, and the State Department adopted them.

In normal times, that would have been the end of any "scandal." But, with the Republicans feverish with conspiracy theories, Benghazi was not about to end. The false "Rice lied" story persisted, even as Republican-led Congressional committees concluded it was not true. In fact, in a report issued in 2014, the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence declared that, even by that time, it was impossible to state exactly what had happened. "Much of the early intelligence was conflicting and two years later, intelligence gaps remain," the report said. "To this day, significant intelligence gaps regarding the identities, affiliations and motivations of the attackers remain."

Hearing after hearing produced precious little new information, but each added more speculation to the growing blaze of Republican theories. Each was more illogical than the next.

The Chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, chaired by Rep. Darrell Issa (R-California) held numerous contentious hearings about Benghazi. But they developed little in terms of new information. With the mid-term elections coming, Issa tossed out in a conspiracy theory in February 2014 that not only had no factual basis, but contradicted itself.

"Why was there not one order given to turn on one Department of Defense asset?'' Issa asked the crowd. "I have my suspicions, which is Secretary Clinton told [Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta] to stand down, and we all heard about the stand down order for two military personnel. That order is undeniable."

No one ordered military assets to move, but Clinton gave an order to stand down. Of course, military assets were moved, but were unable to get any further than Italy before the Benghazi attack was complete. And there is no doubt that any State Department would be concerned about the procedures for having an American military force attack in a sovereign nation. But was there such an order? Contrary to Issa's statement, it is not only completely deniable, it has been denied by everyone involved, including all of the witnesses interviewed by the Benghazi committee.

Like so many other statements made by Republicans about Benghazi, it is wrong in every particular. Despite his investigation, Issa either lied or did not know of the multiple military orders that went out that night—diverting Predator drones, dispatching the Commander's In-Extremis Force from Croatia, sending a special operations unit from the United States and instructing Marine platoons from Spain to prepare for deployment. On the other hand, Issa's statement is literally true: Not one order was given to one Defense Department asset; that's because four were given to four assets.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Then came the conspiracy theory that Clinton herself had personally signed a cable denying a request for increased security at Benghazi. This one was advanced by the chairmen of five Republican House committees and Senator Rand Paul. But the Republicans who continue to traffic in this claim are either lying or almost criminally ignorant about the processes of government.

To make the claim, these politicians cite a cable that went out with Clinton's name on it in a pro-forma signature. This is standard procedure for every cable issued by the State Department in every administration. There are millions of cables with Clinton's name on them, with likely more than 1,000 generated each day throughout the State Department during her tenure, just as with every other Secretary of State. This fantasy or falsehood, which has been repeatedly denied by every witness interviewed and is directly contradicted by the Pickering-Mullen report, persists as true in Republican circles, and is often mentioned by GOP presidential candidates. A cable was issued rejecting the appeal for more security, but Clinton never saw it or signed it.

President Barack Obama and then Secretary of State Hillary Clinton deliver remarks during a transfer ceremony of the remains of Chris Stevens, U.S. Ambassador to Libya, and three other Americans killed in Benghazi at Andrews Air Force Base near Washington on September 14, 2012. JASON REED/REUTERS

Today, there are many bogus claims still advanced by Republicans, which the Benghazi committee continues to pursue. But the all-time classic—which again, has been adopted as an article of faith among many Republicans—is that Clinton and other senior government officials were using the Benghazi mission to transfer weapons from Libya to Turkey, or in another version of the tale, from Libya to Syria. No one advancing this fantasy ever explains how a Secretary of State could be directing an intelligence operation that would be handled by the CIA. However, this has been a favorite myth offered up by Senator Paul, who raised it both in a Senate hearing and in media interviews.

This theory, again, is completely false. In January 2014, Republican Members of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence issued a report that definitively shot it down.. The report read, "All CIA activities in Benghazi were legal and authorized. On-the-record testimony establishes that CIA was not sending weapons (including MANPADS) from Libya to Syria, or facilitating other organizations or states that were transferring weapons from Libya to Syria.'' No matter. Six months later, in a radio interview, Paul raised the allegation again, citing news reports that weapons were shipped from Libya to Syria.

Few noticed that 17 days after this renewed claim by Paul, the House Intelligence Committee adopted its final report, once again declaring the allegation to be nothing but a myth. The report read that, "Multiple media outlets have reported allegations about CIA collecting weapons in Benghazi and facilitating weapons from Libya to Syria. The eyewitness testimony and thousands of pages of CIA cables and emails that the Committee reviewed provide no support for this allegation."

Beyond Disgraceful

In the end, one thing is clear: This rabid partisanship or unmitigated deception or utter incompetence conflicts with everything this country stands for. Four men died serving their country; it is beyond disgraceful that their memories are used for cartoons and political buttons and television shows all for the purpose of advancing outright falsehoods just to gain political points. ,

In their refusal to read documents or accept facts over fantasies, Republican conspiracy theorists have damaged this country in ways that cannot yet be fully comprehended. No doubt, the terrorists set on attacking America are cheering them on..Nothing could delight some terrorist sitting in a Syrian or Libyan or Iraqi hovel while hearing a top Republican Congressman brag on television that a relatively small attack on a U.S.compound continues to threaten to transform a presidential election in the most powerful country in the world.

Ambassador Stevens and the three other men who died on that terrible day in Benghazi are not shiny objects to be dangled for political entertainment. They are American heroes. Serve their memories: Disband this inexcusable Benghazi committee, throw out the buttons and bumper stickers and fundraising letters. Allow the dead to finally rest in peace.

Amanda and Nikki,

Attached is the current draft of an op-ed on KXL and our overall energy infrastructure package and a detailed fact sheet on the latter. Remains to be seen whether the op-ed will be released before or after the President decides on the pipeline so it's been drafted both ways.

A few things to flag from the fact sheet that should help soften the blow to the Building Trades of the KXL decision:

1. National Infrastructure Bank – HRC mentioned this in her launch speech but it's called out more specifically here (positive for all the trades).

2. Modernizing our Pipeline System – A pledge to repair or replace thousands of miles of outdated pipeline by the end of her first term, through a new "Pipeline Partnership" that supports rate relief for states, cities and rural communities that accelerate replacement of outdated pipes (good for LiUNA and UA).

3. Increase Rail Safety – Accelerate the phase-out of outdated tank cars and repair track defects (will create jobs for affiliates with exposure on the tank car manufacturing and track repair fronts, though the Teamsters may be negative if they see it as slowing oil-by-rail volumes).

4. Enhance Grid Security - Provide new tools and resources to states, cities and rural communities to make the investments necessary to improve grid resilience to both cyber-attack and extreme weather events (positive for IBEW).

5. Expanding Consumer Choice: Offer financing tools for grid investments that support the integration of distributed energy resources and for gas pipeline investments that enable households and businesses to switch away from heating oil and other petroleum products (the trades won't love the distributed energy piece but the expanded natural gas pipeline network to enable replacement of old fuel oil furnaces with natural gas furnaces is positive for LiUNA, UA and the Boilermakers) .

6. Transmission Investment: Ensure the federal government is a partner in getting low-cost wind and other renewable energy to market through improved federal coordination and cooperation with local governments and power companies (positive for IBEW).

7. Transportation Funding: Work with Congress to close corporate tax loopholes and increase invest investment in transportation solutions that expand transit access and reduce congestion, commute times, oil consumption, and pollution (positive for IBEW, ironworkers and other public transit-exposed trades).

More broadly, we are calling for a North American Climate Compact that would provide a coordinate, continent-wide energy and climate framework so we don't have to keep battling it our pipeline-by-pipeline and can provides infrastructure investment certainty. That section of the factsheet includes the following line, which the trades should like:

Infrastructure Standards: Develop common, world-class standards for North American infrastructure that create good jobs and ensure energy transportation across the continent is clean, safe, reliable and affordable.

Happy to discuss this weekend if you'd like. I'm at 917-755-5446 .

Best,

Trevor

The Building Trades are flagging for me that they hear the Obama Administration will deny KXL on Monday. I just wanted to try to politically get ahead of this and where we are on the issue if this in fact happens. The trades are also hearing that HRC will put out a statement stating that she encouraged Obama to take this position. Politically with the building trades, this would be a very dangerous posture. Just curious what your thoughts will be if the situation goes this way on Monday.

Appreciate it.

Hopes Fading for Iran Deal by Tuesday Deadline

Hopes of a nuclear deal between Iran and the world powers by Tuesday's deadline faded on Monday, with the consensus being that an agreement will only be reached by week's end. This feeling emerged when the Iranian delegation talked of a possible extension being required to conclude talks beyond Tuesday's deadline. An Iranian diplomat who briefed Western correspondents said, "We are not committed to any deadline," and urged the West to "make decisions." The Iranian statements are, in effect, a mirror image of the messages of U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry on Sunday, when he said Iran and the world powers "are not yet where we need to be on several of the most difficult issues."

Iran Deal set to Make Revolutionary Guards Richer

Iran's elite Revolutionary Guards have done very well out of international sanctions - and if a nuclear deal is done in Vienna this week under which those sanctions are lifted, they are likely to do better still. The Revolutionary Guards Corps is more than just a military force. It is also an industrial empire with political clout that has grown exponentially in the last decade. A Western diplomat who follows Iran closely told Reuters that the IRGC's recent annual turnover from all of its business activities was estimated to be around $10-12 billion. "Lifting sanctions will boost the economy; it will help them to gain more money." said an Iranian official in Tehran who asked not to be named.

Rivlin: Next Gaza Conflict Could be Worse

Israel held an official ceremony marking a year since last summer's war with Gaza and memorializing 67 soldiers killed in the fighting, with President Reuven Rivlin warning that the next confrontation with Palestinian fighters in the Strip would be even tougher. Speaking to mourners at Jerusalem's Mount Herzl military cemetery Monday, Rivlin warned that a new conflict would be inevitable if sporadic rocket fire from the Strip was not stemmed. "The next conflict will be even more difficult than the last. It is clear that such a conflict will require a decisive and difficult decision," he said.

Clinton 'Alarmed' by BDS call to 'Delegitimize Israel'

Leading Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton is "alarmed" by the boycott movement against Israel, she told Jewish media mogul Haim Saban in a letter. In a letter dated July 2, Clinton seeks Saban's advice on "how we can work together - across party lines and with a diverse array of voices - to reverse this trend with information and advocacy, and fight back against further attempts to isolate and delegitimize Israel." Clinton expressed concerns over comparisons between Israel and the apartheid regime in South Africa, and added that as anti-Semitism is on the rise worldwide, now is the time "to repudiate forceful efforts to undermine Israel and the Jewish people."

Gold to Thank India for Shift in UN Voting Pattern

Foreign Ministry director- general Dore Gold is expected to thank India for an apparent change in its voting pattern on Israel-related issues at the UN when he leads a high level Israeli- Indian dialogue in the Foreign Ministry on Tuesday. In a historic first in UN votes on Israel, India did not vote for the Palestinians, but rather abstained, in an anti-Israel resolution in the UN Human Rights Council last Friday. Indian government sources were quoted in the Indian media in December as saying that India, under the new government of Narendra Modi, was considering changing its automatic support for Palestinians at the UN, and abstaining on those votes. The Hindu newspaper at the time said such a move would be tantamount to a "tectonic shift" in the country's foreign policy.

Ex-Iran President: Israel a Fake, Temporary Regime

Former Iranian president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani told a Hezbollah-affiliated outlet that he was confident that the "forged and temporary Israeli entity" would be wiped off the map, the state-run IRNA news agency reported. According to the report, Rafsanjani, often described by Western media as a moderate in Iranian politics, said that Israel was an alien existence forged into the body of a nation which would eventually be destroyed. "When, and how that will happen, depends on conditions which are rapidly changing. Those conditions can be provided very soon if the usefulness period of Israel will expire," he said. Rafsanjani said the destruction of the Jewish state could take some time since Israel's supporters reaped significant benefits from its existence.

Greece is Keen on Axis of 'Security' with Israel

With Greece's future shrouded in great uncertainty, Greek Foreign Minister Nikos Kotzias spoke in Jerusalem on Monday of developing an axis of security and stability among Israel, Greece, and Cyprus. Speaking alongside Prime Minister Netanyahu before their meeting, Kotzias said that, "We are living inside a triangle of destabilization," which he said begins "at the top" with Ukraine, and extends on one side to Libya, and on the other through Iraq and Syria. "We have to create inside this triangle a security and stability framework, and the relations between Israel, Cyprus and Greece are very important," he said. "I call it the stabilization line in this area."

PM Bars Mossad Head from Briefing Opposition

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has forbidden the head of the Mossad to brief Zionist Union Knesset members on the threat posed by ISIS (Islamic State) in the Sinai Peninsula. Zionist Union faction chairwoman Merav Michaeli, who submitted the request, said Netanyahu claimed such a briefing would set a precedent, and therefore, he didn't want to approve it. "Netanyahu is wrong to think that senior civil servants are his personal advisers and work for him," said Michaeli. "In Israel, they are public servants, and it's completely unreasonable and inappropriate to prevent them from speaking to the public's elected representatives."

Netanyahu Prepares to Fight World over Iran Deal

With communications between Washington and Jerusalem all but severed, Netanyahu is hedging his bets and preparing to fight Obama on Capitol Hill once a nuclear deal is announced.

By Barak Ravid

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is preparing for a world war. The reason, what else, is Iran's nuclear program. This offensive will not involve jet fighters descending on the nuclear facilities in Natanz or Fordo, but rather a frontal charge on Capitol Hill. Netanyahu's goal was and remains to enlist enough members from both houses of Congress to vote against the nuclear deal with Iran when President Obama puts it on the docket.

An Israeli source noted that Netanyahu seems optimistic about his chances. According to the source, Netanyahu recently told Jewish-American leaders that the battle is not lost. Those who heard the prime minister's remarks say that it is hard to tell if he actually believes his own words or is only using the rhetoric to try and rally the troops. Either way, Netanyahu conveyed to his interlocutors that he believes that with the right steps, enough Democratic lawmakers with enough political clout can be swayed to stop the deal in its tracks.

The question remains of when the opening shot of this war will be fired. The assessment among Netanyahu and the Israeli establishment is that a comprehensive deal with Iran is a matter of days to a few weeks away. The issues that remain to be resolved between Iran and world powers cast in a doubtful shadow the chances of reaching a deal by the July 9 deadline – the final date Obama can submit the agreement to Congress before it takes its summer recess a month later.

If no deal emerges by July 9 there is a possibility that the White House will choose to continue negotiations without presenting any deal until Congress reconvenes on September 9. The rationale for this being the White House's desire to give Congress the minimum 30 day oversight period stipulated by law to examine the deal's wording. Should it be presented before Congress returns from recess, the deal's detractors will have double the time to plan for its demise in Congress.

Israel is not completely in the dark about the talks in Vienna, but it has relatively limited information regarding the developments from recent weeks. On occasion a French or British diplomat will pass on a snippet of information and once every few days National Security Advisor Yossi Cohen receives a succinct briefing from U.S. Under Secretary for Political Affairs Wendy Sherman or from EU representative Helga Schmidt, but Israeli officials closely involved in the Iranian issue admit that Israel does not have the full picture and that uncertainty in Jerusalem is amassing.

One of the main reasons Israel finds itself in such a bind stems from the fact that communications between Netanyahu and Obama administration officials has been almost non-existent over the last three weeks. The last time the two sides spoke in-depth about the issue was during Yossi Cohen's mid-June visit to Washington D.C. Cohen met with his counterpart, Susan Rice, as well as Sherman, who heads the U.S. negotiation team, but besides reiterating the regular disagreement between the two nations, no progress was made on the issue. Cohen returned much the same as he had left.

Communications between Netanyahu and U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry have also been all but severed in recent weeks. Since arriving in Vienna 10 days ago for the latest round of talks with Iran, Kerry has not spoken with Netanyahu even once. Netanyahu for his part made little to no effort to get Kerry on the phone either.

Both sides have come to understand that at this point of the talks they have little to talk about. The positons are known and both sides have abandoned the pretense of trying to convince each other. All that is left for Obama and Netanyahu to do now is gear up with helmets and flak jackets, and prepare for the political and media battle that will take Washington by storm the moment a deal is announced.

No Holds Barred: Will Samantha Power be the First American UN Ambassador to Abandon Israel?

If President Obama compels her to support this resolution, she must consider her position and her ability to continue as ambassador.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Shmuley Boteach

Last week mega-philanthropist Michael Steinhardt, co-founder of Birthright Israel, which has brought 500,000 young Jews to Israel, joined with our organization The World Values Network in a full-page New York Times ad about Ambassador Samantha Power. In the ad Steinhardt reminded the ambassador of her commitment at her Senate confirmation hearings: "I will stand up for Israel and work tirelessly to defend it" at the United Nations.

At the AIPAC Annual Policy Conference in Washington, DC, in March, Power avowed, "It is a false choice to tell Israel that it has to choose between peace on the one hand, and security on the other. The United Nations would not ask any other country to make that choice, and it should not ask it of Israel."

Power, of course, was correct – security is the foundation of any sustainable peace framework in the Middle East. To its credit, the United States has long stood for justice and served as an essential check against overreach, anti-Semitism and double standards by Arab and European nations at the UN.

Reports have emerged that France plans to put a resolution before the UN Security Council that will call for immediate resumption of peace talks between Israel and the PA with a hard cap of 18 months for a final deal. Under the French proposal, if no deal is reached in 18 months, the UN would recognize the Palestinian state, effectively granting legitimacy to an organization that has consistently proven incompetent, corrupt, hostile to democratic values and openly supportive of terrorism.

While the global Jewish community has come to expect little from France, Hamdallah said France and the US are "coordinating" on the diplomatic catastrophe. There also exists the possibility that should Israel refuse to accept a UN Security Council Resolution authorizing a timetable for the unilateral creation of a Palestinian state, economic sanctions could be levied against the Jewish state.

For starters, the very notion of this process – which rewards the PA for failure – is patently absurd. In practice, if Israel doesn't capitulate to every demand of the Palestinian negotiators, the Palestinians are granted statehood. There is zero incentive for Palestinians to even pretend to negotiate in good faith. The mortifying results of the American discussions with Iran on nuclear weapons lowered the world's estimation of the US State Department's ability to negotiate, but this framework would be a historic nadir.

It's also worth questioning whether this proposal is even in the best interests of the Palestinian people. The PA's leadership has repeatedly proven itself incapable of adhering to basic democratic principles, transparency and rule of law. The PA's history of graft, support of terrorism and lack of accountability is staggering.

But at a personal level, it's not simply the concept of this proposal that is mortifying – it's the person who would be central to the decision for the United States to betray its closest ally if this proposal moved forward: Ambassador Samantha Power.

As many know, long before she became Ambassador Power, she was a well-regarded academic studying human rights at Harvard's Kennedy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

School. It was there she wrote the Pulitzer-winning book that launched her career into orbit, A Problem from Hell, the stirring and essential indictment of the inability of the US to act against genocide over the past 100 years.

But as her star rose in the Obama administration, many began paying attention to other early statements and writing, including specific ones that raised great concern about her feelings toward Israel and understanding of the conflict. These might have gone unnoticed for any ordinary academic speaking loosely early in her career, but Power was no ordinary academic.

Due to those earlier statements, Power wasn't implicitly trusted by members of the Jewish community when she took her role in the National Security Council. After writing an op-ed where I encouraged her to clarify her statements, she did just that.

We met in the White House and spoke candidly – and even quite emotionally – about Israel, the challenges in the region and the real concerns of anti-Semitism that some had regarding her earlier statements. Her passion and emphatic support of Israel was self-evident and convincing. From that moment on, I became intent on transforming the Jewish community's opinion of her, working side-by-side to persuade others that she was someone whose judgment and understanding of the conflict could be trusted when it came to issues related to Israel. Ultimately, when the time came for her nomination to serve as US ambassador to the United Nations, the Jewish American community registered strong, widespread support.

Yet in recent months, the person currently representing America before the United Nations has been a far cry from the Samantha I knew. It has pained me to see her embrace the disastrous Iran deal, even as its leadership repeatedly and unapologetically threatened Israel with genocide. Even unrelated to issues involving Israel, she failed to recognize the Armenian genocide by its proper name on its 100th anniversary in April, joining the ranks of that "problem from hell." The latter was particularly breathtaking given her impassioned plea to the Armenian-American community in 2008 to support President Barack Obama entirely predicated on his commitment to recognize the slaughter of 1.5 million Armenians by the Ottoman Turks as genocide.

Still, I concede Iran and the Armenian genocide are issues somewhat tangential to her role. This French proposal, however, is not. It is squarely and unambiguously her responsibility, and will be remembered as a turning point for her legacy. She will be confronted with a stark choice between doing what's right or giving in to the misguided rhetoric of the UN. For the sake of justice as well as her legacy, she must stand firm and act on the commitment to Israel she impressed so many with when her nomination was considered.

The path forward is clear: the US – and specifically Ambassador Power – must stand in the way of any attempt to move this resolution through the UN Security Council. Moreover, if President Obama compels her to support this resolution, she must consider her position and her ability to continue as ambassador.
This resolution proposed by the French and the pledges she made to the Jewish community to stand by Israel's side are completely incompatible, especially in light of the PA's collaboration with Hamas whose genocidal charter against Israel remains in full force.

In recent years, the UN has shown shocking hostility to Israel that would be comical if it were not so serious. From the modern-day blood libel of the Goldstone Report to the laughable double standards applied by any number of UN General Assembly resolutions. As anti-Israel and anti-Semitic fervor has captured the imagination of the UN, the US has stood by the Negroponte doctrine and proudly asserted its support for the only true democracy and ally of the US in the region time and time again.

I am supremely confident the Samantha Power I knew would hold up this tradition. Her legacy and the security of the State of Israel depend on it.

Wisconsin Senate strips workers' collective bargaining rights

NEA President Dennis Van Roekel reacts

WASHINGTON—In a blatant abuse of power, Wisconsin Republican lawmakers dealt a blow to the working class tonight with passage of the anti-union provisions of Gov. Walker's Budget Adjustment Bill on an 18-1 vote. No Democratic Senators were present. The bill strips collective bargaining rights for public workers. The Wisconsin Senate requires a quorum to take up any measures that spend money. But Republicans on Wednesday split from the legislation a proposal to curtail union rights, and a special conference committee of state lawmakers approved that bill a short time later.

"Wisconsin's Republican lawmakers met in the dark of night, in a near-empty Capitol, and stretched their authority to the breaking point in an attempt to ram through legislation that the public does not support and that will harm thousands of the American working class," said NEA President Dennis Van Roekel. "Its legality is dubious. Its intent is mean spirited. It is perhaps the most grievous example of how democratic decision making should not take place. The Governor and his legislative minions should be ashamed of what they've done."
"In exercising the nuclear option to impose their will on Wisconsites, Governor Walker and Senate Republicans attacked middle class families, from students to seniors, in their state," said Van Roekel. "This is an affront to teachers, nurses, students, firefighters, construction workers and other everyday people who stood up, spoke out, and learned how much their voice mattered to their elected leaders. The response will be unified and the collective voice of millions of working Americans from all across this nation will only grow louder."

Van Roekel added, "Just listen to Brad Lutes, a physical education and health teacher in Sun Prairie, Wisconsin. He summed it up: 'We can't be defeated. There's not really an alternative. You can take away my collective bargaining rights. You can take away my pension and some of my health care, but the one thing you can't take away from me is my vote. I think that's how a large majority of Wisconsinites and Americans feel right now.'"

Main Topics: McCain's Tax Policy, McSame or McDifferent?, Potential VPs, RIP Tim Russert

Summary of Shift: Pundits reminisced about the legendary Tim Russert this morning. Tom Brokaw hosted "Meet the Press" and dedicated the entire show to his remembrance. Fred Thompson and John Edwards were interviewed on "This Week". Bobby Jindal and Newt Gingrich appeared on "Face the Nation", where vice presidential selection was a major topic of discussion.

Highlights:
1) Newt Gingrich interview on "Face the Nation"
a. Says inexperience argument against Obama "won't work", points to Lincoln's "one term in Congress" as proof that experience doesn't matter
b. Calls Jindal "far and away the best candidate for vice president"
c. Argues recent Supreme Court decision granting enemy combatants access to civilian courts is the worst in its history, even "worse than Dred Scott"
2) McCain's flawed tax policies
a. Edwards: McCain's continuation of Bush's tax cuts is "favoring wealth over work"
b. Robert Reich: McCain's tax cuts do more for wealthy than even Bush has
3) Jindal implies he won't accept VP position if asked, reveals he's a skeptic about evolution and for teaching intelligent design in schools
4) On "This Week": McCain having trouble finding his voice
5) Fred Thompson interview on "This Week"
a. Says Supreme Court will be a major voting issue
b. Thompson: Tax policy gulf between candidates vast, Americans better off now than eight years ago

Newt Gingrich Says Inexperience Argument Against Obama "Won't Work", Points to "one term" of Lincoln As Proof Experience Doesn't Matter; Calls Jindal "far and away the best candidate for vice president" and the recent Supreme Court Case "Worse than Dred Scott" (CBS 06/15/08 10:45am)
CHIP REID: Well let's start with Bobby Jindal. You just heard him and you were obviously impressed by him. A lot of Republicans are incredibly impressed by him. 37 years old. Would you recommend to John McCain that he pick him as his vice presidential...

NEWT GINGRICH: Absolutely, I think Governor Jindal would be far and away the best candidate for vice president in the country. I think he is a future presidential candidate. I think he has enormous capacity to keep growing. He was, at 24 state medicaid director of Louisiana. He then headed Bro-Thomas commission on reforming medicare. He then became an assistant secretary of health and human services in the Bush Administration. He then went back home and ran for Governor and lost. Won a congressional seat. Came to Washington for two terms, then became the first person in Louisiana history to win the governorship without a runoff, defeating eleven people with a majority. And has since been just spectacular. Louisiana is a state that had no tradition of ethics reform, he drove through the toughest ethics legislation in the country. As he said, he's now driven through six tax cuts, he's already had a major corporation announce they are moving their corporate headquarters to Baton Rouge. He is just an all around talented human being.

REID: But here's one problem, that McCain has run largely on his ability to step in and become Commander in Chief from Day one.

GINGRICH: Right.

REID: Bobby Jindal doesn't have that. Do you think McCain will pick him? Or is that a real problem?

GINGRICH: Look Bobby Jindal at 37 is fully as prepared to be Commander in Chief as Senator Obama. I mean, you could argue that in fact Jindal's experience in the executive and legislative branches is greater than Senator Obama's [...]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

REID: And you believe Senator Obama is qualified? He has the experience?

GINGRICH: Look, in the American tradition, Abraham Lincoln served one term in Congress. I think it's a fundamental mistake to focus on whether or not he is qualified to be president and a powerful question on what kind of president he would be.

REID: But that is largely what McCain and his people are focusing on now. It's inexperience, inexperience, inexperience. They just keep hammering away.

GINGRICH: It won't work. It's a mistake.

REID: It is a mistake.

GINGRICH: The country is not gonna reject Senator Obama on inexperience. The country may reject Senator Obama because of his relationship to Reverend Wright and his relationship to the hard left, William Ayers. And because his policies include tax increases and because there's some big decisions coming on energy, on education, on the Court, and Senator Obama may turn out to represent a position so far to the left the country won't tolerate him. But if the country ends up not electing Senator Obama, it will be on large principled decisions, not on, I mean, I think both campaigns the last two weeks have been totally off their stride [...]

REID: Well along those lines, you said in a recent column in Human Events, you said "the Republican brand has been so badly damaged that if Republicans try to run an anti-Obama, anti-Reverend Wright campaign, they are simply going to fail." [...]
GINGICH: I will say, I think the recent Supreme Court decision to turn over to a local district judge decisions of national security and life and death that should be made by the president and the congress is the most extraordinarily arrogant and destructive decision the Supreme Court has made in it's history.

REID: In it's history?

GINGRICH: In it's history. Worse than Dred Scott, for the following reason: The court has now knowingly stepped in, this mourning's newspaper say, smugglers had actually gotten the design of a nuclear weapon, that we now have the evidence that people out there had a nuclear weapon design. And this court is saying that any random district judge, based on whatever their personal caprice is, whatever their personal ideological bias, can intervene with a terrorist in such a way, and this is something the Italians will tell you about fighting the mafia...

McCain's Continuation of Bush's Tax Cuts is "Favoring Wealth over Work" (ABC 06/15/08 10:09am)
JOHN EDWARDS: What we're doing under Sen. McCain and George Bush over the last eight years is we're favoring wealth over work. We keep raising the burden on working middle class families at the same time that we're giving tax breaks to people who earned their income from investment, from wealth. All I'm saying and Sen. Obama's saying is we ought to treat people's hard work with the dignity and respect that it's entitled to, just as it is with wealth. And giving more tax breaks to the biggest corporations in America, tax breaks that are absolutely skewed, even more so than George Bush's, to the wealthiest Americans instead of those who need the help, doesn't work. And you don't need me or any policy analyst to tell you that. They've had eight years, George, to try their way and it hasn't worked. Isn't it time that we try something different?

Robert Reich: McCain's Tax Cuts Do More For Wealthy Than Even George Bush (ABC 06/15/08 10:38am)
ROBERT REICH: I don't think you can really separate economic security from national security. This is why John McCain's position is so interesting because he wants to and needs to separate himself from Bush, a failed presidency, particularly if you look at the polls. And yet, on Iraq and on the economy he is going beyond what George Bush has done. His tax cuts are beyond anything that, particularly for the wealthy, beyond anything that George Bush has proposed or did implement.

Jindal Implies He Won't Accept VP Position if Asked, Reveals He's a Skeptic About Evolution and For Teaching Intelligent Design in Schools (CBS 06/15/08 10:30am) said you love your job, you've got a lot of work to do, you don't think McCain's gonna ask you anyway, but what if he does? What if he decides that you're the person he needs, would you turn it down?

BOBBY JINDAL: Well, you know, again, the speculation is flattering. I've talked to the Senator several times, we've never talked about the topic. The reality is I've got the job that I want. This is a historic time for my state [...]

REID: You have said the Republican Party has "lost it's way." Why do you believe John McCain, how have they lost their way, and why do you believe John McCain's the guy to bring them out of the woods.

JINDAL: Well you look at when the Republican Party first got the majorities in Congress, when many Governors, many state houses, the reason was the party stood against wasteful spending, against corruption, it was a party of ideas like welfare reform, stood for conservative principles. The problem was the party went to Washington to change Washington and instead became captured by Washington. All of a sudden started defending the bridge to nowhere, earmarks, wasteful spending, things they would have rightfully condemned if the other party had proposed it. So I think the party got off track, I think that the way we start winning elections again is by being conservative, sticking to our principles, and not condoning, it's not enough to say you want power for the sake of having power, it's not enough to criticize the other side to win an election [...]The reason why I'm supporting Senator McCain, we might not have always agreed on every policy issue, but now we've got a choice between two candidates, I think Senator McCain's policies, I think he's more likely to cut our taxes, more likely to defend our interests overseas effectively, I think he's more likely to keep government out of health care, he's got a long record opposing earmarks and wasteful spending. The good news is that you've got two candidates that are good, decent, people, that I think are patriotic, smart people. I think we've got different views on what the government should be doing [...]I personally think we're a center conservative country, I think Senator McCain's views are more consistent with the majority of American voters. But the good news is voters don't have to got to the voting booth voting against somebody in this election.

REID: Let me take a sharp turn here to a different issue, an issue that has raised some controversy. Now you were a biology major in college, I think you were a double major, but a biology major. And you support the teaching of intelligent design in schools, do you have doubts about the theory of evolution?

JINDAL: A couple of things. One, I don't think this is something the federal or state government should be imposing it's views on local school districts. You know, as a conservative, I think government that's closest to the people governs best. I think local school boards should be in a position to deciding their curriculum and also deciding what students should be learning. Secondly, I don't think students learn by us withholding information from them. Some want only to teach intelligent design, some only want to teach evolution, I think both views are wrong.

REID: But how about you personally? How do you stand personally on the issue?

JINDAL: As a parent when my kids go to school, when they go to public schools I want them to be presented with the best thinking. I want them to be able to make decisions for themselves. I want them to see the best data. I personally think that the life, human life, and the world we live in wasn't created accidentally. I do think that there's a creator. I'm a Christian. I do think that god played a role in creating not only earth, but mankind. Now the way that he did it, I certainly want my kids to the very best science. I don't want them to be, I don't want any facts or theories or explanations to be withheld from them because of political correctness [...]

McCain Having Trouble Finding His Voice (ABC 06/15/08 10:45am)

GEORGE STEPHANOPOLOUS: That leads to another question, Torie, about Sen. McCain's campaign. How does he find his voice on the economy right now . . . I don't think it's going to cut to come out and say, you know, things are going fine, people just don't get it, unemployment is actually at historic lows. That cannot work when people are feeling that the country's going in the wrong direction. Even if they are wrong.

TORIE CLARKE: You're absolutely right . . . it's very difficult for him because politically he has to divorce himself from, separate himself from the Bush administration. Substantively he agrees with them on basic policies. Months and months and months ago I heard him giving a speech and in a very thoughtful way he laid it out: Look, things are working, let's not throw those out, but there are a lot of people hurting badly, what is it we can do to help them, can we say honestly that those people in Michigan, those jobs aren't coming back but we're going to help train you and educate you to get different jobs, those sorts of things. But look, it took me thirty seconds, it's very hard for a politician to wrap that up in thirty seconds. So I think it's going to be hard for him and especially, he's the first one to admit it, this isn't his strong suit, he's got a voice on national security since he was born.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ROBERT REICH: Why wasn't he able to simply say, "I opposed the Bush tax cuts for the rich in 2001 and 2003, I oppose them today"? Why couldn't he have said that?

STEPHANOPOLOUS: He wouldn't've gotten the nomination.

[. . .]

REICH: Do you really think so George? Do you really think so?

STEPHANOPOLOUS: Absolutely. He was dead in the water a year ago. He had no hope.

SAM DONALDSON: That's the problem with trying to find his voice, I mean he's still trying to secure his base. We concentrate on the Democratic Party and how they're so split now . . .the real problem, at least for Republicans is he still can't decide if he's got the nomination.

[. . .]

STEPHANOPOLOUS: In 2006 when he was the front runner far and away, when he was raising money, before immigration destroyed his campaign, he might have had a chance of pulling off some differentiation on taxes but when you had immigration there was no way you could do both.

Supreme Court Will Be a Major Voting Issue (ABC 06/15/08 10:10am)
GEORGE STEPHANOPOLOUS: Do you think that the supreme court's going to be a voting issue this year?

FRED THOMPSON: Absolutely, I can't think of anything that more starkly points out the differences in these two presidential candidates in terms of the kind of justices that they would appoint to the Supreme Court. Barack Obama opposed Chief Justice Roberts . . . I think this a pretty good issue to highlight the differences in these two candidates at a time when our judiciary is arrogating more and more power to itself.

Thompson: Tax Policy Gulf Between Candidates Vast, Americans Better Off Now Than Eight Years Ago (ABC 06/15/08 10:13am)
GEORGE STEPHANOPOLOUS: There's . . . a huge difference on tax policy, on economic policy, you heard Sen. Edwards say . . . John McCain's tax policies are an extension of what we've seen under President Bush and it hasn't worked.

FRED THOMPSON: What hasn't worked, either substantively or politically is the old rich vs. poor, don't worry about it, we'll soak the rich . . . kind of approach . . . we have the second highest corporate tax rate in the world. . .
STEPHANOPOLOUS: You mentioned the cost of Sen. Obama's proposal but that same tax policy institute study said that more revenue would be lost under Sen. McCain's proposals. . .

THOMPSON: That's the static analysis that . . . the beltway has operated under for a long, long time . . .

[. . .]

THOMPSON: . . . of course people act like now we've had a terrible economy for the last eight years, that's not true . . .

+ Obama Campaign Raised Record $32 Million In January.

Sen. Clinton's Campaign:

CLINTON, OBAMA REACH OUT TO EDWARDS SUPPORTERS IN POLITE DEBATE. In their first one-on-one debate last night at the Kodak Theater in Los Angeles, Sens. Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton sought to limit their differences to policy questions, engaging in what media reports called "cordial," "congenial," or "civil" banter. The rivals marked the absence of recently departed contender John Edwards by making a play to his supporters.

The AP (2/1, Raum, Pickler) reports Obama and Clinton "kicked off their final debate before Super Tuesday contests on a cordial note, and reached out to backers of former rival John Edwards in their scrappy chase for delegates." Facing "only each other in a debate for the first time, both candidates acknowledged policy differences but also sought to ratchet back what had become increasingly personal attacks." Obama said, "I was friends with Hillary Clinton before we started this campaign. I will be friends with Hillary Clinton after this campaign is over." The AP adds the two "walked briskly together onto the stage of the Kodak Theater, home of the Academy Awards, with Clinton walking in front of Obama and both waving to the audience. There was no attempt to shake hands, avoiding an uncomfortable moment."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A4, Chozick, Cooper, 2.06M) reports "several weeks of political jabs largely took hiatus" on Thursday night when Clinton and Obama "set aside differences and threw darts at the Republicans in their first one-on-one debate." The two "sparred sporadically but did not appear to spark any controversy that would dramatically change the race as it heads into a critical stage." Instead of politics, "the debate leaned heavily on policy -- especially in areas such as health-care reform, where the two candidates continue to insist there are differences in their proposals but the public -- and even pundits -- often have trouble seeing them."

The Politico (2/1, Smith) reports that the debate "did little to change a race in which each campaign argues that it has an advantage: Clinton's aides pointing to polls showing she has been leading since the race began, Obama's backers claiming that the momentum is on his side after a week of huge crowds around the country and a month of raising more than $1 million a day." Clinton and Obama "associated themselves repeatedly and obsequiously to" Edwards, "whose endorsement both are seeking, and they shifted toward the assumption that Sen. John McCain will be the Republican nominee for president. 'Somewhere along the line, the Straight Talk Express lost some wheels,' said Obama, referring to McCain's new loyalty to Republican fiscal doctrine."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, A1, Martelle, 881K) reports in a front page story that Clinton "sought tonight to derail some of the momentum behind rival Sen. Barack Obama in their final debate heading into the coast-to-coast balloting Tuesday that could determine the Democratic presidential nomination." The "two main surviving Democratic contenders struck a congenial tone as they drew distinctions not only between themselves but against whoever emerges as the Republican presidential nominee." Both said they "would fund their proposals by rolling back the Bush administration tax cuts and, in Obama's case, through focusing on preventive care and, in Clinton's case, by finding efficiencies in the delivery of the care itself."

ABC's Nightline (1/31, 11:25 p.m., Moran) reported, "Both candidates came in with a clear plan. Be nice. No nasty swipes or bitter arguments tonight."

SUPER TUESDAY PRIMARIES UNLIKELY TO SETTLE DEMOCRATIC NOMINATION. The Wall Street Journal (1/31, Kronholz, 2.06M) reports that if the Super Tuesday primaries don't determine the Democratic nominee, it "isn't likely to be settled on the floor of this summer's convention, political experts say. But that doesn't mean that a nomination brokered by party leaders is impossible -- or that things won't get even nastier." Norm Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute said, "We don't know what will happen if we end up with two candidates going into the Democratic National Convention with 40% of the delegates each." The Journal ads that at "that point, the loyalty of the candidates' pledged delegates, the intentions of hundreds of currently unpledged 'superdelegates,' the negotiating skill of party leaders and the outcome of a dispute over whether to seat delegates from Florida and Michigan each could prove decisive." The "possibility of a protracted fight and some sort of brokered settlement seems to be growing, taking the party into uncharted territory."

ABC World News (1/31, story 2, 2:25, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported, "If Barack Obama upsets Hillary Clinton in California, that is going to be the story of the night. Also, Massachusetts, Hillary Clinton's had a big lead there all year long. But Barack Obama has the Kennedy endorsement, the Kerry endorsement, Governor Duval Patrick. And right in the middle of the country, Missouri, that's a bell weather state."

NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 9, 2:10, Yang, 9.87M) reported, "The Democrat needs 2,025. Barack Obama is ahead. But those numbers will change in a big way next Tuesday, Super Tuesday, a virtual national primary. It's the mother load of delegates with about 40% of all of them in each party up for grabs." Tad Devine, Democratic strategist: "There is an opportunity to come out on the 6th of February with a large delegate advantage." Under "some Democratic state rules, the candidates that do poorly statewide and still pick up delegates by doing well in individual Congressional districts. It happened in Nevada where Hillary Clinton won more votes, but Barack Obama won more delegates."

The CBS Evening News (1/31, lead story, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "We're just five days away now from the Super Tuesday showdown between Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama. What happens that day will go a long way towards deciding which one of them will be the Democratic nominee for President. Clinton is leading in the two biggest delegate prizes of the night California and New York. Obama is ahead in his home state of Illinois and in Georgia. In all the other Super Tuesday states, it's either too close or there is not enough data to say who is leading."

Clinton, Obama Target Each Others' Turf. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Sabar, 58K) reports, "New York was once seen as impenetrable. Clinton was reelected in 2006 with more than two-thirds of the vote. Her campaign boasts at least 20,000 volunteers and 35 offices statewide and is backed by much of the political establishment, including Gov. Eliot Spitzer and Attorney General Andrew Cuomo. But Obama has made splashy visits to Manhattan and Brooklyn and has built an energetic grass-roots network in New York City. ... Illinois is Obama country, and he is leading by nearly 30 percentage points in the polls. But Clinton also has roots there; she was born and raised in the Chicago suburbs." Clinton's camp "claims a database of more than 5,000 Illinois volunteers and is focusing particular attention on voters downstate, where Obama didn't perform as well in his 2004 election. Campaign ads in St. Louis reach many Illinois voters, and on Wednesday the campaign dispatched Bill Clinton to an event in downstate Edwardsville, Ill."

CLINTON TO ADVERTISE IN SEVERAL BIG SUPER TUESDAY STATES. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A4, Rutkoff, 2.06M) reports, "In the face of Mr. Obama's broad-brush approach, the Clinton campaign responded Wednesday with a targeted ad buy in the biggest Super Tuesday states, including New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Massachusetts and California. The Clinton campaign yesterday also announced a 90-minute 'town hall'-style live event that will be broadcast nationally on the Hallmark Channel on Monday evening. The Clinton campaign also released two new economic-themed ads Wednesday. In one, dubbed 'Freefall,' a skydiver plummets through the air before his parachute opens, as an announcer tells voters that Mrs. Clinton can 'fix the economy and protect our future.'"

CLINTON, OBAMA BATTLE FOR GOLDEN STATE'S LATINO VOTES. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/31, Hendricks, 395K) reported on its website, "Statewide public opinion polls over the past couple of weeks have given" Hillary Clinton "a 2-to-1 or 3-to-1 edge over" Barack Obama "among Latino Democrats and a double-digit lead in the state overall. But the most recent polling shows the race might be tightening. Analysts say Clinton leads among Latinos because she has tremendous name recognition, she secured early endorsements from key California Latino leaders, including Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and State Assembly Speaker Fabian Núñez. And many Latinos liked Bill Clinton's presidency. But Obama has lined up some influential endorsements of his own and appears to be attracting the interest of some Latino voters because of his willingness to allow driver's licenses for illegal immigrants."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, La Ganga, 881K) reports Obama "told a Los Angeles audience Thursday that he helped Mexican Americans as well as blacks and whites during his days as a community organizer, and that the nation must continue working to bridge its ongoing 'black-brown divide.'" In his speech, he said, "I'm reminded of the Latino brothers and sisters that I worked alongside on the streets of Chicago over two decades ago." Obama faces "questions about his ability to draw Latino voters. ... At the technical college" in Los Angeles, "Obama said the nation's ills affected Latinos and African Americans equally and could only be solved by working together. From higher dropout rates to a greater incidence of diabetes and infant mortality, Obama said, the two groups suffer more than any others in the country."

BILL CLINTON TAKES MORE SUBDUED ROLE IN CAMPAIGN. The New York Times (2/1, Seelye, Hernandez, 1.18M) reports the "new Bill Clinton, playing to crowds in New Mexico, New Jersey and Ohio, is earnest and on script, telling crowds to vote for his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, in the 22 Democratic presidential nominating contests Tuesday." There is "no criticism of her rival, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois. And no extemporaneous interviews with the news media." But even "as the campaign reins in Mr. Clinton, his statements from last week in the heat of the South Carolina primary are reverberating among some Democratic voters." In the process, "Mr. Clinton also raised the specter of a co-presidency and the possibility that if Mrs. Clinton could not control him on the campaign trail, she could not control him back in the White House."

Clinton's Role In Kazakh Uranium Deal Noted. NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 3, 2:50, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported Hillary Clinton "says if she became president he would be her goodwill ambassador. He says he would still raise money for his foundation. But while he is circling the globe doing good works and raising billions for his foundation, some of his connections could create ethical and diplomatic conflicts for his wife. Like Kazakhstan, in December 2005, Bill Clinton went there with Canadian tycoon Frank Giustra on his private jet. They say to inspect AIDS projects." Frank Giustra: "We spent many hours flying around the world, many long flights and it gave us an opportunity to chat on a variety of topics." Mitchell: "But while there as first reported by 'Newsweek' and 'The New York Times,' Clinton praised the country's widely criticized dictator, Nursultan Nazarbayev. Only days later, Clinton's friend won three uranium deals with Nazarbayev's state-run mines worth tens of millions of dollars. Months later, Giustra donated $31 million to Clinton's foundation. Since then he has pledged $100 million more. Critics say praise from Bill Clinton is invaluable to a strong man, like Nazarbayev."

CLINTON CAMPAIGN CO-CHAIR TOOK CHECKS FROM REZKO. The AP (2/1, Blood) reports from Los Angeles that Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, "a national co-chair of Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential campaign, banked at least $1,500 in political donations from an indicted Chicago businessman whose past connections to Barack Obama have been used by Clinton to criticize her rival's judgment and ethics. City records show Antoin Rezko, chairman of Rezmar Corp. of Chicago, contributed $1,000 to Villaraigosa's mayoral campaign in May 2001. Those records show Rezko also donated $500 to another Villaraigosa political committee in March 2003. Villaraigosa's office did not respond" to requests for comment. The AP adds, "The donations could prove to be a political embarrassment for Clinton."

NATIONAL ARCHIVES OPPOSES JUDICIAL WATCH LAWSUIT OVER CLINTON PAPERS. The AP (2/1, DeMillo) reports, "The National Archives wants a federal judge to dismiss a lawsuit seeking quick access to records about a health care task force Hillary Rodham Clinton headed as first lady, or delay the release for about a year. Judicial Watch, a conservative public interest group, has complained in a lawsuit that the National Archives isn't moving fast enough on its April 2006 request to see the documents. The archives says Judicial Watch is trying to jump ahead of those who made earlier requests" under the FOIA and argued in federal court, "At an estimated three million pages, the size and scope of Judicial Watch's present FOIA request makes it the largest FOIA request that the Clinton presidential library has received to date." Sen. Hillary Clinton "has faced criticism from her rivals about the number of documents from her husband's administration that have not been made public."

OBAMA CAMPAIGN RAISED RECORD $32 MILLION IN JANUARY. The Los Angeles Times (1/31, Morain, Muskal, 881K) reports Barack Obama's campaign "reported this morning that in January it had raised $32 million that can be used for the primary battle against New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton. That one-month take was more than Obama raised in any three-month period in 2007, campaign aides said this morning."

ABC World News (1/31, lead story, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Today, the Obama campaign said it had raised $32 million in January alone, more than $1 million a day. And many of those donations came right after he lost in New Hampshire. The Clinton campaign would only say they have raised at least $10 million this month." The CBS Evening News (1/31, lead story, 2:15, Reynolds, 7.66M) reported, "Barack Obama had some good news beyond the sunny Southern California weather today. His campaign announced it has raised $32 million in January alone. That matches the best three-month showing he's ever had. He signed up 170,000 new donors as well, and it looks like he will need every one of them."

Obama Spending $10 Million On Ad "Blitz" In February 5 States. The Washington Post (2/1, A8, Kurtz, 723K) reports while Obama "plans to spend more than $10 million on a blitz that will run through Tuesday, the two leading Republican presidential candidates are spending far less on the air wars. Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, who delayed airing any Super Tuesday commercials, plans to spend $2 million to $3 million in the remaining five days and has released only one ad in California. His chief rival, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), plans a modest buy on national cable networks." Obama is "on the air in all but three of the Feb. 5 states -- he is bypassing his home state of Illinois -- and is to begin advertising today in Maryland, Virginia and the District, which vote Feb. 12."

FIRST READ: GOP PRESIDENTIAL HOPEFULS MOSTLY SILENT ON DRONE MISTAKE

First Read is a morning briefing from Meet the Press and the NBC Political Unit on the day's most important political stories and why they matter.

The Sound of Silence (Almost) From the '16 Candidates on Drone Deaths

If you've been following American politics over the last six years, President Obama could sneeze, and it would produce a flurry of negative statements and reactions from his political opponents. That's what makes yesterday's silence -- or backtracking -- from Republican 2016 presidential candidates regarding the accidental drone killing of two hostages so striking. As the Wall Street Journal writes, some Republican 2016ers chose not to comment on yesterday's news (Jeb Bush, Scott Walker), while two others who staged a 2013 filibuster against U.S. drone policy had no stomach to protest it (Rand Paul and Ted Cruz). "It is a tragedy that these hostages lost their lives," Paul said in a brief statement, per the Journal . "My prayers and thoughts are with their families." Cruz called for investigation into the deaths, but added: "Make no mistake: responsibility for their deaths lies firmly and unequivocally with the terrorists who kidnapped them and forcibly held them in their command center."

But it's a conversation and debate worth having

Meanwhile, Lindsey Graham -- a hawkish supporter of U.S. intervention overseas -- said, "Collateral damage is part of war. I've got no problem at all with anything that happened, other than my deepest sympathies for those who were held by al Qaeda that became collateral damage." And Marco Rubio added, "We are all safer because of the actions taken every day around the world by our government to go after those who wish Americans harm and to prevent future attacks against us here at home." But what's amazing is that an issue that sparks so much political debate -- Should drones be used in these kinds of operations? What about against American citizens, even those with al Qaeda ties? Should there be more checks and balances? -- the 2016ers essentially punted. These are ALL questions American voters should get answers from the people vying to become the next commander-in-chief. But no one was comfortable having that conversation yesterday. It's a reminder of just how unprepared many of these campaigns are to debate some of the true heavy issues out there.

The Clinton campaign strikes back

Hours after the New York Times reported on a Canadian mining company -- whose principals donated heavily to the Clinton Foundation over the years -- sold its uranium business to Russia (which had to be approved by Hillary Clinton's State Department), the Clinton campaign struck back at the newspaper. It issued these rebuttals to attempt to knock down any quid-pro-quo:

1. Hillary wasn't involved in the State Department's review; it is the assistant secretary of state for economic, energy, and business affairs who makes the call;
2. The main Clinton Foundation donor, Frank Giustra, sold his stake in the Canadian mine business in 2007, so before Hillary became secretary of state;
3. The State Department was one of nine U.S. agencies to review the sale.

Indeed, upon reflection, that Times article doesn't hold up that well 24 hours after its publication. But if there's a legitimate criticism of the Clintons here -- especially when it comes to the other articles about the Clinton Foundation and Bill's speaking fees (here and here) -- it's that they were sloppy, bordering on being greedy. As Jonathan Chait writes . "All sorts of unproven worst-case-scenario questions float around the web of connections between Bill's private work, Hillary Clinton's public role as secretary of State, the Clintons' quasi-public charity... But the best-case scenario is bad enough: The Clintons have been disorganized and greedy." Just a reminder: Going after the Clintons on personal money and appearances of conflict of interest was a successful message for candidate Barack Obama in 2007-2008.

Why Ted Cruz skipped the Loretta Lynch vote

He had to catch a flight to a Texas fundraiser: Ted Cruz, who was one of the most vocal critics against Loretta Lynch's nomination for Attorney General, was the only senator to miss her final confirmation vote today because he needed to catch a flight for a previously scheduled commitment in Texas, his campaign told NBC's Kelly O'Donnell and Frank Thorp. "He had to catch a flight for a commitment in Texas," Cruz campaign spokeswoman Catherine Frazier said. According to a fundraising invite obtained by Real Clear Politics , Cruz has a fundraiser in Dallas, TX scheduled for 6:00 pm. Cruz spoke on the Senate floor Thursday morning against Lynch's nomination, and then voted against the procedural vote to move forward with consideration of her nomination, something called "cloture." But Cruz missed the actual vote on Lynch's nomination.

Conservative writer

"John Kasich should be punished for expanding Obamacare": Here's a reason you might not want to buy stock in John Kasich's POSSIBLE presidential candidacy: He expanded Medicaid in Ohio. And here's the headline from the Washington Examiner's Philip Klein , one of top conservative wonks: "John Kasich should be punished for expanding Obamacare."

Saturday's two GOP cattle calls

Saturday brings two GOP cattle calls. One is the Iowa Faith & Freedom Coalition spring kick-off, featuring nine 2016ers -- Cruz, Fiorina, Huckabee, Jindal, Paul, Perry, Rubio, Santorum, and Walker. And the other one is the Republican Jewish Coalition confab in Las Vegas, which will also hear from Cruz and Perry, as well as George W. Bush, John Boehner, and Mitt Romney.

On "Meet" this Sunday

Finally, on "Meet the Press" this Sunday, here's an early look at some of guests: David Boies and Ted Olson (to talk about the Supreme Court's upcoming gay-marriage decision), Arkansas Gov. Asa Hutchinson, and cartoonist Garry Trudeau.

FIRST READ: MONEY-IN-POLITICS STORIES TO WATCH FOR 2016

First Read is a morning briefing from Meet the Press and the NBC Political Unit on the day's most important political stories and why they matter.

Two other money-in-politics stories to watch in the 2016 race

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With all the attention on the Clinton Foundation story -- and with its potential conflicts of interest (see our piece on it yesterday) -- there are two other money-in-politics that should be on everyone's radar screens:

1. The Koch and Adelson Primaries: On Monday, the NYT reported that the Koch Brothers had settled on their preferred 2016 candidate - Scott Walker. Then Koch World pushed back on that story, saying they are still holding auditions for their favorite 2016 candidate. But here is a key question: If the Koch Brothers (and their network of wealthy donors) are going to dole out millions and millions of dollars and they're currently auditioning candidates, what are they getting in return for that support? Check out this quote from Charles Koch: "We're telling [GOP candidates] that if they want our support, one way to get it is articulating a good message to help Americans get a better understanding and a better appreciation of how certain policies ... will benefit them and will benefit all America." What policies are those? Here's NBC's Leigh Ann Caldwell on Scott Walker's ties to the Koch Brothers.

And it's just not the Koch Primary. This coming Saturday, at least two Republican presidential contenders -- Ted Cruz and Rick Perry -- are going to Las Vegas to speak at the Sheldon Adelson-backed Republican Jewish Coalition confab. In the 2012 cycle, Adelson and his wife donated nearly $100 million to GOP outside groups, including Super PACs supporting Newt Gingrich and Mitt Romney.

2. Jeb Bush in uncharted Super PAC waters: On Tuesday, the AP reported that Jeb Bush plans to outsource his TV ads, direct mail, and data gathering to his Super PAC, Right to Rise. What's noteworthy here is that, according to campaign-finance laws, there is supposed to be NO coordination between a candidate and a Super PAC. But Jeb Bush is exploiting a loophole -- and potentially violating at least the SPIRIT of these laws -- because he's not officially a presidential candidate. So he's raising money for this Super PAC and putting his key personnel there. The moment he declares his candidacy (in June?), he'll stop his role with the Super PAC. But by then, it will have all the money (through unlimited donations) and infrastructure it needs.

Bank on it: The Super PACs will outspend the campaigns -- at least during the primary season

When it comes to Jeb Bush's Super PAC, maybe the biggest consequence of it is that, in 2016, we're going to see the Super PACs outspend the actual campaigns, at least during the primary season. As the New York Times' Nick Confessore points out, the Romney campaign spent about $76 million in the 2012 primary season, while the main pro-Romney Super PAC spent $49 million. As Confessore mused, it's easy to see how that ratio shifts for Jeb Bush -- and perhaps the other GOP candidates as well.

Obama visits Florida Everglades to mark Earth Day

USA Today : "President Obama spends Earth Day on Wednesday in the Florida Everglades, promoting his climate change policies. After touring Everglades National Park in the afternoon, Obama will speak 'on the threat that climate change poses to our economy and to the world,' says the White House schedule. The president will stress his efforts to reduce carbon emissions, while criticizing congressional Republicans for opposing his environmental policies." Obama delivers his remarks at 3:55 pm ET.

Hillary vague on trade deal

Turning back to the 2016 race, Hillary Clinton was incredibly vague when talking about the political fight over the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) trade deal. "Any trade deal has to produce jobs and raise wages and increase prosperity and protect our security," she said in New Hampshire yesterday. "And we need to do our part to make sure we have the capacity and the skills to be competitive." As we've written before, this trade deal -- as well as a battle over "fast-track" trade authority for President Obama -- puts Hillary in a tough spot. Does she back Obama and her husband Bill? Or does she side with organized labor, as well as the likes of Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders, who have come out against it? Other questions: Will Hillary be able to look credible if she opposes the TPP? Would it add to a perception she'll say or do anything? Could the better position for her actually be supporting it, showing that she's willing to buck her base (especially since Obama is for it)? Also on the trade-deal front, here's a Wall Street Journal op-ed by Paul Ryan and Ted Cruz supporting giving Obama fast-track authority.

Walker comes out against LEGAL immigration?

Don't miss this piece by MSNBC's Benjy Sarlin : "Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker's newfound skepticism of legal immigration levels is a potential turning point in the still nascent presidential race, potentially dragging the Republican Party further to the right than Mitt Romney's hardline immigration platform in 2012. 'In terms of legal immigration, how we need to approach that going forward is saying - the next president and the next Congress need to make decisions about a legal immigration system that's based on, first and foremost, on protecting American workers and American wages,' Walker said Monday in an interview with Glenn Beck. 'It is a fundamentally lost issue by many in elected positions today - what is this doing for American workers looking for jobs, what is this doing to wages, and we need to have that be at the forefront of our discussion going forward.'" A Walker spokeswoman told the Washington Examiner's Philip Klein: "Gov. Walker supports American workers' wages and the U.S. economy and thinks both should be considered when crafting a policy for legal immigration. He strongly supports legal immigration, and like many Americans, believes that our economic situation should be considered instead of arbitrary caps on the amount of immigrants that can enter."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

FIRST READ'S MORNING CLIPS

OBAMA AGENDA: The latest in Yemen

The New York Times: "Warplanes from a Saudi-led military coalition conducted airstrikes in the southwestern Yemeni city of Taiz on Wednesday, hours after Saudi officials had announced they were halting their nearly monthlong bombing campaign against the Houthi rebel movement. The warplanes bombed Houthi positions during heavy clashes in Taiz on Wednesday morning, according to a local official in the city. The new airstrikes, combined with reports of continued fighting in other parts of the country, including the southern port city of Aden, dampened hopes that the Saudi announcement would quickly result in a broader cease-fire."

Obama is headed to Florida - the home state of two GOP presidential hopefuls - to talk climate change.

DEA chief Michele Leonhart is stepping down amid disagreements with the Obama administration and criticism of her handling of a scandal.

The Baltimore Sun has the latest on the DOJ probe of Freddie Gray's death.

CONGRESS: The deal that paved the way for Loretta Lynch's nomination

NBC's Frank Thorp reports on the deal that paved the way for a vote on Loretta Lynch's nomination this week.

National Journal first reported last night that Mitch McConnell is introducing a bill to reauthorize the surveillance authority of the Patriot Act until 2020.

Rep. Ken Buck of Colorado has an AR-15 in his office, exempt from D.C. law because of his status as a congressman, reports the Washington Post.

Kate Snow writes about Rep. Mike Honda's 8-year-old granddaughter, who is transgender.

OFF TO THE RACES: The Koch Brothers' Five Favorites

USA Today reports that the Koch brothers have identified five candidates that they could consider backing: Walker, Bush, Cruz, Paul and Rubio.

Writes the Des Moines Register: "Hot-button issues such as clean power, water quality regulations and renewable fuels are expected to get a bigger stage in the 2016 Iowa Caucuses, as environmental activists put more pressure on presidential contenders to address controversial issues such as climate change."

CLINTON: From the Associated Press, on Bill Clinton's role: "Aides say the ex-president will stay behind the scenes initially and that Hillary Clinton's focus on her parents and grandchild allow her to fill in other aspects of her biography. Invoking Bill Clinton, who has high approval ratings, also can bring up positives from his administration, such as a strong economy, but at the risk of revisiting the Monica Lewinsky scandal and subsequent impeachment drama."

The Washington Post writes about how Clinton's trade comments are kicking off a public intra-party trade war.

The Huffington Post reports that top campaign officials have a goal of $100 million for the Democratic primary race.

POLITICO describes her as "unrunning" for president.

Bloomberg writes that the findings of the House Benghazi probe likely won't be released until next year.

FIRST READ: WHAT YOU NEED TO KNOW ABOUT THE CLINTON FOUNDATION STORY

First Read is a morning briefing from Meet the Press and the NBC Political Unit on the day's most important political stories and why they matter.

Everything you wanted to know about the Clinton Foundation-money story but were afraid to ask

With the Clinton Foundation's fundraising practices once again in the news as Hillary Clinton runs for president -- especially with a new controversial book on the subject -- here are the basics of what you need to know:

- ORIGINAL CONCERN ABOUT CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

At Hillary Clinton's Jan. 13, 2009 confirmation hearing to be secretary of state, then-Sen. Dick Lugar (R-IN) summed up the potential conflict of interest between the Clinton Foundation receiving donations from foreign countries and Clinton's new job. "The core of the problem is that foreign governments and entities may perceive the Clinton Foundation as a means to gain favor with the secretary of state. Although neither Senator Clinton nor President Clinton has a personal financial stake in the foundation, obviously its work benefits their legacy and their public service priorities."

Hillary Clinton agreed about the perception problem. "[T]he foundation and the president-elect decided to go beyond what the law and the ethics rules call for to address even the appearance of conflict and that is why they signed a memorandum of understanding, which outlines the voluntary steps that the foundation is taking to address potential concerns that might come up down the road."

- THE MEMO OF UNDERSTANDING

The "Memo of Understanding" that Hillary Clinton reached with the Obama administration had two main objectives:

-- to prohibit President Clinton from soliciting funds or accepting foreign-government contributions to the Clinton Global Initiative (CGI);

-- to disclose foreign countries that INCREASED their commitments to all Clinton Foundation entities, or that became a NEW contributor

(The memo of understanding was signed by Valerie Jarrett and Bruce Lindsey of the Clinton Foundation. It also was under supervision by John Kerry and Dick Lugar of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

- THE 2010 ALGERIA DONATION

In Feb. 2015, we learned that the Clinton Foundation FAILED TO DISCLOSE a $500,000 donation in 2010 to assist with earthquake relief in Haiti. This was a NEW donation, and thus should have been disclosed to the State Department.

The Clinton Foundation issued a statement saying that the donation SHOULD have been disclosed. "Immediately following the devastating earthquake in Haiti on January 12, 2010, the Embassy of Algeria made an unsolicited donation of $500K to Clinton Foundation Haiti Relief fund. As the Clinton Foundation did with all donations it received for earthquake relief, the entire amount of Algeria's contribution was distributed as aid in Haiti. This donation was disclosed publicly on our website, however, the State Department should have also been formally informed. This was a one-time, specific donation to help Haiti and Algeria had not donated to the Clinton Foundation before and has not since."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- CURRENT POLICY NOW THAT THE CLINTON CAMPAIGN IS UNDERWAY

The Clinton Foundation is no longer accepting new donations from foreign governments. But it is still CONTINUING existing programs that were up and running before Hillary began her campaign. There are six countries that had EXISTING programs -- Australia, Canada, Germany, the Netherlands, Norway, and the U.K. As a Clinton Foundation official tells NBC News, "You just can't pull the plug" on existing programs, especially when they involve multi-year grants.

Also under current policy, all disclosures will be listed quarterly instead of yearly (as was the case under the older Memo of Understanding). And after the Clinton Global Initiative completes its already-planned Morocco conference, it will no longer have foreign countries sponsor or co-sponsor CGI events.

Hillary's Day 2 in New Hampshire

Hillary Clinton has a 10:20 am ET event in Concord, NH, where she'll focus on community college programs.

On the trail

Chris Christie speaks at the Washington Conference on the Americas at 12:25 pm ET... Carly Fiorina has events in Council Bluffs, Sioux City and Denison, IA... And former President Bill Clinton gives an address on public service at Georgetown University at 10:30 am ET.

A breakthrough on Loretta Lynch and the anti-trafficking bill?

It looks that way. Politico : "The Senate is nearing a resolution to a monthlong dispute that's halted a human trafficking bill and confirmation of attorney general nominee Loretta Lynch, even as Minority Leader Harry Reid on Monday resumed his rhetorical assault on Republicans for the delay." More: "Top sources in both parties - and even Reid himself - said negotiators had made headway toward a compromise on abortion language included in the sex trafficking bill that Democrats have strongly opposed. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has vowed that the trafficking bill must be completed before the Senate votes to confirm Lynch."

Yet ANOTHER Republican says no to running for FL SEN

This is getting weirder and weirder. "Two weeks after floating the idea of a 2016 run for U.S. Senate, Rep. Tom Rooney, R-Okeechobee, said today he has decided against seeking the seat Sen. Marco Rubio is giving up to run for president," the Palm Beach Post writes . "'For the last several days I considered running for the U.S. Senate representing the great state of Florida. While I feel like I could mount a successful statewide campaign, the toll I believe the process would take on my family is something I cannot put them through,' Rooney said in a statement released by his office."

FIRST READ'S MORNING CLIPS

OFF TO THE RACES: Jeb to rely heavily on Super PAC

BUSH: The AP reports that he will delegate a lot of his campaign tasks - like advertising, direct mail, and data gathering - to his Super PAC. More: "The architects of the plan believe the super PAC's ability to legally raise unlimited amounts of money outweighs its primary disadvantage, that it cannot legally coordinate its actions with Bush or his would-be campaign staff."

CHRISTIE: More bad news for the NJ gov, from the Washington Post : "New Jersey state Sen. Joseph M. Kyrillos, who chaired Christie's 2009 gubernatorial campaign and ushered his agenda through a Democratic-controlled legislature, is backing former Florida governor Jeb Bush's all-but-certain presidential bid."

He has hired an Iowa political director for his PAC, reports the Des Moines Register.

Bloomberg writes that Christie is hoping (again) to jumpstart his flagging presidential hopes with a speech in DC.

CLINTON: The New York Times digs into how Hillary Clinton is working to embrace Elizabeth

Warren's populist rhetoric. And/but: "Nothing stings her inner circle more than the suggestion that their candidate is late to these issues. Mrs. Clinton was the original Elizabeth Warren, her advisers say, a populist fighter who for decades has been an advocate for families and children; only now have the party and primary voters caught up."

The Wall Street Journal writes on how Mayor Rahm Emanuel's run-off victory in Chicago could provide lessons for Clinton.

Yesterday in New Hampshire, she said she's "ready" for Republican attacks.

WMUR previews her community college pitch today.

WALKER: The New York Times writes that David Koch has been indicating that Scott Walker is his favorite Republican candidate.

And around the country...

FLORIDA: Republican Tom Rooney says he won't seek Marco Rubio's Senate seat.

NEVADA: Gov. Brian Sandoval is confusing some folks in his own party, writes the Wall Street Journal.

VIRGINIA: Former First Lady Maureen McDonnell is hoping to get her public corruption convictions tossed out.

OBAMA AGENDA: Deploying the USS Theodore Roosevelt

From the AP : "In a stepped-up response to Iranian backing of Shiite rebels in Yemen, the Navy aircraft carrier USS Theodore Roosevelt is steaming toward the waters off Yemen to beef up security and join other American ships that are prepared to intercept any Iranian vessels carrying weapons to the Houthi rebels."

An Egyptian court has sentenced former president Mohammed Morsi to 20 years in prison for charges of inciting violence.

The Baltimore Sun has the latest on the death of Freddie Gray, a 25 year-old black man who suffered a spinal injury while in police custody.

CONGRESS: Business vs. Labor on trade

The Hill writes that business and labor groups are back in their corners as they battle over trade legislation.

The New York Times writes that Congress is pushing forward on Obama's agenda, even as the Hill is now dominated by the GOP.

It's still not clear when Loretta Lynch will get her confirmation vote.

John McCain and Ted Cruz are in a bit of a dust-up over the possibility of hearings on troops carrying personal firearms on military installations.

It looks like Capitol Police Chief Kim Dine is staying on after all, Roll Call reports.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEKEND NEWS

Hillary Clinton's campaign hit back against Peter Schweizer, the author of a controversial book that questions Clinton's impartiality while at the State Department, and attacked him for referring to himself as part of the conservative cause during a Koch Brothers-funded conference. Politico article gives a process analysis of Hillary Clinton campaign fundraising tactics and predicts that Jeb Bush will have raised more money that Hillary Clinton by the end of June. In addition, the New York Times had a story about the progressive groups pushing Hillary Clinton to move to the left in her agenda.

In the case of Freddie Gray's death, in Baltimore's chief prosecutor charged six police officers with a range of crimes including manslaughter and murder. Gov. Chris Christie's former ally pleads guilty to his role in the intentional closing in 2013 of the George Washington Bridge and two others were indicted. Gov. Christie has been cleared of any charges brought against him at this time. The Obama Administration has imposed tougher safety regulations for trains carrying crude oil, responding to growing alarm about a series of fiery derailments that killed dozens of people in a small Canadian town and have rattled U.S. communities from North Dakota to Alabama to Virginia.

WEEKEND'S KEY STORIES 5

Hillary Clinton's big-money dilemma // Politico // Glenn Thrush and Anna Palmer – May 1, 2015.....5

There is a growing realization inside Hillary Clinton's Brooklyn headquarters and among the wider circle of Democratic operatives that coming up with the requisite $1 billion to $2.5 billion in campaign and super PAC cash for the 2016 campaign will be a lot tougher than anticipated — and demands a more aggressive approach to out-of-the-gate fundraising.

6 Baltimore Police Officers Charged in Freddie Gray Death // New York Times // Alan Blinder and Richard Pérez-Peña – May 1, 2015.....9

Baltimore's chief prosecutor charged six police officers on Friday with a range of crimes including murder and manslaughter in the arrest and fatal injury of Freddie Gray, a striking and surprisingly swift turn in a case that has drawn national attention to police conduct. The state's attorney for Baltimore City, Marilyn J. Mosby, filed the charges almost as soon as she received a medical examiner's report that ruled Mr. Gray's death a homicide, and a day after the police concluded their initial investigation and handed over their findings.

Key Christie ally pleads guilty to role in Bridgegate, two others indicted // Washington Post // Rosalind S. Helderman – May 1, 2015.....13

A onetime ally of Christie pleaded guilty Friday, while two others were indicted, in connection with an intentional 2013 traffic jam leading to the George Washington Bridge. David Wildstein, who as an official at the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey had ordered the closure of two of the bridge's toll lanes, confirmed to a federal judge Friday that he closed the lanes to punish the mayor of Fort Lee, Democrat Mark Sokolich, who declined to endorse the Republican governor's reelection bid.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton's big-money dilemma // Politico // Glenn Thrush and Anna Palmer – May 1, 2015

There is a growing realization inside Hillary Clinton's Brooklyn headquarters and among the wider circle of Democratic operatives that coming up with the requisite $1 billion to $2.5 billion in campaign and super PAC cash for the 2016 campaign will be a lot tougher than anticipated — and demands a more aggressive approach to out-of-the-gate fundraising.

The pace of donations to Clinton's three-week-old campaign is surpassing forecasts — but the candidate herself wants to accelerate the timetable and just added several new New York City fundraisers to her May schedule, people close to Clinton tell POLITICO.

Democratic operatives and fundraisers in contact with the campaign cite an array of concerns about the deliberately slow ramp-up to date. There are worries about the willingness of big progressive donors to commit to Clinton before the general election and the campaign's focus on mid-sized donations. The lack of high-impact hires on the finance team have raised eyebrows. Then there is the general unease about the ability of the party's pro-Clinton super PAC to compete with Republican counterparts that will raise hundreds of millions in mega-contributions.

Over it all looms a larger problem – the optics. Barack Obama's huge haul in the first half of 2007 overshadowed Clinton's solid fundraising numbers and shattered her façade of inevitability. The 2016 campaign's decision to solicit only primary election contributions fits the campaign's work-for-every vote ethos, but it's left some donors reluctant to contribute to a race that seems so one-sided already. That means her first campaign finance report — likely due in late July — will fall far short of Jeb Bush, who is expected to raise a jarring $100 million in just the first three months of his unofficial campaign.

"The expectations have always been too high, it's Hillary so everybody expects her to just rake in the money and that was never going to happen," said a veteran Democratic fundraiser who raised $1 million for President Obama but is adopting a wait-and-see-approach before helping out Clinton. "My feeling is that 2015 will be hard, but that things will pick up once we get into 2016. It's not a bad situation, but people have to realize we're in for a long, slow process."

A Clinton spokesperson said the methodical build-up isn't a sign of weakness, but a commitment to creating a system that creates a bigger, broader base of contributors. "Big donors are welcome but with the current finance limits we are better off expanding the donor base and bringing new people in, and it is smarter to bring those new people in May of 2015 than October of 2016," the spokesman said in an emailed statement.

Clinton herself echoed some of those concerns this week when she threw herself onto the fundraising circuit in New York, Washington and California, weeks before she had planned to, in an effort to jump-start the campaign's fundraising – the better to compete with Bush's fundraising juggernaut. "I need to get out there earlier," she told an aide recently.

Clinton has already agreed to appear at two or three additional events in New York the week of May 13th, a senior

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrat familiar with the planning told POLITICO.

And she isn't the only Clinton expected to hit the cash trail – two people close to the situation said they expected Bill Clinton to attend fundraisers, most likely for the super PAC Priorities USA Action, which is hoping to raise a minimum of $150 million and as much as $300 million in the 2016 cycle.

Under executive director Buffy Wicks and longtime Clinton adviser Harold Ickes, Priorities is recruiting a new team of well-connected fundraisers – including Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's former adviser and veteran fundraiser Brian Wolff – and streamlining its internal financial procedures to increase transparency after a nasty internal spat spilled into public view earlier this year.

In a shake-up, board chairman Jim Messina, Obama's 2012 campaign manager, is being moved to an advisory role — and longtime Clinton adviser Guy Cecil will adopt a major role in the super PAC, according to sources familiar with the situation. The moves were first reported in the Washington Post.

In February, POLITICO's Kenneth P. Vogel reported that the group was struggling to come up with 30 or more pledges of at least $1 million apiece to be unveiled when Clinton formally jumped into the race; to date, they have only secured five million-dollar commitments and a handful of smaller donations, according to a source with knowledge of the organization's finances.

And some of Clinton's leading donors aren't committing, including hedge fund billionaire Marc Lasry, who set out to raise $270,000 for Clinton's campaign in its first week. But when he was approached recently about writing a big check to Priorities, he did not immediately commit, instead explaining he'd think about it, according to sources familiar with the group's fundraising.

Priorities' struggles have stoked serious concerns among many Clinton aides, especially from Charlie Baker, a former Priorities board member who stepped down to work on the campaign.

Wicks and other Priorities representatives, including veteran Clinton adviser Paul Begala, are hoping to change that – and will be meeting in small groups with donors in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Chicago and New York over the next few weeks to recruit more contributors. "We'll see what the appetite out there is," said one senior Democratic fundraiser.

The first round of fundraisers hosted by Clinton's own campaign finance team were intentionally small, in keeping with the low-key approach to the kick-off. But organizers of the California events — in which bundlers are encouraged to collect the $2,700 maximum individual primary contributions from ten people — said they are meeting expectations.

"All three events will be at capacity. But the singular thing that is happening here is not only are people contributing but everyone is raising," says Andy Spahn, a veteran Democratic fundraiser with deep connections in Hollywood. "I am making calls for contributions and the only "no's" I get are from people who are saying, 'I'm trying to raise ten checks too.'"

Insiders expressed confidence in Dennis Cheng, the campaign's relatively unknown campaign finance director, whose selection was seen as a signal the campaign was avoiding another mistake of '08: The empowering of celebrity donors who crowded out the younger, more aggressive bundlers who helped power Barack Obama's money machine.

Yet in recent days, as Clinton has assessed her daunting challenge, it's become clear that the force behind the fundraising operation is campaign chairman John Podesta, who has been quietly cultivating big donors and coordinating fundraising strategy.

Podesta, people close to the campaign say, supports the Cheng-led strategy of creating an army of small- to medium-scale campaign bundlers – a "flat" fundraising structure that would give donors the sense of ownership in the campaign. Podesta jokingly refers to himself as the "Sultan of Flat," but more than a dozen older generation Clinton fundraisers and donors interviewed over the past two weeks said they believed the new structure would eventually give way to a more conventional fundraising apparatus that would empower mega-donors on the coasts.

Managing the friction between the old lions of Clinton fundraising – who have no use for the flat organizational chart — and the younger players Cheng hopes to recruit, won't be easy. Cheng recently angered several former Obama fundraisers by offering them their old regional finance jobs – even though they had gone onto to bigger, more lucrative careers in Washington over the years; they turned him down, according to a former Obama campaign official. The campaign's low pay, and the rule that fundraisers must cut ties to other clients, have also been an impediment to getting top-level fundraisers to sign on in key money states like California and New York.

Meanwhile, there's been concern in Democratic finance circles that some of the operatives selected to head regional fundraising efforts are not ready for the big leagues of presidential fundraising.

The regional finance directors' efforts to recruit new bundlers are also being stymied by a perception that the Clinton's fundraising circle is so well-established that it's tough for anyone new to break through.

Cheng, for his part, has also been trying to reassure Obama bundlers and even former lower level Clinton administration aides, who have now gone on to successful careers, that they won't be marginalized. "Their sense is that unless they raise zillions of dollars, they're never going to be noticed and certainly never going to infiltrate their already tight-knit inner circle, so why bother," one New York-based fundraiser said. "Everyone knows who Clinton's inner circle is, that they are going to raise a boat load of money with relatively little effort, and that there is little that can be done by a new person to make their mark."

Even Washington events like the one campaign chairman Podesta and campaign manager Robby Mook did last week in D.C. have drawn criticism for being a little too old-boys-club-ish, including one hosted by Bill Clinton's close friend Vernon Jordan. Meanwhile, other major donors are complaining about being asked to give early and often to Clinton toward the 2016 primary – and not the far more competitive general election. One veteran Democratic operative said that's where they had heard the most complaining.

Another major question that remains unanswered: When will Clinton create a joint fundraising committee with the Democratic National Committee, which would allow her to ask for $35,000 from individuals?

In the meantime, as Clinton and her team fine-tune their strategy, a key critic on the left was peppering her campaign with questions about her family's charitable and political fundraising practices.

"So do I have concerns about the Clinton Foundation and that money? I do," newly announced Clinton primary opponent Sen. Bernie Sanders told ABC on Thursday. "But I am concerned about Sheldon Adelson and his billions. I'm concerned about the Koch brothers and their billions. We're looking at a system where our democracy is being owned by a handful of billionaires."

6 Baltimore Police Officers Charged in Freddie Gray Death // New York Times // Alan Blinder and Richard Pérez-Peña – May 1, 2015

Baltimore's chief prosecutor charged six police officers on Friday with a range of crimes including murder and manslaughter in the arrest and fatal injury of Freddie Gray, a striking and surprisingly swift turn in a case that has drawn national attention to police conduct.

The state's attorney for Baltimore City, Marilyn J. Mosby, filed the charges almost as soon as she received a medical examiner's report that ruled Mr. Gray's death a homicide, and a day after the police concluded their initial investigation and handed over their findings. Officials had cautioned that it could take considerable time for her office to complete its own investigation and decide whether to prosecute.

In a city rocked by unrest this week, and now under curfew and patrolled by National Guard troops, Ms. Mosby's announcement on the steps of the War Memorial downtown drew cheers from the assembled crowd while a nearby cordon of officers in riot gear looked on stonily. As word spread, people in parts of the city took to the streets in spontaneous celebration.

By nightfall a large demonstration wound its way through the streets and the scene became confrontational shortly after the curfew began with small disruptions in front of City Hall and at Pennsylvania Avenue and West North Avenue, where people blocked traffic and taunted the police. Some arrests were made and the crowds disbanded as the police and National Guard closed in.

The officers who were arrested, three white and three black, include a lieutenant with 17 years on the force, several near-rookies and a woman who had just been promoted to sergeant.

The most serious charges were brought against Officer Caesar R. Goodson Jr., who was driving the van that carried Mr. Gray to a police station after his April 12 arrest. Along with involuntary manslaughter, Officer Goodson, 45, was charged with "second-degree depraved heart murder," which means indifference to human life.

All six officers were arrested and appeared before a judicial officer. Bail was set at $350,000 for four of the officers and $250,000 for the other two, according to court records. By late Friday, court records showed the officers had been released from jail.

The death of Mr. Gray, 25, a week after he suffered a spinal cord injury brought to a boil long-simmering tensions between the police and poor neighborhoods in this majority-black city, culminating in rioting and looting on Monday. More peaceful demonstrations continued through the week after a curfew was put in place. And the swift action by the prosecutor seemed to some to mark a turning point after months of debate and demonstrations around the country over police violence.

"The larger message, if there is one, is that we're moving on these things," said David A. Harris, a law professor and expert on police racial issues at the University of Pittsburgh. "We're taking them seriously, and there's no longer going to be any kind of slowing down and taking it to the point where people wonder, 'Whatever happened to that?' "

In Washington, President Obama declined to comment on the charges directly, but said that what mattered was for the justice system to work properly. "What I think the people of Baltimore want more than anything else is the truth," he said. "That's what people around the country expect."

The Gray family said it was satisfied with the charges. "We must seize this opportunity to reform police departments throughout this country," said the family's lawyer, William H. Murphy Jr.

The Baltimore chapter of the Fraternal Order of Police called the speed of the prosecutor politically motivated. "The actions taken today by the state's attorney are an egregious rush to judgment," said Michael E. Davey, the union's lawyer. "We believe that these officers will be vindicated, as they have done nothing wrong."

Ms. Mosby faulted the police conduct at every turn. The officers who arrested him "failed to establish probable cause for Mr. Gray's arrest, as no crime had been committed," she said, describing the arrest as illegal. Officers accused him of possession of a switchblade, but Ms. Mosby said, "The knife was not a switchblade and is lawful under Maryland law."

Ms. Mosby said Mr. Gray suffered a spinal injury while being transported in a police van — and not earlier, while being arrested — and pointed to the failure of the police to put a seatbelt on him as a crucial factor.

"Mr. Gray suffered a severe and critical neck injury as a result of being handcuffed, shackled by his feet and unrestrained inside the B.P.D. wagon," she said.

Despite repeated stops to check on Mr. Gray, the van driver, Officer Goodson, and other officers never belted him in, she said, at times leaving him face-down on the van floor with his hands behind him. Though there has been speculation that the police intentionally gave Mr. Gray a "rough ride," intended to slam him against the metal sides of the van, Ms. Mosby did not refer to that possibility. She charged only Officer Goodson with second-degree murder, the most serious crime facing the six officers; he was also accused of manslaughter, assault and misconduct in office.

Mr. Gray's condition deteriorated, she said, as officers repeatedly ignored his pleas for medical attention and ignored obvious signs that he was in distress. At one point, she said, when officers tried to check on him, Mr. Gray was unresponsive, yet no action was taken. He died of his injuries a week later.

Lt. Brian Rice was charged with manslaughter, assault, misconduct in office and false imprisonment. Officer William G. Porter and Sgt. Alicia White were charged with manslaughter, assault and misconduct in office. Officers Edward M. Nero and Garrett E. Miller were charged with assault, misconduct in office and false imprisonment.

As Ms. Mosby finished reading her announcement, the news began to ripple through a crowd of African-American residents and activists who had pooled around her. Edward Jenkins, 44, a motivational speaker and musician who goes by the name Voyce, approached and could hardly contain his surprise when he was told of the charges. "Are you serious?" he said.

Like many Baltimore residents, Mr. Jenkins, who grew up in Mr. Gray's neighborhood, said he thought the announcement might put a damper on further unrest. "I think this will take some of the nervousness off of it, but they'll still want a guilty verdict," he said. "It means that we're absolutely getting a start on justice."

Standing on a nearby street corner, Renee James, 48, said, "There's no need to go tear up the city no more."

Her friend Antoinnette White, 53, said of the riot: "Hurting innocent people was nonsense. I cried."

But Abdullah Moaney, 53, an information technology worker from East Baltimore, said that "peace has lost its credibility." Seeking to justify the violence that broke out Monday, he said that "if it wasn't for the riot," charges would not have been filed.

Homicide Charges in Gray Case Announced

Marilyn J. Mosby, the state's attorney for Baltimore, said that Freddie Gray's arrest was illegal and that there was probable cause to file manslaughter charges against the police officers involved.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“This is a great day, and I think we need to realize that,” said Representative Elijah E. Cummings, Democrat of Maryland. “I think a message has been sent by our state’s attorney that she treasures every life, that she values every person.”

Elsewhere Friday, rallies celebrating May Day and calling attention to police killings of black men emerged in cities across the country, including Oakland, Calif., Seattle and Portland, Ore. In Manhattan, protesters marched from Union Square to Foley Square, some chanting, “Make them pay for Freddie Gray!”

Mayor Stephanie Rawlings-Blake of Baltimore said most of the city’s officers were good, but added, “To those who choose to engage in violence, brutality, racism and brutality, let me be clear: There is no place in the Baltimore Police Department for you.”

Mr. Gray started the fateful ride on the floor of the police van, Ms. Mosby said. A short time later, Officer Goodson “proceeded to the back of the wagon in order to observe Mr. Gray,” she said.

“At no point did he seek, nor did he render, any medical help for Mr. Gray,” Ms. Mosby said.

President Obama on Freddie Gray Charges

The president commented on the filing of homicide, manslaughter and misconduct charges against police officers in the death of Mr. Gray.

A few blocks later, he called a dispatcher to say that he needed help checking on his prisoner. Another officer arrived, and the back of the van was opened. “Mr. Gray at that time requested help and indicated that he could not breathe,” and asked twice for a medic, Ms. Mosby said. While the officers helped him onto the bench in the back of the van, she said, they still did not belt him in.

While they were there, she said, a call went out for a van to pick up and transport another person who had been arrested. “Despite Mr. Gray’s obvious and recognized need for assistance, Officer Goodson, in a grossly negligent manner,” answered that call, rather than seeking medical help, Ms. Mosby said.

At the van’s next stop, Officer Goodson met the officers who made the initial arrest, and a sergeant who had arrived on the scene. Opening the van once again, they “observed Mr. Gray unresponsive on the floor of the wagon,” Ms. Mosby said.

The sergeant, she said, spoke to the back of Mr. Gray’s head, but he did not respond. “She made no effort to look, or assess, or determine his condition,” Ms. Mosby said.

When the van finally arrived at the Western District police station and officers tried to remove him, “Mr. Gray was no longer breathing at all,” she said. A medic was summoned and found Mr. Gray in cardiac arrest. Then he was rushed to a hospital.

A. Dwight Pettit, a lawyer who handles police brutality cases in Baltimore — and worked to help elect Ms. Mosby — said her emphasis on the officers’ lack of probable cause in arresting Mr. Gray was significant. Rarely, he said, are police officers prosecuted for making false arrests — and too often, they do not worry about lacking probable cause.

He called the charges of false imprisonment “something new for police activity, which offends the constitutional rights of citizens.”

Key Christie ally pleads guilty to role in Bridgegate, two others indicted // Washington Post // Rosalind S. Helderman – May 1, 2015

A onetime ally and former high school classmate of New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie pleaded guilty Friday, while two other former members of Christie’s inner circle were indicted, in connection with an intentional 2013 traffic jam leading to the George Washington Bridge.

David Wildstein, who as an official at the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey had ordered the closure of two of the bridge’s toll lanes, confirmed to a federal judge Friday that he closed the lanes to punish the mayor of Fort Lee, Democrat Mark Sokolich, who declined to endorse the Republican governor’s reelection bid.

Indicted Friday were Christie’s former deputy chief of staff Bridget Anne Kelly and William E. Baroni Jr., a top political appointee at the Port Authority. Wildstein said he had conspired with the two to engineer the traffic jam and falsely claim it was part of a traffic study.

U.S. Attorney Paul J. Fishman said he did not anticipate further charges related to the traffic jam. But a federal investigation into other matters sparked by the bridge inquiry continues.

The attorney for ex-Christie ally David Wildstein said his client "deeply regrets" his involvement in the George Washington Bridge lane closure scheme for which he pleaded guilty Friday and reiterated his claim that New Jersey Gov. Christie knew about it. (AP)
Fishman said that the three officials “callously victimized the people of Fort Lee, who were just trying to get to school, go to work or travel wherever else they needed to go.”

Fishman said the plan was hatched in August 2013, after Sokolich withheld his endorsement, but it was not implemented until early September when the Christie allies knew the start of school would worsen gridlock. As part of the scheme, prosecutors allege that the three ignored Sokolich’s increasingly desperate entreaties about the traffic and lied to the media.

Christie has maintained that he was not given advance warning when two toll lanes of the busy bridge were closed in September 2013. An internal investigation that he commissioned cleared Christie of personal wrongdoing in the episode but found that the closure had been purposeful and politically motivated. Fishman declined to comment on those claims.

In a statement, Christie said Friday that the charges confirmed what he has long said about the incident.

“I had no knowledge or involvement in the planning or execution of this act,” he said. “The moment I first learned of this unacceptable behavior I took action, firing staff believed to be accountable, calling for an outside investigation and agreeing to fully cooperate with all appropriate investigations, which I have done,” he said.

Still, fallout from the scandal has significantly deflated Christie’s presidential prospects, which were extremely bright two years ago after he easily won reelection in a deep blue state and was encouraged to seek the White House by some of the GOP’s biggest donors. In the painful aftermath of Hurricane Sandy in 2012, he cultivated an image as a hands-on, can-do chief executive.

A recent Quinnipiac University poll shows 56 percent of New Jersey voters disapproving of Christie’s performance as governor, with 38 percent approving — Christie’s lowest ratings ever in that poll.

Christie and his advisers breathed a sigh of relief Friday, saying that the indictments bring finality to the controversy that had stunted his presidential campaign. “It’s been the elephant in the room,” one adviser said, but also saying, “It’s not like anyone’s doing backflips.”

Christie’s advisers acknowledged that he still has a lot of work to do to persuade voters and donors to give him a second look. Over the next three weeks, Christie is planning several trips to New Hampshire, where he will hold town-hall style gatherings, as well as private meetings with prospective donors. These events will help him gauge whether he has a viable path forward in the presidential race. He plans to make his decision about whether to launch a campaign late this month or in early June.

But Alan Zegas, Wildstein’s attorney, has said “evidence exists” that Christie knew about the closures, despite his denials. Speaking to reporters outside the U.S. District Court in Newark on Friday, Zegas stood by that claim, indicating that “there is a lot more that will come out.” Fishman repeatedly refused to comment on who else, including Christie, may have known about the plot to clog traffic.

As the long-running scandal came to a head in New Jersey, Christie was in the Washington region, delivering a speech Friday morning to the politically connected Northern Virginia Technology Council in McLean.

He had been scheduled to attend an afternoon fundraiser for Maryland Gov. Larry Hogan (R), but that event was canceled because Hogan is dealing with the aftermath of unrest in Baltimore.

In 2013, a legislative inquiry revealed Wildstein received an e-mail from Kelly indicating that it was “time for some traffic problems in Fort Lee,” the town at the foot of the bridge affected most by the closures. The e-mail exchange, which first suggested that the closure had been orchestrated, prompted the 16-month investigation into the incident that culminated in charges Friday.

Wildstein pleaded guilty to two criminal counts, misusing federal property and denying Fort Lee residents their civil rights. Baroni and Kelly were each charged with seven felony counts in a joint indictment, including wire fraud.

Kelly quickly launched a Web site to appeal for donations to a legal defense fund. At a news conference, she said it was “ludicrous” to suggest that she was the only person in the governor’s office with knowledge of the scheme. She also said she was embarrassed by the tone of her e-mails but insisted she is not guilty of criminal activity.

“I will fight relentlessly to clear myself of these charges and will work to regain my reputation and restore a sense of normalcy for my children," she said.

Baroni's legal team released a statement calling Wildstein a "criminal and liar" who had falsely led Baroni to think that a legitimate traffic study was underway on the bridge; they said he is not guilty of the charges.

Although the criminal investigation began with the bridge incident, it has broadened to include an investigation of the activities of the Port Authority and allegations that Christie's staffers had leveraged public resources as political tools in other ways. Those investigations are thought to be ongoing.

"Every organization behaves in a fashion in concert with the leader of that organization," said New Jersey Assemblyman John S. Wisniewski (D), who led legislative investigations into Christie's staff. "When we see a governor who routinely told people to sit down and shut up, who routinely engaged in name-calling and intimidation, you can see how this kind of behavior fit right in and perhaps was even condoned."

Wisniewski said his committee will reexamine statements made to legislators under oath by a series of Christie aides who insisted that the traffic jam was caused by a traffic study.

Beyond his fading first-tier status in GOP circles, Christie also has seen his grip on power in New Jersey loosening — rapidly losing support among a handful of prominent home-state donors and power brokers who are either hesitant to back him or shifting allegiance to former Florida governor Jeb Bush.

New Jersey state Sen. Joseph M. Kyrillos, chairman of Christie's 2009 gubernatorial campaign and a longtime personal friend, bolted last month to Bush's camp. New York Jets owner Woody Johnson, a onetime Christie booster, attended a major Bush fundraiser in Miami last weekend.

Speaking in March at the state Capitol, Kyrillos lambasted Christie's management of the Port Authority: "Rogue managers in place . . . toll increases: outrageous. Bridgegate: outrageous. Outrageous." He added, "Biggest bridge in the world. An embarrassment to everybody, including the governor, who said as much at the outset."

There have been other bumps along the way. Christie's remarks about child vaccinations on a trip earlier this year to London drew scathing criticism and alarmed some of his supporters. He had to make a series of calls to assure contributors that he supports vaccination for diseases such as measles. His embrace of wealthy Dallas Cowboys owner Jerry Jones and a New York Times report on his penchant for private planes and luxury hotels made headlines.

Embattled but nonetheless determined to rebuild his political standing, Christie has moved aggressively in the past year to regain his footing with party leaders and activists, traveling frequently to early primary states and in 2014 raising more than $100 million for GOP candidates as chairman of the Republican Governors Association.

Christie's political team, which once envisioned a robust early campaign, has narrowed its focus mostly to New Hampshire, where Christie has held a series of town-hall meetings meant to reintroduce him to skeptical Republicans and regenerate some of the electricity that was a hallmark of his town-hall meetings in New Jersey in his first term, when his loud clashes with public employees became popular on YouTube.

Nationally, Christie still counts several financiers as allies, including Kenneth G. Langone, the billionaire co-founder of Home Depot, and Ray Washburne, a Dallas real estate developer leading the fundraising push for Christie's political-action committee.

But the lane closures continued to haunt his comeback efforts. In December, he was interviewed by federal investigators at Drumthwacket, the official residence of the New Jersey governor, before he traveled to Iowa, home to the first-in-the-nation Republican presidential caucuses.

While shaking hands at a Manchester, N.H., restaurant this month, Christie was teased by Buck Mercier, 69, who told the governor that he made sure when he heard of Christie's visit that "the bridges were going to be open." Christie smiled. "Which direction is the bridge?" he asked. "I'll make sure it's open."

Hillary Clinton's smartest move: Say no to TPP, and join the Warren/Krugman forces
Sports obsessive that he is, President Obama likes to refer to the final two years of his second term as his administration's "fourth quarter." He does this because it's a useful shorthand; but I'd guess his vanity, which is a characteristic of any successful politician, is motivational, too. By referring to himself as in the fourth quarter,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama reminds an increasingly distracted press corps that the game isn't officially finished for him quite yet — and, until it is, he intends to keep playing.

Since being the center of attention usually means being the focal point of criticism as well, that's probably a role that Hillary Clinton, Obama's former secretary of state and would-be successor, is happy to leave him for the time being. Better he suffer the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune (a.k.a. the Republican Party) from the comfort of the White House than she do so while pretending to enjoy Iowa's signature cuisine.

But while there may currently be a sort of harmony between the Democratic Party's two most influential figures, their respective self-interests are only complementary up to a point. Sooner or later, it'll be time for Obama to cede the spotlight and the stage to the Clintons yet again; and sooner or later, Clinton will have to accept her role as the party's de facto leader while establishing how (and why) her stewardship will be different. The guardians of American politics' unwritten rules will expect nothing less.

Rather than delay the inevitable until it's foisted upon her by the press, wouldn't it be easier if Clinton got ahead of the meta-narrative and established where she breaks with the president herself? I think the answer is quite clearly yes. The harder it is for the press to succumb to its weakness for narcissism and frivolity, the better. And Clinton's at her best when talking about policy — not her own "authenticity" or how the press corps' feels — to boot.

Author: Clinton Foundation Disclosures 'Sloppy At The Very Least' // NPR // Scott Simon – May 2, 2015

NPR's Scott Simon talks with Joshua Green of Bloomberg News about the Clinton Foundation and its apparent lack of transparency over donors.

SCOTT SIMON, HOST:

This is WEEKEND EDITION from NPR News. I'm Scott Simon. Hillary Clinton is drawing more attention right now for the foundation that bears her family's name than her run for president. Clinton Foundation is under scrutiny for contributions from foreign donors that were made while Mrs. Clinton was Secretary of State. During that time, a Canadian mining financier donated millions of dollars to the Clinton Foundation. He also secured a lucrative mining deal that required approval of the State Department while Hillary Clinton was Secretary of State. Joshua Green of Bloomberg News joins us in our studios. Thanks very much for being with us.

JOSHUA GREEN: Good to be with you.

SIMON: These connections were first unearthed, to my knowledge, by Peter Schweizer, who wrote the book that's coming out next week, "Clinton Cash." The New York Times has been advancing the story. You certainly have at Bloomberg News. Give us, if you could, a quick picture about what's known about the relationship between the Clinton's and this Canadian business person.

GREEN: Well, Frank Guistra is his name. I interviewed him about a week or so ago. And he explained to me he met Bill Clinton at a fundraiser for tsunami victims. He was dazzled by him, was invited to become involved in his charities and has in a very big way - not only pledging or giving tens of millions of dollars but also pledging half the profits of his mining company in perpetuity to the Clinton Foundation. He landed on the board of the Clinton Foundation and actually started up the Canadian wing, something called the Clinton-Guistra Enterprise Partnership.

SIMON: But the fact that it's the Canadian affiliate is what has incited so much interest because at least, as I have been given to understand, they don't have to disclose donors the way they would here in the U.S.

GREEN: Well, that's not so clear. I mean, what happened was Peter Schweizer, the author of "Clinton Cash," does a chapter or two on Guistra and his relationship with Bill Clinton. And they have flown around the globe on Guistra's plane, including to Kazakhstan, where they had dinner with the president. And shortly thereafter, Guistra secured a lucrative uranium mining deal. But it's caused, for Schweizer - now other journalists, including myself - to kind of dive into the Clinton Foundation's tax filings and receipts. And look at, OK, well, who really is giving money? And what Schweizer discovered was that there were about half a dozen Canadian donors who hadn't disclosed millions of dollars in donations, including the chairman of this uranium company that Guistra founded. And that's problematic because as a condition of Hillary Clinton becoming Secretary of State, the Clinton Foundation signed an agreement with the Obama White House saying we pledge to disclose all of our donors on an annual basis. All of this was going to be done out in the open. And it turns out that it hasn't.

SIMON: Yeah. So the implication of your reporting is that whatever it means politically, it violated the agreement between the White House and Hillary Clinton about becoming Secretary of State.

GREEN: Oh, absolutely. There's no real dispute about that. In fact, the president of the Clinton Foundation came out last weekend and issued an odd statement saying, you know, we've made some mistakes. We're going to re-file our taxes. And, oh, by the way, Canadian law forbids us from disclosing people who donate through our Canadian affiliate. At the time, we only knew about four or five in Schweizer's book who hadn't been disclosed. But it turns out now - we're up to 1,100 and counting.

SIMON: Any indication that laws have been violated?

GREEN: I don't think there is, no. There is no indication yet that any laws have been violated. I think a lot of reporters who have read the book and done reporting on it would say, well, there may not be criminality, but there certainly do appear to be lots of examples of sloppiness, at the very least, and conflict of interest or maybe something worse. But I think in the months and, I'm afraid, years ahead as we go through this presidential campaign, that's what reporters are going to be looking into.

SIMON: Joshua Green, national correspondent for Bloomberg Politics, thanks so much.

GREEN: Thank you.

Hillary Clinton's conflict-of-interest problems // LATimes // Doyle McManus – May 2, 2015

The harshest charges against Hillary Rodham Clinton — that she made decisions that favored donors to her family's charitable foundation when she was secretary of State — aren't sticking. Yes, the Obama administration approved a donor's sale of U.S. uranium mines to a Russian firm, but Clinton does not appear to have been involved. Yes, the administration concluded a trade treaty with Colombia that benefited Clinton Foundation donors, but that was President Obama's decision, not Clinton's. And yes, Clinton lobbied foreign governments on behalf of donors such as General Electric and Boeing — but that's part of every secretary of State's job description.

Still, that doesn't mean candidate Clinton has emerged unmuddied from the swamp of accusations and innuendoes stirred up by conservative author Peter Schweizer in a book scheduled for publication this week. The front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination still has some explaining to do.

When she was nominated as secretary of State in 2009, Clinton promised that she would bend over backward to avoid potentially compromising situations.

“Out of [an] abundance of caution and a desire to avoid even the appearance ... of a conflict,” Clinton said, the foundation would agree to strict rules: It would disclose all its donors and clear new contributions from foreign governments with the State Department.

Only that didn't happen. The biggest branch of the Clintons' charitable network, the Clinton Health Access Initiative, never complied with the agreement at all, according to the Boston Globe. It neither disclosed its donors nor cleared new contributions. (A spokesman said they didn't think it was necessary. After media inquiries, the program published a list of donors last month.) The Clinton Foundation also failed to clear a donation of $500,000 from Algeria. (An oversight, the foundation said.) And the foundation's Canadian affiliate collected millions of dollars without disclosing donors' names. (Canadian law guarantees privacy to donors, but the foundation could have asked them to voluntarily disclose their identities; it didn't until last week.)

Beyond the Clinton Foundation and its affiliates, former President Bill Clinton's personal income has raised eyebrows, too.

[She] has tried to deal with bad press by either ignoring it or deploying underlings to attack her critics. That's not going to work; Clinton's problems won't just go away.
Thanks to the Washington Post, we have learned that Bill Clinton made almost $105 million giving speeches from 2001 to 2012 — and his biggest fees came from foreign hosts while his wife was secretary of State: $1.4 million from a Nigerian media firm (for two visits to Lagos); $750,000 from the Swedish telecommunication giant Ericsson; $600,000 from Dutch financial firm Achmea; and $500,000 from Renaissance Capital, a Russian investment bank with ties to Vladimir Putin's Kremlin.

The former president did take one sensible precaution: He cleared his speech gigs with State Department ethics lawyers. According to records obtained by the gadfly group Judicial Watch, the lawyers approved every one of the 215 speeches that were proposed.

There's nothing illegal about any of that; other former presidents have accepted giant speaking fees, too. Ronald Reagan once picked up $2 million for a trip to Japan — and that was in 1989 dollars.

But there's nothing pretty about that picture, either. Even though the lawyers approved the deals, dozens of the firms that paid Bill Clinton were doing business with the U.S. government at the time. Surely Hillary Clinton's 2009 promise to avoid “even the appearance” of any conflict of interest should have applied to her spouse as well as the family foundation — right?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clinton Foundation has taken one step in the direction of reform: It said it would stop taking money from most foreign governments while one of its namesakes is running for president. For the most part, though, Clinton has tried to deal with bad press by either ignoring it or deploying underlings to attack her critics.

A successful candidate, at least in the Democratic primaries, needs to reassure voters that she can reduce the impact of money in politics and restore confidence in government. Right now, Clinton can't do that credibly.

And Clinton's conflict-of-interest problems will dog her in the debates that will begin in August. “The Clinton Foundation ... that's a fair issue,” Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont said Thursday as he announced his candidacy. (The bigger issue, he added, is “the huge amount of money it takes to run a campaign.”)

Hillary Clinton can't undo the past. But here are four things she can do to improve the situation now: She can press the Clinton Foundation and its affiliates for disclosure of all donors, in belated compliance with the agreement they made in 2009. She can ask the foundation to tighten its limits on foreign donations — for example, to cover individuals with close ties to foreign governments. She can ask her husband to tighten his criteria for speaking fees, too, and make it clear that he'll donate his biggest paychecks to charity. Most important, she can spell out the rules she expects her family to live under if voters decide to put her in the White House.

Last week, I asked the Clinton campaign if they saw merit in any of those ideas. I haven't heard back.

Hillary campaign pans 'Clinton Cash' author for comments at Koch event //The Hill // Ben Kamisar - May 1, 2015

The Hillary Clinton campaign is hitting back against Peter Schweizer, the author of a controversial book that questions Clinton’s impartiality while at the State Department, attacking him for referring to himself as part of the conservative cause.

The Clinton camp has honed in on Schweizer’s comments at a 2014 summit sponsored by the conservative multimillionaire donors Charles and David Koch, where he gave attendees a call to action.

“Politicians today are not going to let up, the left and the academic sphere is not going to let up,” he said, according to the Lady Libertine blog, which has released a number of audio tracks of prominent conservatives speaking at the retreat.

“The question is: Are we going to let up? And I would contend to you that we cannot let up.”

Brian Fallon, the Clinton campaign’s national press secretary, bashed the comments as indicative of political motivations.

"This is the clearest evidence yet that this widely discredited book is part of a coordinated Republican attack strategy,” he told The Hill exclusively.

“The author's remarks at a Koch fundraiser pull the curtain back on his true purpose in going after Hillary Clinton and the Clinton Foundation."

A Clinton aide added that the campaign plans to highlight the quote on social media.

Schweizer also told the audience during his remarks that “the left doesn’t dislike you or hate you because of what you do, they dislike you and hate you because of who you are.”

Kurt Bardella, who helps represent Schweizer, downplayed the remarks in a statement to the Lady Libertine Blog.

“As he has in several speeches as a lifelong conservative, Schweizer was espousing his view that conservatives should be informed, engaged, and active,” he said.

“The real politically motivated attacks are coming from Team Clinton as they try the tired and, at this point, very desperate strategy of drawing attention to things that have been in the public domain for sometime in the hopes that Bill and Hillary can continue avoiding the press and their questions."

The Clinton camp’s criticism comes as liberals and conservatives spar over the revelations in Schweizer’s book. He lays out a number of instances where Clinton Foundation donors directly benefited from Clinton’s conduct as secretary of State and repeatedly said in media appearances that the evidence suggests she played favorites.

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), who’s in the midst of his own presidential candidacy, has repeatedly called for an investigation into Clinton’s conduct at State based off of the allegations.

Fellow White House hopeful Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) has called for her foundation for return all foreign donations in light of the accusations.

But Clinton allies and other Democrats have panned the book as politically motivated and Fallon previously told the New York Times that its allegations of favoritism are "baseless."

Clinton Loyalist Joins Priorities 'Super PAC' // First Draft – New York Times – May 1, 2015

A longtime leading operative for Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton will join Priorities USA Action, the dominant "super PAC" that will seek big-ticket donations to finance what is expected to be the long and expensive presidential campaign of Mrs. Clinton.

The move by the operative, Guy Cecil, was described by three people familiar with the discussions as a brushback to Jim Messina, President Obama's campaign manager in 2012 and now the co-chairman of Priorities's board.

Mr. Cecil, who had been a top contender to run Mrs. Clinton's campaign, had long been expected to sign on to the PAC, which will rev up its fund-raising efforts as Jeb Bush's super PAC has already kicked into overdrive.

It is not yet clear exactly what role Mr. Cecil, whose move was first reported by The Washington Post, will play at the PAC. Priorities was dormant during the 2014 mid-term elections and starts out behind in the money race to several super PACs supporting Republican candidates.

But officials involved with the group are aware that they need to begin fund-raising aggressively, as Mr. Bush, the former Florida governor, and other Republicans rake in major contributions to their own super PACs.

Mr. Cecil, a favorite of Bill Clinton's, is a Clinton loyalist coming into a role that initially was supposed to be played by John D. Podesta. But Mr. Podesta went to the White House to work for Mr. Obama, and then became Mrs. Clinton's campaign chairman.

At the same time, Mr. Messina, who has been viewed with suspicion for years by many of Mrs. Clinton's advisers, had become more representative of the super PAC than some of her allies were comfortable with.

In recent months, Mr. Messina and David Brock, Mrs. Clinton's staunchest defender and the founder of Media Matters, had a public fight that prompted Mr. Brock's resignation from the Priorities USA board. (He has since reopened discussions with the board.)

Lately, the Clinton campaign has started to signal to donors that Priorities is, as one person briefed on the pitch put it, "the preferred super PAC" to help support her bid for the White House. But there has been little specificity beyond that.

At the same time, Mrs. Clinton has held a series of fund-raisers in New York and Washington this week as she builds the "Hillstarters" program that requests that donors raise $27,000 for the campaign (or the maximum of $2,700 allowed in a nominating contest from 10 supporters).

Next week, Mrs. Clinton will host a discussion in Nevada and will attend fund-raisers in Los Angeles, where Democrats who were split between Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama in 2008 have expressed early support for her 2016 bid. Meanwhile, senior campaign staff members have been on a road show across the country to explain the campaign's strategy and approach to prospective donors.

In February, tensions between Clinton loyalists and former Obama aides erupted, and Mr. Messina's allies worried that a strategist who was closer to Bill and Hillary Clinton would replace him.

Mr. Cecil, who was previously the executive director of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, had been widely expected to be that strategist. It is unclear what his role will mean for Mr. Messina and the existing leadership at the super PAC, including Buffy Wicks, who serves as executive director. A spokesman for the group declined to comment. Mr. Cecil did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

One Democrat close to the talks to bring Mr. Cecil into Priorities called him as "loyal to the Clintons as they are to him — he is a Clinton person, and funders need that." The Democrat was quick to describe Mr. Cecil and Ms. Wicks as a "team."

Another Clinton loyalist, Harold Ickes, who was an original adviser to Priorities in 2012, has stepped up his role recently, according to people involved with the group. Mr. Cecil is also a former employee of the Dewey Square Group, and a founding partner of the group, Charlie Baker, was just named Mrs. Clinton's chief administrative officer.

Mrs. Clinton has made campaign finance reform one of the "four fights" of her presidential campaign, vowing to get unaccountable money out of politics. When stopped on the campaign trail in Iowa last month and asked by Post reporters about the role of Priorities, Mrs. Clinton shrugged.

"I don't know," she said.

Clinton Accelerates Fundraising Efforts for Primaries in Presidential Bid // Wall Street Journal // Peter Nicholas - May 1, 2015

Hillary Clinton is ramping up fundraising for her presidential campaign, packing her schedule with donor events that are at the same time designed to signal that she will be more frugal than in her last race.

Mrs. Clinton attended a half-dozen fundraising receptions in New York City and Washington, D.C., this week and plans to go to several in California over three days next week. There, she will draw on long-standing support in the entertainment industry. A co-host of one event is Jeffrey Katzenberg, chief executive of DreamWorks Animation SKG and a longtime Democratic donor.

As with other elements of her campaign, Mrs. Clinton is taking steps intended to avoid the mistakes of her first presidential bid, in 2008. People familiar with her plans said she is setting a lower dollar threshold needed for designation as a "Hillstarter," or top fundraiser, in an effort to draw in more supporters. "Hillstarters" need to bring in $27,000, or 10 times the maximum individual donation allowed in the primary, compared with $100,000 in the previous campaign.

Mrs. Clinton was often criticized in 2008 for spending lavishly on consultants and other expenses. The campaign says it is trying a more thrifty approach this year and is signaling that to donors. At a morning fundraising event in New York, donors were given name tags with plastic holders. At the end of the reception, campaign aides asked them to return the holders for reuse.

The breakfast itself was a no-frills affair: coffee and Danish. "Nobody was making omelets," said one participant, Jay Jacobs, chairman of the Nassau County Democrats on Long Island.

One Clinton campaign adviser said, "The frugality is to make sure our donors know the money is going toward things that matter: staff, organization and communication."

While she is raising money now only for the Democratic primaries, Mrs. Clinton accelerated her schedule in part because of the aggressive fundraising efforts of former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, a Republican who is seen as one of her strongest potential opponents in a general election, people familiar with the matter said. The idea is for Mrs. Clinton to show a robust total when her first federal campaign-finance report is due on July 15.

Mrs. Clinton told a group of more than 100 supporters in Manhattan this week that she plans to raise $100 million for the Democratic primary, about half of what she collected in the 2008 campaign. In that race, she needed every cent in a protracted contest against then-Sen. Barack Obama. So far this time around, no other potential Democratic rival is within 50 points of Mrs. Clinton in public-opinion surveys.

Still, in raising money only for the primary, Mrs. Clinton is trying to signal she isn't taking the nomination for granted. Her only formal rival so far, Sen. Bernie Sanders, the independent from Vermont, said Friday he had raised $1.5 million online since announcing his campaign on Thursday. Some 35,000 people donated, Mr. Sanders' campaign said.

Mrs. Clinton is getting plenty of outside help. A super PAC called Priorities USA Action, whose mission is to help Mrs. Clinton win the White House, has been asking donors for money that will be used to underwrite TV and Internet advertising. A co-chairman of the super PAC is Jim Messina, who managed Mr. Obama's 2012 re-election campaign.

Priorities USA hasn't ruled out targeting Democratic rivals if they pose a threat to Mrs. Clinton's bid for the nomination. Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor and a potential White House candidate, has been getting bolder in his criticism, telling a TV interviewer in March that the presidency is "not some crown to be passed between two families"—a clear reference to Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Bush, whose brother and father are former presidents.

One person close to Priorities USA said: "If "O'Malley gets in and really goes after Hillary and attacks her hard, one of Priorities' functions is to rise to her defense."

Clinton ramps up fundraising as GOP candidates surge ahead // USAToday // Fredreka Schouten – May 1, 2015

Hillary Clinton is stepping up her race for campaign money, holding three invitation-only events in the nation's capital Thursday ahead of a fundraising swing next week through California.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Democrat front-runner, who is deliberately focusing on raising her money in relatively modest amounts, may need every penny. Several Republicans vying for their party's presidential nomination are pulling in staggering sums through new super PACs that can collect unlimited contributions, setting up a 2016 campaign that will be awash in cash.

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush, who declared his interest in the GOP nomination last December, has yet to officially join the campaign, giving him the leeway to raise big sums for his Right to Rise super PAC.

At this pace, spending in the 2016 race could top $4 billion — or about twice the amount that President Obama, Republican Mitt Romney and their allies collected in the 2012 contest, said Anthony Corrado, an elections expert at Colby College in Maine.

"It's a radically different approach to structuring campaigns," he said of the Republican contenders' use of super PACs.

Clinton, who has made overhauling the nation's "dysfunctional" campaign-finance system one of the four pillars of her budding campaign, is building a decidedly low-key fundraising system. Bundlers, for instance, need only to collect a total of $27,000 from 10 or more individuals for the primary to earn the title of "Hillstarters."

Between 110 and 170 people were expected to attend each of the three fundraising events Thursday in Washington. The cost: $2,700 per person. Hosts include State Department official and long-time Democratic fundraiser Elizabeth Bagley. She served as U.S. ambassador to Portugal during Bill Clinton's presidency.

Next week, Clinton heads to California where her stops include a May 6 fundraiser at the home of billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer and his wife, Kat Taylor. Steyer, who pumped more than $73 million of his fortune into 2014 midterm races, will help Clinton "in a considerable way," said Chris Lehane, Steyer's top political adviser.

Even so, Lehane said he expects Steyer's efforts will be overshadowed by Republican giving.

Clinton also is slated to attend a fundraising event at the home of Esprit clothing co-founder Susie Tompkins Buell, along with fundraisers in southern California hosted by Homeland co-creator Howard Gordon and other Hollywood luminaries.

Clinton's campaign has not released any fundraising totals, and a super PAC supporting her candidacy, Priorities USA Action, raised no money in 2014 to avoid siphoning cash away from the party's Senate races. Presidential candidates and the super PACs supporting their bids will not have to disclose fundraising and spending figures until July.

Signs abound, however, that Republicans are setting a blistering pace. Bush told donors this week that he's already set a 100-day fundraising record for Republican politics. Bush reportedly is weighing delegating core campaign functions, such as advertising and data-gathering, to the super PAC, the Associated Press recently reported. Super PACs are supposed to operate independently of the candidates they support.

Allies of several other Republicans, such as Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, have claimed raising tens of millions in super PAC donations already.

Last week, billionaire industrialist Charles Koch told USA TODAY that he might provide financial support to as many as five Republican presidential contenders. His political network will invest about $300 million in electoral politics in 2016, he said.

"We have never seen the kind of money we anticipate being spent in this election cycle," said Michael Podhorzer, political director of the Democratic-aligned AFL-CIO. Democrats' best defense, he said, will be appealing to voters concerned about pocket-book and quality-of-life issues, such as income inequality and paid family leave.

Clinton's push to curb unlimited campaign spending could be "part of an approach of saying, 'I'm going to be on your side, not Wall Street's side,' " he said.

Republican National Committee spokeswoman Allison Moore said Clinton already is guilty of "faux populism" on that front, given that her campaign's first fundraisers earlier this week in New York were attended by hedge-fund managers and venture capitalists.

Steve Elmendorf, a lobbyist and veteran Democratic strategist, said Clinton has ample time to build her campaign account.

"It's not like being a Republican in a crowded field of 15 candidates," he said of Clinton's candidacy. "She can do it in a slow, steady way."

Hillary Clinton and the Tragic Politics of Crime // The Atlantic // Peter Beinart - May 1, 2015

With the exception of gay rights, no public-policy debate has shifted more dramatically in my adult lifetime than the debate over crime. In 1992, when Bill Clinton flew back to Arkansas to oversee the execution of a mentally retarded African American murderer, the move helped him in New Hampshire's Democratic primary. In 1994, Clinton's crime bill—which among other things, expanded the death penalty, encouraged states to lengthen prison sentences and eliminated federal funding for inmate education—garnered the votes of every Democratic Senator except one.

Today, by contrast, Hillary Clinton is loudly repudiating the "tough on crime" policies that she and her husband once championed. Even more remarkably, prominent Republicans are nodding along.

To those who see Hillary's new crime agenda as a flip-flop, her campaign has a rejoinder: Different policies make sense at different times. As Clinton spokesperson Jesse Ferguson tweeted, "HRC policy on internet might also be different than WJC policy in 1994. Not b/c he was wrong but b/c times change."

The problem with this argument is that many of the crime policies the Clintons supported in the 1990s were probably wrong even back then. Yes, the crime bill did some good: It put more cops on the street and increased penalties for sex crimes. But it also helped spawn the very "era of mass incarceration" that Hillary now denounces. It's not just that the bill allocated almost $10 billion in federal-prison construction money. It only allocated it to states that adopted "truth-in-sentencing" laws that dramatically increased the amount of time criminals served. As NYU Law School's Brennan Center has noted, the number of states with such laws rose from five when the bill was signed to 29 by Clinton's last year in office. Over the course of Clinton's presidency, the number of Americans in prison rose almost 60 percent.

All this might—I underscore, might—be justified if such prison expansion produced dramatic declines in crime. But while crime has indeed dropped dramatically—it's about half what it was at its peak in 1991—the best evidence suggests that locking people up is not the primary reason. After spending close to two years testing 14 different potential causes of the reduction in crime, the Brennan Center this year concluded that "incarceration was responsible for approximately five percent of the drop in crime in the 1990s," and an even lower percentage since then. A report last year by the National Academies' National Research Council found that "the growth in incarceration rates reduced crime, but the magnitude of the crime reduction remains highly uncertain and the evidence suggests it was unlikely to have been large." Even a 2004 investigation by University of Chicago economist Steven D. Levitt, who considers increased imprisonment more effective, only found that it accounted for roughly one-third of the crime drop.

Liberals urge Clinton to go left, where she risks losing swing votes // LA Times // Evan Halper - May 1, 2015

Richard Trumka mentioned no names as he vowed recently that labor would not endorse yet another presidential candidate who talks big about confronting inequality but offers an agenda that merely fiddles around the edges of the economy, meeting Wall Street's needs before throwing workers "scraps."

Yet it was a clear warning to Hillary Rodham Clinton. Trumka, the AFL-CIO president, had just summarized the collective progressive angst around her.

Clinton's agenda is largely a mystery, reflecting a candidate who has not been engaged in domestic policy since the country first plunged into the Great Recession, and who is in no rush to box herself into positions.

But the left is not giving her the benefit of the doubt. A day has not gone by since she launched her run three weeks ago without some group of progressives calling on her to make a pledge. That she will oppose the big Pacific trade agreement. That she will support a debt-free college plan. That she will commit to raising the minimum wage to $15.

They want promises that she would upend the tax system, guarantee child care for everyone, expand Social Security.

"America doesn't need relentlessly cautious half-measures," Trumka said at his speech this week in Washington. Then he spelled out the consequences of an uninspired base: the door-knocking, phone banking and other mobilizing efforts that labor can offer in the general election may just not materialize.

The message was clear. The coalition that propelled Barack Obama to victory is disenchanted, and it will fray with every step Clinton takes toward the center to appeal to swing voters.

Clinton's long association with liberal causes, from Hillarycare to family leave, is cold comfort to progressive organizers. So are her words on the campaign trail, where she has gradually sought to assure restive liberals that she is one of them, lamenting that "the deck is still stacked in favor of those at the top." One day her campaign hired Gary Gensler, a former regulator who is a nemesis of big banks, and another, as the Supreme Court considered gay marriage, it refashioned her avatar on Twitter as a rainbow flag.

She also wrote the tribute when Time magazine named Clinton frenemy Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), the lefty standard-bearer and constant source of heartburn to Clinton's campaign, one of its 100 most influential people. After Sen. Bernie Sanders, the Vermont socialist, announced Thursday that he was running against her in the Democratic primary, Clinton tweeted that she agreed with him that the "focus must be on helping America's middle class."

Clinton is running in a very different Democratic Party than she was eight years ago, and its base expects much more from her. Activists are angry that even the end of the recession is doing little to stem economic inequality. They resent her husband's legacy on the economy, saying Clintonian policies that emphasized creating opportunity over structurally lifting those workers at the bottom have resulted in chronically low wages and a deteriorating quality of life for too much of America.

"The problems have become so big that it feels to many of us like systemic solutions are required," said Deepak Bhargava, executive director of the Center for Community Change, which advocates for low-income Americans. "Whether she is prepared to go there is an open question."

It is all irritating to the Clinton campaign. Her advisors argue that the groups unfairly gloss over her lengthy record of pursuing liberal legislation and instead harp on Bill Clinton's association with the Democratic Leadership Council, the pro-growth think tank that helped shape his economic agenda as president. The council shut down on the verge of bankruptcy in 2011, and the currency of its ideas in the Democratic party has withered.

The idea generators likely to have the biggest effect in driving Hillary Clinton's agenda now are at a very different group, the Center for American Progress. The think tank is an incubator for many of the policies that progressive organizations are pushing Clinton to adopt. Its founder, John Podesta, is Clinton's campaign chairman. The current president of the center, Neera Tanden, was Clinton's policy director in the last campaign.

"Just because Bill Clinton had some ideas in the 1990s, it doesn't mean Hillary Clinton is going to have the same ideas in 2015," Tanden said. "I categorically reject that … these are new times with new challenges."

A lengthy report that Tanden's group released this year is putting some progressives at ease. It was notable not just because it acknowledges the growth-focused strategies pursued by Bill Clinton no longer adequately address stagnant wages and widening economic inequality, but also because of who wrote it. The co-author was Larry Summers, the relentlessly centrist Treasury secretary under Bill Clinton who played a key role in pushing the Democratic Party to the right in the 1990s.

Now, Summers is warning of an erosion of democracy if unions are not strengthened and government does not pursue policies that force wage growth.

Hillary Clinton could face a litmus test very soon. She is under pressure to take a position on a massive Pacific free-trade agreement sought by President Obama. Legislation supporting the pact is moving through Congress, and the left is mobilizing to fight it.

"This is a chance to separate herself from what people fear about her, which is a continuation of some of the Clintonian economic policies that did not work out so well," said Lawrence Mishel, president of the Economic Policy institute, a progressive think tank.

For now, Mishel is reserving judgment. He said the candidate could yet delight liberal activists, noting that Clinton had the more progressive agenda when she ran unsuccessfully against Obama eight years ago. But he also pointed out that she would be spending a lot of time with Wall Street in the coming months, soliciting donations for her campaign.

"We just don't know where she is yet," he said. "The unstated concern of some people, I think, is that she is too close to the financial center and needs to raise a lot of money. That can make someone shy about addressing the 1%. And it can push them into emphasizing 'opportunity' over inequality.

Hillary Clinton Courts the Democratic Left, but Is Pressured to Take Progressive Stands // New York Times // Jonathan Martin and Nicholas Confessore – May 1, 2015

Months before Hillary Rodham Clinton started delivering Democratic primary voters a liberal-minded message about a "stacked deck" in favor of the wealthy and the need for criminal-justice reform, she met quietly at Esca, a

Mario Batali restaurant in Midtown Manhattan, with four powerful labor leaders.

There, in February, she treated representatives of the biggest teachers', service employees' and government workers' unions to a seafood dinner and a lengthy discussion of policy issues. Her meaning was unmistakable: She wanted them to feel like an important part of her coming campaign.

But Mrs. Clinton is not just conveying veiled messages to her party's left-leaning base. She is also receiving them.

On Tuesday, Richard L. Trumka, president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., gave an address here aimed ostensibly at any White House contender. Without naming Mrs. Clinton, he urged candidates for president to resist "cautious half-measures."

Interactive Feature | Who Is Running for President (and Who's Not)? At least a dozen Republicans and a handful of Democrats have expressed an interest in running for their party's 2016 presidential nomination.

He also called for "a commitment, from the candidate down through his or her economic team," to steer a progressive agenda to completion. A senior labor official later called it the most important line in Mr. Trumka's speech.

That is because he was publicly amplifying, however obliquely, an argument that liberals have made to Mrs. Clinton and her team more bluntly in private: They do not wish to see the likes of Robert E. Rubin and Lawrence H. Summers, both former treasury secretaries to Bill Clinton, become fixtures in her circle.

It is unclear if Mrs. Clinton will bow to such demands; a senior campaign aide said only that she receives a range of policy advice.

On Thursday, Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, a self-proclaimed socialist, said he would seek the Democratic nomination. But the push and pull between Mrs. Clinton's pursuit of the liberal base and its desire for assurance before consummation may be a more significant source of tension within the party.

Mrs. Clinton cheerily welcomed Mr. Sanders into the race, even as she works to deny Mr. Sanders or any other liberal an issue on which to bloody her from the left.

She and her top aides have begun an aggressive charm offensive, calling, emailing, meeting and dining with scores of progressive officials and activists. John Deeth, a well-read blogger in Iowa City ("the People's Republic of Johnson County," he joked), said that Matt Paul, Mrs. Clinton's Iowa director, called him after she announced.

"Mostly he listened," recalled Mr. Deeth, who said he would probably remain neutral in the primary.

With labor opposing the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade pact, Mrs. Clinton's staff has been in touch with Senator Sherrod Brown, Democrat of Ohio, who has been battling President Obama over the agreement.

"People are seeing that the Democratic Party is again standing for things," Mr. Brown said of the energy on the left. (He added that he was not ready to commit to Mrs. Clinton's candidacy — but had "zero" interest in a presidential bid of his own.)

Liberal organizations say they are gearing up to mobilize their memberships around issues like campaign reform, trade and net neutrality. Their goal, leaders of some of the groups said, is to make clear to Mrs. Clinton that committing to their issues could be the difference between tens of thousands of additional enthusiastic volunteers going door to door for her and making contributions to her campaign or simply casting their ballot for her.

"The American people are pretty smart, and they're used to being lied to in campaigns," said Becky Bond, the political director of Credo, a progressive group that has raised about $76 million for liberal causes and has many members in states like Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania. "They want some kind of reassurance that Hillary Clinton will back up her words with actions."

The apprehensiveness is two-way. Mrs. Clinton's campaign reached out through intermediaries to campaign finance activists, some of whom have been privately discussing a public effort in New Hampshire to pressure her on the issue. Campaign reform groups, in turn, have argued that she will be unable to persuade voters to back an activist government agenda unless she first addresses their concerns about Washington corruption.

Mrs. Clinton faces even more intense pressure to confront income inequality and make clear she is not beholden to the business-friendly policies preferred by some of her contributors. While aligning herself with the left on cultural issues like immigration and same-sex marriage, she has so far been less explicit on economic policies — avoiding taking a position, for example, on a controversial trade pact with Pacific Rim countries.

"No candidate can be all things to all people," Mr. Trumka said in his speech, demanding that White House aspirants resist “the politics of hedged bets.”

That afternoon, Mrs. Clinton’s political director, Amanda Renteria, sent an email to leading union officials saying that the campaign had tapped an official from the United Food and Commercial Workers union as Mrs. Clinton’s “labor outreach director.”

“Filling this position has been a top priority for us given the importance of labor issues to Hillary and everyday Americans across the country,” Ms. Renteria wrote, noting Mrs. Clinton’s “longstanding relationships” with labor and her desire to nurture those ties “as a team.”

But a far weightier personnel matter is who will serve as Mrs. Clinton’s economic advisers, both on the campaign and, should she win, as president. Many on the left, who wish but are deeply skeptical that she will surround herself with advisers from the Elizabeth Warren school, believe both Mr. Obama and Mr. Clinton were overly captive to Wall Street-oriented economic aides.

Mrs. Clinton’s aides noted that she is taking economic advice from outspoken progressives like Gary Gensler, a former Wall Street regulator.

But Dean Baker, a liberal economist, said, “I would be very surprised if we had a President Clinton and the administration didn’t include the usual suspects.”

Mr. Baker, who has been frank about the need for a transaction tax on financial investments, said he was called by an adviser to Mrs. Clinton soliciting his input and ideas, but was unmoved by the approach.

“They’re being polite,” he said. “But I’m not optimistic. It may change if blood is drawn by Sanders or somebody. Maybe then they’ll have to sit down and talk seriously.”

Why Is Hillary Running Left? // Real Clear Politics// Sean Trende – May 1, 2015

Brian Beutler has a thoughtful piece up at The New Republic discussing Hillary Clinton’s leftward shift vis-à-vis her 2008 run for president (and especially vis-à-vis Bill Clinton’s presidency). The piece is well worth reading in its entirety, but these are the relevant sections for our purposes:

“There’s an ongoing debate in American politics over the extent to which the Obama coalition is unique to Obama, who is himself a unique historical figure. Are the younger, more progressive Democrats who swept him into office ready to do the same for a candidate who doesn’t check all of the same characterological boxes—youth, charisma, diversity? . . .

“Perhaps more importantly, Hillary Clinton also thinks the answer is yes—if, that is, you buy the cynical (but possibly accurate) interpretation of her leftward shift. In fact, this might be the most hopeful interpretation as far as liberals are concerned. Because if Clinton doesn’t have any core convictions, and is only saying whatever she thinks she has to say to win—if indeed she's merely betting that things like campaign finance reform, same-sex marriage, and immigration reform will add up to a winning platform—then it's a nod to her belief that the Obama coalition is stable, loyal, and larger than the Republican electorate.”

I tend to think overall that the 2016 election will be decided much more by the state of the economy than Hillary Clinton’s positioning on marriage equality or ability to increase youth participation rates. In that respect, Wednesday’s GDP report was much worse news for Democrats than anything we might discern about youth turnout in 2016 (though it remains to be seen if there is a summer “bounce-back” for the economy, as there was last year).

But I do think party coalitions matter, however, at least on the margins. In that respect, I think Beutler identifies the most important issue, by several orders of magnitude, for 2016: Is Obama’s coalition transferrable to Clinton (or other Democrats)? I think we need to flesh out this question a bit before we can turn to Beutler’s second question, which actually asks what Hillary Clinton’s positioning tells us about the answer to the first question.

From a demographic standpoint, an election consists of two components: Turnout levels among different demographic groups and levels of support among different demographic groups. Barack Obama won the demographic battle on both fronts: He boosted turnout levels among African-Americans to match those of non-Hispanic whites, and he blew the proverbial roof off in terms of support levels from minorities.

This was critical to his victory in 2012: If Mitt Romney had matched George W. Bush’s level of support among minorities, Romney would have been elected president (even if he had dropped to George W. Bush’s level of support among non-Hispanic whites). Likewise, if black participation had dropped back to 2004 levels, the election would have been too close to call (how you evaluate it would depend on whether you think new African-American voters in 2008 were even more likely to vote for Obama than returning African-American voters).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So is this coalition transferable? Obviously, Obama's 2012 re-election effort is a very good data point for Democrats on the turnout front. Many analysts, myself included, were skeptical that Obama could re-create the turnout from 2008, much less improve upon it (although much of the demographic change that occurred was due to whites staying home, rather than African-American or Hispanic turnout increasing).

Another positive data point for Democrats is turnout in the 2014 elections. The fact that African-Americans were 12 percent of the electorate in 2014, vs. 10 percent in 2006 and 11 percent in 2010, suggests that many of the marginal voters Obama turned out are no longer marginal. In the battle between voting as a socio-economic phenomenon and voting as habit, what evidence we have suggests that habit may be winning (although turnout was so unusually low in 2014 that it may be tough to generalize from this data).

Things are dicier, however, on the question of support. If we look at support for the parties in the 2004, 2010 and 2014 elections among racial groups, we see an awful lot of stability. Republicans won 59 percent of the non-Hispanic white vote in 2004, 62 percent in 2010 and 61 percent in 2014 (these statistics exclude votes cast for third parties, a common practice when comparing across elections).

Among African-Americans, Republicans won 11 percent, 9 percent and 10 percent in 2004, 2010 and 2014, respectively. For Hispanics, according to the exit polls, Republicans won 45 percent in 2004 (though that is probably an overestimate; the true number is likely closer to 40 percent), 39 percent in 2010 and 37 percent in 2014. Among Asian-Americans, it was 44 percent in 2004, 41 percent in 2010 and 51 percent in 2014. Among "other," the numbers are 43 percent, 45 percent and 49 percent.

There are differences there, but overall those electorates look roughly alike. This is important, because if the Republican wins the same share of whites, blacks, Hispanics, Asians, and "other" voters in 2016 as Republicans did in any of 2004, 2010 or 2014 elections, the Republican would win the popular vote. This would be true even if the white share of the electorate falls another two points, and the Hispanic and Asian/other shares rise another point apiece. To look at this a shade differently, Republicans just had a landslide win in an electorate that, according to the exit polls, had pretty much the same racial demographics as the one in 2008 (which was supposed to be a more or less unwinnable electorate for Republicans).

So how do we evaluate the "support" data? We have two basic ways of looking at it. Democrats prefer to look at this as a midterm/presidential electorate dynamic. There's doubtless at least some truth here, although this argument is neutralized somewhat by breaking things down by race: Seen through this lens, you have to demonstrate not just that the voters who stayed home were more Democratic, but that they were more Democratic after controlling for race (see more here).

Republicans, on the other hand, think of this as an Obama coalition vs. a "normal" coalition. The thought is that if you remove the historic nature of Obama's candidacy, the racial breakdowns will look much more like they did in 2004, 2010 and 2014. There are problems with this view as well – most notably that 2010 and 2014 were wave elections – but the idea that Democrats would have a hard time maintaining 80 percent support among non-whites without the positive stimulus of a non-white presidential candidate isn't far-fetched. Here's political scientist John Sides:

"Second, the 'Obama coalition' may prove to be exactly that: a coalition specific to Obama. When he is no longer at the top of the ticket, will groups like Latinos and African-Americans turn out in such numbers, and with such strong support for the Democratic candidate? At a University of Denver election panel last week, political scientist Matt Barreto noted that 79% of African-American are "very enthusiastic" about the Democratic Party now, but only 47% say they will be after Obama's presidency ends (see slide 18). It's unlikely that African-Americans are going to vote for a Republican candidate in large numbers, but will they turn out in such high numbers for whichever Democrat wants to succeed Obama?"

This brings us back to Beutler's argument that the decision to shift leftward is made by the Clinton campaign from a position of strength, and provides evidence of a belief that Obama's coalition is both transferable and larger than the Republican coalition.

I would call this the optimistic interpretation (from a liberal perspective) of her moves, even if you accept that this is simply cynical gamesmanship on her part. The pessimistic interpretation would stem from one of the theses of my book, "The Lost Majority": that Obama modified Bill Clinton's coalition into a narrower, deeper one. This enabled Obama to win a victory in 2008 that was almost as large as Clinton's 1996 win without bringing Appalachians or working-class whites on board. The problem with such a coalition is that it doesn't allow for much flexibility: At least for now, Democrats have to run up the score with different groups in order to win.

Under the pessimistic take, the Clinton Coalition is simply gone. Bill Clinton had managed to keep Appalachian voters and working-class whites in the Democratic camp through skillful positioning and a bit of luck. But over the course of the next decade, these voters finally broke with the Democrats. This occurred at the presidential level in 2004 and 2008, then occurred at the senatorial level in 2010 and 2014, when relatively conservative Democrats like Mark Pryor and Mary Landrieu found they could no longer win with a Clintonian formula (in fact, they couldn't come close to winning). This was a break that was a long time coming, but given that it has filtered down to congressional and even state legislative offices, it seems like it will be difficult to reverse.

So from the pessimistic standpoint (again, from the liberal perspective), Clinton is running leftward not because she believes it is the best way to win, but because she believes that she has no choice.

AP-GFK POLL: Doubts About Clinton's Honesty After Emails // AP // Lisa Lerer and Emily Swanson – May 1, 2015

Americans appear to be suspicious of Hillary Rodham Clinton's honesty, and even many Democrats are only lukewarm about her presidential candidacy, according to a new Associated Press-GfK poll.

Is she strong and decisive? Yes, say a majority of people. But inspiring and likable? Only a minority think so.

Clinton's struggles to explain her email practices while in government, along with questions about the Clinton Foundation and Republican criticism of her openness, wealth and trustworthiness seem to have struck a nerve in the public's perception of the dominant Democratic figure in the 2016 campaign. In the survey, 61 percent said "honest" describes her only slightly well or not at all.

Nearly four in 10 Democrats, and more than six in 10 independents agreed that "honest" was not the best word for her.

Even so, she is viewed more favorably than her potential Republican rivals, none of whom are as well-known as the former secretary of state, senator and first lady.

With Clinton facing little competition on the Democratic side, Republicans are trying to make questions about her integrity central to the early 2016 campaign. They paint her as a creature of Washington who flouts the rules to get ahead.

Her use of a private email account run from a server kept at her New York home while serving as secretary of state has fed perceptions that she had things to hide. And questions are swirling about foreign donations to the family's charitable foundation and whether that money influenced her work at the State Department.

James Robins, an independent voter from North Carolina, says his generally positive opinion of Clinton has shifted over the past few months, as more details have emerged about her email usage and foundation fundraising practices.

"She and her family think they're above everything," he said. "She intentionally destroyed all the evidence on that server. And when you look at some of her other stuff recently it's equally as bad."

Clinton said last month that she used a personal account out of convenience. She deleted about 30,000 emails that she has described as personal in nature and has declined requests from congressional Republicans to turn over her server for an independent review.

The survey suggests that many Americans aren't buying Clinton's explanation: A majority said they believe she used a private address to shield her emails from transparency laws and they think she should turn her server over to a third party for further investigation.

At the same time, the public is split over whether her email usage is a significant issue for her presidential aspirations: Less than a third -- 32 percent -- said it was a major problem, 36 percent rated it a minor problem, and 31 percent said it's not a problem at all. Only 20 percent said they're paying very close attention to the email story.

"We don't have the whole picture and all the information that we need to make a judgment," said Ruth Johnson, of Moorhead, Minnesota. "Will she show everything that was emailed? Or has she eliminated a lot of stuff we'll never know about?"

Still, Clinton's overall ratings remain the strongest in the emerging presidential field and are essentially unchanged since two AP-GfK polls conducted last year. Forty-six percent of Americans express a favorable view of Clinton, slightly more than the 41 percent who express a negative opinion. No potential Republican candidate in the poll had significantly greater positive than negative ratings.

Polls generally showed Clinton with a much higher approval rating while she was secretary of state. Opinions of her have become more polarized as she has re-entered partisan politics, as they were when she vied for the Democratic nomination for president in 2008.

Despite Clinton's dominance in the early primary field, the survey suggests that some in her party would be open to a challenger.

Among Democrats, only 34 percent said they were excited by her candidacy while 36 percent described themselves as merely satisfied. Another 19 percent said they were neutral, and 9 percent were disappointed or angry.

"I wish there was somebody else," said Kenneth Berger, of New York City. "She always has a problem."

The AP-GfK Poll of 1,077 adults was conducted online April 23-27, using a sample drawn from GfK's probability-based KnowledgePanel, which is designed to be representative of the U.S. population. The margin of sampling error for all respondents is plus or minus 3.4 percentage points.

Respondents were first selected randomly using phone or mail survey methods, and later interviewed online. People selected for KnowledgePanel who didn't otherwise have access to the Internet were provided access at no cost to them.

Hillary Clinton a Free Trader, or Not, Depending on the Moment // Bloomberg // Mike Dorning – May, 1 2015

Three years ago Secretary of State Hillary Clinton praised a proposed deal to reduce trade barriers among Pacific Rim nations as “the gold standard” for such pacts.

Now, the presidential candidate Clinton has nothing to say as President Barack Obama fights to win expanded negotiating authority to complete the agreement over furious opposition from organized labor and progressives in his own party.

Her silence on the premier economic issue dividing Democrats is consistent with a long history of wavering under pressure on trade. She has even alternately praised and criticized the landmark North American Free Trade Agreement signed by her husband in 1993, calling it good for America or a “mistake,” depending on the audience and circumstances.

“What she does could make a difference on the outcome.”

Lori Wallach, director of Public Citizen’s Global Trade Watch

Critics of the current deal, the Trans-Pacific Partnership, are frustrated by Clinton’s ambiguous stance as she tries to hold together a political coalition that includes party activists on the left and major financial supporters from business and Wall Street.

“We expect those who seek to lead our nation forward to oppose fast track,” AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka said in a speech Tuesday without naming Clinton. “There is no middle ground, and the time for deliberations is drawing to a close.”

Some opponents of the trade accord believe a clear statement from their party’s almost-certain presidential nominee opposing fast-track authority, which allows Congress to vote up or down on trade deals but not to amend them, might seal its defeat and kill the entire agreement.

“What she does could make a difference on the outcome,” said Lori Wallach, director of Public Citizen’s Global Trade Watch. Opposition from Clinton “would spotlight how isolated President Obama is among Democrats.”

Lines Drawn

Democratic backers of the deal aren’t pressing as hard for her to express clear support and anger key constituencies such as unions and environmentalists whose enthusiasm Clinton would need in an election. Unions consider the Pacific trade agreement a job killer and activists worry that certain provisions could be used to override environmental, health and safety regulations.

A public Clinton stand on fast track “would be a factor but I don’t think it would be particularly dispositive at this point,” said Representative Gerald Connolly, a Virginia Democrat who supports the initiative. “The lines have been drawn.”

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe traveled to Washington this week and delivered an address to Congress to promote expanded trade as Congress moves closer to a vote on negotiating authority. The measure would allow Obama and his successor to negotiate trade deals for up to six years and submit them to Congress for votes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Only 13 Democratic House members have publicly expressed support for the legislation, considered necessary to complete the Pacific trade deal, which would cover the U.S. and 11 other nations accounting for 44 percent of American goods exports in 2013.

Trade Links

No recent Democratic political name has been more closely linked to the cause of expanded international trade than the Clintons'. NAFTA was a signature achievement of Bill Clinton's presidency, won only after he took on the labor movement, key Democratic congressional leaders and much of his party's rank and file in Congress.

Then-first lady, Clinton praised NAFTA in 1996 as "proving its worth." At a meeting of the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, in 1998, she thanked business leaders for lobbying for the trade deal with Mexico and Canada and criticized them for not making a more vigorous effort to give the administration fast-track authority to negotiate more such agreements.

In 2000, while campaigning for the U.S. Senate in New York, where upstate manufacturing jobs had declined, Clinton called NAFTA "flawed." After she was elected, she listed the trade agreement as an example of her husband's "good ideas and courage" in a 2002 speech to the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. In 2004, she said "on balance NAFTA has been good for New York and America."

As she began to gear up for her 2008 White House run, she turned more skeptical. She voted against the Central American Free Trade Agreement in 2005, saying it lacked sufficient protection for foreign workers. She joined fellow New York Democratic Senator Chuck Schumer in sponsoring legislation calling for sanctions on Chinese exports unless that country stopped holding down the value of its currency.

By 2007, she called NAFTA a "mistake" in a CNN presidential debate. During the campaign she called for a "trade timeout" on additional agreements and promised to appoint a "trade prosecutor" to more vigorously pursue violations by U.S. commercial partners. A Washington Post editorial in 2007 called her evolution on trade issues "opportunism under pressure."

Clinton wasn't the only candidate to court voters in industrial states unhappy with trade deals. Obama criticized her on NAFTA during hard-fought primaries in Ohio and Pennsylvania and promised to renegotiate the agreement if he were elected. He never followed through.

After House and Senate leaders negotiated compromise language on fast-track legislation in April, Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill issued a statement on the Pacific trade talks that didn't take a position on the vote facing Congress.

"She will be watching closely to see what is being done to crack down on currency manipulation, improve labor rights, protect the environment and health, promote transparency, and open new opportunities for our small businesses to export overseas," Merrill said.

"Any new trade measure has to pass two tests," he added in the statement. "First it should put us in a position to protect American workers, raise wages and create more good jobs at home. Second, it must also strengthen our national security."

Perhaps mindful of his own history on trade, Obama has declined to criticize his former secretary of state for withholding public support on the fast-track debate.

"She said what she should be saying, which is that she is going to want to see a trade agreement that is strong on labor, strong on the environment, helps U.S. workers, helps the U.S. economy," Obama said in an interview Tuesday with the Wall Street Journal. "That's my standard as well, and I'm confident that standard can be met."

Bill Galston, a domestic policy adviser in the Clinton White House, said he'd be surprised to see the former first lady take a position on fast-track authority, which she can always characterize as "a procedural issue.'

"It's clearly her assessment that it has become a very volatile issue," Galston said. Should a complete treaty come before Congress, he added, it would become "increasingly difficult for her to avoid taking a position."

On Clinton's age, Republican rivals imply -- but never say -- she's old // Reuters // James Oliphant – May 1, 2015

Her campaign barely three weeks old, Hillary Clinton already has been attacked by Republicans on everything from donations to her family's charitable foundation, to her tenure as secretary of state and her ties to Wall Street. But her rivals, and the political action committees that support them, are treading more carefully on one incendiary subject: her age.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If elected in November 2016, Clinton would be, at 69, the second-oldest person to take the presidential oath for the first time, behind only Ronald Reagan, who turned 70 weeks after being sworn into office in 1981.

Questions of health and fitness for the presidency dogged two former candidates of a similar age, Bob Dole in the 1996 election and John McCain in 2008, each of whom was 71 at this point in the race. Time magazine featured Dole on the cover asking whether he was "too old" for the job. McCain was so determined to show that he was healthy that he often put in back-breaking campaign days.

"I do think age is an issue in a presidential campaign," said Steve Schmidt, who was McCain's campaign manager. "There is a thin line between seasoned and decrepit."

But several Republican campaigns that seem best positioned to exploit it don't want to touch the issue - at least directly. That's a shift from just a few months ago, when presidential hopefuls Senator Rand Paul, 52, and Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, 47, explicitly referenced Clinton's age as a possible disqualifier, and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell likened her to a cast member of the hit TV show "The Golden Girls," which featured four older women living together.

"It's a rigorous physical ordeal, I think, to be able to campaign for the presidency," Paul said in November, referring to Clinton's age. Now, however, Paul's presidential campaign doesn't want to talk about the issue. It declined further comment. As did Walker's political action committee, even though last fall, he, too, noted that he could run for president "20 years from now" and be the same age Clinton is today.

Campaign aides to Paul, Walker and Senator Marco Rubio, 43, as well as Republican strategists, told Reuters there was little appetite in the party at the moment for a direct assault on Clinton on the issues of her age and fitness for office, even after a 2012 fall that gave her a concussion and caused a potentially life-threatening blood clot.

Similarly, anti-Clinton political action committees such as American Crossroads, America Rising, and Citizens United said they had no plans to launch ads centered on her age.

POLL SHOWS DEMOCRATS UNFAZED

"It's unwise to attack a political opponent based on her immutable characteristics, like race, gender and age," said Republican pollster Kellyanne Conway. She said she has met with at least five Republican presidential campaigns seeking her services and none of them has indicated they want to go after Clinton on issues involving her age.

With Clinton swamped by questions about foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation and criticism of her use of a private email server while at the State Department, there is also simply no reason at the moment to engage in an attack that could be more divisive than beneficial, Republican strategists said.

They fear that highlighting Clinton's age could alienate women voters whom Republicans need to be competitive in next year's general election.

Democratic pollster Anna Greenberg said women older than 50 would likely comprise the largest bloc of voters in 2016.

There is little evidence that Democrats and independent voters are concerned about having another president in their 70s. A Reuters/Ipsos poll conducted this month showed that Clinton's age would not influence how 67 percent of Democrats and 72 percent of independents voted in November 2016.

And rather than downplay her age, Clinton in recent campaign events in Iowa and New Hampshire embraced her role as a grandmother, striking sympathetic notes with other older women in the room about the responsibility of raising a grandchild.

Supporters have also sought to dismiss any concerns about her age as sexist, noting that she's the same age as Mitt Romney when he ran four years ago. Romney largely avoided any protracted discussion about his health.

IT'S A GENERATIONAL THING

While eschewing direct attacks, some of the Republican presidential hopefuls have found other ways to strongly hint that Clinton's age should be an issue for voters. They have repackaged the issue as "generational" and suggested she is a product of the politics of the 20th Century. That argument will grow more vivid should Clinton face a candidate who could be a generation younger than her in the general election.

"When you look at Hilary Clinton's age, it becomes an issue in a general election if she's running against a 40-something new face as opposed to Governor Bush," said Schmidt. Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor, is 62.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio, a quarter century younger than Clinton, referred to her as a "leader from yesterday" when he announced his candidacy last month.

"We welcome the contrast (with Clinton)," said a top adviser to Rubio. "This election is going to be about the future."

Clinton's campaign declined to comment on the various statements by the Republican hopefuls, referring questions to Correct the Record, a rapid-response operation run by the pro-Clinton group American Bridge. A spokeswoman, Adrienne Watson, said it was Clinton's rivals, not her, who were behind the times.

"Republican politicians are stuck in the 90s - the 1890s," Watson said. "I'm sure all Americans, Republicans included, would appreciate it if Republican leaders would join (Clinton) in talking about our future."

She saw Rubio's comments as a coded attack on Clinton's age.

"Marco Rubio basically disqualifies himself to be president when he diminishes any American for being too young or old or anything else," Watson said.

BILL CLINTON'S PLAYBOOK

Yet Rubio's approach is similar to the one employed by Clinton's husband, Bill, in his reelection campaign against Dole in 1996.

"I don't think Senator Dole is too old to be president," Clinton said at one debate. "It's the age of his ideas that I question."

Dick Morris, who served as Bill Clinton's campaign manager, said it was a subtle enough way to remind voters of the age difference between the two candidates.

"We obviously couldn't attack age directly because of older voters," Morris told Reuters. "What we did is adopt a whole strategy based on issues that would summon the memories and ideas of age without articulating it."

Dole released his medical records in 1995 to assuage concerns about his age. But the damage control was not entirely successful: he mistakenly called the Los Angeles Dodgers baseball team "Brooklyn," and he tumbled off a stage during a rally.

Hillary Clinton, too, had what her husband seemed to term a "senior" moment in 2008 when she erroneously claimed she had come under sniper fire while on a trip to Bosnia as first lady.

Bill Clinton blamed the episode on his wife being exhausted, adding that her critics, "when they're 60, they'll forget something when they're tired at 11 at night, too."

The bipartisan corruption of American politics // vox // Ezra Klein – May 1, 2015

The money at the nexus of the Clinton Foundation, Bill Clinton's speaking shop, and Hillary Clinton's State Department is unnerving. But the amount of coverage it's getting might make you think it's unusually unnerving by the standards of modern American politics.

Nope. In fact, it's not even the most unnerving part of Hillary Clinton's campaign.

The Clinton Foundation is a great topic to investigate because its structure is strange, it namesake is an ex-president, and there are lots of documents and disclosures that can power stories. These investigations are worthy, and these pieces should be written — which is why we've been writing them at Vox.

But it's also worth looking past the smoke to the purported fire: the basic concern is that the Clinton Foundation gave corporations and even foreign governments a way to donate huge amounts of money to the Clintons without seeming like they were donating huge amounts of money to the Clintons — and those donations could have given them unusual access or influence in Hillary Clinton's State Department, or to her hypothetical future White House.

When you look at it that way, what becomes clear is that whatever the conflicts in the Clinton Foundation's finances, the daily corruption that powers modern presidential campaigns is much, much worse.

How to buy a Clinton

With the Clinton Foundation, there is at least the possibility that donors wanted to give money to an actual philanthropy trying to save and improve lives in poor countries. The same can't be said for the daily moneygrubbing that fuels modern political campaigns.

Take, well, Hillary Clinton. She kicked off her presidential fundraising on Tuesday with a series of events on Wall Street. Guests paid $2,700 to attend, while hosts had to bundle $27,000 in donations each. These are big, direct donations to Hillary Clinton's campaign. They are being made by people who have paid to be in a room with Hillary Clinton. They are being made with the express purpose of helping Hillary Clinton win the presidency. They are being made by people whose livelihoods are regulated by the very agencies Clinton seeks to control.

The thing that people worry was quietly happening at the Clinton Foundation, in other words, is publicly happening with the Clinton campaign.

You might argue, of course, that individual donors are limited by that $2,700 cap. How much influence can anyone really buy for $2,700? How much goodwill is really purchased by getting 10 of your friends to bundle their contributions alongside yours? Particularly when Chicago businessman Fred Eychaner gave more than $25 million to the Clinton Foundation. One guy. More than $25 million. How can you compare that to donations capped at $2,700?

You can't. But donations to the Clinton campaign aren't really capped at $2,700. Clinton, like every other major candidate in the race (and probably a few of the not-so-major ones), will have a number of allied Super PACs. The Super PACs will supposedly be independent of Clinton's campaign, but they won't be, not really. Hillary Clinton will be raising money for them directly. Her top surrogates will quietly be urging her richest donors to fund send them bigger and bigger checks. And those checks will get eye-poppingly big.

Donations to Super PACs, like to the Clinton Foundation, are unlimited. Eychaner can give another $25 million, or another $100 million, if he so chooses. Indeed, one of the reasons Clinton announced so early was that her Super PAC was having trouble raising those big checks until she officially entered the race.

The dynamics behind Clinton's Super PAC are the precise dynamics that people fear existed in the Clintons' foundation. Extremely rich individuals and institutions will give extremely large sums of money in order to get Clinton elected. These donors will get access, influence, and a certain measure of power over her administration — after all, if Clinton wants to run again, she's going to need them to fund her next campaign, too. And there will be no chance that these donors simply wanted to help Bill Clinton distribute HIV/AIDS drugs in the world's poorest countries.

How to buy the entire Republican primary field

Anti-Koch Brothers Protest Held Outside Their Manhattan Apartment
That's not how you spell Coke.

It's not just Clinton, of course. The Republican candidates will have their own Super PACs. The Koch Brothers, for instance, are coordinating a network of rich Republicans who intend to spend nearly a billion dollars — yes, billion with a "B" — on the 2016 election. And there, the corruption has become almost comically explicit.

Rand Paul wrote them a love letter in Time magazine. "Charles and David Koch are well known for their business success, their generous philanthropic efforts and for their focus on innovation in management," he wrote. "Some also know them for their activism in the political realm." Yes, I think I heard something about that activism.

But it's not just Paul. Republican presidential hopefuls are literally flying across the country to audition for the Kochs' support:

In another surprise, a top Koch aide revealed to POLITICO that Jeb Bush will be given a chance to audition for the brothers' support, despite initial skepticism about him at the top of the Kochs' growing political behemoth.

Sen. Marco Rubio, Sen. Rand Paul and Sen. Ted Cruz debated at the Koch network's winter seminar in January, and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker made a separate appearance. Those were the candidates who appeared to have a chance at the Koch blessing, and attendees said Rubio seemed to win that round.

And unlike the donors to the Clinton Foundation, whose political aims are hypothetical and speculative, the Kochs are political activists trying to change the nature of the Republican Party — and the country. And it's working. As Andrew Prokop wrote, there's no serious Republican presidential hopeful who breaks with the Kochs' core policy commitments — and that's partly because no Republican presidential hopeful who breaks with the Kochs' core policy commitments is going to have the resources needed to be taken seriously:

The Kochs have longed seem to prioritize economic issues — shrinking government, slashing entitlement spending, cutting taxes, and reducing regulations — far above other matters. And it hasn't been too long since the big-spending, Medicare-expanding George W. Bush administration drew their ire.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The prospect of the GOP nominee pledging a major entitlement expansion seems unimaginable now. Instead, the entire party has backed Paul Ryan's plans to overhaul Medicare, to reduce government spending on the program. More broadly, this year's contest features the spectacle of every major hopeful competing to trash the Export-Import Bank — a longtime target of the Kochs, who view the agency as exemplifying government interference in the free market. Support for action on climate change, for Obamacare, or for campaign finance reform are all anathema for the vast majority of the expected presidential field — as they are for the GOP in general.

It actually, unimaginably, gets worse. The Clinton Foundation has agreed to make its donors public, and presidential campaigns and even Super PACs are required by law to make their donors public. We know, sooner or later, who gave money and how much they gave. But there's also the world of 501(c)4 and 501(c)6 organizations, like Karl Rove's Crossroads GPS, where the donations are simply secret: the public has no way to know who gave, or how much, even though the candidate might know exactly whom they owe, and why.

This "dark" money has gone from a minor feature of campaign spending to a powerful one. According to the Center for Responsive Politics, the 2004 presidential election had less than $6 million in dark money; the 2012 election had more than $310 million.

That means the stories being written about the Clinton Foundation, or about the Koch brothers, simply can't be written about the 501(c)4s — not because the corruption isn't more grievous, but because the information is so much more limited.

The influence-purchasing that people are worried might have happened, in a loose and indirect way, with the Clinton Foundation, is happening in an obvious and direct way around every single one of the major presidential campaigns —and what's worse is that we're getting used to it, inured to it, tired of complaining about it. The Clinton Foundation is getting so much coverage in part because it's novel. But the much more significant, more daily corruption of American politics is, sadly, becoming routine.

Clinton Charities Raked in Millions of Taxpayer Dollars // Free Beacon // Elizabeth Harrington – May 1, 2015

The Clinton Foundation and its major health charity have raked in more than $7 million from the U.S. government in recent years, according to an analysis of public records conducted by the Washington Free Beacon.

The Clinton Health Access Initiative (CHAI), chaired by Bill Clinton and run by the former president's long-time associate Ira Magaziner, has received $6,010,898 from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) since 2010. CHAI, the biggest arm of the Clinton family's charitable efforts, accounting for 60 percent of all spending, received $3,193,500 in fiscal years 2010, 2011, and 2012, according to federal contracts, during Hillary Clinton's tenure as secretary of state. The organization received an additional $2,817,398 from the CDC in FYs 2013, 2014, and 2015.

The grants, including $200,000 awarded as recently as January, have gone to CHAI's Global AIDS program, and are filed under "Global Health and Child Survival." The CDC is listed as a $1 to $10 million contributor to CHAI, according to its donor list released earlier this month.

The Boston-based health arm of the Clinton Foundation has come under scrutiny for failing to disclose donations from foreign governments—in violation of a pledge Clinton made to the Obama administration before she assumed office as secretary of state.

A Reuters report found that the health initiative stopped making its annual disclosure in 2010 and that "no complete list of donors to the Clintons' charities has been published" since. The group only recently published a partial donor list, which its spokesperson Maura Daley told Reuters "made up for" CHAI's "oversight" of failing to meet the disclosure agreement.

When asked whether the CDC has any concern regarding its funding of CHAI or plans to provide grants to the organization in the future, an agency spokesperson told the Washington Free Beacon that it "can't predict who will apply for and be awarded grants."

"CDC and potential grantees must follow federal guidelines when applying for or awarding and monitoring grants," said Shelly Diaz. "CHAI, like any other organization meeting federal requirements, may apply for CDC grants. They would also be expected to meet the same ongoing requirements for grantees (e.g. reports, audits, performance standards)."

CHAI received hundreds of millions from foreign nations between 2009 and 2014, including: the United Kingdom ($79.7 million), Australia ($58.6 million), Norway ($38.1 million), Canada ($12.1 million), Ireland ($11.7 million), Sweden ($7.2 million), and New Zealand ($1.2 million).

The Boston Globe found that foreign donations "sharply accelerated" to CHAI when Hillary Clinton became secretary of state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Government grants, nearly all from foreign countries, doubled to $55.9 million in 2013 from $26.7 million in 2010, according to the records,” the report said.

The health initiative broke off into a nonprofit separate from the Clinton Foundation in 2010, though it is still chaired by Bill and Chelsea Clinton.

The charities have remained intertwined. CHAI received a $2 million cash grant from the Clinton Foundation for “Haiti relief,” according to the group’s 2013 tax filing. It received a $4 million cash grant from the foundation for “program service” in 2012.

CHAI’s chief executive officer and vice chairman, Ira Magaziner, a 1960s student activist who tried to “convert a small American city into a model of municipal socialism,” is a long time associate of the Clintons. Magaziner was a Rhodes scholar with Bill Clinton in the late 1960s, a senior advisor in the Clinton White House, and the architect of Hillary Clinton’s failed health-care plan in the 1990s.

Magaziner formerly ran the foundation’s Clinton Climate Initiative while also running CHAI, though he ceded control over the environmental group late last year. He was paid $415,000 in salary and consulting fees from the Clinton Foundation in 2013, according to Politico. Bruce Lindsey, Bill Clinton’s longtime lawyer and chairman of the board of the Clinton Foundation, was the highest paid official at CHAI, paid $398,159 in salary and benefits in 2013 as a board member.

CHAI’s website says they are a “frugal” charity that focuses on saving lives, rather than “compensating ourselves excessively.”

CHAI’s spokesperson, Maura Daley, said that taxpayer funding to her organization is being provided by the U.S. President’s Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR), and distributed through the CDC for AIDS work in Ethiopia.

“The CDC agreement with CHAI was a 5-year grant to support work in Ethiopia, which began prior to Secretary Clinton becoming Secretary,” Daley told the Free Beacon. “The work includes building the management capacity in government hospitals throughout Ethiopia to maximize the productivity of their resources and deliver higher quality services.”

She said the funding is going towards enrolling hospital CEOs in masters programs for hospital management.

“CHAI had been working with the Ethiopian Government to begin this hospital management program with funding from other donors prior to the CDC getting involved,” Daley said. “The CDC came in later to add funding for the work so it made sense for the Ethiopian Government and the CDC to have CHAI continue the work we had already been doing.”

Daley said CHAI does not normally accept grants from the U.S. government, but said the Clinton charity was the “ideal” group for the CDC.

“While CHAI does not typically take USG work, it agreed to do so on contract in this instance because it was the ideal NGO to successfully complete the work required,” she said. “Again, CHAI’s involvement in the work, which has continued, was at the request of the Ethiopian Government along with the CDC.”

Aside from millions given to the health initiative, the Clinton Foundation itself has received more than $1.4 million in U.S. taxpayer funding from federal agencies and the 2009 stimulus law.

The Clinton Foundation lists several state and federal agencies as financial contributors, including the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA).

The EPA is listed as having contributed between $1,001 and $5,000.

EPA spokesperson Laura Allen said her agency “does not have any record of a donation” to the Clinton Foundation.

Another agency, entitled the “Office of Minority Health and Human Services,” is also listed as having contributed between $1,001 and $5,000. The Free Beacon was unable to determine what this donation referred to, or which federal or state office it came from.

The Department of Health and Human Service’s Office of Minority Health (OMH) was unable to locate any donation to the Clinton Foundation. The Office of Minority Health and Human Services, a state agency in Nebraska that recently changed its name to the Office of Health Disparities and Health Equity, said the donation could not have come from their office because they do no solicit or issue funding.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

State agencies in Arkansas have also given financial contributions to the Clinton Foundation, according to the organization's website.

The Arkansas Minority Health Commission gave between $1,001 and $5,000. Michael Knox, executive director of the Arkansas Minority Health Commission, told the Free Beacon that the donation was for the Clinton Center's annual "Head of the Class Bash" in June 2011 that paid for "car seat inspections, immunizations and health screenings, and backpacks with school supplies to the children of Arkansas."

The Arkansas Energy Office is also listed as donating between $500,001 and $1 million to the Clinton Foundation, though the contribution actually came from spending authorized by the 2009 stimulus law.

Scott Hardin, director of communications for the Arkansas Economic Development Commission, told the Free Beacon that the Clinton Foundation received nearly $800,000 from his office, through a grant funded by the stimulus.

"The Energy Office distributed more than $50 million in American Recovery and Reinvestment Act (ARRA) funds a few years ago and the money provided to the Clinton Foundation was part of this effort," he said.

The grant, amounting to $758,123, was provided to the Clinton Foundation in October 2009, Hardin said.

The funds went to the Clinton Foundation's Home Energy Affordability Loan (HEAL) program, which aims to reduce greenhouse gas emissions from buildings through "energy-efficiency and monitoring strategies."

The Clinton Foundation received another stimulus grant on Sept. 28, 2009 for $639,711, through the Department of Energy. The grant also went to the HEAL program and to "support the implementation of the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act of 2009 in Arkansas."

The project is listed as creating zero jobs.

The Free Beacon found one case where an agency was listed as a Clinton Foundation contributor, even though it has never donated to the organization.

The Arkansas Department of Human Services is currently listed for a donation between $1,000 and $5,000. However, the state agency never paid the Clinton Foundation, and only helped host a conference at the Clinton Center. The state agency nonetheless received a gift receipt from the Clinton Foundation.

In this case, the Clinton Foundation did receive $1,350 from the U.S. taxpayers, but through another federal agency: the Corporation for National and Community Service.

Amy Webb, director of communications for the Arkansas Department of Human Services, told the Free Beacon that her agency helped the Clinton Foundation host an event honoring AmeriCorps in Little Rock, Ark. last year.

"Our Division of Community Service and Non-profit Support, along with other local entities, co-hosted an AmeriCorps 20th Anniversary event at the Clinton Center in September 2014," she said. "Via a grant, the Corporation for National and Community Service provided our agency with $1,350 to help cover costs associated with that event."

Webb provided an invoice from the Clinton Foundation detailing the $1,350 charge, which she said was for refreshments.

"The money was not a donation to the Clinton Foundation," Webb said. "In January, we incorrectly received a 'gift receipt' for a donation for the money we used for that event, and we notified the foundation of that error."

In all, state and federal agencies have contributed between $1,402,187 and $1,414,184 directly to the Clinton Foundation.

Together with the health initiative, taxpayers have contributed roughly $7.4 million to Clinton charities.

The Clinton Foundation admitted it has "made mistakes" in disclosing donors after a barrage of recent news reports. Among its failures was disclosing a $2.35 million donation from the chairman of Uranium One, a company acquired by the Russians and later used to assume control of 20 percent of U.S. uranium production through a deal that was signed off in part by Hillary Clinton's State Department.

The Clinton Foundation is also expected to refile some of its tax forms, according to a blog post written by Maura Pally, the foundation's acting chief executive, who said that the organization "mistakenly combined" government grants with other donations.

The Clinton Foundation did not return requests for comment.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

Sanders draws warm welcome in New Hampshire // Washington Post // Aaron C. Davis - May 2, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders on Saturday gave a version of the same speech about the nation's struggling middle class and greedy billionaires that he has delivered for the past 30 years. But two days into his long-shot bid for the presidency, the oft-repeated words amounted to something new — a barometer of frustration on the liberal left that could begin to reshape the Democratic primary.

With almost 100 people packed into the house of an acupuncturist here and dozens more craning to listen from outside, Sanders (I-Vt.) had a growing audience. And the warm reception he received suggested there is room alongside front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton in the nation's first presidential primary state for Sanders's rumpled and irreverent attacks on the country's political establishment.

"My intention in this campaign," the senator from nearby Vermont began, "is to talk about the real issues impacting working people throughout New Hampshire, Vermont and America." To growing rounds of applause, Sanders ticked off a list of stagnating wages, dwindling family savings and out-of-reach college costs. They are all getting worse, Sanders said, because the political system in Washington is rigged to send an unfair share to the rich.

Speaking to a convention of labor leaders hours later on a mountaintop, Sanders drew more applause. He blasted a proposed trade pact with Pacific Rim countries backed by President Obama and that Clinton first negotiated as secretary of state as dangerous to what U.S. manufacturing jobs remain.

"Pushed by corporate America, pushed by Wall Street . . . the function of these trade agreements is to allow companies in America to shut down here, move to low-wage countries abroad and bring their products back to America," Sanders said. "Enough is enough, we do not need another disastrous trade policy."

As dozens pushed in for pictures with him after, the scenes followed an announcement by Sanders's campaign on Friday that in the first 24 hours after he launched his candidacy, he raised $1.5 million: A grass-roots surge from 35,000 online donors who gave an average of just $43.54 apiece. On Saturday, his campaign said the two-day tally topped $2.1 million, that most had signed up to continue contributing in monthly installments. A larger group of 145,000 people had also signed up online to volunteer, the campaign said.

The first day in New Hampshire also brought a new indication of Sanders's seriousness about the race. Congress's longest-serving independent and a self-described socialist, Sanders backtracked just two days after announcing his candidacy to say that he would abandon the "I" beside his name and register as a Democrat if needed to compete in the party's primary in all 50 states.

Outside the U.S. Capitol on Thursday, the senator rejected any suggestion that he register as a Democrat. "No," Sanders said, "I'm an independent." But a day later, questions surfaced in New Hampshire about whether he would be eligible. The Granite State requires candidates to fill out a form declaring party registration.

"We're going to fulfill all the rules," Sanders said, "I made the decision that the best way to be effective in this campaign, the best way to win was to do it through the Democratic primary process. We will meet all of the requirements of all of the states, including New Hampshire," he said.

In almost every way, Sanders first day on the trail contrasted sharply with Clinton's first trip to the state last month. Clinton held a series of small and often scripted events, one a roundtable in a quiet warehouse staged with a table and chairs and a place for reporters to watch.

Before Sanders arrived, it was unclear how he would reach a music stand set up as a podium in a corner of the living room. Elizabeth Ropp, wearing a People's Organization of Community Acupuncture T-shirt, took the microphone to ask anyone feeling claustrophobic to step outside "if they need air."

Without Sanders having a paid campaign staffer yet in New Hampshire, or even a campaign office in Vermont, Ropp said she got a call asking to host earlier in the week "from a friend of a friend" who had started volunteering for the campaign.

Ropp introduced Sanders as the candidate of the "12-hour filibuster and the $12 haircut," referring to his opposition to tax cuts during Obama's first term, and his frizzy white, often disheveled hair.

Sanders took the microphone, unfolded notes scratched on a piece of yellow legal paper, and said he's the one with ideas to win.

He said he wants a $1 trillion infrastructure campaign to create 13 million jobs. He said he will soon introduce legislation in the Senate for a $70 billion plan to make public colleges and universities tuition-free. The plan could be funded, he said, by eliminating tax loopholes that allow companies to keep profits overseas. And he said the nation needs to move toward a single-payer Medicare system for health care and increase Social Security benefits

“Our job is to think big, not small,” Sanders said. “Our job is to say that in the wealthiest country in the history of the world . . . that we can create a nation in which every person has health care as a right . . . and can get a higher education,” he said.

“We can create a nation where anybody who wants to can run for office, even if they are not a billionaire,” Sanders said. After more photos, he piled into a dented Subaru with three aides and drove away.

Many in both audiences were graying but not as white-haired as Sanders. There was also a smattering of teens and 20-somethings at each event.

“This is someone who could actually keep a lot of young people like me in the fold” of the Democratic Party, said Chace Joe Jackson, 23. “Our generation just isn’t going to have anything like the world that came before us and actually enjoyed the American middle class for what it was.”

Jackson said he’s been disappointed by Obama and thinks of Clinton as a “right-leaning, big-business Democrat. . . . When they become president, they all give in to the status quo. You know that’s not what Bernie Sanders is going to do.”

Sanders will register as a Democrat if needed // Washington Post // Aaron C. Davis – May 2, 2015

Bernie Sanders, Congress’s longest-serving independent and a self-described socialist, backtracked just two days into his presidential campaign on Saturday, saying he would register as a Democrat if needed to compete in the party’s primary in all 50 states.

Announcing his candidacy Thursday outside the U.S. Capitol, the senator from Vermont rejected any suggestion that he register as a Democrat. “No,” Sanders said, “I’m an independent.” But a day later, questions surfaced in New Hampshire about whether he would be eligible to compete next year in the nation’s first presidential primary.

New Hampshire requires candidates to fill out a form declaring party registration. Sanders also rejected the Democratic nomination for Senate twice in Vermont, New Hampshire news media noted.

On Saturday, after addressing a mosh pit of more than 100 supporters stuffed in a Manchester home and spilling out into a yard, Sanders said: “We will do what we have to do” to make sure his name appears on the ballot alongside Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Sanders’s new openness to registering as a Democrat follows his campaign’s statement that he raised an impressive $1.5 million in the first 24 hours of his announcing: A grass-roots surge from 35,000 donors who gave an average of $43.54 apiece, the campaign reported.

Sanders stressed repeatedly Saturday that he is in the race to win it. Known in Washington as a pragmatic politician, his party affiliation appeared to be an early compromise, though he often sits with the Democratic caucus.

“We’re going to fulfill all the rules,” Sanders said, when asked about the potential roadblock. “You know, I am the longest-serving independent in congressional history. I made the decision that the best way to be effective in this campaign, the best way to win was to do it through the democratic primary process. We will meet all of the requirements of all of the states, including New Hampshire,” he said.

Even If that requires registering as a Democrat?

“We will do what we have to do. We are going to be on the ballot in 50 states. You don’t win unless you do that,” Sanders said.

In every other way, Sanders remained the idealist Saturday, acknowledging his long-shot campaign will rise or fall on an idealistic vision for bolstering the middle class.

Sanders said he wants a $1 trillion infrastructure campaign to create 13 million jobs. He said he will soon introduce legislation in the Senate for a $70 billion plan to make public colleges and universities tuition-free. He suggested funding for the plan could come from eliminating corporate tax loopholes that allow companies to keep profits overseas. And he said the nation needs to move toward a single-payer Medicaid system for health care and increase social security benefits.

“We are going to run a campaign unlike any before,” Sanders said. “I’m running because this country faces more serious crises than at any time since the Great Depression.”

Elizabeth Warren praises Bernie Sanders’ prez bid // Boston Herald // Prisca Pointdujour – May 2, 2015

Bay State U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren welcomed fellow liberal from the north, Vermont U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders, into the presidential sweepstakes yesterday, even as she continues to resist efforts to draft her into the race.

“I’m glad to see him get out there and give his version of what leadership in this country should be,” Warren said while at Middlesex Community College in Lowell yesterday. “I think that Bernie Sanders is going to play out a vision for America and that it is important for people to hear what he has to say.”

Warren has repeatedly said she will not run for president, despite a nationwide campaign urging her to throw her hat in the ring. Sanders shares many of Warren’s causes, such as breaking up big Wall Street banks, and many see him as the party’s only real chance to force Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton to tackle more liberal issues.

Sanders will make his first visit to New Hampshire today since launching his campaign Wednesday.

Meanwhile, Warren also said it’s time to rebuild ties between police and communities.

“People are angry and frustrated, and they have a reason to be,” Warren said. “That never excuses violence against the police, but we need to have a more serious conversation about what’s gone wrong in Baltimore and other places throughout this country and how to repair that.”

Warren said outrage over Freddie Gray, the Baltimore man who died in police custody, was due to mounting frustrations.

“It’s something we must address,” she said. “We have shoved this problem out of the spotlight for years and that’s been part of what’s erupted now in Baltimore.”

Chris Cassidy contributed to this report.

Bernie Sanders Yells His Mind // New York Times – Opinions // Gail Collins – May 1,2015

Our topic today is: Bernie Sanders for president?

“My fifteen minutes of fame,” the Vermont senator said gruffly over the phone. Gruff is pretty much his normal way of speaking, but Sanders was actually in a good mood at this point in the conversation. Later, the volume would escalate.

He announced he was running for the Democratic nomination on Thursday, first in an email, then in a makeshift press conference on the lawn outside the Capitol. There are worse approaches. One of the few previous presidential candidates from Vermont was George Dewey, the hero of the Spanish American War. Dewey started his campaign off with a statement that read, in part: “Since studying the subject I am convinced that the office of the president is not such a very difficult one to fill . . .” It was pretty much downhill from there.

Sanders’s beginning was more auspicious. His infant campaign raised more than $1.5 million in donations in the first 24 hours: “Thirty-five thousand donations averaging $43 apiece!”

For you, concerned citizen, this is nothing but good news. For one thing, we can now spend the winter entertaining the idea of a President Bernie. Plus, competition is always better. Hillary Clinton is no longer in danger of spending the next year just listening to average voters and denying she feels entitled.

Besides the two announced candidates, there will probably be other contenders, including former Maryland governor Martin (“former Maryland governor”) O’Malley. Also interested are ex-Senator Jim Webb of Virginia and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, a former Republican senator turned former independent governor who is now a Democrat.

Question: What about Elizabeth Warren?

Answer: As a rule, when somebody says they are not running for president more than 100 times, it is a strong indication that they are not running for president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Question: Sanders self-identifies as a “democratic socialist.” Aren’t people going to think that’s a little extreme?

Answer: This week, the governor of Texas announced he was putting a special watch on U.S. military exercises this summer, due to public speculation that the soldiers might take over the state and confiscate everyone’s guns. Also, the Idaho Legislature recently killed a bill that would have provided federal aid in tracking down deadbeat dads, due to concern that it might involve the use of Shariah law. I do not want to hear you calling Bernie Sanders an extremist.

Sanders said his campaign goal is to “lay down a progressive agenda which speaks to the needs of working people.” This would include making “the wealthiest people and corporations start paying their fair share of taxes.”

Now this is a problem for Democrats who envision the senator as a tool to push Hillary Clinton to the left. We already know she’s going to talk endlessly about bridging the economic divide. It might help if there were more specific specifics.

“You don’t know much about me, right?” asked Sanders, launching into another list of his causes: tax reform, health care, fixing the crumbling infrastructure.

Continue reading the main story
“I voted against DOMA — you know what DOMA is?” he demanded, referring to the anti-gay Defense of Marriage Act, which Clinton once supported during her husband’s presidency. “I’m not evolving when it comes to gay rights. I was there!”

The sun was sinking over this conversation. (“You got me riled up here!”) The problem was that I was talking about his potential as a debating partner who could turn Clinton into a more progressive candidate, while Bernie Sanders wants to be regarded as a potential president of the United States.

“I do resent that,” he agreed. “I am in this race to win.”

Sanders doesn’t really want Democratic voters to compare him with Clinton to see who has the best positions on the issues. He wants them to decide who has the most consistent record in fighting for those issues, and there is absolutely no question in the world that when it comes to consistency, Bernie Sanders is Mount Rushmore to Hillary Clinton’s Sheila the Shapeshifter.

Her political life has been a continual, sometimes unedifying, struggle to get the power to do what she believed were the right things for the country. His began with a long list of principled and totally hopeless campaigns whose dismal outcomes he recounts proudly in speeches: “... I received 2 percent of the vote. Not dissuaded, I ran a year later for governor of the State of Vermont, and received 1 percent of the vote . . .”

Then came an improbable win for mayor of the small city of Burlington, which he governed well. Then it was off to the House and the Senate, where he fought for progressive causes. He has now been in Congress for 24 years — longer, he likes to point out, than any other independent in American history.

You’ve got to give him credit. Welcome to the race, Bernie.

Bernie Sanders raises $1.5 million in 24 hours, says his campaign // Washington Post // Philip Rucker - May 1, 2015

Advisers to Bernie Sanders have argued that his grassroots network of small-dollar donors could raise him the roughly $50 million the independent senator from Vermont will need to run a credible, competitive campaign in the Democratic presidential primaries.

They may be right.

On Friday, the Sanders campaign announced that it has raised more than $1.5 million online in the 24 hours since he announced his candidacy. It is a surprisingly heavy haul for a candidate whom some in the Democratic chattering class have cast off as a gadfly and viewed as unable to wrest the nomination from the overwhelming favorite, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The donations came from a broad base of supporters -- some 35,000 donors who gave an average of $43.54 a piece, according to the Sanders campaign. The campaign also said it signed up more than 100,000 supporters through its website, building what it calls a "mass movement."

Clinton has not released any details about her fundraising totals, online or otherwise. But the Sanders haul outpaces the three major Republican candidates who already have announced. In the first 24 hours since launching their campaigns, Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.) raised $1.25 million and Sens. Rand Paul (Ky.) and Ted Cruz

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(Texas) raised about $1 million each, according to their campaigns.

“This is a remarkable start for Bernie's campaign," Sanders adviser Tad Devine said in a statement. "People across America are yearning for authentic leadership that tells them the truth about what is holding back our nation."

As a self-described socialist, Sanders does not have a deep base of wealthy donors and corporate PACs who give to his campaigns; he jokes that he doesn't know any millionaires or billionaires. He said Thursday he is taking on the "billionaire class" he says are controlling the U.S. political system, and would make the surge in political spending in recent years -- especially through super PACs fueled by unlimited donations -- a major theme of his campaign.

Bernie Sanders Could Curb Hillary's Enthusiasm // U.S. News and World Report The Run 2016 // David Catanese - May 1, 2015

He’s a cantankerous, bespectacled, balding New Yorker who is inclined to see the glass half-empty.

Born to Jewish parents, he’s devoutly irreligious and fiercely liberal. He’s not one to engage in small talk, like the stop-and-chat. And his mood is perpetually sullen, with dashes of cutting humor.

Larry David isn’t running for president. But his political doppelgänger – Bernie Sanders – is.

One is a renowned comedian currently performing on Broadway. The other is a grizzled politician – a second-term senator representing Vermont – who will be putting on his own show in cities like Bedford, New Hampshire, and Bettendorf, Iowa.

But the similarities between the two – in likeness, demeanor and even substance – are uncanny.

First, there’s the appearance. Separated by just six years in age, there’s the wispy white hair split by a shiny cranium. And the trademark glasses, which do little to hide a face that usually looks either mildly irked or unimpressed.

Yes, Bernie dons the dark suit and white shirt required of male public officials, whereas Larry prefers khakis and a plain navy corduroy jacket. But there’s a striking simplicity to both men’s wardrobes. These are guys with bigger things to stew on than what they put on in the morning.

Bernie and Larry also share a prickly streak that places Larry in countless sticky situations on the HBO program “Curb Your Enthusiasm” and could prove fraught for Bernie in those mandatory warm-and-fuzzy moments on the campaign trail. Larry can be awkward, amusing and irritating all at once in daily interactions. And while Bernie is not expected to engage a potential supporter about the propriety of using a handicapped-accessible restroom stall, if he’s offered a house tour in an early primary state, as Larry found, it’s best to zip your lip and endure it.

But Bernie has also shown a proclivity for not playing along.

When he appeared on Bloomberg Politics' “With All Due Respect” program last fall, he was pelted with a bunch of personality questions meant to “get to know him” better. Amid a string of inquiries that ranged from his grandchildren to his athletic ability, Sanders let slip: “I’m not a great fan of media in general.”

Neither is Larry.

When he was being interviewed by “60 Minutes” for a March episode to promote his play “Fish in the Dark,” he made clear he wasn’t comfortable.

“I had to be talked into '60 Minutes.' You think I wanted to do this? I didn’t want to do it! 'Cause I knew you’d be asking questions like this!” he told interviewer Charlie Rose.

Bernie’s Bloomberg interview took a similar path.

Mark Halperin pitched a question thousands were yearning to know: Was he – and not Larry – the actual voice of George Steinbrenner on "Seinfeld"?

Of course not.

But Halperin handed Bernie some lines to try it out. Bernie obliged, but didn’t seem excited.

He bowed his head, averting his eyes, seemingly thinking, “Why did I agree to do this?”

“Did you do the voice of George Steinbrenner?” Halperin pressed.

"No," Bernie replied, tapping his hands on the upholstered chair he was seated in.

Then, the Bernie broadside: "Now that we've dealt with the important issues facing America, what else do we have?"

Personality isn't central to selecting our political candidates, Bernie said. "What's more important is there are enormous problems facing this country and we don't talk about them."

It was full curmudgeon. Larry would be proud.

Larry and Bernie are quite copacetic when it comes to their politics, from tax cuts to climate change.

But Bernie embodies Larry's dour view of the world – that if it could go wrong, it probably will.

A challenge for Bernie's 2016 campaign will be infusing sun into his rather gloomy outlook of the current political atmosphere.

The Iraq War was "the worst foreign policy blunder in modern American history," Bernie's lamented.

The Citizens United Supreme Court decision that opened the floodgates of political spending showed that the "foundations of American democracy" are in serious danger, he has warned.

Bernie has also repeatedly suggested that what he's attempting – to make a credible run for the Democratic nomination against a billion-dollar front-runner – may not be possible.

"If that is the case, what a sad state of affairs that is for American democracy," he said Wednesday on the lawn in front of the U.S. Capitol.

In February, he stated quite grimly that the game might be over before it has even started, referring to the libertarian Koch brothers and the eye-popping sum of money they're planning deploy in the 2016 election.

"Can you take that on? I don't know the answer. Maybe the game is over. Maybe they have bought the United States government. Maybe there is no turning back. Maybe we've gone over the edge," he said.

It conjures up the cover image of Season 3's "Curb Your Enthusiasm" box set, in which Larry is staring contemplatively into a glass half-full.

Bernie understands the odds against an avowed socialist. But as the first official Democratic alternative to Hillary Clinton, he immediately fills a void for those progressives who feel ignored or taken for granted.

Larry would probably tell Bernie his ultimate goal is out of reach, too hard to obtain, maybe even silly. But Bernie will raise the uncomfortable issues – whether it be trade, money in politics or foreign intervention – that could put Clinton in some sticky situations.

He won't win, but ultimately, Bernie may – ahem – curb Hillary's enthusiasm.

Baltimore riots hurt O'Malley's already slim chances // Politico // James Hohmann – May 1, 2015

Martin O'Malley's political career, which started on the streets of Baltimore, may also end there: Half of Democratic insiders in the early states believe this week's riots have hurt the former mayor's already long-shot presidential hopes.

The POLITICO Caucus, our weekly bipartisan survey of the most important activists, operatives and elected officials in Iowa and New Hampshire, found that Democrats are evenly split over whether racial unrest will be a minor or significant issue in the presidential campaign.

"I really like and respect O'Malley, so it pains me to write that I think the Baltimore violence will essentially disqualify him as a viable presidential candidate for a broad swath of Americans," said a New Hampshire Democrat, who – like all 73 respondents – completed the questionnaire anonymously in order to speak candidly. "The renaissance of Baltimore has been such a huge part of his biography when he speaks to Democrats, so when your TV shows Baltimore on fire, riot police on the streets and baseball at an empty Camden Yards, one can only wonder what kind of lasting progress he made there."

On the Republican side, six in 10 insiders think the turmoil between African Americans and the police has injured Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul politically, though three-quarters of Republicans believe it will either be a non-issue or a minor one.

“Rand is advocating, in part, for reduced sentences for non-violent crimes,” said an Iowa Republican. “However, all anyone is going to see and hear is ‘Put more criminals back out on the street,’ and overlay that with the images that everyone is watching from the mayhem in Baltimore. How does he argue that being softer on crime would alleviate the rioting???”

Here are the six main takeaways from Week 12 of The POLITICO Caucus:

Changing his travel plans may not have helped O’Malley.

The former mayor and governor canceled paid speaking gigs in Europe to return home after the rioting on Monday. The attempt at damage control, which included an op-ed, failed to quell growing doubts about O’Malley’s rationale for seeking the presidency and spotlighted his controversial approach to policing during his eight years as mayor from 1999 to 2007.

“Returning to Baltimore was an odd move, especially considering there’s not much he can actually do about the unrest,” said a New Hampshire Democrat. “By coming back he also made it easier to link his own police policies as mayor to the current situation.”

“Any mention of Baltimore will now draw people’s attention to the events of the last few days — not any of the progress he claims to have made while mayor,” said an Iowa Democrat.

Several Democrats complained about O’Malley’s embrace of zero-tolerance policing tactics, which have been widely criticized this week by people like David Simon, the creator of the HBO crime drama “The Wire.” More than 108,400 arrests were made in 2005, according to the Baltimore Sun. For context, only about 600,000 people live in the city.

“The Anyone-But-Clinton crowd is on the left, and police-racial issues are a litmus test now,” said an Iowa Democrat.

O’Malley’s campaign-in-waiting said Thursday night that Baltimore saw a greater reduction of serious crimes during his tenure than any other major U.S. city. “When O’Malley was elected mayor in 1999, Baltimore was the most violent, addicted, and abandoned city in America,” spokeswoman Lis Smith emailed reporters .”His policies — including proactive policing, policing of the police, increased drug treatment, and earlier intervention with at-risk youth — fundamentally changed the trajectory of the city of Baltimore.”

Six in 10 Republicans agreed that the events of this week are damaging to O’Malley, and many of those who didn’t argued that it’s not damaging because he was already irrelevant. “It’s difficult for O’Malley to sink any lower than the 1 percent current polls have him at,” said a Granite Stater. “Right now, he has the ability to luxuriate in the purity of his irrelevance.”

Most think Rand mishandled the Baltimore blow-up.

Paul has closely identified himself with criminal justice reform, traveling to Ferguson, Mo., last year and spending a lot of time engaging with the African-American community.

More than six in 10 Republicans surveyed said that they thought the violence in Baltimore would benefit candidates who back more traditional Republican positions on crime at Paul’s expense.

“The more there is chaos both abroad and at home — the less Republican caucus-goers are going to take a risk on libertarian-oriented policies that Paul is selling,” said an Iowa Republican. “On the domestic front, personal security still trumps civil liberties with GOP voters.”

“The events in Baltimore break down neatly along ideological lines,” added a New Hampshire GOPer. “For Republican voters, this is another reason to stress the rule of law and a strong police presence. For Democrats, this is another instance of the breakdown of race relations and the need for ‘criminal justice reform.’ Both are unhelpful for Rand, who risks looking soft on crime, and [Hillary] Clinton, who now has to explain the change in tone on her tough on crime rhetoric from the 1990s to her speech this week talking about the need for cameras on cops everywhere.”

Democrats were evenly split 50-50 on whether Baltimore is good or bad for Paul.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The third of Republican insiders who think Baltimore is a plus for Paul predicted he will ultimately get credit for tackling this tough issue once the imagery of the moment dies down.

“While the violence is inexcusable, the frustration and peaceful protests are legitimate,” said an Iowa Republican. “Rand Paul is the only Republican who’s getting it. If the GOP fails to understand why people are unhappy with what they’re getting from the criminal justice system, then the Democrats hold the White House. It really is that simple.”

Another Iowa Republican staked out a more nuanced position: “Baltimore probably tilts to helpful for Rand to get his message out, but for every non-traditional supporter he appeals to on the issue, he likely turns off a social conservative he’s desperately trying to secure.”

Since announcing his presidential campaign last month, Paul has discernibly shifted his tone. On Tuesday, he told conservative radio host Laura Ingraham that he was “glad” his train hadn’t stopped in Baltimore on the way back to D.C. the night before as he expressed concern about “the plight of police.” Then, during the same radio hit, he blamed the violence on “the breakdown of the family structure, the lack of fathers, the lack of sort of a moral code in our society.”

This was too much for many Democratic respondents to The Caucus, who pointed out that the senator’s 22-year-old son was charged just last week for driving under the influence of alcohol after crashing into a parked car.

“He would have gotten a pass on the incident regarding his son because it’s not fair game, but he made it fair game with his remarks about fathers’ responsibilities for their sons in Baltimore,” said a New Hampshire Democrat. “Voters don’t like hypocrisy.”

There’s bipartisan agreement: Hillary’s tough-on-crime rhetoric from the ‘90s makes no difference now.

Seventy percent of both Republican and Democratic insiders said the 21-year-old crime bill signed by Bill Clinton, which temporarily led to 100,000 more cops on the street while fueling the massive surge in incarceration, is neither helpful nor hurtful to Hillary Clinton’s presidential hopes.

After the former secretary of state delivered a speech Wednesday calling for the end of mass incarceration and recommended police departments have their officers wear body cameras, Paul issued a press release pointing out that she was a cheerleader for the policies that created the underlying problems at First Lady: “Not only is Hillary Clinton trying to undo some of the harm inflicted by the Clinton administration, she is now emulating proposals introduced by Senator Rand Paul over the last several years, and we welcome her to the fight.”

An overwhelming number of Democratic insiders said Bernie Sanders could not carry their state against the Republican nominee in a general election | Getty

Two-thirds of Republican insiders don’t think this line of attack has legs, while one-third said it will be harmful for Clinton.

“Hillary is advocating for sentencing and prison reforms that lighten punishment for certain crimes,” said an Iowan. “That’s her position, not some long-forgotten crime bill her husband signed.”

“Opinions on Hillary are set,” said another. “All these issues do is cement what you already think.”

One in five Democrats said the 1994 efforts will be helpful, while one in 10 said they are harmful.

“Bill Clinton showed that you can reduce crime and offer support to law enforcement without blowing up race relations in the country,” said a New Hampshire Democrat.

Democrats are divided over how big of a deal this issue will be in 2016.

About half of Democratic insiders think that the racial unrest will become a significant issue in 2016, and the other half say it will be a minor issue.

“This is our 7.8 earthquake,” said a New Hampshire Democrat. “Just like Nepal, we should have expected it, and just like Nepal we did nothing to prepare but chose to ignore. The difference is Nepal is poor, and we are rich. A pox on us!”

“We are now likely at a tipping point and can expect to see more marches and rallies moving toward the presidential elections,” said another. “Moreover, this is not simply a matter of racial tensions. It also involves income inequality and the fact that we are leaving millions of our citizens behind. Our candidates are going to be pressed for their plans to address these issues.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Democrats who said it will be a minor issue explained why it is such a tough topic to talk about.

“Man, this is complicated,” said another New Hampshire Democrat. “Libertarian Republicans and progressive Democrats both have been complaining about the militarization of the police, and the use of Homeland Security resources to obtain military equipment. On the other hand, most cops are good cops, and I think most people get that. Candidates will have to walk a fine line on how to be supportive of racial justice without throwing good cops under the bus. These guys are out there every day, working for us and putting their lives at risk, but meanwhile way too many African Americas are getting killed or incarcerated.”

Republicans were much more likely to say that racial tensions will be a minor issue.

“They don’t involve constituencies that vote in Republican primaries,” said a New Hampshire Republican.

“There have been too many incidents for them not to matter, but the campaign will be about bigger-scope issues,” said another.

Many Republican strategists said the party needs to offer smart solutions.

“Republicans need to be careful to not pigeonhole this simply as a failure of government and a repudiation of the Great Society program,” said an Iowan.

Very few take Bernie Sanders seriously.

The Vermont independent senator formally kicked off his bid for the Democratic nomination on Thursday, but more than 90 percent of Democratic insiders in the two early states said there is no way Sanders could win their state’s caucus or primary. GOP insiders answered similarly.

The same overwhelming number said Sanders could not carry their state against the Republican nominee in a general election.

“A socialist winning outside of Vermont? Hard to believe,” said a New Hampshire Democrat.

“The Clinton campaign should be ecstatic,” said another. “Sen. Sanders gives Hillary the benefit of a credible primary opponent who has absolutely no chance of winning. She can now comfortably continue her progressive window-dressing while still looking practical and moderate in comparison.”

“He isn’t the right messenger,” said a third. “He will get some support in our primary. But, people want to win, and New Hampshire Democrats have been very astute in recent years in nominating candidates who can win, like [Sen.] Jeanne Shaheen, [former Gov.] John Lynch and [Gov.] Maggie Hassan, even if the candidates are more moderate than the primary base voters. They will want Secretary Clinton to be more moderate than Bernie Sanders because they will want a candidate who can win.”

As a Republican put it, “he is only a fly in the ointment.”

Several GOP insiders lamented that Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) did not get into the race. “Unlike the Senator from the state on New Hampshire’s southern border, Sanders doesn’t have the polish of a Warren needed to play in New Hampshire,” said a Republican there. “The Granite State has typically eschewed the angry candidates — Pat Buchanan in 1996 aside — in favor of the more composed.”

New Hampshire Democrats are far more likely to believe Sanders will pull Clinton to the left than the Iowans.

Overall, Democratic insiders were evenly split when asked whether the Sanders challenge will force the frontrunner to tack left. But opinions varied by state: A majority in New Hampshire did, but a majority in Iowa did not.

“He’s just a gnat buzzing around the Scooby Van right now,” said an Iowa Democrat. “She has written off the college towns and Fairfield to Sanders. But that is his ceiling.”

“He absolutely will pull her to the left in New Hampshire,” responded a Democrat there. “He will enjoy significant support in western cities and towns bordering Vermont — Hanover, Lebanon, Claremont and Keene — and may earn some key liberal supporters on the college campuses, in Concord and along the Seacoast too.”

Iowa Democrats said that Clinton, to the extent she goes left, will be forced in that direction by the outside influence of Warren and others like New York Mayor Bill de Blasio or O’Malley.

“Clinton has already been pulled to the proverbial left — a great example is her focus on economic inequalities and criminal justice reform,” said an Iowa Democrat. “But do I think she’s going to go down the single-payer route because Bernie is in the race? No. Will she be as hard charging against Wall Street as Bernie? No. Will this enable him to garner support? Yes."

A lot of Republicans said it all depends on how seriously progressive activists take him. "Folks thought little of Howard Dean in the beginning as well," a New Hampshire Republican said of another Vermonter.

"Not sure if HRC will take the bait," said an Iowa Republican, "but it'll be entertaining as hell to watch Sanders try."

Cleveland's 2016 convention plan: Don't be Baltimore // Politico // Daniel Lippman – May 2, 2015

City officials are taking steps to make sure demonstrations — or worse — don't disrupt the Republicans' big show. Could Cleveland be next?

Cleveland, the host city for the 2016 Republican convention, has its own Freddie Gray incident — the killing by police last year of Tamir Rice, a 12-year-old African American boy who turned out to be brandishing a toy gun.

It has its own Ferguson-style Justice Department investigation, a damning 58-page report that found "the trust between the Cleveland Division of Police and many of the communities it serves is broken." The report condemned the CDP's widespread use of "unnecessary and excessive deadly force" symbolized by a militarized sign hung in one district station: "Forward Operating Base." In one high-profile 2012 case, two motorists were killed during a 22-minute car chase in which police shot at the fleeing vehicle 137 times.

And Cleveland, like Baltimore, consistently ranks among America's most segregated cities, with the country's second-highest rate of children living in poverty — 54 percent, trailing only Detroit.

Landing the RNC was a major coup, but city leaders now find themselves trying to avoid a nightmare scenario ahead of next year's convention: riots that could disrupt planning and hurt the city's image.

On Tuesday, Cleveland Mayor Frank Jackson emailed a letter to "Community Leaders" saying the city was "planning for a variety of contingencies and are being very proactive in both communication and outreach."

Republicans seeking White House say it's all about stopping Hillary Clinton // Post and Courier // Schuyler Kropf - May 2, 2015

Republicans running for the White House did their best to portray a Hillary Clinton presidency as the third term of President Barack Obama as they defended religious liberty and an expanded war on radical Islam to the hundreds of party faithful who gathered for the S.C. GOP State Convention here Saturday.

"We need to understand that the Obama foreign policy has been an unmitigated disaster," former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said as he made his case for a probable White House run.

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz said he was particularly offended by Republicans who stepped away from legislation in Indiana and Arkansas this spring that would have allowed merchants to decide if they wanted to serve gay patrons on religious grounds.

"It's sad to see how many Republicans have run for the hills and hidden in the caves," said Cruz, the only one of the five potential candidates here this weekend who has formally declared a bid.

U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham did not discuss his own interest in a White House run, but led the chorus of those taking shots at Clinton and Obama. The president, he said, has missed "an opportunity to take America to a better place" during his presidency.

"He ran from the middle of the road, but he governed from the left ditch," Graham said, and "this what happens when you elect a commander-in-chief who doesn't know what they hell they are doing."

Among the likely candidates, Graham spoke first at the convention before heading to New Hampshire for two days of stumping there. He's expected to announce a bid by June.

Graham was the only candidate who mentioned the situation in Baltimore where rioting last week followed the death of Freddie Gray in police custody. Graham said Republican ideas could aid the city, such as by closing failing schools.

Bush was also the only candidate to play up his anti-union credentials, saying he battled teacher unions in Florida.

Other speakers included former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry.

Both men also took shots at the administration, with Santorum saying that not enough has been done to appeal to the working class in America, many of whom are becoming jobless in the changing economy.

“You want to appeal to the people who feel left behind?” he asked. “Make jobs for the workers,” he answered.

Perry said conservatives live in a world of “reality based thinking” when it comes to identifying world threats, something he charged the White House has not handled effectively. “We are in the early years of a struggle with radical Islamic extremists and it’s going to last a long time,” he said.

Perry also differed with what he identified as the liberal view on gun control, saying “the best defense against crime is an armed citizenry.” He drew loud applause for the comment.

The state convention was an opportunity for 1,000 county delegates to get together under one roof at the Columbia Convention Center to hear speeches, trade strategies and conduct party business. The biggest internal business was that Matt Moore was re-elected state party chairman by a wide margin, turning back a challenge from Anderson County Republican Mark Powell.

Still, the draw was the GOP presidential hopefuls, all of whom have made previous stump visits to the state in the buildup toward next year’s first-in-the-South presidential primary, probably on Feb. 20.

While the candidates attacked Obama’s seven years in office, there was little discussion of how the country could be turned around economically, beyond cutting taxes and increasing de-regulation.

Globally, all five candidates recommitted their support for Israel, saying Obama’s foreign policy and pursuit of a nuclear treaty with Iran will make the world less safe. Several also pointed to Clinton’s role as Secretary of State in contributing to the decline of U.S. influence abroad.

“You shouldn’t be riding ‘shotgun’ with the person who pulled us back,” Bush said of Clinton, adding “she has her fingerprints on all these foreign policy disasters.”

Cruz also returned to his dislike of the Affordable Care Act, saying anger against it among conservatives is enough to affect the upcoming election. “Millions of Americans are ready to appeal Obamacare,” he said.

Each of the candidates had about 15 minutes to speak, and they left the meeting hall right afterward.

While the gathering ended quietly after about four hours, Gov. Nikki Haley did note that presidential primary fights in South Carolina have a reputation for getting out of hand. She asked the delegates to keep 2016 friendly.

“Stand up for the person you believe in but make sure you are respectful about it,” she told the crowd.

Jeb Bush exploits major loophole in campaign finance rule // MSNBC // Aliyah Frumin- May 2, 2015

Today, thanks to a Supreme Court decision that unleashed unlimited money into politics, even the unlikeliest of long-shot presidential candidates needs only one very wealthy patron to run a credible campaign. It’s a system that many campaign finance reform advocates see as messy and bordering on corrupt. But now, Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush is taking things to an entirely new level: putting off his official entry into the 2016 race so he can raise vast sums for a super PAC that’s supposed to be entirely independent of his all-but-certain campaign.

“Until he says the magic words ‘I’m running for president,’ he can raise as much money as he wants.”

The 2016 GOP field is already crowded. Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas, Marco Rubio of Florida and Rand Paul of Kentucky are in, with announcements expected next week from former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina, retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson and former Arkansas Gov. Huckabee. Missing from that group is Bush, an early GOP frontrunner who says he’s still “exploring” a possible candidacy. Why is he waiting? In a word, money.
By not officially jumping in the race, the former Florida governor doesn’t have to abide by the “hard money” rules of presidential campaigns, which cap primary donations at just $2,700 per individual. He’s raising unlimited funds for his Right to Rise super PAC instead.

Super PACs, which sprang to life in the wake of the Supreme Court’s 2010 Citizens United decision, can accept unlimited donations from wealthy individuals and from corporations. The only rule: they must operate independently of a candidate’s official campaign operation.

The word ‘candidate’ is key. Since Bush isn’t yet an announced candidate, he is essentially exploiting a loophole in the law and soliciting for his own super PAC.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to the Sunlight Foundation, a non-partisan group that advocates for government transparency, Bush has headlined at least 47 appearances –many of them fundraisers – on behalf of Right to Rise since January. Indeed, he recently bragged to have raised more money in 100 days (estimated to be as much as $100 million) than any other political operation in his party.

It may seem obvious that Bush is competing for the GOP nomination. “But until he says the magic words ‘I’m running for president,’ he can raise as much money as he wants,” said Bill Allison, a senior fellow at the Sunlight Foundation. “He’s really using the super PAC like we’ve never seen before.”

That’s especially true because Team Bush reportedly has plans to have his super PAC essentially take control of the many operations that a candidate’s campaign would typically handle, like expensive television advertising and direct mail. The advantage is simple: the super PAC can raise unlimited funds, while his campaign will be subject to much stricter rules. And by waiting to declare his candidacy, Bush is giving himself plenty of time to coordinate with the super PAC and come up with a winning strategy for how it will later spend money on his behalf. According to the Associated Press, Mike Murphy – Bush’s longtime strategist – is likely to take the super PAC’s reins when the GOPer officially announces.

A Bush spokesperson did not respond to requests for comment.

Of course, there are other ways to skirt the spirit of campaign finance rules too. One popular way in recent cycles has been to score a billionaire donor who will set up a super PAC for a specific candidate – like Sheldon Adelson did for Newt Gingrich or Foster Friess did for Rick Santorum in 2012, keeping those candidacies alive far longer than they would have under the old rules.

“The whole theory behind Citizens United is large money can’t corrupt because it’s independent … What Jeb Bush is doing undermines that.”

In this presidential cycle, Rubio has already bagged the support of Florida billionaire Norman Braman, while Ken Langone, the billionaire co-founder of Home Depot, has lined up behind New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie. Even Bush recently acknowledged to msnbc that the conservative, billionaire Koch brothers will likely play a big role in the 2016 presidential race, and that if he does run for president he’ll reach out to reach out to every sector of the party, including the Kochs.

“If you have a big backer, it buys you additional chances to make your case,” said Rick Hasen, a campaign finance regulation expert and professor of law and political science at UC-Irvine School of Law.

But even in a post-Citizens United world, Bush’s moves regarding his super PAC are new territory.

“The whole theory behind Citizens United is large money can’t corrupt because it’s independent. It might not even help the candidate because it’s not being done with any coordination,” said Hasen. “What Jeb Bush is doing undermines that … Giving money to the super PAC is just about the same as giving it to him.”

Bush is not the only GOPer coming under criticism over how he’s operating early in the game. Similar complaints have been lobbed against former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, and Democratic former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley. The Campaign Legal Center and Democracy 21 have filed complaints with the FEC accusing the four of “actively organizing and running early presidential bids without abiding by federal rules related to fundraising limits and disclosure.”

Some allege that what Bush is doing is more than squeezing through a fundraising loophole, arguing his behavior is flat-out illegal. The liberal American Democracy Legal Fund this week filed a complaint with the Federal Election Commission against the ex-governor’s super PAC, alleging it is breaking campaign finance laws by coordinating directly with Bush.

Is Jeb Bush struggling?

“Bush’s motivation for failing to declare his candidacy is to skirt the prohibition on federal candidates raising soft money. By failing to declare himself a ‘candidate,’ he takes the position that he can fundraise for Right to Rise super PAC, Inc. without violating the law,” the complaint says. It adds that Bush “triggered” candidate status several months ago when he began traveling the country to raise money in excess of what would be reasonably expected for someone who is merely considering running.

Ben Ray, a spokesman for ADLF, said “it is clear this is the mechanism [Bush] is using to escape campaign finance law and he needs to be held accountable for it,” asking, “On what planet do we need $10, $20, $30 million for someone who is just thinking about running?”

FEC Spokeswoman Julia Queen verified receipt of the complaint but said the commission was prohibited from discussing any aspects of an open case.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Several experts said the likelihood that the FEC would take any action before the next election cycle is unlikely. "The FEC's wheels turn very slowly ... If we do see any action, it will likely be after the [2016] election," said Hasen.

Also the composition of the FEC – made of six committee members split along party lines – matters. "If there's a 3-3 split, that means no action is taken and they close the case," said Scott Thomas, a former FEC chairman and Democrat. The three conservatives, Thomas said, would likely cite First Amendment rights and be "hesitant to find anything that will be a violation of the law."

Jeb's secret Jersey mission // Politico // Alex Isenstadt – May 2, 2015

Jeb Bush is quietly waging a behind-the-scenes offensive to pick off disillusioned home-state supporters of Chris Christie, the New Jersey governor whose presidential prospects have dimmed in recent months.

Bush's effort to undermine Christie's network of donors, power-brokers, and political players is conducted mainly through emails and phone conversations — and he tracks the progress closely.

At a get-together with donors in Miami last weekend, Bush sat down for a private conversation with Lawrence Bathgate, a prominent New Jersey attorney and former Christie donor who is now behind the Florida Republican. During the talk, Bathgate, a former Republican National Committee finance chairman, outlined to Bush a plan to have a majority of the state's 16 Republican state senators endorse him.

Bush responded with a question. How soon, he wanted to know, would the endorsements start to roll in? And could some of them be announced sooner rather than later?

The former Florida governor is said to court Christie boosters with frequent emails and makes himself accessible to them. "He's a great emailer," said Hersh Kozlov, a major Republican Party fundraiser in New Jersey and former Christie supporter who's now with the former Florida governor.

The attempts to crack the Christie network — both are in competition for the same group of moderate and establishment Republicans — dates back at least to January, not long after Bush launched his presidential exploratory committee. At the time, Bush met with around a dozen New Jersey Republicans for dinner at New York City's Union Club. He started out the meeting in a surprising way, telling those gathered that they should feel free to ask him anything — no holds barred. One person took him up on the challenge, posing a question to him about his daughter's struggle with drug addiction.

For months, Bush and his finance chief, Heather Larrison, have been reaching out to New Jersey donors. Once a financial commitment is secured, they typically ask that person for names of friends or associates in the state who might also want to give.

As Christie's fortunes have seemed to fade amid his sagging polling numbers, fiscal problems at home and fallout from the Bridgegate scandal — on Friday a former political ally of the governor pleaded guilty and two other former officials were indicted for their alleged roles in the affair — Bush's efforts have ramped up.

Last month, Bush landed his biggest catch yet: Joe Kyrillos, a longtime state senator who chaired Christie's 2009 campaign. When Kyrillos, a former New Jersey Republican Party chairman, appeared at a Bush donor event in Miami last week, he was greeted with a hero's welcome. At a private dinner, which was attended by around 350 of the former governor's biggest benefactors, the senator was rewarded with a round of applause and a seat at Bush's table.

Among the other recent public converts to Bush: Brian Nelson, an up-and-coming, 37-year-old lobbyist who less than six years ago helped lead Christie's gubernatorial transition team and John Crowley, a biotech executive whose compelling life story was the subject of a 2010 Harrison Ford movie. Crowley had contributed over $7,000 to Christie's campaigns.

"I think there is a very broad effort to win over the traditional fundraising community, especially the people who supported Chris Christie," said Crowley, who plans to cut Bush a check. "Here in New Jersey, I think there is very broad support for Governor Bush."

So far, Bush has yet to hold a fundraiser in New Jersey or to campaign there — a decision, those close to him say, reflecting a belief that doing so would be seen as an intentional provocation to Christie, whose team keeps an iron-fisted grip over the party apparatus in the state. Most often, Bush has chosen to hold his face-to-face meetings with the state's Republicans across the border in New York City. But that calculus is now changing. In recent days, Bush's camp has been in talks with its supporters in the state about holding an early summer fundraiser there.

Publicly, the Bush team is saying little. Tim Miller, a spokesman, declined to comment on the push other than to say: "We're happy to earn the support of any like-minded individuals across the country that want to support Gov. Bush."

Christie's team insists Bush's effort will have little overall impact, arguing that the Florida Republican's support in the state represents just a small fraction of the party. Christie continues to maintain the public backing of the state's 21 influential GOP county chairmen and a number of other key players, including Dale Florio, a Trenton lobbyist, Jon Bramnick, the GOP leader in the state Assembly, and George Gilmore, an attorney and the Ocean County Republican Party chairman.

"I am not concerned about it. Ninety-nine percent of the state GOP political establishment will be with Christie if he runs," said Mike DuHaime, a Christie adviser. "The few defectors will have their own personal reasons for doing so, but it will be of no concern in the long run."

One reason for that high level of confidence is the reluctance of GOP officeholders to buck the incumbent governor — constitutionally one of the most powerful governorships in the nation. Regardless of Christie's standing in the presidential race at the moment, his term in office doesn't expire until January 2018 — and he has a reputation for playing hard-ball politics, especially against those he deems disloyal. Many of those contacted for this story declined to speak for the record out of fear, they say, of inflaming Christie.

Among many ex-Christie backers, an often-stated reason for defecting is a longstanding relationship with the Bush family. Kyrillos first met Bush in 1986, back when Bush was serving as chairman of the Miami Dade Republican Party. Clifford Sobel, a prominent GOP fundraiser, served in the George W. Bush administration as ambassador to Brazil. Kozlov said he'd forged a relationship with Jeb Bush ahead of the 2000 presidential campaign. In 1998, Bush flew up to Cherry Hill, N.J. for a fundraiser he was hosting.

"I've known Jeb for a long, long time," he said. "For me, it was a very easy choice."

For others, the issue is Christie's hard-charging personal style. Gail Gordon, an influential Republican lobbyist in the state who is with Bush, found herself at odds with Christie after he targeted her husband, a Democrat in the state Senate, for defeat. Bathgate, who raised money for George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush, clashed with the governor over his plan to construct sand dunes across the state's coastline.

Christie, for his part, has remained stoic.

During an appearance on a local radio station this week, Christie was asked about the Kyrillos defection.

"This is politics," he shrugged. "It's not personal."

"It doesn't change my view of him," he added. "I love him."

No charges, but Christie's troubles persist // USAToday // Michael Symons – May 2, 2015

Although New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie wasn't charged Friday in the George Washington Bridge scandal, his political problems from the illegal, intentional lane closures may have gotten worse.

The good news for Christie was that U.S. Attorney Paul J. Fishman said that he expects no one else, beyond the three people implicated by his office, to face criminal charges in connection with the lane closures.

The bad news is, it is now law enforcement, not merely the media or political partisans, decrying what Fishman described as a political vendetta — one carried out on behalf of Christie's re-election by people he entrusted with high-ranking positions of power.

Christie's primary defense since the sinister origins of the September 2013 traffic jams first came to light: He didn't know.

Such an excuse is not very presidential, in the opinion of Claira Monier, a resident of Goffstown, N.H. Her view should matter to Christie, who has been courting Republican voters in her state's first-in-the-nation-presidential primary.

"If you're a president, you have to trust the people close to you. If you cannot appoint people that are trustworthy and ethical, that raises some issues about you being an excellent administrator," Monier said. "And I think the president of the United States has to be a top-notch administrator."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Early Friday, ending months of speculation, one of the architects of the politically motivated lane closures pleaded guilty to federal charges that he conspired to cause the traffic jams that gripped Fort Lee over four days during the busy first week of school.

David Wildstein, the former director of capital projects for the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, admitted his role in causing the lane closures at the approach to the George Washington Bridge.

Wildstein also identified two alleged co-conspirators, Bridget Anne Kelly, a former deputy chief of staff to Christie, and Bill Baroni, the former deputy executive director of the Port Authority.

Kelly and Baroni denied any criminal wrongdoing following word of their indictment Friday, contending that Wildstein was lying. Windstein said the trio acted in concert, as part of a plant to punish the Democratic mayor of Fort Lee for not endorsing Republican Christie's 2013 re-election.

All three — Wildstein, Kelly and Baroni — were longtime Christie insiders.

Brigid Harrison, Montclair State University political scientist, said it's "almost irrelevant" that Christie didn't consent to the retaliation scheme; he enabled the atmosphere where people thought such conduct was allowed. She said Christie was already on shaky political ground and his opponents now have been handed a hammer.

"This is a real serious blow to his presidential bid," Harrison said. "It is not that a scandal of this type is insurmountable, but when you are at 4% of the GOP vote share nationally and key members of your staff are indicted, that is as close as you can come to a death knell."

Adding to the uncertainty is that there are likely more shoes to drop. Fishman was careful to limit his statements Friday to the GWB lane closures, not the other Port Authority issues his office is investigating, as evidenced by subpoenas disclosed by the authority.

Fishman made reference to unindicted co-conspirators who could be revealed later. Wildstein's agreement to plead guilty to two counts of conspiracy was signed in January, so he has been cooperating with federal investigators for many months.

At least one avenue of inquiry led nowhere. Federal authorities told attorneys for public officials being investigated for possibly threatening to withhold Superstorm Sandy aid — unless a Hoboken development was approved — that their clients were in the clear.

But if charges are eventually brought against former Port Authority Chairman David Samson, for example, that would shine still more light onto Christie's inner circle, as Samson was his 2009 campaign counsel. Some of the subpoenas issued in the wide-ranging investigations are focused on potential conflicts of interest in actions Samson took at the authority.

"Hillary Clinton is embroiled in scandal. Scott Walker is embroiled in scandal. But they're their party's front-runners," Harrison said. "If you're a stronger candidate, you can weather a storm like this. But the fact of the matter is that the governor is really damaged goods."

Christie's allies see things differently. They say investigations by the outside counsel hired by Christie's office, the state Legislature and the U.S. Attorney's Office all found he wasn't involved in the lane closures.

But few allies stepped forward to defend the governor: Only Christie's office and the Republican Party state chairman issued supportive statements, compared with 10 critical ones from Democrats.

At a minimum, Christie now knows more about the GWB scandal's scope as he mulls whether to run for president, said Joseph Marbach, the incoming president of Georgian Court University and a former president of the New Jersey Political Science Association.

"It certainly is a poor reflection on the part of any leader when you've got folks working for you either operating without your consent or without your knowledge, particularly when they're engaged in wrongdoing, as apparently Wildstein was, and it remains to be seen what Baroni and Kelly's roles have been," Marbach said.

He added: "You could certainly be criticized about how you're managing your office. To the governor's credit, when he apparently did find out, he took action in relieving people, Kelly in particular, of their jobs. But is that too little, too late? I guess that's what people will have to evaluate."

Baroni and Kelly were indicted on conspiracy and wire fraud charges. Both made lengthy statements Friday in which they maintained their innocence and lashed out at Wildstein. Wildstein's lawyer repeated assertions that the governor knew about the lane closures and that there was proof to that effect.

Christie's campaign hopes aren't over, said Seton Hall University political scientist Matthew Hale. The latest developments did not contradict what's been known for 16 months. And so long as wealthy donors like Home Depot cofounder and billionaire Ken Langone continue to back him, fundraising through the early states, in the GOP primaries, won't be an issue.

"He has an easy answer to everything that we heard today, and that is that everything that came out today is something that we already know, that we already heard. He's got a response, and I think that means he can keep going," Hale said. "We didn't see a smoking gun."

"I don't by any stretch think he's got a good shot," Hale said, "but I think he has a shot."

That will depend on early-state voters like Monier. She attended Christie's recent speech in New Hampshire about Social Security and Medicare and thought it was excellent. But Monier said she has too many questions right now about Christie to support him, at least until those issues play out.

"Every time something negative hits the news, it raises questions about Christie and the stereotypes some of us in New Hampshire have of New Jersey politicians," Monier said. "Whether it's true or not, it does exist. It raises concerns. It will take away from his message."

As Ben Carson bashes Obama, many blacks see a hero's legacy fade // Washington Post // Robert Samuels - May 2, 2015

The black man courting crowds of white conservatives doesn't seem like the same guy that H. Westley Phillips once idolized. Phillips still relishes the day he heard Ben Carson inspire minority students at Yale University with his story of persistence. He can still feel the nervous anticipation he had while waiting in line to shake Carson's hand.

After the speech, Phillips followed Carson's path and began to study neurosurgery.

"I had come from a public school in Tulsa and came from a single-parent household and thought I was the admissions mistake," said Phillips, now 27. "But he gave me the comfort to know that if I did struggle — and I thought I would — that I wouldn't have been the first, and there are ways to handle it. The message he gave was this backup artillery when times were hard."

For many young African Americans who grew up seeing Carson as the embodiment of black achievement — a poor inner-city boy who became one of the world's most accomplished neurosurgeons — his emergence as a conservative hero and unabashed critic of the United States' first black president has been jarring.

Carson has been a black icon since 1987, when he became the first person to successfully separate twins conjoined at the backs of their heads. He was a rare and much-desired role model: a black man who became known for his intellect, not for telling jokes or shooting basketballs.

Posters of Carson hung on bulletin boards in classrooms. Reading "Gifted Hands," his 1992 autobiography, was practically a rite of passage.

But now retired from his medical career, Carson, 63, has become known more widely since using his speech at the 2013 National Prayer Breakfast to offer a conservative critique of U.S. health-care and spending policies, while standing a few feet from President Obama.

In the ensuing months and years, Carson's attacks grew sharper — deriding Obama's signature health-care law as the "worst thing to have happened in this nation since slavery" and, in the pages of GQ, likening Obama to a "psychopath." Carson's 2014 book, "One Nation," assails a decline of moral values in America and its government.

As Carson prepares to announce his candidacy for president on Monday in his home town of Detroit, his political base is now whiter and more rural.

Carson's personal accomplishments — and the work he has done to help black communities — still garner respect and pride among African Americans. Yet, while he has been a conservative for as long as he has been famous, many worry that he risks eroding his legacy in their community and transforming himself into a fringe political figure.

Some black pastors who were Carson's biggest promoters have stopped recommending his book. Members of minority medical organizations that long boasted of their affiliations with him say he is called an “embarrassment” on private online discussion groups.

“Has he lost his sense of who he is?” said the Rev. Jamal Bryant, a prominent black pastor in Baltimore, where Carson lived for decades when he was director of pediatric neurosurgery at Johns Hopkins Hospital. “He does not see he is the next Herman Cain.”

Mark Terrelonge, 26, who is in his final year at Stanford University School of Medicine, said he feels his heart sink every time another clip of Carson shows up on his Facebook feed.

Reading “Gifted Hands” as a teenager, Terrelonge said he saw Carson’s story as an affirmation of his own ambitions to become a doctor. Never before had he heard of a black man in the upper echelons of medicine. But Terrelonge, who is gay, was stung when he heard Carson say that homosexuality was a choice.

“I don’t know how to say it exactly,” Terrelonge said. “I don’t want to attack him because he’s done great things in medicine, but the role-model aspect of him has kind of diminished in my life.”

Carson, too, is trying to fully understand his new place in black America. He spoke recently at the National Action Network, the civil rights group headed by the Rev. Al Sharpton, who once ran for president as a Democrat. Carson also issued a statement criticizing Baltimore demonstrators protesting after the death of Freddie Gray — urging parents to “please take control of your children and do not allow them to be exposed to the dangers of uncontrolled agitators on the streets.”

In an interview, Carson said he laments that many in the black community “drank the Kool-Aid and think I have forsaken them.”

“People write things. They say things. It saddens me,” Carson said. “There are forces in this country that really like to foster division and conflict, particularly in the black community, because they don’t want the synergy of them working together. Because that would advance them.”

The admiration many blacks have long felt for Carson differentiates him from past black conservative presidential candidates such as Cain, the former pizza executive who briefly rose in the polls during the 2012 primary season, Carson’s political supporters say. He has won the Presidential Medal of Freedom, awarded by Republican President George W. Bush, and the Spingarn Medal, the top honor given by the traditionally liberal NAACP.

His stature, Carson supporters say, helps him combat the perception that the far right is exclusive and out of touch. Critics, these supporters say, underestimate Carson’s potential impact on the race at their own peril.

“I would be elated if the left felt this too shall pass and he is just the chocolate flavor of the election cycle,” said Vernon Robinson, a fellow black conservative and chairman of the National Draft Ben Carson for President Committee. So far, Robinson said, the group has raised $16 million.

“Despite everything so far,” Robinson said, “he still has a reservoir of residual admiration.”

Carson’s renown — and his stature in black America — dates to his early years as a pediatric neurosurgeon at Johns Hopkins. Even then, Carson said, he always felt a sense of duty to help advance his race.

When the hospital started to receive publicity in the late 1980s for its attempt to separate German twins conjoined at the back of the head, Carson took the unusual step of asking not to be initially identified as the lead surgeon.

He said he worried that the procedure might not be treated as groundbreaking or important if the media and the broader public saw a black man in charge.

“Historically, when black people had done things of a scientific nature, many times either it wasn’t appropriately covered or someone else received most of the credit,” he said.

“And I was thinking what more of a tremendous thing it would be for young black kids to know something of this magnitude and this complexity was done by someone who looked like them,” Carson said.

After the surgery, Carson — young and soft-spoken — stepped forward. Intrigued journalists became “more interested in me than they were in the twins,” Carson recalled with a chuckle.

Someone suggested he write an autobiography. Agents kept calling for him, Carson said, “and then I thought to myself, 'I should write a book.' "

"Gifted Hands" chronicles his unlikely journey into medicine. His mother, a devout Seventh-day Adventist, raised Carson and his brother alone. She taught them that they could be anything they wanted to be. Carson was the worst student in his class and suffered a debilitating anger after his father walked out on his family, he wrote.

The autobiography described how Carson's mother barred television from the house and mandated her children read two books a week. He wrote that he prayed to God to cleanse him from his angry feelings. His grades soared, and he went on to graduate from Yale and then the University of Michigan Medical School.

He became the youngest director of pediatric neurosurgery at Johns Hopkins and the first black person to hold the position.

Carson said his agent expected the memoir to sell about 14,000 copies. According to its publisher Zondervan, the Christian arm of HarperCollins, it has sold 1.7 million.

Religious leaders in the black community emphasized the spiritual overtones and recommended the book to their youth groups. Teachers saw the narrative of achievement and social mobility and taught the book in their schools.

The legend of Ben Carson took flight. He became a regular speaker at graduations and churches, encouraging parents to find positive role models for their children — particularly black men. He asked them to instill pride by teaching minorities about the many inventions of black people, including the traffic light, the gas mask and the hair products of entrepreneur Madam C.J. Walker.

He founded a nonprofit called the Carson Scholars Fund. The group has distributed nearly $700,000 for scholarships to middle- and high-schoolers, awarding them with big trophies so academic success could be put on the same plane as athletic success.

Carson has also raised money to refurbish libraries in nearly 150 of the country's poorest schools. A Detroit public school was named for him, as was a medical school in Nigeria. By 2009, "Gifted Hands" was adapted to a made-for-TV movie.

Matt Dean Campbell, 25, remembers being tucked into bed growing up in South Florida as his mother read "Gifted Hands" to him. His mother, a domestic worker, struggled to pay the bills, but she wanted to imbue her son with stories of uplift, he said.

Campbell, now a high school teacher near Miami, said he has drawn on that message any time he has faced adversity. He was one of the slowest sprinters on his track team at the University of Michigan, Campbell said. He graduated as the captain. He continued pushing himself, because "that's what Ben Carson would do."

Sara McLaughlin, a teacher in Virginia Beach who works with troubled middle-schoolers, thought the book would be perfect for her class. Students wrote essays about Carson's resilience and got queasy when they watched the surgery scenes from the movie.

"Is this the same Ben Carson who is running for president?" she recalled a student asking.

Then came more questions: But he's not a politician, he's a doctor. Why would he run? A reading assignment became a civics lesson.

McLaughlin said she could offer no answer.

"It's funny," she said. "A lot of people are asking the same thing."

Presidential politics was not originally in Carson's plans, he said.

Retirement, he said, meant relaxing in his Florida home, playing golf, maybe a television appearance here or there.

That all changed after his appearance at the 2013 National Prayer Breakfast. It was the second time Carson was invited to speak at the event. The first time, in 1997, he made quips about the unfairness of HMOs. But this time, he went further. With repeated references to his tendency to be politically incorrect and offend the "PC police," he offered an alternative view of health-care reform in which people would simply have private accounts to pay for their own care with pre-tax income. He railed against the debt and tax policies that seek to force the wealthy to pay a higher share than others — endorsing a flat tax, similar to tithing.

Carson, who does not often speak with notes, insisted that this was not a political speech but an exhale of frustration of the state of the country. But then new admirers started suggesting he run for president. Within days, the Wall Street Journal published an editorial proclaiming “Ben Carson for President.” He began thinking maybe he should.

The political turn was unexpected for many who knew him. The Rev. Frank Reid of Bethel AME Church in Baltimore found it “astounding.” When they were at Yale together, Reid said, Carson was universally regarded as brilliant and hard-working. Reid could not recall Carson participating in student activism because he was too busy studying with his future wife, Candy, in the library.

When Carson first promoted “Gifted Hands,” Reid invited him to his church so his congregation could hear the story. But if Carson were to speak today, Reid said he would ask him to come in for a “family session, with our leaders, behind closed doors, to find out what is really going on.

“I am hedging about what to say, because you cannot take away the impact that he’s had,” Reid said. “But before we turn on the brother, we have to hear him out. As shocking as some of the things he’s said are, I would rather have a discussion than attack someone who has done respectful work.”

[The worst thing Ben Carson could do for ‘Ben Carson’ is run for president]

Carson says he is willing to put his legacy aside to do what he thinks is best for the country. Still, it matters to him.

Sitting at the Sheraton Hotel in New York last month, Carson seemed anxious as he prepared to address the National Action Network a few hours later. This audience, a mostly black group seeking the advancement of black people, used to be an easy crowd for Carson. But times had changed.

“I have no idea how they are going to receive me,” Carson said.

As Carson waited to go on stage, Sharpton pleaded with the crowd to give him a fair hearing. Carson got some applause when he reiterated his belief that marriage was between a man and a woman. He said it was “a bunch of crap” for critics to say he doesn’t like black people anymore.

“I love black people. My wife is a black woman,” he said.

Then came the Carson of old, borrowing parts of the speeches he used to give in the 1990s.

He talked about the need for black role models and the importance of teaching young people about those black inventors. His voice shook as he described the horrors of growing up in neighborhoods crippled by drugs and overrun by rodents, and of losing families members to gun violence. He asserted that hard work and faith were able to lift him — and anyone else — out of poverty.

The crowd rose to their feet.

The next week, Carson returned to more comfortable terrain for a prospective GOP presidential candidate: the convention of the National Rifle Association. There, he spoke of how he thinks the need to control gun violence on the streets does not outweigh the need to combat “radical Islamic terrorists.”

Days later, he appeared at a fundraiser for a faith-based medical clinic in the lush upstate South Carolina city of Greenville. He talked about the importance of putting God first and speaking honestly. The emcee of the event said Carson would help fill in the gap of having “good, godly leaders to stand up for what is right.” The neurosurgeon received another standing ovation.

Carson then sat at a table to sign copies of his books. A line of mostly white attendees formed. Near the end was Landry Assinesi, a 19-year-old student at Piedmont College in Georgia who came back home to listen to Carson speak.

Assinesi said he never read “Gifted Hands,” but he devoured “One Nation.” Reading Carson’s words, Assinesi said he found a new political hero.

Carly Fiorina to launch presidential campaign Monday // CBS News // Stephanie Condon – May 1, 2015

Carly Fiorina, the former CEO of Hewlett-Packard, will announce on Monday that she's seeking the 2016 Republican presidential nomination.

Fiorina will be the first woman to throw her hat into the ring for the GOP nomination. The other announced Republican candidates so far include Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas, Rand Paul of Kentucky and Marco Rubio of Florida. On the Democratic side, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont have announced their candidacies.

Despite HP, Fiorina touts business experience for possible 2016 bid

After Fiorina officially announces her candidacy, she'll take questions Monday afternoon during a live, online "town hall" event, via the app Periscope.

The next day, the former tech executive speaks at TechCrunch in New York City. After that, she embarks on a tour of the early-nominating states: She stops in Iowa on Thursday, New Hampshire on Friday and South Carolina on Saturday.

Also, Fiorina's new book will be released on Tuesday. Fiorina's share of all proceeds from the book are going to a charitable foundation, according to a spokesperson for the candidate.

Fiorina, who lost a bid for the U.S. Senate in 2010, has touted her business experience as an asset in the race.

Ted Cruz Says He Has Asked the Pentagon for Answers on Jade Helm 15 // Bloomberg // David Weigel – May 2, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ted Cruz said Saturday that he'd been hearing concerns about Jade Helm 15, a domestic military training exercise that has become a fount of conspiracy theories, and that he wanted questions about it to be answered.

"My office has reached out to the Pentagon to inquire about this exercise," Cruz, a Texas senator, told Bloomberg at the South Carolina Republican Party's annual convention. "We are assured it is a military training exercise. I have no reason to doubt those assurances, but I understand the reason for concern and uncertainty, because when the federal government has not demonstrated itself to be trustworthy in this administration, the natural consequence is that many citizens don't trust what it is saying."

The paranoia about Jade Helm, which started on websites like Alex Jones's InfoWars, had started with familiar fulmination about a mass seizure of firearms or a cover-up for American "death squads." This week, Texas Governor Greg Abbott channeled the concerns of voters in the Southwest, asking the Texas state guard to monitor the exercise for any violations of freedom. "It is important that Texans know their safety, constitutional rights, private property rights and civil liberties will not be infringed," said the governor.

Not every Republican was so concerned. Last week, Kentucky Senator Rand Paul told Iowa radio host Jan Mickelson that he'd "gotten a few questions" about Jade Helm and would "look at it." Today, South Carolina Senator Lindsey Graham told Bloomberg that he had never heard of the Jade Helm panic.

Cruz was more plugged in. "I have a great deal of faith and confidence in Governor Abbott," said the senator. "He is a long-time friend and mentor of mine. You know, I understand a lot of the concerns raised by a lot of citizens about Jade Helm. It's a question I'm getting a lot. And I think part of the reason is we have seen, for six years, a federal government disrespecting the liberty of the citizens. That produces fear, when you see a government that is attacking our free speech rights, or Second Amendment rights, or religious liberty rights. That produces distrust."

Later, in his speech to the convention, Cruz told South Carolina Republicans about his fights in Texas and Washington for religious liberty. The backlash to Indiana's religious-freedom law, he said, was a "perfect storm of the Democratic Party and big business coming together." Anyone who doubted that gay-marriage supporters could declare culture war on Christians needed only look at the 2014 fight between Houston pastors and a city that was trying to pass a gay rights ordinance.

"Just because you're paranoid," said Cruz, "doesn't mean they're not out to get you."

F.E.C. Can't Curb 2016 Election Abuse, Commission Chief Says // New York Times // Eric Lichtblau – May 2, 2015

The leader of the Federal Election Commission, the agency charged with regulating the way political money is raised and spent, says she has largely given up hope of reining in abuses in the 2016 presidential campaign, which could generate a record $10 billion in spending.

"The likelihood of the laws being enforced is slim," Ann M. Ravel, the chairwoman, said in an interview. "I never want to give up, but I'm not under any illusions. People think the F.E.C. is dysfunctional. It's worse than dysfunctional."

Her unusually frank assessment reflects a worsening stalemate among the agency's six commissioners. They are perpetually locked in 3-to-3 ties along party lines on key votes because of a fundamental disagreement over the mandate of the commission, which was created 40 years ago in response to the political corruption of Watergate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some commissioners are barely on speaking terms, cross-aisle negotiations are infrequent, and with no consensus on which rules to enforce, the caseload against violators has plummeted.

The F.E.C.'s paralysis comes at a particularly critical time because of the sea change brought about by the Supreme Court's decision in 2010 in the Citizens United case, which freed corporations and unions to spend unlimited funds in support of political candidates. Billionaire donors and "super PACs" are already gaining an outsize role in the 2016 campaign, and the lines have become increasingly stretched and blurred over what presidential candidates and political groups are allowed to do.

Watchdog groups have gone to the F.E.C. with complaints that probable presidential candidates like Jeb Bush and Martin O'Malley are skirting finance laws by raising millions without officially declaring that they are considering running.

Ms. Ravel, who led California's state ethics panel before her appointment as a Democratic member of the commission in 2013, said that when she became chairwoman in December, she was determined to "bridge the partisan gap" and see that the F.E.C. confronted such problems. But after five months, she said she had essentially abandoned efforts to work out agreements on what she saw as much-needed enforcement measures.

Now, she said, she plans on concentrating on getting information out publicly, rather than continuing what she sees as a futile attempt to take action against major violations. She said she was resigned to the fact that "there is not going to be any real enforcement" in the coming election.

"The few rules that are left, people feel free to ignore," said Ellen L. Weintraub, a Democratic commissioner.

Republican members of the commission see no such crisis. They say they are comfortable with how things are working under the structure that gives each party three votes. No action at all, they say, is better than overly aggressive steps that could chill political speech.

"Congress set this place up to gridlock," Lee E. Goodman, a Republican commissioner, said in an interview. "This agency is functioning as Congress intended. The democracy isn't collapsing around us."

Experts predict that the 2016 race could produce a record fund-raising haul of as much as $10 billion, with the growth fueled by well-financed outside groups. On their own, the conservative billionaires Charles G. and David H. Koch have promised to spend $889 million through their political network.

With the rise of the super PACs and the loosening of legal restrictions on corporate spending, campaigns and groups are turning to creative new methods of raising money. Writing in March in The Washington Post, Ms. Ravel charged that some candidates — she did not name names — appeared to have been amassing large war chests at fund-raisers this year without acknowledging that they were at least considering a presidential run, which would trigger campaign finance limits and disclosure.

She said it was "absurd" to think that such politicians were not at least considering a White House run under federal law.

"It's the Wild West out there in some ways," said Kate A. Belinski, a former lawyer at the commission who now works on campaign finance at a law firm. Candidates and political groups are increasingly willing to push the limits, she said, and the F.E.C.'s inaction means that "there's very little threat of getting caught."

As a lawyer in Silicon Valley who went after ethics violators in California during her time there, Ms. Ravel brought to Washington both a reformer's mentality and a tech-savvy background, and she has used Twitter and other media to try to attract young people and women to politics.

But her aggressive efforts have angered some Republicans, who charged that an F.E.C. hearing she scheduled for next week on challenges facing women in politics was not only outside the commission's jurisdiction but a thinly veiled attempt to help the presidential bid of Hillary Rodham Clinton. Ms. Ravel called the accusations "crazy."

Some disputes between the commissioners have gotten personal.

A disagreement over how to treat online political ads, for instance, turned tense when Ms. Ravel received anonymous online threats over charges that she was trying to "regulate" the Internet. She angrily confronted Mr. Goodman, charging that he had unfairly "fanned the flames" against her by mischaracterizing her position in an interview he did on Fox News. But Mr. Goodman said he had no regrets about challenging her position, which he saw as opening the door to greater regulation of Internet activities.

Relations between the two have been difficult ever since.

Last fall, Ms. Ravel did join Republicans on the commission — and took some criticism from the left — in a 4-to-2 decision that eased rules growing out of the Citizens United decision and a related case. But she has had little success in persuading Republicans to vote with her on enforcement measures.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She said she was particularly frustrated that Republican commissioners would not support cases against four nonprofit groups — including Crossroads GPS, founded by Karl Rove — accused of improperly using their tax-exempt status for massive and well-financed political campaigns.

A surge in this so-called "dark money" in politics — hundreds of millions of dollars raised by nonprofits, trade associations and other groups that can keep their donations secret — has alarmed campaign-finance reformers who are pushing to make such funding public.

But Mr. Goodman said the problem was exaggerated. He and other Republicans defend their decisions to block many investigations, saying Democrats have pushed cases beyond what the law allows.

"We're not interested in going after people unless the law is fairly clear, and we're not willing to take the law beyond where it's written," said Caroline C. Hunter, a Republican commissioner. Democrats view the law "more broadly," she said.

The commission has not always been so hamstrung. In 2006, it unanimously imposed major fines against high-profile groups — liberal and conservative — for breaking campaign finance laws two years earlier by misusing their tax-exempt status for political fund-raising and campaigning. The penalties put political groups on notice, and experts credited them with helping curb similar abuses in the 2008 campaign.

These days, the six commissioners hardly ever rule unanimously on major cases, or even on some of the most minor matters. Last month at an event commemorating the commission's 40th anniversary, even the ceremony proved controversial. Democrats and Republicans skirmished over where to hold it, whom to include and even whether to serve bagels or doughnuts. In a rare compromise, they ended up serving both.

Standing in front of a montage of photos from the F.E.C.'s history, Ms. Ravel told staff members and guests that there was a "crisis" in public confidence, and she stressed the F.E.C.'s mandate for "enforcing the law." But the ranking Republican, Matthew S. Petersen, made no mention of enforcement in his remarks a few minutes later, focusing instead on defending political speech under the First Amendment.

As guests mingled, Ms. Weintraub — the commission's longest-serving member at 12 years — lamented to a reporter that the days when the panel could work together on important issues were essentially over.

She pointed to a former Republican commissioner standing nearby — Bradley A. Smith, who left the agency in 2005 — and said she used to be able to work with commissioners like him even when they disagreed on ideology.

Laughing, Mr. Smith assumed a fighting stance and yelled at Ms. Weintraub: "Let's go right now, you speech-hating enemy of the First Amendment!"

A few feet away, Mr. Goodman was not laughing. As Ms. Weintraub condemned the F.E.C.'s inertia, he whispered a point-by-point rebuttal to show that things were not as bad as she made them sound.

With the commission so often deadlocked, the major fines assessed by the commission dropped precipitously last year to $135,813 from $627,408 in 2013. But like most things at the F.E.C., commissioners differ over how to interpret those numbers.

Republicans say they believe the commission's efforts to work with political groups on training and compliance have kept campaigns within the legal lines and helped to bring down fines.

The drop in fines "could easily be read as a signal that people are following the law," said Ms. Hunter, the Republican commissioner.

Ms. Ravel scoffed at that explanation.

"What's really going on," she said, "is that the Republican commissioners don't want to enforce the law, except in the most obvious cases. The rules aren't being followed, and that's destructive to the political process."

Why Does Rand Paul Keep Missing His Moment? // Bloomberg // David Weigel - May 1, 2015

Can two years of hard work be undone with a few seconds of talk radio chatter? Rand Paul's campaign is about to find out.

Its problems started on Tuesday morning, right after what seems to have been the apex of civil unrest in

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Baltimore. President Obama had spoken out about the angry, occasionally violent reactions to the death of 25-year old Freddie Gray. Paul, asked by Laura Ingraham to critique the president, talked briefly about "the breakdown of the family structure," then tried to land a joke.

"I came through Baltimore on the train yesterday," he said. "I'm glad the train didn't stop."

The Ingraham comment was published first by Brendan James at Talking Points Memo. It took a little time for the "train" line to become a problem. By Wednesday morning, The Washington Post was placing the comment into a narrative about how Paul's "language seems to have shifted" on criminal justice. By Wednesday evening, Gawker was asking why Paul wouldn't "tell the truth," and admit that all Amtrak trains were still stopping in Baltimore. (The area around Baltimore's Penn Station was perfectly calm throughout the unrest.) And by Thursday night, the most popular story on Politico was about how "Rand Paul blew it on Baltimore," complete with quotes from black leaders saying that the Kentucky senator had been exposed as a phony.

Paul's campaign aides were alternately baffled and apoplectic. "We're listening and learning every day and we learned from this," said Paul advisor Elroy Sailor in one of several defensive clean-up interviews. "We're also leading this conversation." This was one reason for the harsh tone of a Wednesday campaign statement, criticizing Hillary Clinton's criminal justice speech by accusing her of "emulating proposals introduced by Senator Rand Paul over the last several year." Paul's team was quietly furious at how years of work on criminal justice reform—five of Paul's bills are waiting for votes—was tossed aside for a quick story about a guy "missing his moment."

The problem is that Paul never used to miss these moments. In 2013 and 2014, as Paul established himself as a Republican leader on NSA reform, drone warfare, police abuse and the war on drugs, he seemed to weigh in on everything. In those years, a call or email to the right spokesman would elicit either a quote, a plea to hold on while the quote was composed, or—surprisingly often—a link to the column Paul had just written. He wrote three pieces for Time magazine, a few more columns for Politico, and eighteen pieces for Breitbart, most of them to start or win arguments that were in the news.

The last of these columns ran in February—which happens to be when his communications chief, Brian Darling, left for the private sector. Darling declined to speak on the record, but it's easy to infer that Paul's missed a step since his Senate communications team was reduced to one person, Jillian Lane. Last week, Paul responded to drone strikes that had killed turncoat American citizens—an issue he'd become an expert on—with a short statement and a brief discussion on Fox and Friends.

Three weeks earlier (as noted in every "Rand Paul blows it" column), Paul arrived in Charleston, South Carolina for a speech and addressed the killing by police of Walter Scott in some media interviews. His comments to CNN, the New York Times, and Bloomberg were overwhelmed when he did not explicitly mention Scott during the speech itself. "In the midst of this national discussion on an issue that he wants to be known for," snarked MSNBC's Rachel Maddow, "Senator Rand Paul, bravely today, while he was in South Carolina, said nothing about it."

In Paulworld, this feels like a pile-on, both unfair and unlearned. The senator simply isn't inclined to leap into the story of the day. He largely eschews the hallway interviews that other senators use to quickly make news. He prefers to sit and compose an argument, then shoot it into the conversation, on his own terms. It took him days to respond to the Ferguson unrest, and he followed up his column on it with a personal visit to the city. Where was the backlash then?

There was no backlash, because Paul was not yet a candidate for president. The hunger for him to react is insatiable now; the press that dubbed him the "most interesting man in politics" and a "one-man think tank" is less forgiving. In his first month as a candidate, Paul missed three major opportunities to lead on his causes.

Columba Bush, Wife of Jeb Bush, Takes on Greater Role in Campaign // Wall Street Journal // Rebecca Ballhaus - May 1, 2015

Columba Bush, the famously private wife of former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, appears to be taking on an increasingly prominent role in her husband's nascent presidential campaign.

Columba Bush, the famously private wife of former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, appears to be taking on an increasingly prominent role in her husband's nascent presidential campaign.

Later this month, Mrs. Bush will headline a fundraiser for her husband's leadership PAC, Right to Rise, in Miami. This week, she attended a retreat for Mr. Bush's donors at an oceanfront luxury hotel in Miami Beach, where she gave a heartfelt speech about her husband, according to those present. Her name has also been popping up with increasing frequency in fundraising emails — last week she asked supporters to "join with my family and commit to stopping Hillary today."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Bush's rising prominence in her husband's campaign is notable because she has often avoided the public eye. She rarely gives interviews to the press, and her reluctance to join her husband in the media spotlight reportedly weighed on Mr. Bush's decision to run for president.

Any presidential candidate's spouse is bound to get a hefty share of media attention. In 2012, for example, Ann Romney's dressage avocation yielded fodder for critics and late night comedians. Comedian Stephen Colbert cracked, "This is exactly what Mitt needs. He's had a little trouble relating to Joe Sixpack."

President Barack Obama's wife Michelle actively campaigned for her husband in both campaigns and was considered a significant asset. But she, too, learned the hard way about the perils of the spotlight, facing criticism in 2008 for telling voters she was proud of her country "for the first time in my adult life." GOP nominee John McCain's wife, Cindy, quickly declared to audiences later that week: "I'm very proud of my country."

Mrs. Bush, who is from Mexico, is likely to draw attention as Mr. Bush seeks to appeal to the Hispanic voters who in recent election cycles have spurned the Republican Party. Mr. Bush, who argues that he is uniquely qualified to win over that part of the electorate, recently spoke about his love for his wife to a group of Hispanic evangelicals in Houston.

The May 18 Miami fundraiser—a rare event raising money for the Bush PAC, not the super PAC of the same name—will be hosted by three current and former members of Congress, Lincoln Diaz-Balart and Reps. Mario Diaz-Balart and Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida. The event at the Jorge Mas Canosa Youth Center costs $25 to attend. Fundraisers for Mr. Bush's super PAC, by contrast, have carried ticket prices ranging up to $100,000.

Individuals can give unlimited amounts to super PACs, while leadership PACs—which are largely intended to raise money to give to other candidates but can also pay for expenses considered unrelated to a campaign—can only accept up to $5,000 per individual.

With Bridge Case Charges, a Cloud Descends on Christie's White House Hopes // New York Times // Michael Barbaro – May 1, 2015

In an era of maddeningly careful politics, Gov. Chris Christie rocketed to national stardom as brazenly incautious. His excesses defined him: the scorching rants, the seductive oversharing, the caustic insults and endless public feuds.

Harmless theatrics, he said.

But the in-your-face instincts and boundary-breaking behavior that Mr. Christie brought to public life found a vindictive host in the fiercely loyal circle around him, as the federal indictment of a top appointee and a former deputy chief of staff in the George Washington Bridge lane-closing scandal laid bare on Friday.

The 37-page charging document recounts a ruthless act of political retribution: To punish a small-town mayor for refusing to endorse Mr. Christie's 2013 re-election, the governor's confidants unleashed a major traffic jam that gridlocked ordinary commuters, emergency responders and children on the first day of school.

Nowhere does the indictment say Mr. Christie, a Republican, knew of the scheme or was involved in it.

Yet it was a crime of political vengeance, the indictment makes clear, that was conceived in furtherance of Mr. Christie's political ambitions, and carried out in his name.

Now, the growing risk for Mr. Christie is that the very belligerence that electrified voters, the press and the Republican Party, and catapulted him into a credible contender for the White House, may wind up putting the presidency out of his reach.

Brigid Harrison, a professor of political science at Montclair State University who has studied Mr. Christie closely for years, said the indictments of Bridget Anne Kelly and Bill Baroni, once two of the governor's most loyal and trusted lieutenants, spelled the death knell for his national aspirations.

"Even if he is not directly connected to the indictments," Professor Harrison said, "he is guilty of creating a political culture in which corruption was allowed to flourish."

Mr. Christie faces the specter of a lengthy and embarrassing criminal trial overshadowing the 2016 presidential campaign, in which the star witness — David Wildstein, a onetime Christie loyalist who pleaded guilty on Friday to two counts of conspiracy — still maintains the governor was aware of the lane-closing plot as it happened.

Even so, Mr. Christie treated the outcome of the federal investigation as a personal exoneration.

"Today's charges make clear that what I've said from day one is true," the governor posted on Twitter. "I had no knowledge or involvement in the planning or execution of this act."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But exoneration of the man is not exoneration of his leadership style.

Mr. Christie and his staff have a history of punishing those who have crossed him. There was the state college professor whose budget was vetoed after he failed to sign off on a project that Mr. Christie favored. The mayor of Jersey City whose meetings with the governor's staff were summarily canceled hours after he said he would not endorse Mr. Christie's re-election. The attempt, even before the lane closings, to freeze out the mayor of Fort Lee for failing to back Mr. Christie.

"There was a level of arrogance," Ms. Harrison said, "that would seem to be coming from the top down."

Mr. Christie, whose bipartisan popularity and fund-raising prowess were once the envy of his party, is now a man without a clear path to the Republican nomination. His poll numbers are sagging badly. Voters openly taunt him at public events about the bridge episode. Donors fret about his viability. And longtime allies are defecting to rival campaigns.

Two weeks ago, State Senator Joseph M. Kyrillos of New Jersey, a trusted Christie friend who served as chairman of his 2009 campaign for governor, declared his support for Jeb Bush.

In candid moments, close allies of Mr. Christie acknowledge that his shot at winning the White House, which seemed so plausible a year ago, may have passed.

Mr. Christie is fond of talking about the "kill shot" in politics: the fatal moment when a candidacy switches from viable to moribund. But over the past year, the governor has suffered a series of smaller, but still significant, wounds: He oversaw nine downgrades of New Jersey's credit rating; the repeated overestimation of state revenue projections; and the failure to make a $1.6 billion payment to New Jersey's deeply underfunded pension system.

A growing number of Republican operatives say that Mr. Christie has, in a sense, already bled out.

"Politically, he's been dead for a year," said Rick Wilson, a longtime Republican political strategist, who is not aligned with any campaign for the 2016 race.

"It wasn't just the bridge," Mr. Wilson continued. "It was that there were any number of better, more conservative, more electable candidates."

New Jersey, he added, "isn't the kind of economic success story that he could build a campaign around."

As a parade of comparatively unblemished Republican rivals declare their candidacies, Mr. Christie has put off an announcement until late spring or early summer.

Presidential candidates have weathered messy campaign-season scandals. In 1992, Bill Clinton survived revelations of a longtime sexual affair with Gennifer Flowers, the existence of which he vigorously denied.

But Americans are historically most forgiving of personal scandals involving deeply contrite officials. The problem for Mr. Christie is that the closing of access lanes to the George Washington Bridge stand as a unique case of public betrayal, an act mystifying in its meanness and unsettling in its indifference to the thousands of motorists involved.

From the start, Mr. Christie treated the closings as a nuisance, suggested the episode did not merit his attention and derided those who wondered whether his administration had played a role.

"I was the guy out there, in overalls and a hat," he declared mockingly during a news conference in early December 2013. "I actually was the guy working the cones out there."

Within a few weeks, damning emails emerged showing that Ms. Kelly, his top political aide, had been deeply involved.

Those close to Mr. Christie vow that he will push ahead with a presidential campaign, regardless of his standing in the polls or his fund-raising totals.

He is a practiced political gambler with a history of defying odds.

Little was expected of him when President George W. Bush chose Mr. Christie, a little-known corporate lawyer and Republican fund-raiser, to take on the high-profile job of United States attorney for New Jersey in 2001. He turned it into a national platform for fighting public corruption. He faced daunting electoral math in 2009 when he challenged a wealthy, incumbent Democratic governor, Jon S. Corzine, in a reliably blue state. Mr. Christie prevailed, then won re-election by an overwhelming margin.

These days, friends said, Mr. Christie is realistic about his chances in a crowded Republican nominating contest. He has devoured the polls. He has assessed the field.

But no matter the outcome, they said, Mr. Christie feels he has one more in-your-face battle left to wage.

Ted Cruz, Barack Obama and the biggest vote-missers in the Senate // Washington Post // Philips Bump – May 1, 2015

When Ted Cruz missed the confirmation vote for Attorney General Loretta Lynch, his spokesman dismissed criticism by pointing out that Cruz had already "made the case against her." On Thursday, Cruz himself explained it away by saying that an "absence is the equivalent of a no vote." In which case Cruz has had a lot of "no" votes lately; as we pointed out, he's missed 70 percent of the votes this month.

When we noted that, defenders of Cruz were quick to demand that we compare Cruz's absenteeism to Barack Obama's. Which: That ship has sailed? But regardless, we compared Cruz to Obama and other confirmed and likely 2016 candidates with Senate experience, using data at GovTrack to do some exploration.

First and foremost: Cruz has missed the most votes over his career of any 2016 candidate, but Obama's brief Senate career was much worse. Still, it's not really a fair comparison yet, for reasons we'll discuss.

We actually ran this data for every member of the Senate who'd been born in the year 1900 or later, which revealed some interesting patterns. (And which provides the yellow "average" bar above.) Here is a selection of that 400-plus group, showing how regularly each missed votes.

Missed votes

1. Maryon Allen: 43.4% (355 total votes)
2. Ross Bass: 35.8% (497 total votes)
3. David Clark: 35.7% (677 total votes)
6. Eugene McCarthy: 31.2% (3,135 total votes)
7. Barry Goldwater: 30.8% (10,807 total votes)
10. Mike Gravel: 29.5% (6,264 total votes)
24. Barack Obama: 24.2% (1,300 total votes)
25. George McGovern: 23.8% (7,891 total votes)
36. Al Gore: 19.8% (2,731 total votes)
57. Walter Mondale: 16.3% (5,149 total votes)
64. John Edwards: 15.7% (1,980 total votes)
114. Ted Cruz: 10.7% (825 total votes)
131. Hillary Rodham Clinton: 9.5% (2,616 total votes)
150. Marco Rubio: 8.3% (1,311 total votes)
222. Lindsey O. Graham: 4.5% (3,984 total votes)
279. Rand Paul: 3.1% (1,311 total votes)
290. Bernie Sanders: 2.9% (2,664 total votes)
327. Jim Webb: 2% (1,839 total votes)
332. Rick Santorum: 1.9% (4,156 total votes)
428. Charles E. Grassley: 0.3% (10,923 total votes)
430. Benjamin L. Cardin: 0.3% (2,664 total votes)
433. Olympia J. Snowe: 0.2% (5,995 total votes)
436. William Proxmire: 0.1% (12,108 total votes)

You'll notice that a number of the most frequent vote-missers were also presidential candidates (including Mike Gravel, who ran a bit later). Obama's misses almost certainly link to his success on the national stage; he's the only one of the candidates on our graph who spent a full year of his time while in the Senate campaigning non-stop, given that he won his party's nomination. So it's not quite an apples-to-apples comparison with the nascent Cruz campaign.

Congrats to William Proxmire, by the way, Democrat of Wisconsin. He barely ever missed a vote at all.

Since we had the data in-hand, we decided to also see who the most positive and negative members of the Senate had been. And something surprising happened.

But first, here are the 2016ers (plus a 2008er) who had the highest percentage "yes" and "no" votes.

That "no" chart is particularly interesting. All the Republicans higher than average, save Rick Santorum; all of the Democrats below. Have we stumbled onto some greater truth about the parties?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

No. There's a reason Santorum is the outlier on the right. He served longer -- and at a different time.

Here are the top lists among all senators for "yes" and "no" votes.

Senators voting "yes"

1. John Walsh: 93.5% (340 total votes)
2. Dean Barkley: 85.7% (14 total votes)
3. Joe Donnelly: 82.2% (825 total votes)
4. Cory Booker: 80.8% (600 total votes)
5. Angus King: 80.2% (825 total votes)
6. Heidi Heitkamp: 79.8% (825 total votes)
7. Martin Heinrich: 79.8% (825 total votes)
8. Tim Kaine: 79.5% (825 total votes)
9. Tammy Baldwin: 79.5% (825 total votes)
10. Mazie Hirono: 79.5% (825 total votes)
86. Jim Webb: 65.5% (1,839 total votes)
100. Rick Santorum: 64.5% (4,156 total votes)
101. Hillary Rodham Clinton: 64.4% (2,616 total votes)
103. Bernie Sanders: 64.3% (2,664 total votes)
263. Lindsey O. Graham: 55.7% (3,984 total votes)
311. Barack Obama: 52.4% (1,300 total votes)
392. Marco Rubio: 45.2% (1,311 total votes)
409. Rand Paul: 43.3% (1,311 total votes)
440. Ted Cruz: 36.6% (825 total votes)

Senators voting "no"

1. Mike Lee: 55.9% (1,311 total votes)
2. Tim Scott: 55.4% (825 total votes)
3. Hugh Mitchell: 54.1% (242 total votes)
4. Deb Fischer: 53.5% (825 total votes)
5. Rand Paul: 53.3% (1,311 total votes)
6. Ted Cruz: 52.7% (825 total votes)
19. Marco Rubio: 46.5% (1,311 total votes)
81. Lindsey O. Graham: 39.7% (3,984 total votes)
237. Rick Santorum: 33.5% (4,156 total votes)
279. Bernie Sanders: 32.6% (2,664 total votes)
295. Jim Webb: 32.3% (1,839 total votes)
415. Hillary Rodham Clinton: 26.1% (2,616 total votes)
429. Barack Obama: 23.5% (1,300 total votes)

A number of recent senators top both lists! What gives?

Partisanship. Lee, Scott, Walsh and Booker got to the Senate recently, when it was controlled by Democrats and when there weren't very many votes. So Democrats voted yes, along with party leaders, most of the time. Republicans voted no. In the 2016 field are a number of Republicans who are new to the Senate and a number of Democrats who didn't serve very long. (Staying in the Senate long enough to see control switch parties is a good way to diversify your voting patterns.)

To put a fine point on it, here's how the total number of votes for each of our 2016ers (and that Obama fella) compare to the average number of votes cast by those 400-plus senators.

They're all new kids, which basically every graph above reinforces. Can a new kid to the Senate who missed a lot of votes win the presidency, just like that?

Hard to say. It hasn't happened in almost seven years.

Rubio: A bad Iran deal 'almost guarantees war' // CNN // Alexander, Jaffe - May 1, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio on Friday warned that a bad deal with Iran on its nuclear program "almost guarantees war," and defended his controversial amendment to the Senate's bill requiring congressional approval for the final deal.

"The argument the White House uses is if you're not in favor of this deal, you are in favor of war," Rubio said at the National Review Institute Ideas Summit. "I would argue that a bad deal almost guarantees war, because Israel is not going to abide by any deal that they believe puts them and their existence in danger."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Speaking to a crowd of conservative scholars and donors, the Republican presidential contender said that Iran would "exploit any loophole in a deal that it can find." He predicted a future in which Iran used the West's "short attention span" to snooker investors into pouring money into the country, which it would ultimately just use to attack the West.

Rubio mused that Iran would plot: "We'll blow up a bomb in one of their cities. We'll blow up their embassies in Latin America. We'll kill Americans. We're going to punish them -- a stronger Iran."

The final deal hasn't yet been released, but Rubio said he doesn't like what he's heard of the framework. And he defended his effort with Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Arkansas) to use a procedural tactic to try to force a vote on an amendment that would require Iran to recognize Israel's "right to exist."

That tactic has stalled activity on a bipartisan bill requiring congressional approval on the final deal, raising doubts about its passage.

"The criticism of that is that there are a bunch of countries in the Middle East that don't recognize Israel's right to exist, which is true," Rubio said. "But none of them are trying to build a nuclear weapon. And none of them have billions of dollars of sanctions, and if we lift those sanctions, we are handing over billions of dollars to the Iranian regime."

He also weighed in on immigration policy, accusing President Barack Obama's policy allowing children brought to the U.S. illegally to remain here of being abused by drug traffickers.

"I've had leaders of the Northern Triangle in Central America -- Honduras, Guatemala and El Salvador -- tell me that DACA was used by trafficking groups in the Northern Triangle to recruit people to send their children here illegally," Rubio said.

The senator again distanced himself from the failed 2013 bill that he helped shepherd through the Senate. He now backs a piecemeal approach to reform, and said the first step has to be securing the border. After that, Rubio floated the possibility of revising legal immigration limits every year "on the basis of what our economic needs are," and suggested after securing the border and modernizing the legal immigration system, there should be a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants.

That pathway would require illegal immigrants have lived in the U.S. for a decade or longer and not violated any laws, and they would need to undergo a background check, pay a fine, start paying taxes and learn English.

"In exchange for all of that, what you would get is the equivalent of a non-immigrant, non-permanent work visa to be in the US," he said.

After holding that status for a period, Rubio said immigrants could apply for full citizenship.

Marco Rubio Courts Right on Iran and Immigration // First Draft - New York Times // Ashley Parker - May 1, 2015

Senator Marco Rubio, who described the possibility of his becoming president as “an increasingly optimistic hypothetical,” spent Friday morning answering questions both immediate and, yes, hypothetical at the National Review’s ideas summit.

On the Iran bill sputtering its way through the Senate, the Florida Republican defended the so-called poison pill amendments he was offering, including one that says Iran must recognize Israel’s right to exist as a precondition for any nuclear deal.

“The criticism of that is there are a bunch of countries in the Middle East that don’t recognize Israel’s right to exist, which is true,” Mr. Rubio said. “But none of them are trying to build a nuclear weapon, and none of them have billions in dollars in sanctions, which, if we lift those sanctions, we are turning over billions of dollars to the Iranian regime.”

Mr. Rubio also warned that he fully expected Iran to cheat on any deal.

“Iran is going to exploit any loophole in the deal they can find,” he said, adding that “the West has a very short attention span,” focusing on an issue for a few weeks before moving on.

“At some point, in a couple of years, in five years, six years, eight years, whatever it may be, a stronger Iran can then re-emerge and say, ‘You know what, guys? We believe that our enemies have nuclear weapons, too, so we believe we need to build one,’ ” he added.

On immigration, an issue that has dogged Mr. Rubio as he has transitioned from an architect of a broad bipartisan immigration bill to a Republican candidate for president, the senator called for increased security at the nation's southern borders; beefing up internal enforcement; and overhauling the nation's legal immigration system.

But after those things are accomplished, Mr. Rubio said, he could support a pathway to legal status for the 11 million undocumented immigrants already in the country, as he laid out a vision that largely mirrored the Senate immigration compromise he helped to write.

"I think a reasonable way to approach it is, if you are in this country a decade or longer, have not otherwise violated our laws, you would have to come forward, undergo a criminal background check," Mr. Rubio said. "You would have to pay a fine for having broken our laws, you would have to start paying taxes, you would have to learn English."

In exchange, he continued, those undocumented immigrants could then receive a visa that would allow them to legally work in the United States.

"You'd have to be in that status for a significant period of time, and at some point, if you choose, you could apply for permanent residency, but you'd have to do it through that modernized legal immigration system and you'd have to do it just like everybody else," he said.

Huckabee gears up for presidential announcement with new video // MSNBC // Emma Margolin – May 1, 2015

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee broke through the closed doors of "Bill Clinton's Arkansas" and is ready to take on another Clinton in 2016, boasts a new video that will introduce the Republican as a presidential candidate during his official announcement next week in Hope, Arkansas.

The video, entitled "Nailed Shut," casts Huckabee as a come-from-behind leader who fought "huge Democratic majorities" in his state and will continue to "fight for what matters most."

"Every day of my life in politics was a fight, and sometimes it was an intense one," Huckabee says in the two-minute, 18-second spot, which was released Friday. "But any drunken redneck can walk into a bar and start a fight. A leader only starts a fight that he's prepared to finish."

"Any drunken redneck can walk into a bar and start a fight. A leader only starts a fight that he's prepared to finish."
Former Gov. Mike Huckabee

The governor will officially announce his candidacy on May 5 at an event in Hope, Arkansas – a city that featured prominently in President Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign, which dubbed him "The Man from Hope." Though Huckabee will be the fourth Republican to join the race and will have to take on Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas, Rand Paul of Kentucky, and Marco Rubio of Florida in the primaries, the video makes clear that the former governor sees Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton as his primary foe.
"On his first day in office, Gov. Huckabee's door was nailed shut. It was in Bill Clinton's Arkansas," says Rex Nelson of the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette in the video. "You had all the apparatus of the Democratic party aligned against Mike Huckabee, and all of a sudden this Republican comes out of nowhere and wins."

A former Baptist pastor, Huckabee won the Iowa caucuses during his 2008 presidential bid, thanks in large part to overwhelming support from Christian conservatives. In the past few months, the governor has made headlines for his sometimes perplexing remarks about gay marriage, religious freedom, swear words, and even Beyoncé.

But the culture wars were nowhere to be found in Friday's video, save for a promise to "lead with moral clarity in a dangerous world." Instead, Huckabee highlights his commitment to protecting Social Security and Medicare, helping Americans earn their "maximum wages," and keeping "all options on the table in order to defeat the evil forces of radical Islam."

Kasich Undecided on 2016: 'Without Resources, You Can't Do It' // NBC News // Mark Murray - May 1, 2015

At a lunch on Friday with reporters, Ohio Gov. John Kasich said he's still weighing a presidential bid, but he explained that his ability to raise money will largely determine if he runs. "Without the resources, you can't do it," he said. "I've tried it before," referring to his short-lived bid in 2000.

Kasich, a Republican, declined to lay out any date or timetable for a final decision. "There is not a date, but we'll know."

Last month, Kasich told NBC's Chuck Todd on "Meet the Press" that he was "more and more serious" about a White House bid. "Look, all my options are on the table here. And I'm, you know, more and more serious, or I wouldn't be doing these things." That includes forming a 527 political organization as he mulls a potential run.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Also at the lunch sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor, Kasich defended expanding Medicaid under the federal health-care law in his state - which angered some conservative Republicans. "I got money that I can bring home to Ohio," he said.

Kasich also said he believes that marriage is between a man and woman. But if the Supreme Court legalizes gay marriage in the state - voters in 2004 passed a constitutional amendment banning it in Ohio - he would attend a gay wedding, if invited by friends. "I have a number of friends who are gay," he said. "They know how I feel about it."

Ohio's Kasich says 2016 presidential run depends on money // Reuters // Steve Holland – May 1, 2015

Ohio Governor John Kasich said on Friday his 2016 presidential aspirations depend on whether he can raise enough money to compete with a host of rivals for the Republican nomination.

Kasich, 62, is considering a run for his party's nomination, which would make him a potentially potent force in the Republican field as he represents an important swing state in presidential elections.

But with more than a dozen Republicans either already in the race or about to enter it, Kasich could easily be just another face on a crowded stage searching for his own breakout moment.

Kasich, a former chairman of the House of Representatives Budget Committee who was re-elected as Ohio's governor in November, sounded like a presidential candidate during a 45-minute session with reporters at a lunch sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor.

Kasich, who considered running for the White House in 2000 before bowing out of the race, said he was optimistic that he will be able to move forward with launching a campaign, but did not indicate when he would make up his mind.

"I'm going to determine whether I'll have the resources to win. If I don't have the resources and I can't see a path to victory, I'm not going to do that," Kasich said.

Kasich, who served 18 years in Congress, touted his experience as a key selling point for why Republican voters would want to give him a look.

A fiscal conservative with an independent streak, he said he would want to take on the role of problem-solver.

"The country's got a lot of problems. I think whether you're a Republican or a Democrat, the anxiety is not much different," he said.

Kasich's decision to expand Medicaid, a government-funded health program for the poor, in Ohio through President Barack Obama's signature 2010 healthcare law has drawn scorn from conservatives.

Many Republican governors have opted not to expand Medicaid out of opposition to the law, also known as Obamacare. The White House says that position deprives the residents of those states of the federal dollars that would be available to them.

Kasich defended his decision, saying the money is being used to treat 10,000 mentally ill inmates in Ohio prisons.

"Here's what I'm faced with. I've got money I can bring home to Ohio ... It's not Washington's. It's the money that belongs to the people of our state," he said.

Kasich also was unwilling to give his unabashed support to free trade legislation that Obama and Republicans are trying to get passed in Congress, saying he was concerned about its impact on the U.S. labor market.

Kasich wades into presidential waters, says he's an unconventional Republican // Washington Post // Philip Rucker - May 1, 2015

Ohio Gov. John Kasich waded into the presidential waters on Friday, casting himself as an unconventional Republican who governs as a compassionate reformer and arguing that among a field of nearly two dozen White House hopefuls, he would stand out as the most experienced.

Although not formally a candidate, Kasich signaled he has the will to run for president in 2016, if not necessarily the resources. The governor said he has been talking to prospective donors to gauge whether, in an historically deep and competitive field of GOP contenders, he can raise the millions of dollars necessary to wage a competitive primary campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If I don't have the resources and I don't see a path to victory, I'm not going to do that," said Kasich. He's had the presidential bug before, running briefly in 1999 before dropping out in the face of the George W. Bush juggernaut. Kasich boasted of what he sees as unique political strengths -- "I'm a retail guy," he said -- but acknowledged, "Either I got it or I don't." If he calculates that he cannot raise the resources to run, he added jokingly, he could still live out his dream of being a PGA tournament golfer.

Kasich's comments came during an hour-long luncheon with reporters at a downtown Washington hotel hosted by the Christian Science Monitor.

Should he run, Kasich said, his campaign would focus on restoring productive relationships -- both among Republicans and Democrats on Capitol Hill and among the United States and its allies in Europe, the Middle East and elsewhere. He said foreign alliances have deteriorated and suggested that the last Bush presidency shared in the blame with President Obama, although he did not cite Bush specifically.

"I think those relationships have eroded over time -- not just with Obama, [but] over time," Kasich said. "We don't have the deep relationships we need in order to be unified and send strong messages."

Kasich sharply criticized Obama's nuclear negotiations with Iran, arguing that the president is so "in love" with getting a deal that he was giving in to the Iranian regime. He compared it to going to a car dealership and "you're so hungry to get that car you'll pay anything for it."

More broadly, Kasich said, "I'm not a believer in nation-building. We should have a military that's mobile, that's lethal, where we can go and exert force and then come home."

Kasich also said he was looking at sweeping changes to the tax code, including reducing the corporate tax rate. He said he has been talking with Steve Forbes, the wealthy publishing executive who ran unsuccessfully for president as a Republican in 1996 and 2000, about his flat tax idea.

Kasich declined to draw contrasts with his potential Republican primary opponents; when one reporter asked him to compare his record in Ohio with Gov. Scott Walker's in Wisconsin and Gov. Rick Snyder's in Michigan, he snapped, "I'm not going to take your bait." But he suggested that being the governor of the premier general election battleground state gave him an edge. "You can't be president if you don't win Ohio," Kasich said.

Kasich has made a mark with his efforts to lift up Ohio's poorest residents. He expanded Medicaid in his state, a move that drew the ire of some fellow Republican governors, and has enacted mental health, criminal justice and educational programs designed to help what he calls people living in the shadows.

"My view of it is all people are made in the image of God and everybody deserves respect," he said. "To me, there's no lost human beings."

On the issue of gay rights, which has left many Republican leaders twisted in rhetorical knots, Kasich voiced some openness to accepting same-sex marriages as legal.

"I am for marriage defined as between a man and a woman," Kasich said. "If the Supreme Court changes that, those changes have to be respected. I have a number of friends who are gay. I like them."

Asked whether he would attend a friend or relative's gay marriage, Kasich said he would. "I don't usually go to weddings of people that I don't know, okay? I don't go to 'em. But if somebody that I like is getting married in the traditional sense or in the non-traditional sense, I'm not hung up about it. I'll be celebrating with them."

Would-be presidential candidates like Pataki test waters with a wink // Washington Post // David A. Fahrenthold – May 1, 2015

The tall man in a blazer burst into the Chipotle in the middle of the afternoon. He had a smile, a TV camera following him, and the jovial air of a man who expects to be recognized.

“George Pataki, from New York,” he said, shaking hands with the first two diners he met. “We’re doing the non-Hillary tour. We’re actually saying ‘hi’ to people.”

Then the tall man moved on, to quiz the next table about their food. (“Chicken burrito? I gotta try something new.”) When he was gone, the first two diners wondered: Who was that? Do they not have Chipotle where he lives?

“It’s like, ‘Oh, I’m from New York,’ ” said Aaron Lee, 22. “What are you doing here, then?”

Officially, what George E. Pataki is doing is flirting — for the fourth time in 16 years — with the idea of running for president of the United States.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Republican ex-governor of New York is raising money, visiting early-primary states and telling people that he's close, close, close to making a decision. "I'm strongly leaning toward making the run," he told a radio station in New Hampshire. The first three times he considered running, he didn't.

This is the flirting season in American politics: Right now, more than 20 politicians are officially "considering" or "exploring" a run for president. The key to understanding this strange every-four-years ritual is to understand that there are actually two kinds of flirting.

For the big-name candidates, the presidential flirt is a useful, temporary, legal dodge. They will run. They are basically running already. But they don't want to admit it yet, because that would bring on tighter fundraising rules.

For the others — particularly the eight or so who had fallen out of the political spotlight — the flirt can be an end in itself. It allows them to experience some of the most pleasant parts of a campaign: audiences, media attention, a chance to raise money. And then it lets them escape before they have to face the less-pleasant parts. Like getting crushed.

"I make a joke that every four years, there's the Olympics, there's the World Cup and I come to New Hampshire thinking about running for president," Pataki told a crowd of 15 people during a speech at a Sea-Doo and snowmobile dealership in Laconia, N.H.

Nobody laughed. Then Pataki said this election was different: "This time, in all honesty, I see things differently."

That might be true. But it is also the thing you have to say if you're a good flirt.

Pataki, 69, has already lived a remarkable political life. He is the son of a postman, who unseated liberal icon Mario Cuomo (D) in a 1994 governor's race — one of New York's legendary upsets. Pataki then won second and third terms by large margins. He led New York through the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the rebuilding of Ground Zero.

But he has not held office since 2007. Since then, his political star has faded somewhat.

"Who is Bloomberg?" a "Jeopardy!" contestant said in January while looking at a photo of Pataki.

The category was "New York governors," and the clue was "He took New York into the 21st century."

"No," host Alex Trebek said. The other two contestants stared blankly at the same photo, without buzzing in, until time ran out.

Another sign: There used to be a museum about Pataki in his hometown of Peekskill, N.Y.. It opened after he left office, complete with an exhibit where schoolkids could see Pataki's actual gubernatorial desk.

Then, in 2013, it closed. Its leaders thought maybe more schoolkids would visit if it was a Web site.

"Basically, it would be like a monkey flying out of a unicorn's [posterior]," if Pataki won the 2016 Republican nomination, said Florida-based GOP strategist Rick Wilson. If he got into the GOP primary, Pataki would face obstacles that go far beyond his meager name recognition. He is pro-choice. He signed strict gun-control laws. He let state government spending grow rapidly.

In recent polls, his best showing has been 1 percent.

"Let's just say a meteor strikes the first debate, and kills everyone except Pataki, who is stuck in traffic. Let's hypothesize for a moment," Wilson said. He thought. No. It still wouldn't be Pataki. They'd find somebody else.

But despite those long odds, Pataki came to New Hampshire last month for his eighth flirting-related visit since September. He is planning a ninth visit next week.

"I know I can appeal — not just to Republicans and conservatives — but to independents and intelligent Democrats as well," Pataki told an audience of eight College Republicans at the University of New Hampshire.

This is the heart of Pataki's pitch to voters. He's a Republican who won big in a blue state. He's a reformer who would tame Washington's bureaucracy. "I go there today, and it's like I'm on an alien planet," Pataki said of Washington. "They are an insular world. They talk a language you don't understand."

In New Hampshire, Pataki's crowds were not big. At the official opening of his super PAC's office in Manchester, for instance, 25 people turned up. And one of them turned out to be an incognito staffer for Donald Trump. Think about that. If this was an intentional act of flirter-against-flirter espionage (which the Trump staffer denied), it might be the most pointless dirty trick in the history of American politics.

Nevertheless, wherever Pataki went, the crowds were pleasant and admiring.

“Under a Pataki administration,” one man asked him at a diner, how would Middle East policy change?

“You’d change everything,” Pataki told him.

This is one of the things that makes flirting worthwhile: for an ex-politician, it is an unlocked door back into the American political arena.

That can mean new audiences for men used to audiences. The same College Republicans, for instance, had recently hosted a 2016 flirter whose odds are even longer than Pataki’s: former Virginia governor James Gilmore III (R). Gilmore left office in 2002.

“I mean, thank God for Wikipedia,” said UNH senior Elliot Gault, 22.

And the same kind of magic works on the news media. Before former Rhode Island governor Lincoln Chafee (D) announced he was exploring a presidential run on April 9, The Washington Post had not quoted him about anything in nine months.

Since then, The Post has quoted him eight times. Er, nine.

“Clinton is just too hawkish,” Chafee said in an interview, repeating his signature attack line on the Democratic front-runner, former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The other great thing about flirting is the money. While you flirt, you can raise it. And if you don’t run, you can spend it anyway.
In 1999, for instance, Pataki flirted with a campaign, then gave up and endorsed George W. Bush. In 2007, he did it again. “I was very serious about it” that time, Pataki says now. “But: Mayor Giuliani.” The former New York City mayor was in the race, and Pataki didn’t think there was room for two New Yorkers. So he got out.

Both times, Pataki raised more than $1 million in donors’ money. Both times, the New York Times reported, Pataki spent it — giving to allied Republican candidates, paying for Pataki’s travels, and paying a circle of Pataki’s own advisers, strategists and fundraisers.

Then came 2012.

“I was very serious about it,” Pataki says. “But everywhere I went, people had committed to Mitt Romney.” He pulled the plug but still raised and spent more than $600,000 via a political nonprofit.

This year, Pataki is raising money again — for a super PAC called “We the People, Not Washington.” Among those leading the fundraising are several Pataki associates who got paid from the money he raised in past flirtations. Aides wouldn’t say how much he’d raised or spent this time.

“Because he was my friend, I wouldn’t feel cheated [if Pataki didn’t run]. I’m never one to say that a guy should be a suicide lunatic,” said Peter Kalikow, a New York real estate titan who donated to Pataki’s super PAC this year. In the last presidential cycle, Kalikow was a major backer of another long shot: pizza executive Herman Cain.

Pataki’s aides say they have a strategy ready if their man really gets into the race. He’ll stand out in the debates with his genial wit and executive experience. Then he’ll surge in New Hampshire, by appealing to libertarian-leaning . . .

Wait.

Perhaps we’re getting ahead of ourselves.

“When I heard the name, I was like, ‘Pataki. Pataki. Pataki.’ But I didn’t know that he was the mayor of New York,” Tony Coutee, 42, a crane operator who was at the second table Pataki visited in that Manchester Chipotle, said incorrectly. After Pataki left his table, Coutee said, “I Googled him and found out.”

“So he is running?” asked Coutee’s lunch companion, Jason Soto, 35.

Yes, Coutee said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While the two of them were talking, Pataki was into a full-blown, campaign-style restaurant schmooze. He bumped elbows with the grill man. He walked back to greet employees in the walk-in cooler ("He just shook my hand and I said I didn't want to be on camera, and he asked if I was on parole," one said, bewildered.) Pataki went through the line and loudly asked if he could leave a tip.

Then he came back and sat down with Coutee and Soto. "I'm trying the chicken burrito," Pataki told them.

The two men quickly got up to leave.

"Kinda normal," Soto said of this only-in-flirting-season interaction, a pseudo-conversation with a pseudo-candidate, who never said what he was running for. "But abnormal."

Thousands Gather Peacefully in Baltimore in a Mix of Anger and Jubilation // New York Times // Sheryl Gay Stolberg – May 2, 2015

This beleaguered city took on a festive, almost celebratory feel Saturday as thousands of people of all ages and races rallied peacefully in front of City Hall to call for an end to police mistreatment of black men, but also an end to the curfew imposed by Mayor Stephanie Rawlings-Blake amid riots set off by the death of Freddie Gray, who sustained a fatal spinal cord injury in police custody.

The gathering, bookended by marches through city streets, felt at times like a street carnival, with a dash of black power militancy. It came a day after six police officers were charged in the death of Mr. Gray, 25. The rally stood in stark contrast to the looting and arson that took place here Monday night, and the scattered violence after a similar demonstration on April 25.

As one speaker after another addressed the crowd on a grassy plaza in front of City Hall, Julian Burke, 23, a painter, handed out balloons, saying, "We're spreading good vibes." A group called Food Not Bombs served free vegan meals.

Not long after the 10 p.m. curfew began, the police used pepper spray and made several arrests. Credit Ruth Fremson/The New York Times
"The public got an answer yesterday," Ms. Adams said, explaining the change in mood. "I just hope that the changes stick. I'm really hopeful that it doesn't turn."

The presence of thousands of camouflage-clad National Guard troops and armored vehicles was a sign that the city was not quite back to normal. While many protesters called for an end to the citywide curfew that Ms. Rawlings-Blake put in place Tuesday night — and the American Civil Liberties Union of Maryland said it had "outlived its usefulness" — Police Commissioner Anthony W. Batts said it would remain in effect Saturday night "for everyone's safety."

The mood changed again at night. Not long after the 10 p.m. curfew began, someone threw a water bottle at a passing truck carrying National Guard troops, and a lone, shouting pedestrian would not leave the intersection of West North and Pennsylvania Avenues. The police used pepper spray to subdue the man, who was then thrown down and dragged by his hair. A small group of other people began throwing rocks and bottles across the intersection toward police officers, who made several arrests.

In his first public comments since Marilyn J. Mosby, the state's attorney for Baltimore City, announced she would prosecute six officers for charges including murder and manslaughter, Mr. Batts defended his department, but said he would not "tolerate any misconduct." He refused to comment on specifics of the case, but said, "Now we will have the confidence that the truth will come out."

As Gov. Larry Hogan of Maryland called for a statewide "day of prayer and peace" on Sunday, a spokesman for Ms. Rawlings-Blake, Kevin Harris, said in an interview that the mayor was re-evaluating the curfew on a daily basis and was "very encouraged the demonstrations over the last few days have been peaceful." He added, "We know that the curfew is having an economic impact on the city."

Many people here, especially those who work night shifts, say the 10 p.m. to 5 a.m. curfew has been difficult for them. In West Baltimore on Saturday, J. R. White, 36, who owns a car detailing business, said the restrictions were forcing him to cut back his hours. "They need to end that now," Mr. White said after taking a selfie photo in front of a makeshift graffiti memorial to Mr. Gray at the spot where he had been arrested. "People can't pay the bills if they can't work."

death of Freddie Gray while he was in custody.

Even though the scene outside City Hall was calm, Governor Hogan's office announced in an email sent during the demonstration that the National Guard had increased its presence in the city. Mr. Hogan's office said 3,000 soldiers and airmen had been deployed, up from 2,500 on Friday.

Saturday's protest and rally had been called by Black Lawyers for Justice, a Washington-based group whose leader, Malik Shabazz, clearly makes Baltimore's mainstream black leadership nervous. Mr. Shabazz, a former chairman of the New Black Panther Party, has been labeled an extremist by the Southern Poverty Law Center, which calls him a "racist black nationalist" who is "particularly skilled at orchestrating provocative protests."

A protest he led on April 25 turned briefly violent after he told demonstrators at City Hall to go out into the streets of Baltimore and "shut it down!" But on Saturday, it was Mr. Shabazz himself who was shut down, by members of the crowd who shouted, "It's not about you!" and implored him to "let the youth speak!" when his own speech went on at length.

The march was organized by Malik Shabazz, president of the Washington-based group Black Lawyers for Justice and a former chairman of the New Black Panther Party.

When the rally ended, a boisterous but peaceful crowd marched back toward West Baltimore, pooling at West North and Pennsylvania, where a CVS drugstore was looted and burned on Monday night. The intersection had been blocked earlier in the week by officers in full riot gear; now the crowd broke into a happy call-and-response chant: "Take back! Baltimore! Take back! Baltimore!"

Someone turned on a loudspeaker, and the crowd began to dance.

Earlier in the day, volunteers handed out bags of supplies and food at the Simmons Memorial Baptist Church, a block from the intersection, where the sign on the church proclaimed, "Praying for the Freddie Gray Family." Joyous Jones, a church lay leader wearing an "I Bleed Baltimore" T-shirt, said that the food giveaway was a regular event but that more people turned out to help Saturday, and more companies, including the grocery chains Trader Joe's, Safeway and Giant, donated food.

"It makes me feel warm, to see so many people helping," she said.

City officials had been bracing for Saturday's demonstration, but the day got off to an almost sleepy start. Just past noon, a small crowd, including a group of New Yorkers, started gathering near the intersection of Mount and Presbury Streets, in Gilmor Homes, at the spot where Mr. Gray had been arrested.

A few blocks away, children played with a toy car on a stoop, and church members emerged from the Mt. Pisgah C.M.E. Church after attending the funeral of their bus driver.

"It's gonna be peaceful. Yes, it is," said Delphie Horne, 86, who sat in a wheelchair with her granddaughter, Michelle Lennon, 12, at her side. Ms. Lennon shook her head shyly when asked if she expected to attend the protest and rally at City Hall.

Across the street, the Guard troops stood ready. Another church member, Sharon Ann Hargrove, 62, who works as a tax preparer here, stopped to thank them. "I know y'all give up your life every day for us," she told them. Turning to a reporter, she added, "They're not our enemies."

But on the minds and lips of many was Ms. Mosby's announcement. "I think they charged the officers just to calm the city down," said Tajhi Cooper, 22, a lifelong resident of the Sandtown-Winchester neighborhood. "But I don't think they're going to get convicted."

Many people came with a sense that they were watching history unfold, with origins in the civil rights era but an ultimate path still unknown. Several hundred marched from the Gilmor Homes to meet the much larger group that had massed at City Hall.

Crystal Miller, 47, marched down Pennsylvania Avenue with the youngest of her eight children, 18-month-old Noah, on her hip. “It could have been my children,” said Ms. Miller, who has four sons and four daughters.

Ms. Miller, who is in a training program to get a certificate for nursing home care, said Friday’s charges had spurred her to march. She said she had feared that the officers would not be charged and that the city would be ablaze in anger.

“I was scared. I was praying on it,” she said, adding that she hoped Mr. Gray’s death would inspire lawmakers to expand the use of police cameras from cars and bodies to the interior of transport vans. “They need video cameras in these vans,” she said. “That would stop some of this.”

Amid the celebration, there was an undercurrent of anger, not only over police treatment of black men, but over the lack of jobs and recreation centers, as well as dilapidated housing for Baltimore’s poor.

“Eye Contact is NOT a Crime,” one sign said — a reference to police admissions that Mr. Gray had been arrested after a lieutenant made eye contact with him, which contributed to Ms. Mosby’s assertion that the officers had made an illegal arrest.

Salesmen hawked T-shirts with the phrase “Black Lives Matter.” There was also a thread of the 1960s; black power advocates raised their fists, and communists distributed Marxist literature.

Rashaan Brave, a division chief in the Baltimore Parks and Recreation Department; Rashad Vance, who teaches in a middle school and at Morgan State University; and Travis Vance, a civil engineer, all of whom live in Baltimore, made their way on bicycles to City Hall. Each was trying to understand the aftermath of Mr. Gray’s death, the anger of youths and ways to help them.

“This is history. I just wanted to be involved,” said Rashad Vance, 32. “I’ve been telling my students, ‘Protest, but nonviolently.’ ”

SurveyMonkey CEO, husband of Facebook's Sheryl Sandberg, dies suddenly // CNET // Scott Olson – May 2, 2015

Goldberg's brother, Robert Goldberg, announced the news in a post on Facebook, requesting that people share their memories of David via the site.

"No words can express the depth of loss we feel, but we want his children to learn how much he meant to all of you," Robert Goldberg wrote.

There has also been an outpouring of support and condolences across the tech community, including from Facebook CEO Mark Zuckerberg, who called Goldberg "an amazing person."

Goldberg had a long, varied career, which spanned companies like Capitol Records and Yahoo before he ultimately became chief of SurveyMonkey. As CEO there, Goldberg oversaw a company with about 500 employees, which has grown to become a recognizable Web-based survey platform. The service is used by more than 20 million people worldwide and receives 2.8 million survey responses every day, with 473,000 surveys deployed every month.

He began dating Sandberg in 2002, and they married two years later. Though both had successful careers, Sandberg often discussed how they divvied up household responsibilities. Their partnership was key to her successful career, she has said.

One of the keys to their success was that they both left work at about 5:30 p.m. every day. Goldberg told The Los Angeles Times two years ago that both he and Sandberg worked hard to ensure their home life didn't suffer despite their high-profile jobs. "I am at home with my kids from 6 to 8. If I have a work dinner, I'll schedule to have dinner after 8. But we're working at night," he said. "You'll get plenty of emails from me post-8 p.m. when my kids go to bed."

Tech VIPs paid tribute to Goldberg on Saturday.

Six officers charged in death of Freddie Gray // Washington Post // By Lori Aratani, Paul Duggan and Dan Morse – May 1, 2015

Six police officers were charged Friday in the death of Freddie Gray as Baltimore's top prosecutor acted with surprising swiftness in a case that ignited protests and rioting here. She described how Gray allegedly was arrested illegally, treated callously by the officers, and suffered a severe spine injury in the back of a police van while his pleas for medical help were ignored.

Baltimore State's Attorney Marilyn J. Mosby publicly delivered her stunning, detailed narrative of extensive police misconduct in the latest of several cases nationwide that have fueled anger over heavy-handed law enforcement tactics in low-income communities.

Her decision to file charges brought joy and relief to low-income West Baltimore and beyond, at least temporarily. By nightfall, thousands of residents had taken to the streets in peaceful demonstrations.

One officer is accused of second-degree murder, and three others were charged with manslaughter.

Events leading to Gray's arrest and hospitalization View Graphic
"To the people of Baltimore and the demonstrators across America, I have heard your call of 'No justice, no peace,' " Mosby declared. Her announcement of the charges came after days of angry yet nonviolent marches in the city and overnight rioting and looting on Monday, mostly in West Baltimore.

"Your peace is sincerely needed as I work to deliver justice on behalf of this young man," Mosby said of Gray, 25, who died in a hospital April 19 — a week after three of the officers took him into custody on a West Baltimore street in what Mosby said was an illegal arrest. She said Gray was carrying a folding knife, which is legal in Maryland.

Gray's family said it was "satisfied" by the filing of the charges. Richard Shipley, Gray's stepfather, also issued a plea for demonstrators to assemble peacefully this weekend.

"Where there is no justice, there is no peace," Shipley said. "But let us have peace in pursuit of justice."

An attorney for Baltimore's police union reacted angrily to the charges, calling them "an egregious rush to judgment" and saying that "these officers did nothing wrong."

Except for the allegedly illegal arrest — which resulted in false- imprisonment charges against the three officers who first encountered Gray — allegations in the case stem not so much from what the six officers did to Gray as from what they failed to do after he was taken into custody the morning of April 12.

Mosby said Gray, in handcuffs, was placed in the back of a police van but was not secured by a seat belt, as required by police rules. At one point during a trip that involved four stops, he was removed from the van and then put back in "on his stomach, headfirst, onto the floor," Mosby said. After the first stop, Gray "suffered a severe and critical neck injury as a result of being handcuffed, shackled by his feet and unrestrained" by a seat belt, she said.

Some of the officers checked on Gray in the van, Mosby said, and Gray asked for medical attention several times. However, Mosby said, "despite Mr. Gray's seriously deteriorating medical condition, no medical assistance was rendered or summoned." She said Gray was taken by ambulance to a hospital only after suffering cardiac arrest.

The officer who drove the van faces the most serious charge: second-degree murder, punishable by up to 30 years in prison. Three other officers, including a lieutenant, are accused of involuntary manslaughter, which carries a possible 10-year term.

In addition, those four officers, along with two others, were charged with second-degree assault and misconduct in office. Three of the six also are accused of false imprisonment.

Gray was black, as are three of the accused officers. Three of the officers are white.

By late Friday, the six officers had been released on bail, online court records show. This is the start of what is expected to be a protracted legal process.

The union attorney, Michael E. Davey, representing Fraternal Order of Police Lodge 3, told reporters, “We have grave concerns about the fairness [and] integrity of the prosecution” of the six officers.

“No officer injured Mr. Gray, caused harm to Mr. Gray, and they are truly saddened by his death,” he said.

Mosby, a daughter and granddaughter of police officers, has been the city’s elected top prosecutor since January. The unexpected announcement of the charges Friday was greeted with applause by many community leaders and residents who said police misconduct occurs routinely in poor sections of the city.

The charges came less than two weeks after Gray’s death — a stunningly rapid turnaround for such an investigation.

It was more than three months between the Aug. 9 shooting death of Michael Brown in Ferguson, Mo., and St. Louis County prosecutor Robert McCulloch’s announcement that a grand jury decided not to indict Ferguson police officer Darren Wilson. Nearly five months after Eric Garner died during his arrest by New York police officer Daniel Pantaleo, a Staten Island grand jury declined to issue an indictment.

Studies have found that in cases in which officers are charged, particularly in incidents that occurred on duty, prosecutors historically have had a hard time getting guilty verdicts because juries are often sympathetic to police officers.

The accused Baltimore officers are Lt. Brian W. Rice, 41, a 17-year member of the force; Sgt. Alicia D. White, 30, who joined the department in 2010; Officer Caesar R. Goodson Jr., 45, a member of the department for 16 years; and Officers Garrett E. Miller, 26, Edward M. Nero, 29, and William G. Porter, 25, all of whom joined the force in 2012.

Rice, Miller and Nero were on bicycle patrol the morning of April 12 when Rice “made eye contact” with Gray near North Avenue at Mount Street in West Baltimore, Mosby said. She said Gray then ran, with the officers in pursuit, before he was caught a few blocks away on Presbury Street.

Gray “was then placed in a prone position with his arms handcuffed behind his back,” Mosby said. “It was at this time that Mr. Gray indicated that he could not breathe and requested an inhaler, to no avail.”

Miller and Nero moved Gray to a sitting position on the sidewalk and frisked him, finding the folding knife “clipped to the inside of his pants pocket,” Mosby said. She said Gray was then placed “back down on his stomach, at which time [he] began to flail his legs and scream” as Miller and Nero forcibly restrained him.

The van arrived, driven by Goodson, and Rice, Miller and Nero loaded the handcuffed Gray into the back, without securing him with a seat belt, Mosby said. She said the van initially was bound for a police facility downtown. After a short distance, though, Goodson stopped on Baker Street so that Rice, Miller and Nero could “complete required paperwork.”

There, Rice, Miller and Nero took Gray out of the van and placed shackles on his ankles, and then returned him to the van, headfirst, on the floor, Mosby said.

She said Gray suffered a critical neck injury after the van left Baker Street. After traveling nearly a mile, Goodson stopped the van at Mosher Street and Freemont Avenue “in order to observe Mr. Gray,” Mosby said. “Despite stopping for the purpose of checking on the status of Mr. Gray’s condition, at no point did he seek or did he render” medical aid.

Goodson stopped again after several blocks, at Dolphin Street and Druid Hill Avenue, and radioed to a dispatcher that he needed to check on the condition of his prisoner, Mosby said. She said Porter, on patrol, met Goodson at the intersection.

She said Goodson and Porter checked on Gray, “who at that time requested help and indicated that he could not breathe.” Porter asked Gray “if he needed a medic, at which time Mr. Gray indicated at least twice that he was in need of a medic.”

Porter helped Gray off the floor and onto a bench, Mosby said, but neither officer summoned medical help for him. Instead, Goodson, “in a grossly negligent manner,” chose to drive to North and Pennsylvania avenues to pick up another man who had just been arrested, Mosby said. “Once the wagon arrived, Officer Goodson walked to the back of the wagon and again opened the doors . . . to make observations of Mr. Gray.”

White met the van at North and Pennsylvania avenues. She “observed Mr. Gray unresponsive of the floor of the wagon” and “spoke to the back of Mr. Gray’s head,” Mosby said. “When he did not respond, she did nothing further, despite the fact that she was advised that he needed a medic."

The van eventually arrived at the Western District police station, where officers left the ailing Gray in the van while the other prisoner was processed, Mosby said. By the time White and two other officers, who were not charged, went to remove Gray from the van, he had suffered cardiac arrest and "was no longer breathing at all."

Goodson was charged with second-degree murder under the legal theory of "depraved heart," which doesn't require an intent to kill. He also was charged with involuntary manslaughter, manslaughter by vehicle, second-degree assault and misconduct in office.

"Depraved-heart murder requires what I call super-gross negligence," said Robert Bonsib, a Greenbelt defense lawyer and former prosecutor who is not involved in the case.

The most serious charge against White, Porter and Rice is involuntary manslaughter. Each also was charged with second-degree assault and other crimes. Nero and Miller were charged with second-degree assault, false imprisonment and misconduct in office.

"This appears to be a complicated set of facts," Bonsib said.

Glenn F. Ivey, a former Prince George's County state's attorney, said this about Mosby: "What she's saying is, [Goodson's] actions were outrageous, and he should have known the actions, or inaction, could cause Mr. Gray's death."

DOT issues final rules on flammable oil trains // Politico // Elana Schor and Kathryn A. Wolfe – May 1, 2015

The Obama administration imposed tougher safety regulations Friday for trains carrying crude oil, responding to growing alarm about a series of fiery derailments that killed dozens of people in a small Canadian town and have rattled U.S. communities from North Dakota to Alabama to Virginia.

Details of the rules provoked a furious rebuke from the railroad industry's main lobbying group, which called DOT's mandate for advanced brakes "a rash rush to judgment," while oil refiners said its requirements for retrofitting tens of thousands of older tank cars by as early as 2018 are "unrealistic" and may disrupt commerce. On the other hand, the rules fall far short of some environmental groups' call for banning oil train shipments altogether, and they don't require oil companies to process their fuel to make it less volatile before shipping it.

Transportation Secretary Anthony Foxx said the long-awaited regulations are meant to absorb the lessons of the oil train accidents of recent years, including the July 2013 derailment and explosion that incinerated 47 people in Lac-Mégantic, Quebec. The rules are also a response to the huge surge in oil production that has taken root in heartland states like North Dakota, thanks to the shale revolution that has made the U.S. a growing oil and gas superpower.

"Since 2008, we have seen a staggering, staggering 4,000 percent increase in the transport of crude by rail," said Foxx, who was accompanied by Canadian Transport Minister Lisa Raitt.

"The truth is, 99.9 percent of these shipments reached their destination safety," Foxx said, quoting a statistic that the railroad industry likes to cite. But he added: "The accidents involving crude and ethanol that have occurred, though, have shown us that 99.9 percent isn't enough. We have to strive for perfection."

Acting Federal Railroad Administrator Sarah Feinberg dismissed the railroad industry's objections to the newly required braking systems, which will have to be in place as early as 2021.

"We are not an agency with a goal of making things convenient or inexpensive for industry," she said. "Our entire goal and mission is safety."

Friday's announcement came one day after the first anniversary of an oil train derailment and explosion in Lynchburg, Va., that dumped crude into the James River.

Last year saw an all-time record of 144 oil train incidents in the U.S. — up from just one in 2009 — causing a total of more than $7 million in damage. The trend has continued this year, including derailments and breaches in West Virginia, Ontario and Illinois, all of which involved a newer model of tank car that had been billed as more sturdy and puncture-proof.

While members of Congress largely welcomed the new rule, several faulted DOT for not getting the most dangerous tank cars off the tracks faster. They said the department should also require oil companies to make their fuel less prone to explosions and should force railroads to provide more information to state and local emergency responders.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The new DOT rule is just like saying let the oil trains roll,” said Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.), whose state has seen protests against crude rail shipments. “It does nothing to address explosive volatility, very little to reduce the threat of rail car punctures, and is too slow on the removal of the most dangerous cars.”

Cantwell, the top Democrat on the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said she would look for legislative options to mandate even tougher standards, perhaps through the appropriations process or an upcoming passenger rail authorization.

Sen. Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.) agreed that DOT needs to do more. “While I am glad that the administration is finally taking steps to protect our communities, I have serious concerns with these rules,” she said in a statement. “Inadequate tank cars will be allowed to continue carrying volatile crude oil until 2020 and in some cases—indefinitely.”

“The good news is that the standards for tank cars are tough and provide certainty, but the phase-out timeline lets the railroads take too long to implement it,” said Senate Democrat Chuck Schumer of New York.

In a more positive vein, Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) said the new tank car standards “appear to move in the right direction and should help prevent future tragedies.” And Rep. Peter DeFazio of Oregon, the top Democrat on the House Transportation Committee, said that “at first glance, this rule will provide certainty to manufacturers, shippers, and railroads and better protect the American public” — though he noted that “the National Transportation Safety Board first recommended replacing and retrofitting these cars more than 20 years ago.”

The Association of American Railroads would not rule out challenging the regulations in court, even though it welcomed the tank car requirements overall and noted that it had been advocating tougher standards for years. In particular, the group objected to DOT’s mandate for the oil-carrying trains to use electronically controlled pneumatic brakes, saying there’s no evidence they would reduce accidents.

“The DOT couldn’t make a safety case for ECP but forged ahead anyhow,” railroads association President Ed Hamberger said in a statement. “This is an imprudent decision made without supporting data or analysis. I have a hard time believing the determination to impose ECP brakes is anything but a rash rush to judgment.”

Foxx maintained that the brakes could prevent a repeat of incidents like a December 2013 collision in which an oil train slammed into a derailed grain train, setting off a series of explosions outside Casselton, N.D.

“ECP brakes can reduce how long it takes a train to stop,” Foxx said. “They can prevent cars from slamming into each other, they can decrease the number of cars that derail, they can greatly reduce the probability that tank cars will puncture. This is proven technology.”

Besides the brake provisions, the rules also include stiffer construction standards for rail tank cars made after Oct. 1 and permanent versions of the speed limits that DOT had previously announced.

The oil industry group American Fuel & Petrochemical Manufacturers said it’s concerned that DOT’s “aggressive retrofit schedule is unrealistic and may be disruptive to transporting crude oil to markets across the country.” It also repeated its call for DOT to take on what it calls the “root causes of train derailments: track integrity and human error.”

Important aspects of the rules go beyond what the oil and railroad industries had suggested — for example, new tank cars designed to transport crude that are made after Oct. 1 will have to have steel walls that are 9/16th-inch thick, compared with the half-inch thickness both industries had jointly called for last fall. And the rule requires trains to use the advanced electronically controlled pneumatic brakes that they had aggressively fought against — within eight years at the most.

The rules also make permanent the provisions of an emergency order DOT issued last month that limits oil trains containing at least one older-model tank car to only 40 mph in “high-threat” urban areas. All crude-by-rail service would be restricted to 50 mph, in line with a voluntary speed limit that railroads adopted in 2013.

The regulations also include provisions affecting ethanol, another flammable liquid frequently shipped by rail.

DOT said the rules would impose $2.5 billion in costs from 2015 to 2034, while the benefits would range over the same period range from $912 million to $2.9 billion.

Timothy Butters, acting chief of DOT’s Pipeline and Hazardous Materials Safety Administration, said regulators are still looking at the issue of decreasing the volatility of the fuel before it can be shipped. “We need the science to drive that,” he said.

West Virginia’s two senators, Republican Shelley Moore Capito and Democrat Joe Manchin, urged Foxx and Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz in a letter Friday to move faster on studying oil volatility.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The rules came well beyond the date that Foxx originally promised lawmakers — he had said repeatedly in hearings last year that it would not be allowed to go into 2015. Friday's announcement comes amid serious and growing pressure from lawmakers in both chambers to get a handle on the issue, especially against the backdrop of Canada's own actions on oil trains, which at times seemed faster and more aggressive than DOT's.

Congress attempted to prod DOT into action last year by setting a Jan. 15 deadline to complete the crude-by-rail regulations, but the administration blew past that deadline. While Democrats pressed DOT for the strongest possible rules, Republicans have amplified concerns from the oil industry and other shippers that an unattainable retrofitting timeline for tank cars could lead to further delays and congestion.

Last May, DOT issued a "safety advisory" asking — but not requiring — shippers of Bakken crude to discontinue using older DOT-111 models of tank cars and instead use newer cars with the model name CPC-1232. But weeks earlier, Canada had announced a series of mandates including the phase-out or retrofitting of DOT-111 tank cars in the next three years, prompting grousing among U.S. regulators.

"When can we expect the U.S. DOT to raise the bar, to up the ante?" asked NTSB member Robert Sumwalt during a safety forum around the time Canada acted.

"Right now in three years, those communities that live alongside railroad tracks that are transporting crude oil in Canada, those communities will ostensibly have a higher level of safety than will those communities here in the U.S.," he added at the time. "So when is the DOT going to step up to the plate?

Why Larry Flynt Is Endorsing Hillary Clinton // Bloomberg // John Heilemann - May 1, 2015

The Hustler honcho has long supported Democrats–and thinks Clinton could get a chance to shift the balance of the Supreme Court.

When Larry Flynt is feeling righteous, he describes himself as a crusader: for civil liberties in general and free speech in particular, against capital punishment, political correctness, and hypocrisy in high places. In more mischievous moments, the sobriquets he applies are earthier, funnier—and more on point. His 1996 autobiography was titled An Unseemly Man: My Life as Pornographer, Pundit, and Social Outcast. The slogan of his quixotic 2003 campaign for the California governorship was "the smut peddler who cares." But now Bloomberg Politics can exclusively report that the impresario behind the Hustler empire is adding a new element to his persona: Flynt is officially ready for Hillary.

The bestowal of Flynt's blessing on Clinton occurred this week in his sprawling, surreal aerie—with its jumbled-up mix of American southern and Italianate décor, the place has the look of an unholy, Hollywood Babylon hybrid of Tara and the Uffizi—high above Wilshire Boulevard in Los Angeles. Flynt's people had lured me out West with the promise that he had something of import to say about the Democratic front-runner. It took little prompting to get it out of him. "I'm endorsing Hillary Clinton for president!" Flynt declared.

Flynt's backing of Clinton is, on the face of it, unsurprising. His support for Democrats at the presidential level has been lifelong and unfailing; one of his better friends in politics is California Governor Jerry Brown, who, as it happened, was next in line to see Flynt after I exited the building. His famous/infamous practice of trawling for the sexual indiscretions of public figures—which reached its apogee during the impeachment furor around Bill Clinton and claimed the scalp of House Speaker-to-be (and then not-to-be) Bob Livingston—has been directed almost entirely at Republicans. On his desk the day we met were galleys from the next issue of Hustler, including an column that confers on George W. Bush the honorific "A--hole of the Century."

Few Clinton supporters will take issue with the animating impulse behind Flynt's endorsement: the future makeup of the Supreme Court. "We've had a right-leaning court for half a century," he says from the gold-plated wheelchair he's occupied since being shot and paralyzed in 1978. "But if Hillary gets in, chances are she's going to have an opportunity to appoint two, maybe three justices … and we could shift the balance there."

But no small number of Clinton's ardent fans, and especially those who regard her as a feminist icon, may find it unsettling—or queasy-making—to have a man who has made a vast fortune in the skin trade squarely in her, and their, corner. For his part, Flynt brushes off the apparent incongruity. He thinks of himself as a feminist (of a kind), he tells me, though he acknowledges that "people in Gloria Steinem's world, they don't–they think I'm the misogynist of the century." As for his candidate, Flynt laughs and says, "I'm sure that Hillary doesn't necessarily approve of everything I do."

For Clinton, a raft of endorsements from Capitol Hill to Hollywood have been a rare bright spot in a campaign launch filled with poor reviews and worse headlines. But whatever her private views of Flynt and his profession, it beggars belief that she and her team will be issuing any press releases touting the latest bold-faced name to clamber aboard her bandwagon.

Flynt is well aware of that most politicians prefer to keep their distance from him, and that Hillary will likely be among them. And he professes not to care. “Hillary doesn’t need no help from me,” he says. “All she needs to do is start fighting back”—in particular against Clinton Cash author Peter Schweizer, whose campaign against Hillary Flynt likens to that of his bete noire Jerry Falwell against Bill Clinton in 1992. “One of the biggest evangelists in the world put out a video accusing President Clinton of murder—[and Schweizer’s book] is the same kind of smear tactic.”

That Flynt holds a special place in his heart for 42 is evident, and Flynt claims that the feeling is mutual. In 2006, the two men ran into each other at a fundraiser in Las Vegas for Jimmy Carter’s son, Jack, who was running for Senate in Nevada. According to Flynt, Bill Clinton—apparently still grateful for the porn king’s role in the downfall of Bob Livingston, a key moment in the deflation of the impeachment bubble—walked over, shook Flynt’s hand, and said, “You’re my hero.” As I prepare to leave, Flynt shows me a photo on his desk of him and Clinton from the fundraiser, noting that the former president has denied the quote in question. “He can say whatever he wants,” Flynt chuckles. “I have three witnesses.”

Veep Creator on Hillary Clinton and the Intense Pressure to Say Nothing: Candidates running now define themselves by their inaction // Hollywood Reporter // Armando Iannucci – May 1, 2015

It’s possibly no coincidence that Hillary Clinton started her presidential run the same week that astronomical scientists at the University of Hawaii in Manoa announced the discovery of a Supervoid, a structure in space 18 billion light-years across and “distinguished by its unusual emptiness.” The Supervoid sits in a part of the cosmos known as the Cold Spot, where there’s far less matter to observe than elsewhere throughout the universe.

It’s a perfect analogy for how Hillary Clinton’s opponents seek to characterize her: as someone who is profoundly visible yet hard to identify. She is politics’ Dark Matter: We know she’s there, but we just can’t describe her. Is she on the left or the right, is she a friend of the rich or the poor, is she a testosterone-fueled superhawk or a grandmatronly van-driver popping into Chipotle for a chat with the staff?

Yet Hillary’s identity problem is prominent only because she has been on the public stage for so long. It’s a magnified version of a debilitating crisis of identity that sits at the heart of national American politics, the real Supervoid that constricts and confines most presidential candidates: and that is, the intense pressure to say nothing. Knowing that your every speech and interview sits in the digital archive, ready to be analyzed by an army of opponents with time to spare and money to spend, can kill spontaneity dead. Far better to sit contentious debates out. If you hold public office, be careful how you vote on any piece of legislation, no matter how obscure. Your voting record will be used by your opponents just as savagely as if it were a criminal one.

And far better to stand for president before you’ve done anything. It worked for Obama, who moved swiftly in the space of two years from senator to president and kept out of trouble as much as he could while still in the Senate chamber. It’s the same be-a-senator-for-a-few-years-then-jump strategy now being used by Marco Rubio. When you’ve not got much to show for yourself other than your face, you enter the presidential race without baggage and with the opportunity to attack all those who have. You enter not as someone with a legacy but someone who is a brand. The difference with Hillary is that she’s been around a lot longer, so she has had more time in which to try not doing very much. That’s a tougher challenge, and the fact she’s more or less managed it shows what a formidable candidate she’s going to be.

When I first started researching Veep, my comedy show for HBO with Julia Louis-Dreyfus playing Vice President Selina Meyer, I was much taken by the portrayal of LBJ in Robert Caro’s monumental biography of the president. What hooked me was the tragicomic dilemma of a once-powerful senator found sitting in his vice president’s office twiddling his thumbs and waiting for something to do. Looking at it again, I’m reminded of a state of politics now gone: When Johnson was majority leader, he got things done. Here was a Democrat, working alongside a Republican White House under Eisenhower and getting legislation passed by extending a hand across the aisle. He sometimes twisted the arm that was extended back; the negotiations certainly weren’t pretty, but they did achieve positive results. This was a time when the two parties in Congress talked to each other and found common ground. It’s worth remembering the Constitution is predicated on people at opposite ends of the political spectrum being forced to compromise.

Now, though, that doesn’t happen. The conversation is stalled, the vote delayed, the bill dropped. Which is why candidates running now define themselves by their inaction: “Vote for me because I voted against this, I stopped it from happening, I got this overturned, I will oppose this measure, I’ll make sure this is thrown out.”

This is the ultimate Supervoid now at the heart of politics. It’s the reason why for most presidential candidates today, the only significant thing they can say about themselves is that they are running for president.

Iannucci is the creator and executive producer of HBO’s ‘Veep.’

Hillary Clinton's Money Issues (New Yorker)
By John Cassidy
February 13, 2015
The New Yorkers

This week, as the Democratic National Committee was preparing to announce that Philadelphia will host the Party's 2016 convention, Hillary Clinton's still undeclared Presidential campaign was running into a media squall about money—two of them, actually. First, David Brock, the conservative activist turned liberal activist, resigned from Priorities USA Action, a big money-raising group that is supporting Clinton, and accused the group of taking part in an "orchestrated political hit job" on two other pro-Clinton groups that Brock is involved with. Then, the Guardian revealed that a number of wealthy donors to the Clinton Foundation, a philanthropic organization set up by Bill Clinton, were clients of the Swiss division of H.S.B.C., a big bank that is embroiled in a tax-avoidance scandal.

The upshot of the Brock story was that Hillary's money guys and gals are squabbling, and that Priorities USA Action, the political-action committee that spent seventy-five million dollars supporting Barack Obama, in 2012, is off to a slow start this year. (According to Politico, it had less than half a million dollars in the bank at the end of 2014.) The Guardian story, which was based on leaked documents from H.S.B.C., identified seven rich donors to the Clinton Foundation who had bank accounts at H.S.B.C.'s Geneva branch. One of them, Richard Caring, a British entrepreneur, "used his tax-free Geneva account to transfer $1m into the New York-based foundation," the newspaper reported. "The HSBC records suggest Caring's $1m donation was paid in return for former president Bill Clinton's attendance at a lavish costume charity ball organised by Caring in St Petersburg, Russia."

Outside of the political bubble, I doubt that one likely 2016 voter in twenty noticed either of these articles, or the follow-ups. But, at a moment when Hillary is reported to be consulting with numerous experts about how to tackle rising inequality, the articles raise anew an awkward question: How far will the Clinton family's ties to moneyed interests complicate Hillary's efforts to fashion a populist campaign built around the theme of defending the middle class?

One way of seeking to answer that question is to point out that, in politics (and philanthropy, too), cultivating donors and raising a lot of money are unavoidable parts of the business. And, although some people, myself among them, will never be wholly persuaded that he who pays the piper doesn't call the tune, the average voter doesn't seem to judge candidates by their financial backers. In 2008, and, to a lesser extent, 2012, Barack Obama's campaign received a lot of cash from Wall Street. That didn't prevent him from running as an agent of change, and as someone who was willing to take on vested interests. Hillary, too, has already shown some aptitude in this regard. After falling behind Obama in the campaign of 2007 and 2008, when she seemed to lack a defining theme, she did a pretty good job of reinventing herself as a scrappy fighter for the working stiff, even if, ultimately, it wasn't enough to save her campaign.

Perhaps Clinton can recapture the spirit and message she displayed in the summer and fall of 2008. First, though, she will need to reinforce her defenses against the attacks that are sure to come from the left and the right.

One way to do that is to put together a formidable campaign apparatus and a big war chest. Until the Brock story broke, few people in the political world had believed that these objectives would present a major issue. Evidently, they might. The first task facing John Podesta, the departing White House official who is slated to become chairman of the Clinton campaign, will be to gather together the various Democratic fund-raising groups and persuade them to coöperate. That won't necessarily be easy. The Brock flap made clear that there are residual tensions between veteran Clintonites, like Brock, and some Obamaites who are preparing to support Hillary. Priorities USA Action was created by two former officials of the Obama Administration, and its co-chairman is Jim Messina, Obama's 2012 campaign manager. In a Times article that appeared after Brock's departure, Nicholas Confessore and Amy Chozick noted that "the marriage between the two camps … now appears more uneasy than at any time since Mr. Obama asked Mrs. Clinton to serve in his administration after the 2008 election."

The issues relating to the Clinton Foundation, which Bill Clinton founded in 2001, go beyond internecine conflict and bruised egos. Some people close to the Clintons have long been concerned that the foundation's biggest venture, the Clinton Global Initiative, could present some vulnerabilities for Hillary. In its own words, the C.G.I. "convenes global leaders to create and implement innovative solutions to the world's most pressing challenges," For years, it was managed by a handful of longtime aides to Bill Clinton, at least one of whom, Douglas Band, also acted as a highly paid consultant to some of its corporate donors—a fact highlighted in a lengthy 2013 Times article by Confessore and Chozick. The C.G.I.'s high-profile annual conferences, which bring together politicians, chief executives, and celebrities, have always attracted as much attention, or more, than its efforts to tackle problems like hunger, disease, and environmental degradation. Plus, there has been lingering suspicion that some of the organization's donors were motivated by a desire to gain access to the Clintons.

In the past couple of years, perhaps partly in an effort to counter some of these concerns, the Clinton Foundation and the C.G.I. have both been overhauled. A new leadership team was appointed to the foundation, Band left the C.G.I., and Hillary and Chelsea Clinton took much more central roles. Today, they are both directors of the Clinton Foundation, and Chelsea is its vice-chair. The Clinton Foundation's Web site says that she "focuses especially on the Foundation's health programs, including the Clinton Health Access Initiative, which strengthens health care and access to lifesaving services in the developing world; the Alliance for a Healthier Generation, which fights childhood obesity in the United States; and the Clinton Health Matters Initiative, which addresses preventable disease in the United States." In 2013, the foundation was officially renamed as the Bill, Hillary, and Chelsea Clinton Foundation, and last month a longtime aide to Hillary, Maura Pally, was appointed as its interim chief executive.

The Guardian story, by highlighting the fact that some of the Clinton Foundation's donors have been maintaining bank accounts in Switzerland, has focussed attention on its sources of financing rather than its makeover or its philanthropic activities. Among the donors named by the Guardian were the British retail mogul Richard Caring; Frank Giustra, a Canadian mining magnate who appeared earlier this week at C.G.I.'s annual winter meeting, in New York; and Jeffrey Epstein, a New York financier who was jailed in 2008 for soliciting prostitution from underage girls. According to the Clinton Foundation's donor database, Giustra and charities linked to him have donated at least fifty million dollars. In 2006, Epstein gave twenty-five thousand dollars, the Guardian said. Other donors to the foundation who were identified as clients of H.S.B.C.'s Geneva office included Eli Broad, the Californian entrepreneur and philanthropist, and Denise Rich, whose former husband, the fugitive commodities trader Marc Rich, was pardoned by Bill Clinton just before he left office, in 2001.

The Guardian was careful to avoid any suggestion of illegality. "It is not unlawful for US or other non-Swiss citizens to hold accounts in Geneva and there is no evidence any of the Clinton donors with Geneva accounts evaded tax," the story said. The paper cited lawyers for Giustra saying his H.S.B.C. account was for investment purposes and complied with Canadian laws. Caring was "legitimately permitted to keep his assets offshore by a hereditary quirk of UK tax law, under which he is registered as 'non-domiciled', courtesy of his Italian-American father," the story noted. And, in addition, "it is not against US law or charity regulation to accept donations from non-US citizens, or from overseas accounts."

Still, to the public at large, Swiss bank accounts are often associated with tax avoidance. In Britain, the allegation that H.S.B.C. helped some of its wealthy clients dodge taxes has become a hot political issue. The Guardian story quoted a speech that Hillary gave at a C.G.I. meeting in 2012, when she said, "One of the issues that I have been preaching about around the world is collecting taxes in an equitable manner, especially from the elites in every country…. There are rich people everywhere. And yet they do not contribute to the growth of their own countries. They don't invest in public schools, in public hospitals, in other kinds of development internally."

What should we make of all this? In a statement to the Guardian, a spokesman for the Clinton Foundation, Craig Minassian, said, "We are a philanthropy through and through, and we take pride in our programs, our efficiency, and our transparency…. The Clinton Foundation has strong donor integrity and transparency practices that go well beyond what is required of US charities, including the full disclosure of all of our donors. The contributions of these donors are helping improve the lives of millions of people across the world."

The organization has some evidence to back up this claim. Unlike other philanthropies, C.G.I. doesn't hand out grants or develop its own programs from scratch, such as building schools and hospitals in Africa. Instead, it identifies specific challenges somewhere in the world, solicits commitments from governments and nongovernmental organizations to meet them, finds corporate sponsors willing to finance the projects, and undertakes to help out with expertise, contacts, and encouragement. Last year, it released the results of an internal review of nearly three thousand such commitments made since 2005. The review concluded that they had affected the lives of four hundred and thirty million people in a hundred and eighty countries.

To be sure, this was an internal study, which relied on data provided by C.G.I.'s partners. An independent appraisal would have carried more weight. But when you read about some of the projects C.G.I. is involved with, as I have been doing, it's hard to avoid the conclusion that its staff of three hundred and fifty people is doing some good in the world—or, at least, trying to do good. Here, selected more or less at random, are a few examples:

• In 2007, C.G.I. teamed up with F.H.I. 360, a New York-based not-for-profit that, among other things, promotes family planning and reproductive health in poor countries. F.H.I. 360 made a commitment to increase the number of women and children it tested for H.I.V./AIDS, and to provide antiretroviral therapy for those who tested positive. By 2012, according to an update on the C.G.I.'s website, F.H.I. 360 had tested more than four million women and children, in such countries as Kenya and Rwanda, and had enrolled nearly thirty thousand children in retroviral therapy.

• In 2010, C.G.I. partnered with the Mexican government, a classical-music foundation, and a bus company called Estrella Blanca to expand youth orchestras throughout Mexico. By September of 2013, according to a press release from C.G.I., this effort had established working orchestras in twenty-nine of Mexico's thirty-one states, serving more than ten thousand young musicians.

• In 2011, C.G.I. partnered with Women for Women International, a Washington, D.C.-based charitable organization, to help female farmers in the war-torn Democratic Republic of the Congo. Women for Women International committed to enrolling ten thousand Congolese women in a series of classes covering topics like crop rotation, numeracy, and coöperation with other farmers. By March of 2014, according to a C.G.I. update, more than six thousand women had taken the classes, and twenty-seven new farming coöperatives had been formed.

Would some of the many projects with which C.G.I. is involved have gone ahead anyway, without its intervention? Perhaps. But in bringing together charitable organizations and corporations looking to make philanthropic donations, it has carved out a unique role. In the words of Tom Watson, the founder of Cause Wired, a consulting firm that advises not-for-profits, "It's an investment banking service—old style—for causes and philanthropy." These days, investment banks aren't exactly popular, of course. When they were originally formed, however, they played a valuable role in raising capital for entrepreneurs and businesses that needed funding. C.G.I. does the same for not-for-profits.

In some circles, it should be noted, the tactic of partnering with large companies is controversial because it tends to promote market-based approaches to economic development. Earlier this week, for example, at its winter meeting, the foundation teamed up with Unilever, the multinational home-products company, and Acumen, another New York City-based not-for-profit, to launch a ten-million-dollar program called the Enhanced Livelihoods Investment Initiative, which is aimed at turning small farmers in Africa, South Asia, Latin America, and the Caribbean into suppliers of foodstuffs and raw materials for multinationals. Giustra, the Canadian mining magnate who is also helping to fund the project, said in a statement, "Under this model, entrepreneurs and farmers will gain access to capital and skills training—all essential tools needed to pull them out of poverty."

It can be debated whether C.G.I.'s approach is the best one. Some left-leaning critics say that the organization promotes a neoliberal, inequality-accentuating agenda of the type pursued by the Clinton Administration during the nineteen-nineties. Commenting in the Huffington Post about a forum C.G.I. held in Denver last year, Michele Swenson, an author and social activist, said that it "seems nothing if not a meeting of one-percenters." The Clinton Foundation's employees and defenders would probably reply that if you can get the one-per-centers to support reducing poverty, eradicating horrible diseases, and empowering poor women, it's surely a positive development.

This is a legitimate debate to have—and Hillary, at some point, may well be obliged to engage in it. Indeed, she might be eager to do so. From her perspective, discussing how many lives the Clinton Foundation has improved in sub-Saharan Africa and other deprived regions would be a lot more palatable than getting dragged into the tax affairs of some rich "friends of Bill" or the infighting among her fundraisers.

Will war powers vote haunt senators weighing higher office? (AP)
By Julie Pace
February 14, 2015
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — In 2002, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton cast a vote in favor of the Iraq war that would later come to haunt her presidential campaign.

Now, a new crop of senators eyeing the White House — Republicans Marco Rubio of Florida, Rand Paul of Kentucky and Ted Cruz of Texas — will face a similar choice over authorizing military action in the Middle East.

A vote in favor of President Barack Obama's use-of-force resolution would give the potential candidates a share of the responsibility for the outcome of military action in a combustible region. And as Clinton learned well, the public's support for a military campaign can quickly fade, making the long-term implications of the vote difficult to predict.

Obama asked lawmakers this week to approve a three-year offensive against the Islamic State group and affiliated forces. His request includes no constraints on geographical boundaries but would bar "enduring offensive combat" — intentionally vague language that some lawmakers fear leaves open the prospect of a U.S.-led ground war.

So far, most of the 2016 hopefuls currently in Congress have sidestepped questions about how they would vote on Obama's measure, which could be amended before they have to say yes or no. Among Republicans, Rubio has been perhaps the most specific in outlining his views, saying he opposes the president putting constraints on his ability to use military force against an enemy.

"What we need to be authorizing the president to do is to destroy them and to defeat them, and allow the commander in chief — both the one we have now and the one who will follow — to put in place the tactics, the military tactics, necessary to destroy and defeat ISIL," Rubio said.

A spokesman for Paul said Friday that the senator is reviewing the legislation but has not decided how he would vote. Cruz has called for Congress to "strengthen" the legislation by making sure the president is committed to clear objectives. He also has suggested the authorization should include a provision to directly arm the Iraqi Kurds, but it is unclear what other changes he wants to see.

Despite Americans' war weariness, there is public support for formally authorizing the mission. An NBC News/ Marist poll released Friday showed that 54 percent of respondents want their member of Congress to vote for Obama's request.

Clinton, who is laying the groundwork for another presidential run, will also be pressed to take a position. But this time around, she will have the advantage of weighing in from the outside, without the pressure of voting.

"You can talk about the subject without actually being pinned down on a particular vote that you're going to have to defend for years to come," said Jim Manley, a longtime aide to the late Edward Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who worked to get Clinton and other Democrats to vote against the 2002 war authorization.

Clinton has made no public comments since Obama sent lawmakers the draft legislation earlier this week, and her spokesman did not respond to a fresh request for her position Friday.

The former secretary of state has previously called the fight against the Islamic State group a "long-term struggle" and has said military action is essential to prevent the group from making further advances.

The military campaign against the Islamic State militants began six months ago, and Obama is, in effect, seeking Congress' approval retroactively. He has said the current mission is legally justified under the 2002 authorization

President George W. Bush used to start the Iraq war — the resolution Clinton voted for.

By the time Obama and Clinton faced off in the 2008 Democratic primary, the Iraq war was deeply unpopular. Obama saw Clinton's vote for the military conflict as a way to draw a distinction with his better-known rival, arguing that while he was not in the Senate in 2002, he would have voted against giving Bush the war powers.

The 2002 vote and its political implications have continued to shadow the way lawmakers have responded to war-power requests.

In 2013, Congress balked at Obama's request to authorize strikes in Syria and never held a vote. And while congressional leaders pushed the president for months to seek authorization for the Islamic State campaign, lawmakers insisted Obama be the one to actually draft a resolution.

As with Obama's current request, there was public support for Bush's Iraq resolution in 2002. A Gallup Poll a few weeks before the high-stakes vote found that 57 percent of Americans said Congress should "pass a resolution to support sending American ground troops to the Persian Gulf in an attempt to remove Saddam Hussein from power in Iraq." About 38 percent said it should not.

As the Iraq war dragged on, and the death toll and financial costs mounted, the conflict became deeply unpopular.

By the time Clinton and Obama were facing off for the Democratic nomination, surveys showed a majority of Americans believed going into Iraq was the wrong decision — a warning for potential 2016 candidates trying to read the tea leaves ahead of their own war powers vote.

Time for Europe to get tough with Russia, urges Clinton (Times)
Matt Spence
February 14, 2015
The Times

Hillary Clinton believes Europe has been "too wimpy" with Vladimir Putin over Ukraine and must be far tougher to stop Russia's expansionist ambitions, Boris Johnson revealed yesterday.

The mayor of London, who was in New York as part of a six-day tour of the US east coast, said Mrs Clinton believed Russia would try to expand its influence into what was the old Soviet Union, unless it was challenged more robustly.

Mr Johnson, who held talks with Mrs Clinton during a closed meeting on Wednesday, said yesterday that she believed, "Putin, if unchallenged and unchecked, would continue to expand his influence in the perimeter of what was the Soviet Union".

It is possible that Mr Johnson and Mrs Clinton's political trajectories may coincide, with them leading their respective nations and sharing stewardship of the "special relationship" between the US and the UK.

Her comments in their meeting came hours before President Hollande of France and Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, backed a "last chance" peace deal to stop fighting in Ukraine, involving Russian-backed rebels and forces loyal to Kiev. The deal is widely viewed as being favourable to Russia. The US has threatened to arm Ukrainian forces if the deal falls apart.

Mr Johnson said Mrs Clinton had also urged greater diversification of energy independence away from Russia, and added they had discussed further measures to tackle the rise of Islamic State. He said they had agreed that more needed to be done to support Kurdish forces fighting the fanatics.

"Clearly she feels, like me, that we should be doing more to support the Kurdish peshmerga," he said.

The mayor, who holds joint US citizenship, also revealed that he has settled his debts with the US taxman, telling audiences he had "coughed up in full" an amount believed to be just under £30,000, stemming from the profit from the sale of his family home in north London.

US citizens are required to declare their income to the American tax authorities irrespective of where it was derived and may then face a bill.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I’m a massive taxpayer in the UK and in America,” Mr Johnson told one audience. “All I can say is I hope very much people will requite my generosity in America by coming to London in ever growing numbers.” Remarking on a US tax arrangement he once called “outrageous”, Mr Johnson blamed his predicament on Britain’s 1773 tax on tea, which sparked the Boston Tea Party revolt, the American revolution and independence.

He described the tea tax as “irrational attack on fair trade”, without which “we would all remain part of the same great Churchillian commonwealth”.

As part of his visit the mayor has held talks with the Smithsonian Institution about plans to bring the museum’s first foreign outpost to the Olympic Park in east London. Accompanied by members of the London Legacy Development Corporation, the organisation in charge of the park, Mr Johnson cautioned that he was not “counting his chickens,” but hoping to reach an agreement to make the Smithsonian an anchor tenant in his envisioned “Olympicopolis” cultural hub.

David Goldstone, the corporation’s chief executive, met his Smithsonian counterparts last night to iron out details of the potential arrangement. The Smithsonian’s governors, its Board of Regents, which includes Joe Biden, the US vice-president, are expected to consider the London proposal when they meet on April 13.

Hillary Clinton thinks Europe ‘too wimpy’ with Putin, London mayor says (CNN)
By Stephen Collinson
February 13, 2015
CNN

Washington (CNN)Hillary Clinton is worried that European governments are being “too wimpy” in dealing with Russian President Vladimir Putin, London’s mayor Boris Johnson said Friday.

Johnson, on a trade mission to the United States, said that he was struck by the former secretary of state’s insistence that Europe must do more to stand up to the Russian leader over Ukraine.

“One thing in particular she really wanted to get across -- that was she thought the Europeans were being too wimpy in dealing with Putin,” Johnson said, at a Politico Playbook Breakfast event in Washington.

Stressing he was not quoting Clinton word for word, two days after meeting her in New York, Johnson said that he was impressed by the likely Democratic presidential candidate’s “brilliant mastery” of foreign policy.

“She thought in particular that we in Britain should be less dependent on Russian hyrdrocarbons and she thought we should get on with seeking alternative sources,” Johnson said.

“Her general anxiety was that Putin, if unchallenged and unchecked, would continue to expand his influence in the perimeter of what was the Soviet Union. She spoke of alarm in Estonia and the Baltic states. I was very, very struck by that.”

“I was struck by the firmness with which she wanted us in Britain to stick it, to take it to Putin,” he said, once again underlining he was not using Clinton’s exact words but offering a “brutal summary” of what she said.

Johnson, who is known for his scruffy shock of blond hair and colorful turn of phrase, said Clinton backed President Barack Obama’s strategy on tackling ISIS and thought there was more everybody could be doing to support Kurdish Peshmerga forces fighting the extremist group.

The mayor, who recently visited Kurdish areas in Iraq, quipped that he would not overstate the danger of his trip -- in a reference to NBC newsman Brian Williams who was suspended for six months for exaggerating his experiences during the Iraq war.

“You get in trouble over here .. I was nearish to the front line. I wouldn’t say bullets were wanging over my head.”

Johnson also said that Clinton was “particularly gracious and charming” in their meeting, considering his comments about her in a Daily Telegraph article in 2007 in which he accused her of “purse-lipped political correctness” and said she reminded him of a “sadistic nurse in a mental hospital.”

“She was so nice and so kind that even in that article she found something to agree with,” he said Friday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Johnson also weighed in on the controversy stoked up by a possible Republican presidential candidate Bobby Jindal who said in London last month after the Paris terror attacks that Muslim communities had made parts of the British capital and other European cities “no go areas” for people who did not share their faith.

He said that Louisiana Gov. Jindal and those who shared his views were in need of some “gentle education” on the issue. “I would be more than happy personally to escort Governor Jindal around any area of London that he thinks is a no go zone. It really isn’t true, it is complete nonsense ... there are no no go zones and nor will there be.”

The flamboyant Johnson, while remaining mayor of London, is running for a seat in parliament at the next UK general election in May, and has long been tipped as a future leader of the Conservative Party and possible future prime minister.

Why April Will Trigger Campaign Announcements (US News)
By David Cantanese
February 13, 2015
US News & World Report

With the exception of exploratory committees set up by former Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va, and Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., formal 2016 presidential campaign announcements have been few and far between.

That hasn’t stopped a proliferation of pre-candidacy political action committees, of course.

But those aren’t formal campaign committees with the express intent of gauging a White House run.

Look for that to change in April.

Former Federal Election Commissioner Michael Toner says he foresees five to 10 2016 presidential campaign committees being created in April, in order for candidates to take advantage of a full fundraising quarter.

“That’s going to be a popular lane. I bet some heavy hitters file in early April. It’s soon enough to do the spadework by the summer to be in the best position,” he tells U.S. News. “It will create a ripple effect.”

In politics, fundraising timespans are divvied up like quarters in football – there are four of them every year, each covering three months. The second quarter begins April 1 and runs through June 30. So, for instance, if a candidate was to wait until June 1 to announce, he or she would only have 30 days to raise money before having to report the totals to the FEC. That risks producing a smaller number, which will be thoroughly scrutinized by political pundits and the media for immediate signs of weakness.

And that’s why it’s no coincidence Hillary Clinton is eyeing April as a point to pull the trigger.

It’s not only fundraising that’s of priority, notes Toner. Serious contenders can only delay constructing a campaign infrastructure for so long. If a Republican plans to compete in Iowa’s August straw poll, volunteers must be enlisted. Many states also require thousands of signatures to qualify for the primary ballot. (In 2012, both Newt Gingrich and Rick Perry were kept off the ballot in Virginia because they failed to corral the necessary signatures in time.)

“The ballot access issue is a nightmare, and you have to be on top of it for the summer and fall. You can’t push that off indefinitely,” Toner says.

If he’s right, April will shower down candidates as much as it will raindrops.

Obama bundlers slow to back Clinton super PACS (USAT)
By Fredreka Schouten and Christopher Schnaars
February 13, 2015
USA Today

WASHINGTON — Only a tiny fraction of the fundraisers who helped President Obama secure a second term have made significant contributions to the committee backing a potential run by Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton, a USA TODAY analysis shows.

Of the 769 individuals and couples who raised money for Obama, just 54 people and firms have donated at least $5,000 to Ready for Hillary, the super PAC that has spent two years working to build grass-roots support for a

Clinton campaign, according to the analysis.

South Carolina lawyer Richard Harpootlian collected more than $500,000 for Obama's re-election, according to figures released by the president's campaign. However, Harpootlian, a former two-time chairman of the South Carolina Democratic Party, is sitting on the sidelines in the early stages of the 2016 campaign. "I don't know that she has generated any sort of enthusiasm or excitement," he said of Clinton.

"In 2007, the Clinton campaign was more a corporate entity with layers and layers and layers of consultants — Clinton, Inc. — as opposed to a campaign," Harpootlian said, referring to the early months of Clinton's unsuccessful primary battle with Obama.

"I had hoped that this time around the Clinton campaign would be more agile. But there's no real feeling that there's a campaign. They are acting as if she's the nominee, which is what happened in 2007 — and good golly — that went wrong."

The reluctance of some of Obama's biggest backers to make significant early contributions to the Ready for Hillary super PAC underscores Clinton's slower-than-expected campaign start. The former secretary of State initially had signaled she might make a decision on the 2016 race as early as last month. More recently, the timetable for an announcement was adjusted to as late as July, Politico and other news media outlets report.

Ready for Hillary spokesman Seth Bringman said Obama's supporters are playing "an essential and inspiring role" in the super PAC's operations. Some of Obama's fundraisers have not written big checks themselves but have joined the group's "finance council" and are encouraging others to contribute, he said.

Ready for Hillary's ranks also include people who donated to Obama's campaign or the super PAC supporting him, but who did not have a formal fundraising role in his campaign.

David Garrison, a Nashville lawyer who raised money for both of Obama's campaigns, has not donated to Ready for Hillary. He said some of Obama's success relied on giving a broad group of party activists and fundraisers — many of whom were new to politics — meaningful roles early in his campaign. He hasn't seen those opportunities emerge so far.

"While the Clintons have established ties with Democrats in Tennessee and all around the country, what we haven't seen yet is a Clinton campaign that's built an infrastructure at all various levels of donors and activists," Garrison said.

"What she didn't do in 2008 — and she has to do now — is build a new coalition beyond the Clintons' storied history in the party," he said.

In a statement, Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill said Clinton will "take nothing for granted" if she runs and will "fight for every vote."

As Clinton devises her plans, a crowded field of Republican candidates is jockeying for an edge. Several prominent contenders, including former Florida governor Jeb Bush and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, launched their own fundraising committees in recent weeks.

The Republican National Committee has seized on Clinton's slower timetable. On Thursday, RNC operatives posted a mobile billboard at Vice President Biden's events in Iowa, arguing that Clinton's absence from the campaign trail demonstrates that she's "hiding from voters."

At the same time, squabbling in the network of groups preparing for Clinton's candidacy broke into public view this week when David Brock, a liberal activist who oversees several super PACs backing Clinton, resigned from the board of another pro-Clinton super PAC, Priorities USA Action, in a dispute over fundraising tactics. (Both sides sought to quickly defuse the situation, and Brock has said he will willing to rejoin Priorities' leadership.)

Priorities USA Action, which raised nearly $80 million to back Obama's re-election in 2012, was formally reorganized last year to support Clinton. The group raised virtually no money in 2014, which officials said was an intentional plan to avoid siphoning contributions from other Democratic groups working on last year's congressional elections. But it has been dogged by headlines in recent days that it is having problems securing financial commitments for the upcoming campaign.

Billionaire financier George Soros, a prominent Democratic donor, has been among the major backers of Brock's organizations. He's also donated $25,000 to Ready for Hillary but has not contributed to Priorities since it was reorganized to back Clinton.

Michael Vachon, Soros' political adviser, warned against reading too much into that. Soros will "enthusiastically support Hillary Clinton," he said.

"To what degree he will be involved in independent expenditures is not something he has yet considered," Vachon said, adding that Soros has spent the last year focused "almost exclusively" on the crisis in Ukraine.

Officials with Priorities USA Action — which includes a mix of veteran Clinton and Obama political operatives and supporters — insist they will raise ample money once Clinton's campaign to become the nation's first female president is in full swing.

"Make no mistake, we will have the resources we need to be effective and to work with our allies to help elect Hillary Clinton in 2016," Jonathan Mantz, Clinton's 2008 finance director and a senior adviser to Priorities, said in a statement.

The USA TODAY analysis compared the list of 769 individuals and couples who raised money for Obama's 2012 campaign with donors who contributed at least $5,000 to Ready for Hillary since the super PAC's launch in January 2013. The 54 matches include companies and spouses of Obama fundraisers that USA TODAY could identify.

As a super PAC, Ready for Hillary can accept unlimited funds but has capped its contributions at $25,000. It has built a list of 3 million supporters that will be a valuable asset for a Clinton campaign.

Jerome Pandell, a lawyer in Walnut Creek, Calif., who raised about $400,000 for Obama, has attended several Ready for Hillary fundraisers but has focused more on local races in the last year.

Although he has not written big checks yet, Pandell said he stands ready to help Clinton in any way he can. He also maintains that Clinton doesn't need to rush into the 2016 fray.

"She's a known quality," he said. "She doesn't have to introduce herself."

Activists bristle at Hillary Clinton fundraising pleas (Politico)
By Ben Schreckinger

Politico

In early November, with her party on eve of an electoral walloping, Democrat Mary Tetreau had had enough. The Londonderry, New Hampshire activist was sick of the constant emails begging for money for a candidate who wasn't even running for office yet.

When another plea landed in her inbox the day before the election, she unsubscribed.

"I'm not going to be ready for Hillary until she announces she's running for president," said Tetreau, a three-decade veteran of New Hampshire primary politics, who called Ready for Hillary's early-and-often email approach "annoying."

Three months later, Hillary Clinton remains officially undeclared, but her campaign-in-waiting's emails continue to flood inboxes of Democratic activists in early voting states. Though it amounts to little more than a nuisance in the grand scheme of the 2016 election, it does point to a downside of Clinton's strategy of staying out of the public eye while her supporters campaign on her behalf. Namely, that it could create Clinton fatigue among activists and fuel concerns that she's taking the Democratic nomination for granted.

"I'll be ready for Hillary when Hillary's ready for Hillary," said Bill Verge, a Democratic activist who played a key role in John Kerry's 2004 New Hampshire campaign. Like Tetreau, Verge, who said he has been "inundated with emails daily," counts himself a likely Clinton supporter — but one turned off by the aggressive fundraising on behalf of a candidate who appears intent on postponing an official entry into the race possibly until July.

Clinton is conducting a charm offensive from afar: Democrats in both early states report receiving handwritten notes from her. In the meantime, Ready for Hillary, a super PAC formed on Clinton's behalf in April 2013 that has no formal ties to the former secretary of state, will keep laying the groundwork. One of the group's main purposes is to rebuild Clinton's list of supporters, dormant since 2008, which it would rent or sell to an eventual Clinton campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“People are tired of people asking for money every time they look at their email,” said Pat Sass, chairwoman of the Blackhawk County Democrats in Iowa. “They feel the election is far away.”

A spokesman for Ready for Hillary did not respond to requests for comment.

The delay of an official presidential campaign puts more pressure on Ready for Hillary to raise money in order to continue operating longer than initially planned. Tension over fundraising in Clinton’s political apparatus spilled out into the open this week when Clinton loyalist David Brock resigned from the board of the pro-Clinton Priorities USA.

Brock claimed that Priorities’ leaders had planted a critical story in the New York Times about a fundraising consultant — used by Brock’s pro-Clinton groups and Ready for Hillary — who charges commission, a controversial practice. POLITICO reported this week that Priorities is having trouble meeting its fundraising goals, in part because many wealthy donors have already given to other groups in Clinton’s orbit.

As frequently as Ready for Hillary sends its solicitations — recipients say they arrive daily — experts say barraging inboxes has become the new norm.

“The best practice used to be that you would only send a couple per day at max,” said Michael Whitney, an email campaigning specialist at the progressive communications firm Revolution Messaging. But in recent years, he said, email campaigners have become more aggressive without registering any meaningful backlash.

The new consensus is that constant emailing “might annoy a lot of people, but it doesn’t mean they’re going to unsubscribe and it doesn’t mean they’re not going to donate in the future.”

“Three years ago, the idea of sending more than two emails a day was considered abusive,” he added. “That’s gone out the window.”

As for the distaste among the grass roots, Iowa City activist John Deeth said there’s one obvious way to dispel it.

“The grumbling isn’t so much about hearing so much from Ready for Hillary and is more about not hearing anything from actual Hillary,” said Deeth, who is eager for the nominating process to kick into gear. “I don’t think anybody would mind if an email landed in their inbox that said, ‘Hillary’s going to be in Des Moines next week.’ That would be fine. Everybody would love to get that email.”

Liberals Work To Lure Warren Into White House Race (Reuters)
By Scott Malone

MANCHESTER, N.H. - The scene in the New Hampshire office is one common to any nascent U.S. presidential campaign in the state that holds the country’s first primary contest: Young staffers peck away at laptops and unpack boxes of signs with their candidate’s name.

But the Democrat they are working for, U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, adamantly denies plans to seek the presidency.

Backed with $1.25 million from liberal advocacy groups MoveOn.org and Democracy for America, the “Run Warren Run” group has opened offices in New Hampshire and Iowa, hoping she will jump in and contending Warren’s message of populist economics could propel her into the White House in 2016.

This core of supporters believe Warren could beat presumed party frontrunner and former secretary of state Hillary Clinton, who is expected to formally launch her campaign in coming months and who holds a huge lead over other possible Democratic candidates in opinion polls.

Even outside the Warren camp, some other Democrats says a challenger to Clinton could help the party’s chances by ensuring she entered the general election campaign well-prepared, and by focusing attention on economic issues that matter to middle and lower income Americans, such as promoting a higher minimum wage and student loan reform.

MoveOn.org, which wants to see Warren in the race and her ideas heard, is a political powerhouse with a grass-roots organization that helped elect and re-elect President Barack Obama, including his long and hard-fought battle with Clinton for the Democratic nomination in 2008. Democracy for America has its own strong pedigree, dating back to Vermont Democrat Howard Dean's 2004 presidential run.

"We believe that she would be the strongest candidate in the general election," said Kurt Ehrenberg, a veteran political operative who is heading up the Run Warren Run operation in New Hampshire. "Our job is not only to convince Senator Warren to get into the race, it's to focus the race on these issues."

At Run Warren Run's Manchester office, Ehrenberg and three young staffers were busy organizing volunteers to hit the streets of four New Hampshire cities this weekend to spread the Warren message.

"The plan is for us to build a campaign, to show Senator Warren that if she does decide to get into the race, there is a ready-made structure here in New Hampshire and Iowa," Ehrenberg said. "We're going to build an organization that is ready to go it she decides to run for president."

Despite 300,000 signatures on a petition urging Warren, 65, to run, that is still a big if. "As Senator Warren has said many times, she is not running for president and doesn't support these draft campaigns," Warren's spokeswoman, Lacey Rose, said in an e-mail.

Shaking Up The Primary Race

Warren's progressive views would make her chances of defeating a moderate Republican for the White House unlikely, but her appeal to the liberal flank of the Democratic Party is rooted in dogged opposition to perceived Wall Street excesses.

She grew up on what she has called the "ragged edge of the middle class," and as a Harvard law professor was among the first to warn of the looming sub-prime mortgage crisis that triggered the financial crisis of 2008.

She was a key architect of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau set up after the crisis and since winning a Senate seat in 2012 has been a strong voice on financial issues, including helping block a former Lazard banker from winning a top job at the Treasury Department.

Publicly, Democratic strategists in Washington back Clinton's White House bid and say it is unlikely another viable candidate will emerge unless she decides not to run. Privately, many of the same people say they would like to see a more progressive candidate enter the race, if only to push the conversation to the left during the primary contests.

Clinton's potentially smooth path to the nomination stands in sharp contrast to the crowded Republican field, where about a dozen candidates are at various stages of exploring runs.

The Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary will take place early next year, kicking off a series of primary contests that culminate in each party picking its candidate to run in the November election.

"Candidates don't like primaries, but primaries traditionally will make candidates stronger for the general election," said Neil Levesque, executive director of the New Hampshire Institute of Politics. "While all the Republicans are fighting amongst themselves, they're all having a chance to get on TV for a year. When there's only one candidate, it's more difficult to do that."

Clinton has a commanding lead among Democrats who are likely to vote in the New Hampshire primary, with 58 percent saying she would be their choice if the primary was held today, according to a University of New Hampshire/WMUR poll released last week.

Warren ran second, with the support of 14 percent of 297 likely voters polled Jan. 22-Feb. 3, leading third-placed Vice President Joe Biden. The poll had a 5.7 percent margin of error.

But a poll commissioned by Run Warren Run found that 98 percent of likely Democratic voters in New Hampshire and Iowa wanted a competitive race. Some 79 percent of 800 respondents polled Jan. 30 through Feb. 5 said they would like to see Warren run, though that did not mean they would vote for her.

Think Hillary Clinton is likely to win? Think again. (National Journal)

Ask around: Washington is pretty certain Hillary Clinton is the favorite to win the White House. Democrats have a natural turnout advantage in presidential years, seasoned political operatives reason. Five of the past six popular-vote tallies have gone to the Democratic candidate. And early polls that show Clinton sporting a big lead, especially among women, have strategists wondering how the Republican nominee could ever catch up.

But outside of the capital, from Georgia to New York to California, there's another set of political professionals watching this race: academics and model-makers. And based on the data they track, Democrats have little reason to be so bullish about Clinton's chances.

"Viewing her as a prohibitive favorite at this point is misplaced, definitely," says Alan Abramowitz.

Abramowitz isn't a Republican pollster or a professional Clinton-hater. He's a political science professor at Emory University in Atlanta. And he and his ilk—the wonky academics who research in anonymity while pundits predict races on TV—offer the most compelling case for reconsidering Clinton as the likely winner.

"I would feel comfortable saying that it's a 50-50 race right now," says Drew Linzer, a political scientist who is an independent analyst in Berkeley, California. "But I don't think anyone would be wise going far past 60-40 in either direction."

Veteran political operatives regard these predictions as nothing more than musings from the Ivory Tower. But political scientists who specialize in presidential-race forecasts aren't relying on their guts. They've built statistical models that draw on the history of modern presidential campaigns (since Harry Truman's reelection in 1948) to determine with startling accuracy the outcome of the next White House contest.

The best-known forecasting tool of the bunch—and one that plainly spells out Clinton's looming trouble—is Abramowitz's "Time for Change" model. He first built it before George H.W. Bush's 1988 election, and he has used it to predict the winner of the popular vote in the seven White House races since. (The model predicted that Al Gore would win the presidency in 2000, when he became the first person since Grover Cleveland to earn the majority of the popular vote nationally but lose the Electoral College.)

The model uses just three variables to determine the winner: the incumbent's approval rating, economic growth in the second quarter of the election year, and the number of terms the candidate's party has held the White House. Official forecasts aren't made until the summer before the presidential election. But reasonable estimates rooted in current political and economic conditions demonstrate Clinton's vulnerability.

Consider this scenario: President Obama retains equal levels of approval and disapproval, better than he has had most of his second term; and gross domestic product growth in the second quarter of 2016 holds at 2.4 percent, the same as last year's rate of growth. Under this scenario, the "Time for Change" model projects that Clinton will secure just 48.7 percent of the popular vote.

In other words, she loses.

Slight increases in Obama's approval rating and economic growth aren't enough to change the outcome for Clinton. Every 10-point improvement in the president's approval—if, for example, 55 percent of voters approved of Obama while 45 percent didn't—earns Clinton only an additional 1 percentage point of the popular vote. It takes an extra 1 percent year-over-year GDP growth to give Clinton an extra half percentage point of the popular vote.

For Clinton to reach 50 percent of the popular vote, under this model's rules, the president would need to see a 5-point increase in his approval rating and GDP growth would have to hit 3.5 percent. It's certainly possible, but it's fair to call that a best-case scenario for Obama in his final year as president.

So while Democrats see the recent gains in both Obama's approval and economic growth as signs that Clinton enters the race as the favorite, the academic modeling suggests that assessment is far too sunny. In fact, the recent uptick is the only thing keeping her from being a prohibitive underdog.

The reason Clinton struggles under seemingly decent conditions is obvious. After one party holds the presidency for two terms, voters want change. In the model, this desire for a new direction manifests itself as a 4-point reduction in the candidate's take of the popular vote compared with what candidates could expect had their party held the White House for just one term.

"One of the regularities you'll find for all presidential elections since World War II is, after a party has been in power eight years and is trying to hold on to the White House for a third consecutive term, it gets harder," Abramowitz says. "Another way of looking at it: In the first election after a party takes over the White House, you have a significant advantage. And the next time, after you've held another term, you lose that advantage."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Campaign operatives love to hate this academic assessment of politics, much like Wall Street belittles the technical analysts who use past performance to predict stock-market moves.

The tension between the strategists and the scientists speaks to the distinct approaches they employ: Political professionals (including journalists) study strategy, tactics, the day-to-day activities of a campaign, while political scientists see fundamentals shaping every election, almost no matter the strength of a candidate.

In 2012, for example, most strategists think Obama won because he ran one of the best presidential campaigns in American history while Mitt Romney ran one of the worst. According to political scientists, however, Obama's victory was a product of favorable conditions, such as an improving economy, decent approval ratings, and his incumbency. The unemployment rate was high, yes, but the state of the economy matters little compared with the direction it's headed.

In an era of hyper-professionalized, financially flush campaigns, it is this set of fundamentals that will make the difference between winning and losing, the scientists argue.

"The notion the campaign doesn't matter, it's not that simple," says Michael Lewis-Beck, a political science professor at the University of Iowa. "It doesn't matter so much because everyone is campaigning so hard that they cancel each other out."

Lewis-Beck showcased his own presidential model—one of many that now dot the political landscape—on the political science blog Monkey Cage. Academics began developing statistics-based predictions as early as the 1970s, but they have become more popular and mainstream since Nate Silver correctly forecast the 2008 and 2012 presidential elections.

Silver is a controversial figure in the political science world, where he's seen as a practitioner who went mainstream and came to define the entire forecast-model genre. As Romney supporters can attest, Silver's forecasts have been accurate, but they also depend on polls—many of which are not yet available or are of little use this far from Election Day. This means that Silver's forecasts might not be accurate untila couple of months before an election, and to political scientists who develop models, the goal is not just to be accurate but to be accurate long enough before an election to make a true forecast.

Other methods abound. Political scientists have used job growth and state-based economic indicators in their models, for example, while Abramowitz tried to update his own to account for increased polarization among voters. (He plans to scrap the update after it was less accurate about the 2012 election than his old model.) Lewis-Beck says the public's expectations for how a presidential race will turn out are predictive, while a historian at American University has a checklist of conditions that must be met for an incumbent party to win reelection.

One political scientist, Helmut Norpoth at Stony Brook University in New York, bases his model entirely on which party holds the White House, and for how long. It lets him make predictions years in advance: He has already forecast that Republicans have a 65 percent chance at winning the presidency next year.

"There's a cyclical pattern in the elections," Norpoth said. "It swings back and forth. And you can see it in the time lines since 1828."

Models can be wrong, of course. Norpoth says his 2008 prediction missed in part because he made it before the onset of a financial crisis that tanked the economy. And even models with a better track record aren't perfectly calibrated.

The biggest assumption that all the models make is that Republicans and Democrats will nominate someone from the mainstream of their party—and that might amount to a fatal flaw in predicting 2016, when the GOP could pick a candidate, such as Ted Cruz or Rand Paul, who's not favored by the establishment.

And other potential problems lurk: Models that suggest Clinton would earn 49 percent of the vote come with a margin of error that might make the difference; Abramowitz worries that because there have been only six modern-day presidential elections in which no incumbent from either party is running, his model's sample size might be too small; and in a race between Clinton and an equally talented, outsized personality, such as Jeb Bush, the qualities of the individual candidates might matter more.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But conceding that the models aren't perfect isn't the same as saying they're not effective. When I talked with Linzer, I argued that Clinton has an advantage. It comes down to women, I said, especially educated white women who, early polling shows, have a special affinity for the former senator and first lady. How can the GOP hope to persuade enough members of this group to break away to win swing states such as Colorado and Pennsylvania?

"It's just way more complicated than that," Linzer said. "For every argument that you can pick out of the cross-tabs, I can pick a counterargument. Off the top of my head: She's not going to earn the same enthusiasm that Obama did among nonwhite voters."

As he put it, our brains trick us into believing things that seem plausible but don't hold up to scrutiny. It might seem plausible that Clinton is a favorite, but the historical record simply says otherwise.

"I'm sorry," Linzer said, "to rain on your thought parade."

Because, yes, to the scientists, it's not our thoughts about this election that count. It's the data.

Hillary Targets Grandmother Voters (Waycross Journal-Herald)
Cokie Roberts and Steven V. Roberts
February 13, 2015
Waycross Journal-Herald

Hillary Rodham Clinton has played many roles in her 67 years: first lady and Secretary of State, U.S. Senator and presidential candidate. All those titles have one thing in common: They are intensely political and largely partisan.

One identity Clinton recently acquired is very different from all the others: Grandmother. That title transcends politics. It's about personal relationships, not professional ones. It's about the real you, not the image crafted by your media consultant.

As Clinton clearly knows, however, being a grandmother has enormous political implications. That's why she recently tweeted an endorsement of childhood vaccinations with the hashtag "#GrandmothersKnowBest."

Since we are blessed with six grandkids of our own, we admit to being prejudiced here. We know full well what Clinton means when she describes her "grandmother glow." We agree with her adage that age and experience provide a perspective that youth can never duplicate.

But the practical implications of her new role go far beyond gauzy sentiment. There are 70 million grandparents in this country — a pretty formidable voting bloc, and one that Democrats have struggled to attract. In 2012, Barack Obama won only 44 percent of voters over 65. Grandma Hillary should have a better shot.

Remember, too, a key word in her hashtag: "mother." She didn't use "#GrandparentsKnowBest," after all. And Democrats simply cannot win the presidency without a large advantage among women voters.

It's also instructive that she used the hashtag to weigh in on vaccinations. She'll probably use it again on a range of issues relating to child welfare that Obama has already signaled will be part of the 2016 campaign: increased tax credits for parents, more pre-K education and better family leave policies.

The importance of Granny Power goes far beyond age and gender. Hillary lost to Obama for many reasons, but one of the most important is this: She failed to connect with voters on a human, personal level.

We've covered a dozen presidential elections and talked to countless voters, and they almost never say, "I just voted for someone based on his 16-point program on climate change."

To most voters, personal qualities are far more important than policy positions. What they do say is, "I like him, he understands me, he knows what my life is like."

The best way to convey those qualities is through stories. Obama was far better than Clinton at doing that, and his favorite tales are now so familiar we can all recite them. The grandmother who hit a glass ceiling at her bank; the mother who struggled with paying her medical bills; the father-in-law who hobbled on two canes every day to reach his job.

We know about the student loans the young Obamas had to pay off. We can describe the car he drove on their first date that was so old the floorboards were rusted through.

All of these stories carry one message: I've endured the same pains and pressures that you have. I'm just like you.

Clinton has struggled to find the language that conveys that level of personal empathy. One of her few attempts to do so in 2008— she liked to say "I grew up in a middle-class family in the middle of America" — never really connected.

"As we saw in 2008, she had a more difficult time relating to voters on a personal level," Jennifer Lawless, director of the Women & Politics Institute at American University, told Time magazine. "(Telling) stories about having a first grandchild might serve as one way to connect with the millions of Americans who watched Chelsea grow up, and who are now grandparents themselves."

Baby Charlotte is not Clinton's only female relative we'll hear more about. There's her late mother, Dorothy, who grew up in an abusive household and left home at 14 to support herself as a nanny. It's the kind of story about grit and determination and overcoming adversity that touches a resonant chord in American mythology.

Sure, there are risks here. In our youth-obsessed culture, age is not always an asset. Ask Bob Dole and John McCain, who ran for president in their 70s and lost to much younger opponents.

And there is still a double standard when it comes to gender. Women have to prove their toughness in ways men never do. Being Grandmother-in-Chief doesn't automatically qualify you to be Commander-in-Chief.

But in the end, Hillary Clinton has to embrace who she is: a woman with the wounds and wisdom that come with age.

Hillary Clinton, Bill Frist: Reauthorize children's health insurance program (CBS News)
By Jake Miller
February 13, 2015
CBS News

Hillary Clinton joined forces with former Senate Republican leader Bill Frist on Thursday to push Congress to reauthorize the Children's Health Insurance Program (CHIP) well ahead of a late September deadline, arguing that "our most vulnerable children shouldn't be caught in the crossfire" of the continued fighting over the budget and Obamacare.

Clinton, the early but undeclared frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination, and Frist, a physician and former Senate majority leader, made their case in an op-ed published in the New York Times.

"Despite strong bipartisan support, we are concerned that gridlock in Washington and unrelated disputes over the Affordable Care Act could prevent an extension of the program," they wrote. "As parents, grandparents, and former legislators, we believe that partisan politics should never stand between our kids and quality health care."

Federal funding for CHIP is due to dry up at the end of September, when the bill currently funding the government expires, but Clinton and Frist urged Congress to act now to keep the program afloat. "With more than four-fifths of state legislatures adjourning by the end of June, lack of action and clarity from Washington by then will make budgeting and planning virtually impossible," they wrote.

Clinton and Frist acknowledged that the Affordable Care Act is helping to extend health insurance to families who might not have been able to afford it previously, but they added that "substantial gaps still exist - and too many children can still fall through them."

One such gap, which they labeled the "family glitch," prevents families from receiving subsidized insurance through an Obamacare exchange if they're offered "affordable coverage" by their employer.

"In this case, 'affordable' is defined as less than roughly 9.5 percent of household income for that parent to sign up alone - even though the actual cost of available family coverage is far higher," Clinton and Frist wrote. "For families affected by this glitch, CHIP may be the only affordable option for making sure their children are covered."

A failure to reauthorize the program, they warned, could have dire consequences: "As many as two million children could lose coverage altogether. Millions more will have fewer health care benefits and higher out-of-pocket costs."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CHIP, created in 1997, was designed to cover families who made too much money to qualify for Medicaid but not enough money to afford private insurance. It offered money to states but allowed them flexibility to tailor the program to fit their specific needs. Some states created a new program while others expanded Medicaid to cover more children.

Clinton, who was then first lady, aggressively pushed Congress to approve the program, and many of its architects on Capitol Hill credited her public advocacy with pushing a bill over the finish line.

"She was a one-woman army inside the White House to get this done," an aide to then-Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Massachusetts, who co-sponsored the bill, told the New York Times several years after its passage.

Joe Biden: Running away from Obama in 2016 would be 'mistake' for Dems (Washington Times)
By Dave Boyer
February 13, 2015
The Washington Times

Vice President Joseph R. Biden said Democratic presidential candidates in 2016 should embrace President Obama's economic policies and "run on what we have done" instead of running away from the administration.

"In my view, those seeking to lead the nation should protect and defend and run, yes run, on what we've done and own what we have done," Mr. Biden said in a speech in Des Moines, Iowa. "Stand for what we have done. Acknowledge what we have done. And be judged on what we have done, if we have any chance for continued resurgence in 2016."

He added, "Some say that would amount to a third term of the president. I call it sticking with what works."

Mr. Biden hinted at his own presidential plans, saying he will decide whether to run in 2016 by the end of this summer.

"That's a family personal decision that I'm going to make sometime at the end of the summer," Mr. Biden told reporters. "In the meantime, though, this is about convincing the public and in turn some of our Republican friends that what we're proposing in the budget is a continuation of the stuff that works."

Mr. Biden, who has not formed an exploratory committee for 2016, said he wasn't in the state for campaigning.

"I've been here a lot, I have a lot of friends. I'm going to see some of my friends are still in the Legislature and they're here today," he said. "But no, I'm not doing any organization if that's what you mean."

He didn't mention former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton, although Mrs. Clinton has tried to distance herself from the administration's foreign policy and tweeted last month that Democrats need to "deliver" on Mr. Obama's economic proposals, implying his programs haven't helped the middle class enough.

Sen. Elizabeth Warren, Massachusetts Democrat and a darling of the left, has been more vocal in her criticism of the president's economic agenda for failing to improve middle-class wages.

In his speech at Drake University, Mr. Biden criticized Democrats who would separate themselves from the administration's policies.

"It wasn't that long ago that even members of my own party were saying our economic path hadn't worked," Mr. Biden said. "And they were looking to distance themselves between what the president and I had done and the policies we put in place. I think that would be a terrible mistake."

Iowa Republican Party officials said Mr. Biden's visit served mainly to highlight that Mrs. Clinton hasn't been in the state for 104 days.

"Hillary Clinton has never had a warm relationship with Iowa voters, which might explain why she is hiding from them now," said Iowa GOP Chairman Jeff Kaufmann. "It's been months since Hillary has taken a question that wasn't vetted by her professional handlers. It's been nearly four months since she's met an actual Iowa voter. It's time for Hillary to stop hiding and start proving whether she has anything new to say since her disastrous defeat in 2008."

The vice president said the 2016 campaign will determine how the economy performs for the next decade, and will be a battle between Democrats' proposals to help the middle class versus Republicans' "top-down" plans for tax cuts to benefit mainly wealthier families.

"That's what the next presidential election is going to be about," he said. "Are we going to continue this resurgence, focus on growing the middle class, or are we going to return the policies that have failed the middle class?"

Mr. Biden gave a robust defense of the administration's $840 billion economic recovery plan of 2009, even referring to it as "stimulus," a much-mocked term that Obama officials usually avoid.

He called out Republican critics of the stimulus plan by name, including House Budget Chairman Paul Ryan of Wisconsin, House Speaker John A. Boehner of Ohio, former presidential candidate Mitt Romney and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, and others who said the recovery act wouldn't work.

"They were wrong, dead wrong," Mr. Biden said. "Now every Main Street economist agrees what we did prevented us from sliding into depression. Stimulus can and does revive the economy."

Obama's Third Term? (Slate)
By John Dickerson
February 13, 2015
Slate

Vice President Joe Biden spoke in Iowa on Thursday saying exactly what you'd expect him to say about the success of the Obama administration and how it should be carried on: "Those seeking to lead the nation should protect and defend and run, yes run, on what we've done; own what we have done. Stand for what we have done, acknowledge what we have done, and be judged on what we have done. ... Some say that would amount to a third term of the president. I call it sticking with what works and what we oughta do."

A third Obama term. The vice president isn't the only one who feels this way. This, of course, is what Republicans have been saying Hillary Clinton's presidency would be for months. Biden didn't introduce this idea, but it's one thing for Republicans to say it, it's another thing for the vice president to bolt it onto the eventual Democratic nominee.

When I heard it, I was fresh from having read David Axelrod's book Believer about his life in politics from his first political rally at age 5 to the celebration of Obama's re-election in Chicago on election night in 2012. In the book, he recounts the details of the 2008 campaign, when Obama repeatedly said he didn't want to give "John McCain the chance to serve out George Bush's third term."

This is a standard attack. Indeed, Democrats are raising money today playing on the idea that Jeb Bush is a third George W. Bush term. The big obvious difference in 2016 is that Obama is much more popular right now than George Bush was at the end of his presidency. Bush's approval rating was 28 percent in the 2008 election night exit poll. Right now Barack Obama's approval rating is 47 percent in the Gallup poll, almost 20 points higher. If the economy continues to improve, that number could climb higher still and you could imagine Hillary Clinton saying, If by third term you mean another 59 months of continuous job growth and falling unemployment, then yes I'll be a third term.

But what Axelrod's book highlights is the way in which this kind of attack presents challenges that go well beyond mere association. In the 2008 campaign, the Bush's "third term" charge was a way to highlight the contrast between the old and the new. McCain was a part of the Washington system, Obama was from outside that system. The attack created an appetite for the new, the flavor that Obama happened to be selling. Hillary Clinton may be a strong candidate, but she will never be able to pull off new.

Axelrod writes about a crucial lesson he learned from working on so many mayoral races. Voters want a "remedy, not [a] replica" in the next candidate, even when the incumbent leaving office is well-liked. He says this rule—which he learned most directly in the 1989 race for the mayor of Cleveland where Michael White, the Democrat, followed the popular incumbent Republican George Voinovich—applies to presidential campaigns, too. He wrote to Sen. Obama in 2008: "When incumbents step down, voters rarely opt for a replica of what they have, even when that outgoing leader is popular. They almost always choose change over the status quo." This is a different formulation of what President Obama was talking about recently when he said voters wanted "that new car smell." Clinton is associated with the status quo even more because she has the Obama years and the Clinton years attached to her.

Given this view, simple distinctions between Obama and Clinton on policy or positioning won't be enough to break the third-term lock. It will be very hard for Clinton to offer herself as a remedy because there is nothing that makes her so constitutionally different from Obama that voters will notice. She is probably, for example, a better deal-maker and would work harder at connecting with Republicans, but that's hardly a vast distinction that makes voter sit up. Gender is an obvious distinction, but that's not the basis for a presidential platform.

Perhaps this is one of the reasons Clinton is working so hard to come up with a message that is so unique and powerful it looks new. Amy Chozick of the New York Times reports that Clinton has consulted more than 200 experts in her effort to craft an economic message. She's not just trying to come up with a policy that creates distance, but one that achieves escape velocity.

Were Clinton actually campaigning right now, she'd probably have had to spend the day answering questions about where she stands relative to President Obama. Is she a third term or not? Perhaps she would ace that test, but this charge is also a trap to make Clinton bungle into the most damaging caricature of her—that she is excessively political. If the public doesn't think there's any big difference between what she's offering and what President Obama would offer in a third term, Clinton's efforts will look like Third Term Monte, a sleight of hand confidence game.

With Phil Gramm dominating the news, here's an old clip with some new meaning.
McCain, "I want you to judge me by the company that I keep …"
JOHN MCCAIN: "I do want you to judge me by the company that I keep... I do want you to judge me by the company that I keep... Every homeowner in this state and across the gulf region that are threatened by hurricanes we will work together and get the insurance that you need so that you will be able not to risk everything you worked for in your life."

In "womens event" McCain misrepresents himself, record on equal Pay

JOHN MCCAIN: "We haven't done enough. We have not done enough. And I'm committed to making sure that there's equal pay for equal work. That there is equal opportunity in every aspect of our society. And that is my record and you can count on it."

McCain to woman in wheelchair: Program to support disabled Americans is not the "right kind of legislation"
QUESTIONER (in wheelchair): "Senator McCain, [...] my friends and I—we are members of a group called ADAPT. We were in Washington in April. And 40 people with disabilities were arrested. We came to your office to ask you to support our national legislation, the Community Choice Act. What that would do is it would end the institutional bias and allow people with disabilities to choose where we would live and would receive services. [...] We come from all over the country [...] Will you sign on to support the Community Choice Act?

JOHN MCCAIN: "I will not because I don't think that it's the right kind of legislation. [...] The Community Choice Act is not a piece of the legislation that I support [...]"

McCain on Social Security: "It's an absolute disgrace."

QUESTIONER: "[...] Many of the proposals that are being created for people of my generation no longer include Social Security because of the belief it will not be there. Tell me how you plan to fix it."

JOHN MCCAIN: "Thank you very much. I'd like to start out by giving you a little straight talk. Under the present setup, because we've mortgaged our children's futures, you will not have Social Security benefits that present-day retirees have unless we fix it. And Americans have got to understand that. Americans have got to understand that we are paying present-day retirees with the taxes paid by young workers in America today. And that's a disgrace. It's an absolute disgrace, and it's gotta be fixed."

MCCAIN: "Now how do you fix it? [...] You fix it by reaching across the aisle and you say to the Democrats: sit down with me at the table. Sit down with me the way Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neill did the last time that Social Security was in deep trouble. And that was way back in 1983. Ronald Reagan, conservative President from California, and Tip O'Neil, the liberal Democrat from Massachusetts, sat down together and they walked out of the White House together and they say, we're gonna fix Social Security. And they did for about 20, 30 years. Right, Hank? Hank and I were part of the Congress at the time. And we were proud. We were proud to see the kind of bipartisanship that was exhibited for future generations.

MCCAIN: "Well now it's broken again. [...] Nothing is forever in American. I want to promise you, that I'll say to the Democrats and I'll say to the American people, here's a chart, here's a chart, here's how much is coming in, here's how much is going out, and here's where there's more money going out than coming in, and here's where there's no money left. Now are we going to hand it off to your generation to fix it, or are we gonna do the hard things? I wanna be President to do the hard things. [...] It's gonna change and it's got to change. And I will change it."

McCain gets into tense exchange with Vietnam Vet; falsely claims he has a perfect voting record from "all … veterans service organizations"
JOHN MCCAIN: "I see a person with a funny hat on that says Vietnam Veterans, so I'd love to recognize you first, sir."
[...]
QUESTIONER: "Senator, veterans and all Americans admire your service [...] but we know that you voted against—well, actually you didn't vote on the GI bill and you spoke out against it. We understand you have a difference on that but we [...] haven't heard an explanation of why you voted against your colleagues' proposals to increase health care funding in 2004, [2005], [2006] and [2007] when we had troops coming back from two wars."

MCCAIN: "[...] I have great respect for Sen. Webb and I appreciate his efforts. [...] The problem that some of us had [...] was that there were studies that showed that we didn't have incentives for people to become career military people. [...]"

MCCAIN: "With that all I can say is, I don't know what you're pointing to but I've received every award from every major veterans' organization in America—I've received every organization in America their awards—but sir I don't know what you're referring to [...] But the reason why I have a perfect voting record from organizations like the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Legion and all the other veterans service organizations is because of my support of them. But you can go ahead and respond if you want to. Go ahead."

QUESTIONER: "You do not have a perfect voting record by the DAB and the VFW; that's where these votes are recorded. And the votes were proposals [...] by your colleagues in the Senate to increase health care funding of the VA in 2003, [2004], [2005] and [2006] for troops returning from Iraq and Afghanistan. And you voted against those proposals. I can give specific Senate votes, the numbers of those Senate votes right now."

McCain on FISA: Telecommunications companies "should not be held responsible in the way that they're to be sued"
JOHN MCCAIN: "On FISA, I believe it's very dangerous [...] to hold the telecommunications corporations liable for them acting in cooperation with the govnernment after 9/11 to help us monitor the communications of Al-Qaeda and terrorists. [...] I believe the telecommunications company, or any other organization, when called upon by their government, to do something that is in the national security interest, that they should not be held responsible in the way that [...] they're to be sued."

MCCAIN: "[...] Now it's my view that we should have the ability, with certain court procedures observed, to monitor the communications—particularly with the dramatic modernization and ability of communicate [sic] between organizations that want to do America harm. And so, I'm glad you're recording this because I'd like to make sure you show it to all your friends. Have no doubt where I stand: that the telecommunications companies should not be held liable for cooperation they provided the government of the United States after 9/11, when we were trying to stop further attacks on the United States of America. And to say that you want them to be held liable is something in my view that would be a trial lawyer's dream. And I strongly oppose it. Sen. Obama supports it. That's the difference in our views."

McCain on education: Thankful we had "the money to send … our kids to Catholic school"
QUESTIONER: "I've been a teacher for about 31 years. What is your feeling about No Child Left Behind?"

JOHN MCCAIN: "Thank you. By the way, did I mention that Cindy was a teacher of special education before I took her out of that honest line of work?

MCCAIN: "[...] I think No Child Left Behind needs to be fixed. However, I think it was a right beginning. I think we need to be able to judge [...] students' performance all over America. [...] But now [...] we need to go back and sit down together again Republican and Democrat and fix what needs to be fixed.

MCCAIN: "And [...] some of what needs to be fixed is more full funding for some of the programs that were never adequately funded, as you know. Including special education. Including this terrible problem that you're very aware of in this rise in autism amongst children in America. It's a terrible thing that's happening. And it's going to require additional educational capabilities.

MCCAIN: "So I want to fix it but I also have to give you a little more straight talk. I'm for choice and competition. Now Cindy and I had the money to send—the ability to send our kids to Catholic school. I want every American to be able to send their child to the school of their choice.

MCCAIN: "[...] Charter schools work. Charter schools are good competition. Some of them don't work. Some of them don't work, so they should fail. But if you look at New York City today and if you look at New Orleans [...] New York City's education has improved rather dramatically. And also, New Orleans because they had to start from Square One because of the tragedy of Katrina; they know have 30 charter schools there. And the quality of education is improving.

MCCAIN: "Learn the lessons of No Child Left Behind. Fix the problem. Reward good teachers. Find bad teachers another line of work. Fix education, which is the future of America."

McCain tells woman who's parents died of cancer "Nuclear power is safe... a vital part of our nation's energy future"
JOHN MCCAIN: "I did see a person over here with a 'no nukes' sign so maybe we can't start with you. Because obviously you know I am a supporter of nuclear power. [...]"

QUESTIONER: "[...] I live here in Portsmouth. And my father also worked in the Piketon plant and he also died young of cancer. He had 4 cancers. My mother died of cancer as well. And I feel strongly about getting the Piketon plant cleaned up and bringing alternative energy industry into Portsmouth [...] We've done this for 50 years. We deserve better. We don't want our young people to continue to have to work in a highly toxic industry. And I believe that a lot of people here probably feel the same way and are afraid to say anything. Because I know the outcome in my personal life has been very detrimental to me in fighting this nuclear industry."

MCCAIN: "I know I speak on behalf of all of us [...] and extend our sympathy at the loss of your parents. There's no way that I can provide proper consolation except to say to you that I believe that nuclear power is and can be safe. [...] We have sailed Navy ships around the world for more than 60 years with nuclear power plants on them. There has never been any recorded case that I know of that someone was either injured or killed or had any effects of, of those nuclear power plants. I know that there's been Three Mile Island. And we know about Chernoble. But I do believe that nuclear power is safe. [...] But the evidence that I have that I'd like to share with you, is that nuclear power is safe. And it is, I think, a vital part of our nation's energy future[...]

QUESTIONER: "One of the things that I've been striving for is to make sure that workers that go into the Piketon site are protected, and I haven't been able to get that affirmation from the NRC or the EPA or any of the DOE or any of the groups that are in charge of that cleanup and that site. And I think that's one of the things that many people are concerned about here.

MCCAIN: "Well I will (1) try to get that information from you, (2) myself try to contact the nuclear regulatory [...] commission and any other oversight organization and get the information [...] I promise you I will learn, and I will read the information that you send me, and I will act on it as I think would be appropriate."

McCain gives crying woman losing her job "some straight talk," doubts he'll be able to help keep her job
QUESTIONER: "[...] I'm the founder of a small, non-profit hospice in Wilmington, Ohio. [...] I'm sure you are aware that DHL is closing that airpark in Wilmington. We will lose 8,600 jobs. [starts to cry] Will you call for Senate hearings to investigate the DHL-UPS joint venture, which could be an antitrust issue? [...] We're just small people trying to live a life. And I want to be able to keep our nonprofits alive. Thank you."

JOHN MCCAIN: "I have been briefed, and I know about this situation. [...] This is a terrible blow. Um, if there's an anitrust implication that's associated with this, I certainly would seek a thorough investigation [...] We are in a period of transition to a global economy. That is of no consolation to anyone who is losing their job. [...] But we have to offer them an opportunity to get the education and re-training programs so they can re-enter the job market.

MCCAIN: "[...] I've got to look you in the eye and give you some straight talk; I don't know if I can stop it or not. Or if it will be stopped it. [...] In fact, some more straight talk: I doubt it. Ok? But I am for a thorough examination of this situation. [...]

MCCAIN: "In the meantime, there are manufacturing jobs that have been lost all over the state of Ohio, and it's been a terrible trauma and we have got to give people another opportunity. And you do that by going to the community colleges and saying: design education and training programs that are designed for the local job market and implement those programs. The private programs today do not work. They are total failures.

MCCAIN: "[...] But I also want to make a commitment [...] if someone has a high-paying job, particularly an older worker, and that worker has to take a low-paying job just to survive [...] that we would subsidize, with some of this job training money that's being wasted, that worker's salary [...] while they're undergoing their re-training and education programs.

MCCAIN: "[...] I believe in free trade; I believe that it's important to the economy."

McCain Predicts War With Iran, Calls 16-Year-Old Boy "Attractive"
QUESTIONER: "Senator McCain, how can world leaders take the President of Iran seriously with his outrageous claims to wipe Israel off the face of the earth? And, as a follow-up question, would you consider a 16-year-old running mate?"

JOHN MCCAIN: "If that individual happens to be as attractive and articulate as you are, I certainly would—consider it. Thank you.

MCCAIN: "Um, I'm worried that the President of Iran, Ahmadinejad's comments are not just crazy talk. [...] We all know that they just tested uh, uh a missile. Uh, which,by the way, was done by the Iranian Revolutionary Guard. Which is a terrorist organization that supports terrorists and in my view-- We had a vote on the floor of the Senate to label the same organization as a terrorist organization.

MCCAIN: "[...] If there is a outbreak of conflict [...] with Iran and Israel, or because of Iran's continued aggressive behavior-- [...] If there's an outbreak of conflict, then I worry very much that the United States will be drawn into it. [...] And I worry about brave young Americans who are serving in the military today."

MCCAIN: "[...] By the way, if there's anyone concerned about the fact that we don't have communications with Iran, we have plenty of communications with them."

Cabinet Authorizes Measures against Jewish Terror

In wake of Jewish terrorist attack in Duma, gov't authorizes use of administrative detentions, while Justice Ministry team recommends changing classification of 'price tag' perpetrators to 'terrorists'. The Security Cabinet decided Sunday to adopt recommendations providing law enforcement agencies with new tools to combat Jewish terrorism. "The Cabinet views the arson and murder in Duma as act of terror in every aspect, and has called on all the relevant authorities to use all necessary measures in order to bring the perpetrators to justice, and prevent similar incidents," a statement issued after the cabinet meeting said.

Hundreds Hold Vigils for Victim of Pride Parade Attack

Hundreds of people turned out at Jerusalem's Zion Square Sunday night to attend a memorial vigil in honor of Shira Banki, who succumbed earlier in the day to wounds sustained in a stabbing attack at Jerusalem's Gay Pride Parade last week. Ceremonies were also held for Banki at Tel Aviv's Meir Park and in Beersheba. In Jerusalem, "Shira's Song," written for the 16-year-old victim of the attack, was played at the request of her family. "Who would believe that on Jerusalem's streets, an innocent young girl, talented, which such good values and love would be killed in cold blood for nothing. Murder that's nothing but hate," said Sara Kala, head of the Jerusalem Open House for Pride.

Rabbis, Palestinian Activists Unite against Violence

In the sweltering heat of Sunday afternoon and the bitter atmosphere of recent days, some 150 people gathered in the Etzion settlement bloc to condemn the slaying of Ali Dawabsha. The event, staged at the Gush Etzion junction, was designed as a prayer vigil and a show of solidarity against violence, initiated by Shorashim, a joint Israeli-Palestinian coexistence organization based in the area. The crowd was comprised entirely of Israelis, including many residents of the settlements in the area. Those who spoke included several notable rabbis, Yesh Atid chairman Yair Lapid, and two Palestinian peace activists and local residents, Sheikh Ibrahim Abu El-Hawa and Ziad Sabateen.

Rivlin to File Police Complaint After Threatened

The President's Office is to file a police complaint over threats made against President Reuven Rivlin, following his condemnation of the arson attack last week. Rivlin harshly condemned the perpetrators of the attack, who are suspected to be Jewish extremists. Rivlin also spoke out against the public atmosphere of incitement that bred the incidents. "Flames have engulfed our country," Rivlin said at a demonstration in Jerusalem's Zion Square Saturday night over the stabbing at the Gay Pride Parade in the capital. "Flames of violence, flames which permit bloodshed in the name of the Torah, in the name of the law, in the name of morality, in the name of a love for the land of Israel."

Benki Family: We Wish for More Tolerance

The family of Shira Benki, the 16-year-old girl who succumbed to her wounds today after being stabbed by a religious fundamentalist during the Gay Pride Parade in Jerusalem, issued a statement where they related to the circumstances that caused their daughter's death: "It was without any purpose and because of malice as well as negligence that the life of the wonderful flower of our life was cut short." "Our wonderful Shira was murdered only because of the fact that she was a happy 16-year-old, full of love and life that respected that each person can live according to their own ways," the family stated. "The family wishes for less hatred and more tolerance."

Tibi: Anger and Rage, Could be before an Explosion

Palestinians feel their lives are worthless and that tensions may be on the verge of exploding, Ta'al chairman Ahmad Tibi told The Jerusalem Post on Sunday. Tibi, who was at the Aksa mosque on the Temple Mount on Sunday morning, said all of the gates were closed, but that some Jewish groups were allowed to enter, which served as an "unnecessary provocation." "This is adding fuel to the fire," he said, saying al-Aksa is "a most sensitive place." "There is great anger and rage," he said. "This could be the moment right before an explosion." The fact that the attack occurred in the middle of the village meant that it was "well planned," Tibi said, expressing concern that this would not be the last attack. "We will probably see more of these criminals breaking the law," he said.

Khamenei Publishes Book on How to Destroy Israel

Iran's Supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei has published a book on how to destroy Israel and outsmart the U.S., arguing that his position is based on "well-established Islamic principles," The New York Post reported Saturday. The 416-page book, entitled "Palestine," reportedly reached The Post through a source Iran - the only place the book is said to be currently available in. The report has yet to be confirmed independently and was written by Amir Taheri – an Iranian expat whose reports have been mired in controversy amid claims of fabrications. The book's blurb reportedly bills it as "The flagbearer of Jihad to liberate Jerusalem."

Democrats see 'Fire Wall' Holding to Preserve Deal

U.S. backers of the Iran nuclear deal are increasingly confident of enough Democratic support to ensure it survives review by Congress, despite fierce opposition by majority Republicans and a massive lobbying drive. By the time the House of Representatives recessed for the summer last week, no senior Democrat in the chamber had come out formally against the agreement and several central figures, including Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, were strongly in favor. Pelosi said she was confident that if, as expected, Republicans pass a "resolution of disapproval" to try to sink the deal, a promised veto of that measure by President Barack Obama would be sustained. "More and more of them (House Democrats) have confirmed to me that they will be there to sustain the veto," Pelosi told reporters.

AIPAC Chooses Sides: It Picks Bibi over its Own Supporters, US Jews

By Uri Savir

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is now at his best. He thrives when he runs political campaigns; he is the master of using scare tactics to elicit public support. His current campaign is geared toward members of the US Congress and Israeli public opinion. He is determined to fight US President Barack Obama on his own political turf, siding with the Republicans, and to be perceived in Israel as the ultimate "defender of the Jewish people." To him, this is about history, or rather about history books.

Netanyahu has engaged the most effective lobby in Congress — the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) — to pressure all members of Congress, especially the 13 Democratic senators needed to override the eventual veto that Obama will use on a negative congressional vote.

The focus in the "nay" camp is on the struggle, not its consequences. Given that Obama has placed his credibility and legacy on the line, with the support of presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican-Netanyahu-AIPAC battle is virtually a hopeless cause.

A senior member of AIPAC's political leadership told Al-Monitor on condition of anonymity, "We have decided to go all out on the issue, despite this being a partisan cause. We cannot stand by when the prime minister of Israel makes defeating the Iran deal his cause celebre. This is the first time in AIPAC's history that the lobby challenges a US president on such an issue; an issue where the president's political credibility is on the line. Secretly, some of us pray not to succeed in this battle."

Indeed, AIPAC has galvanized all its troops, urgently calling its constituents to appeal to their respective congressmen, demanding them to oppose the Iran deal. For this purpose, AIPAC followers were offered long and argumentative fact sheets on the alleged flaws of the agreement. These sheets look very much like the talking points of the Republicans in Congress. Tens of millions of dollars have been allocated, and many of the influential AIPAC funders have been called to convince key senators.

It seems that all sides are focused on a fierce political battle. At the same time, apparently not many of those who oppose the agreement for legitimate or political reasons are actually considering the consequences of a Republican-Netanyahu-AIPAC win.

If the deal is defeated, the agreement will still stand with regard to the European, Russian and Chinese decision to gradually remove the sanctions. Their business representatives are already exploring possible deals with Tehran. In the eyes of the world, Iran will be depicted as the more moderate party, while Israel will be perceived as an obstacle to global peace. At the same time, the Iranians might feel less compelled to stick to their side of the bargain (considering that the Europeans seem to be easier to fool). Thus, they might continue secretly to develop nuclear weapons. If this happens, the United States would lose its leading position in the world for a long time to come.

As aforementioned, this Israeli move initiated by Netanyahu and spearheaded by Ron Dermer, the Israeli ambassador to the United States, is conducted in full coordination with AIPAC and the heads of the Republican Party in Congress. But within it lie many dangers both to Israel and to the American Jewish community.

Even before the congressional debate got started, Netanyahu's campaign has already provoked unprecedented and, for the foreseeable future, irreversible damage to US-Israel relations. It has seriously harmed Israel's influence mostly within the Democratic Party and its voters.

On the international level, as Netanyahu continues his campaign, Israel's power of deterrence will increasingly suffer. The image of its alliance with the Unites States will erode in the eyes of the Arab world and others. This move also hastens Israel's isolation. US Secretary of State John Kerry already warned July 24 on NBC that, should the agreement be rejected, Israel would be blamed. This is tantamount to accusing Israeli policies of potentially endangering world peace. A field day for the Iranians.

As for the American Jewish community, Netanyahu's call to arms, with AIPAC marching to his beat, places American Jews in direct confrontation with their president. AIPAC's right-wing position on Iran contradicts the majority opinion of American Jews. According to a survey conducted by the Los Angeles Jewish Journal on July 22, 49% of American Jews support the deal, while only 31% oppose it. Yet, AIPAC's high-profile anti-Iran deal campaign, coupled with aggressive activities of some other Jewish organizations, depicts the entire American Jewish community as "objectionist."

By turning the Iran issue into a political battle against Obama, Netanyahu has pushed American Jewry into a corner: They must allegedly choose between an allegiance to their president and loyalty to the Israeli prime minister. The sensitive question of dual loyalty by American Jews may surface again, to the detriment of the community. This is not only Netanyahu's fault, but also the making of American Jewish community leaders, such as the AIPAC chief and leaders of the US Jewry umbrella body — the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. The executive vice chairman of the latter, Malcolm Hoenlein, bitterly criticized Obama's policies and the Iran agreement in a radio interview on July 19. These leaders seem to align their concerns with those of the Israeli government before addressing the concerns of their Jewish constituency. Together with Netanyahu, they place Israel and America Jewry on a collision course with Israel's No. 1 ally.

It Takes Courage to Deal with Jewish Terrorists

Israel must turn every stone, catch the people who burned Palestinian baby Ali Dawabsheh alive, prosecute them and destroy their homes. Unless our side makes a real move after they are caught, there will be fire.

By Smadar Perry

It takes courage to catch them and give them the punishment they deserve. The people who burned Palestinian baby Ali Dawabsheh to death, scorched his four-year-old brother Ahmad and his parents Saad and Reham, who are fighting for their lives, have to pay. It's a test for all of us.

Anyone who has any doubts should look for the chilling testimony of Ibrahim Dawabsheh, the neighbor from the adjacent house in the village of Duma. At 2 am he was busy talking to his fiancée on the phone, when he heard the yelling. He managed to see two masked people standing above their victims to confirm their deaths. The masked people tried to chase Ibrahim. Had he not escaped, he would have suffered a similar fate.

This time there must be no cover up. We must turn every stone, catch them, prosecute them and destroy their homes. Without a brave decision, once and for all, this affair will not calm down. There is no excuse in the world to justify the horror at the village of Duma.

So far, everything has been going according to routine: Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon condemned the attack, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu telephoned Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, and the security organizations are working on the need to curb the other side's revenge, to convince that "they" are not "us."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Abbas is threatening to approach international institutions, while we are afraid of a third intifada. In the state of Tel Aviv I hear from young people that they are hopeless over what is happening here. In the state of the settlers, people are waiting to see what the Shin Bet will do. It's not a simple situation. The pictures of 18-month-old Dawabsheh are circulating around the world. Unless our side makes a real move after the arsonists are caught, there will be fire.

Let's not forget: We are the ones who invented the punishment of destroying terrorists' homes. A Palestinian man or woman who launch an attack against Israelis take into account that the punishment will arrive, that their family will pay. Granted, rabbis will cry out and right-wing Knesset members will search for excuses, launch a "din rodef" (law of the pursuer," permitting extrajudicial killings) against the legal system and the security organizations. And despite political pettiness, the person who telephoned Abbas on Friday night and ran to the hospital – and I believe that Netanyahu really is shocked – must take one step further and show that Israel knows how to deal with brave decisions.

All kinds of self-righteous people in Israel wrote on social media that we must not make generalizations, that we must remember that Palestinian terrorists have murdered Israeli babies and children in cold blood. I have the pictures of Jewish baby Shalhevet Pass and the children of the Fogel family fixed before my eyes. I haven't forgotten. There is no forgiveness. I hope we are better than the other side. We carried a heavy baggage on our way to establish a state. We will never forget the revenge for the blood of a little child which has yet been devised by Satan.

In October 1985, Egyptian soldier Suleiman Khater murdered a group of Israeli tourists in Ras Burqa. When he was caught, the Egyptians rushed to declare him "insane" and sentenced him to life in prison. His imprisonment burdened the government, and one day he was found hanging in his cell.

In 1997, Jordanian soldier Ahmed Daqamseh murdered a group of Israeli high school girls who were on a trip in Naharayim. Jordan's King Hussein cut short his visit to Spain and rushed to the mourners' homes in Beit Shemesh, got down on his knees and asked for forgiveness. The opponents of peace are still, to this very day, calling for the murderer's release. He was also declared "insane."

I find it hard to believe that the arsonists of the Dawabsheh family's home will not be found. One doesn’t have to be a big Shin Bet expert to find out who didn't come home or who left the yeshiva over the weekend. The group of delusionists is already dreaming of kissing the hands contaminated with blood. Courage, decision makers. Give them what they deserve.

Right, but if we wanted to have a reporter cover the Israel support now, a leak of the letter could probably get written.

Otherwise, we can work around the Israel support for reporters covering Iran.

Hillary Clinton to Jewish donors: I'll be better for Israel than Obama

But the former secretary of state is sending mixed signals on the president's Iran deal.

By Kenneth P. Vogel and Tarini Parti
7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT
Updated 7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT

Hillary Clinton is privately signaling to wealthy Jewish donors that — no matter the result of the Iranian nuclear negotiations — she will be a better friend to Israel than President Barack Obama.

But, even as donors increasingly push Clinton on the subject in private, they have emerged with sometimes widely varying interpretations about whether she would support a prospective deal, according to interviews with more than 10 influential donors and fundraising operatives.

Clinton's private responses in some ways resemble a foreign policy Rorschach test; donors who see a deal as important to world peace have come away thinking that Clinton shares their perspective, but so, too, do donors who oppose any prospective agreement as compromising Israeli security.

Publicly, she's expressed support for the negotiating process, which she secretly initiated during her time as secretary of state, but has also said "no deal is better than a bad deal."

With the talks heading into the home stretch in Vienna, the issue is emerging as an early test for Clinton's presidential campaign. She's already struggling to balance two of her biggest strengths as a candidate — her deep foreign policy track record and her vaunted fundraising ability — and that balance could become even trickier if there's a deal.

"Whatever way you go, there will be some people who won't like it," said Sarah Kovner, a prominent New York donor who is a leading bundler for Clinton's campaign and worked in Bill Clinton's presidential administration. "You can't have everybody with you. You've got to do what you think is right for the country."

The negotiations are of intense interest for some Jewish donors whose political giving is animated by their support for Israel. They're being counted on by Clinton's allies to donate huge sums for a campaign and a pair of supportive super PACs that, taken together, are expected to raise $2 billion or more.

Clinton's campaign rejected any suggestion that she's trying to have it both ways on Iran.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Her support for the negotiating process and touting support for Israel are not contradictory," said Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill. "A strong deal is good for Israel in her view."

And several people who've heard her address the issue say the fact that different people can come away with such different interpretations is a testament to her nuanced approach to the issue and her skill as a politician, rather than any vacillation on the subject.

"That's just smart politics," said one donor who supports the negotiations and recently talked to her about them. "Because, right now, you have the freedom to say all those things, so why would you commit and box yourself in until you saw what the deal was? "

Clinton recently told another pro-deal donor that she was "very supportive of the negotiating process," the donor recalled, while a third funder said she boasted of her role in starting the talks. "So it seemed like she was supporting it," recalled the funder.

And, at a Manhattan fundraiser last week featuring a largely Jewish group of donors, Clinton defended Obama against charges he had weakened the U.S.-Israel relationship, asserting that such criticism stemmed from a "perception" problem, according to a donor who was present. But she also suggested that if she were elected president she could correct that problem and bring the two nations closer.

"Diplomacy is all about personal relationships, and I've got my own relationships," she said, referencing her two-decade association with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, an ardent opponent of the Iran deal and, occasionally, of Obama. Clinton even cited her rapport with former Israeli ambassador to the U.S. Michael Oren, who last week published a book that was brutally critical of the Obama administration and was timed for release to try to stymie the Iran deal . "I know Michael well, but I haven't read the book," she said.

At a fundraiser last month at the Long Island home of Democratic donor Jay Jacobs, Clinton was asked by an Orthodox rabbi about threats to Israel's security. "She did stress in no uncertain terms her full and fervent support of the state of Israel and the defense of the state of Israel," recalled Jacobs. "And the people in the audience who heard it seemed to be comfortable with her answer."

Likewise, donors at a different New York fundraiser seemed to fully accept her answer to a slightly different question about the U.S. interest in the deal, said billionaire hedge fund manager Marc Lasry, a leading Clinton donor. "She said 'I'm going to do what's in the best interest of the U.S.,' and that was the end of it," Lasry said.

Dan Berger, a Philadelphia lawyer and major Democratic donor who supports the framework of a deal, cautioned that the interests of the U.S. and Israel, "although close, are not identical. It might not be in the best interest of American Jews, but it's got to be in the best interest of the majority of the people." He urged Jewish donors "to take a step back and look at the complexity and judge the agreement based on its merits," adding: "I'd hope Hillary would judge it based on its merits and not on political support."

Lasry rejected the suggestion that Clinton would even consider the fundraising implications when assessing any deal.

But Clinton's senior foreign policy advisers have briefed interested wealthy donors on both the negotiations over the deal and its prospects for congressional approval, according to one donor who recently talked to a top Clinton aide.

"It's a tricky issue for her," said the donor who was briefed, arguing that Jewish donors who oppose a deal and favor military intervention in Iran "are going to put her in a box."

Clinton's allies are carefully monitoring the sensitivities of a handful of hawkish Democratic mega-donors for signs that the Iran talks may be influencing their willingness to write million-dollar super PAC checks. Chief among that group is billionaire Hollywood entrepreneur Haim Saban, who sources say has spoken multiple times with Clinton and her top aides about the deal.

In April, he strongly suggested that Clinton opposed the deal. "I know where she stands, but I can't talk about it," Saban told an Israeli television news channel, adding under questioning, "She has an opinion, a very well-defined opinion. And in any case, everything that she thinks and everything she has done and will do will always be for the good of Israel. We don't need to worry about this."

He soon backtracked, saying "I have no idea what Hillary thinks about the Iran deal."

And multiple prominent Jewish donors who joined Saban at a White House meeting with Obama in April to discuss the Iran negotiations said Saban expressed open-mindedness about supporting the deal, though one participant suggested his opinion shouldn't hold as much weight as those of foreign policy professionals.

"Haim Saban is a very smart businessman who has a tremendous amount of love for the Clintons, but I don't think he is the most sophisticated policy analyst that there is," said the donor.

Saban's representatives did not respond to questions about his interactions with Clinton.

But on Thursday, POLITICO reported that he donated $2 million this year to a super PAC supporting her presidential campaign, which Democratic finance sources interpreted as a sign that Saban's financial support will not be conditioned on Clinton taking a certain stance on the Iran deal.

Steve Rabinowitz, a Democratic consultant who worked in the Clinton White House and was a co-founder of Jewish Americans Ready for Hillary, argued that the Iran deal isn't going to be a deciding issue for either donors or voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Do people in my community talk about the Iran deal? Sure. But is it affecting their support for Hillary Clinton? No," he said. "Iran certainly will — and already has — become a talking point, but it will not move three votes or $3."

Clinton has the potential to bring along donors like Saban who might have been skeptical of negotiating with Iran, argued the Long Island donor Jacobs. "Hillary has a lot of credibility and support in the Jewish community. It's broad and deep. People understand that she has fought and has been there as an advocate," he said. "So when she speaks on the issue, there will be more people in the Jewish community who have perhaps unfairly not appreciated President Obama's support who will at least give her view a more open-minded assessment."

If Clinton backs any eventual deal, its proponents will be under pressure to step up their giving — both to the Clinton super PACs and to pro-deal groups — because she is likely to come under heavy fire from deep-pocketed groups that oppose the deal.

"If there's a deal, and she comes out in favor of it, you can be sure there will be a great deal of fire trained on her," said Noah Pollak, the executive director of the Emergency Committee for Israel. The conservative group has worked to rally opposition to the talks and this week began airing an ad pressuring New York Democratic Sen. Chuck Schumer, who is considered a key vote on the deal, to oppose it.

The left-leaning Israel advocacy group J Street, which has worked to build support for the deal, is expected to come to the defense of supporters, including potentially Clinton, though on some issues, the group's members regard her as too hawkish for their tastes.

"For people who speak on these Middle East issues on which we have strong positions, we come to their support and defense on those issues, regardless of party, regardless of candidacy," said Victor A Kovner, a Democratic donor who chairs J Street's PAC.

Kovner, like his wife, Sarah Kovner, is backing Clinton, and said he has communicated his support for a deal to the candidate.

"She is familiar with my view, but she has a lot of supporters and advisers on both sides of this question — around the nation, both within the Jewish community and beyond the Jewish community."

called Bashar Al-Assad a reformer, or why a “gimmicky” red button would reign in Vladimir Putin, why she declared victory in Iraq for 2011, and what really happened in Benghazi.

MSNBC's Morning Joe: Panel discussion about HRC and her CNN interview. Said there was a tonal problem and she comes across as not wanting to be asked these tough questions, which was more of a problem than the substance (the accuracy or inaccuracy of her answers). They said she needs to have a manner with the press that when you're asked the questions that doesn't across as so defensive or so irritated by the fact that you're being asked tough questions. Back to HRC’s CNN interview. Panelist Harold Ford agreed that HRC was being attacked by Republicans but there was balance. Noted HRC has several polls now that suggest she has a problem with trust. Richard Hass said her line that everything she did was permitted by law or regulation sounded like an accountant. He said it’s hard to watch and not be struck by the irony that she deleted the emails so no one would talk about them. She’s on the defense rather than the offense of personal questions. Joe Scarborough asked isn't it true the Obama administration themselves said what she did was not in fact permitted by their guidelines and regulations? Jonathan Capehart said he’s never been clear on the State Department law and what law HRC supposedly broke and said HRC was the only former Sec of State who sent in her documentation. Willie Geist read the regulation out loud. Joe Scarborough says HRC said any emails she sent to the State Department are saved but what about emails sent to Sidney Blumenthal, etc. those weren’t saved. Said HRC turned over what she wanted to turn over and destroyed the rest and isn’t anywhere near adhering to the regulations. Joe kept repeating that she didn’t have good answers and doesn’t tell the truth. He said her campaign needs to figure out a smart way to get it behind her so she can start talking about the issues. Noted HRC is still beating every Republican head-to-head in every battleground state and the purpose is to win the presidency so if she does, then she prevailed. Said HRC did not tell the truth about is saying that people trust her. Pointed out that every job she’s had she’s earned their trust because of her performance. The panel said this issue does not have an impact with voters that it may have with some of the panel. Joe Scarborough said the specifics don’t matter to the voters but the slipperiness does stick and that’s why Sanders who goes out and tells it like it is does. she doesn't look totally comfortable answering the questions. she doesn't look as if she wants to be on the stage answering the questions. but that's separate from whether or not this exercise she’s engaged in which is to win the presidency, Americans aren’t going to prevent her from reaching the White House. Joe Scarborough just wants the Clintons to come out and say “I screwed up” without the press having to drag it out of them. Willie Geist says she believes in her heart that she didn’t do anything wrong. On HRC, Chuck Todd said on the email questions, she was more forthcoming and showed remorse in the press conference and she was extra defiant on the issue. She was amazingly prepared on Trump and immigration and Jeb Bush. Scott Wallker is going to announce an RV tour through Iowa which is a big contrast to HRC’s Scooby Van.

Subject: Helping with the Campaign

John,

It was good to talk to you this afternoon, and I appreciate your taking the time to call. As I mentioned, I would like to do all I can to support Secretary Clinton, and would welcome your advice and help in steering me to the right persons in the campaign.

Below is a summary of the issues I have been working on since I left State nearly 18 months ago, and suggestions for a couple of areas where I could perhaps be of use.

ISSUES

Since coming back from Washington, I have focused my public policy work on the following three issues:

(a) Foreign Policy: My professional career has mostly involved the emerging markets, and while in DC most of my work had to do with Latin America, MENA and Africa. Since coming back I have written and spoken at many conferences involving foreign policy, with an emphasis on the intersection of business and development. For example, I published an article in Foreign Affairs on the global infrastructure boom and why it is important for strategic reasons that US companies become more active in helping countries build roads, energy plants, water systems, etc. The article was well received and think tanks such as CSIS had me speak on the subject. Foreign Affairs recently published another of my articles, this time on the Cuba opening. Americas Quarterly, the publication of the Council of the Americas, ran a long piece that suggested an approach to Latin America based on economic development, poverty reduction and social inclusion. I was also invited by the State Department to speak on Middle East issues, and was the keynote speaker on the Arab Spring at the NUSACC annual forum. In the next couple of weeks I will be the keynote speaker at a US-Spain business forum in Madrid, and at the inauguration of the UC San Diego School of Public Policy and Strategy, and in both cases will speak on business and foreign policy topics. I am also on the board of directors of Iberdrola SA, a Spanish utility which is the largest electricity provider in the Northeastern United States, and the largest renewable energy company in the world (2nd largest in the US), so I can talk energy security.

(b) Immigration. I have worked and spoken on this issue since before the Obama Administration and have continued to do since coming back from DC, both at conferences and in the media. The point I try to make is that all sides recognize that any solution must include a combination of border security and a path to regularization, but that the political noise is keeping us from reaching a common-sense compromise. Demonizing immigrants cuts against our values. I have also pointed out that there is plenty of research from both the left and the right showing the economic benefits of immigration reform. As an immigrant myself, this issue is personal to me.

(c) Latino Voting. During the 2014 elections I was a regular guest on Spanish-language TV and radio on the subject of voting restrictions imposed by some states, and also –importantly—on the need for Latinos to vote. Using some of the materials prepared by CAP, I pointed out that while the achievements of this Administration in the areas of health care, immigration relief and job growth have benefited Latinos more than any other demographic, by voting less than just about any other group Hispanics abandon those who have fought for our rights and leave the door open for opponents who would roll back these gains. Sometimes I have summarized my point by concluding with the slogan "Vota o Calla" ("Vote or Shut Up"), which (somewhat to my surprise) often works.

MEDIA

Almost every week, I am interviewed on the above subjects on radio and TV, mostly in Spanish-language media.

(a) Radio: In Miami I appear every two weeks on the most conservative and "Cuban" of the radio stations ("La Cubanisima", owned by Univision) to speak about Latin America, most recently on the Cuba sanctions liberalization. I am told I am the only Democrat regularly featured. I have also made many appearances on another Miami station, Radio Actualidad, which is geared to non-Cuban Latinos. I have also gone on many other radio stations around the U.S., both English (including NPR) and Spanish-speaking, to talk about economics and international trade topics.

(b) Television: I am a regular guest on issues of immigration, voting rights and foreign policy on NTN24, a Colombian-owned TV station that targets both US Latinos and Latin America. Jorge Ramos has invited me to both his Sunday talk show Al Punto and in the new station Fusion, to speak about Latino voting as well as foreign policy. I have also spoken on these topics on Telemundo, Bloomberg and CNN. And starting next month, I will become a weekly commentator for TV Azteca, which is a network geared to Mexican-American communities in California and the Southwest.

I have clips for most of these appearances and can forward them to the person you suggest.

SUPPORTING THE CAMPAIGN

If the campaign feels that I can be useful, I would offer to contribute by:

(a) Formulating policy and position papers: In 2008 I helped to prepare position papers and daily responses to potential press questions for candidate Obama. This time I would again be willing to write on issues of foreign policy (with an emphasis on Latin America and MENA), economics, energy and business.

(b) Outreach to the business community: My professional career has been as a business lawyer. At the State Department one of my tasks was to advocate for US companies abroad and to encourage foreign investment in the US. I think I could be a credible interlocutor to help with Secretary Clinton's outreach to business.

(c) Surrogate Work with Latinos: My experience with the Hispanic community and appearances on Spanish and English-language media geared to Hispanics, outlined above, could help communicate the message to Latino voters and provide feedback to the campaign.

(d) Help with campaign in Florida, Southwestern US, and New Hampshire: I am familiar with the Hispanic communities that will be critical in South Florida, California and the Southwest. I also know New Hampshire well: I went to Dartmouth, served on its Board of Trustees for 8 years (then-governor Shaheen was ex officio), and helped a bit with the recent campaigns for Sen. Shaheen and Congresswoman (and classmate) Annie Kuster.

Of course, I am also prepared to help with fundraising by tapping my network, and participating in the outreach to business, lawyers, Hispanics, and other potential contributors.

John, thanks again for taking the time to speak during what must be a very hectic period. Please count on me for full support within the confines of my day job. I look forward to your suggestions on what I can do to help. In addition to the office number below, please feel free to call my cell number (917-648-4951) at any time.

All the best, Jose

Florida "boricuas" feel disenfranchised The San Juan Star
The San Juan Star reports today in a front page article that Clinton's Puerto Rican supporters in Florida are urging relatives in the Island to vote for her in the June 1 primary because they feel disenfranchised. "We are not willing to be disenfranchised. We do not want 50 percent or 75 percent, but 100 percent of the votes counted," said Jose Fernandez, head of the Orlando of the Hispanic Democratic Caucus.

Obama's Symbolic Claim El Nuevo Día
http://www.elnuevodia.com/diario/noticia/mundiales/noticias/reclamo_simbolico_de_obama/406933
El Nuevo Día reports today (World Affairs lead Story) that Barack Obama will symbolically claim the Democratic Presidential nomination after tomorrow's KY and OR primary. Obama will be in Iowa -- which to most political analysts signals that he has begun his national campaign against Republican Candidate John McCain. Regardless, Sen. Clinton promised on Sunday to improve Puerto Rico's security if elected President through a crime reduction strategy (which includes a greater number of police on the streets and a greater cooperation between the Justice Dept and certain communities in the Island. Puerto Rico's 55 delegates represent one of the last chances for her to take the lead. After OR and KY, Obama will need less than 100 votes to clinch the 2,025 mark.

Frictions rise as Primary nears El Nuevo Día
http://www.elnuevodia.com/diario/noticia/politica/noticias/crecen_las_fricciones_al_acercarse_la_primaria/406843
El Nuevo Día reports today (Politics section) that friction between the Clinton and Obama local camps started to rise yesterday on the possibility that the Democratic Presidential primary might be decided on the Island. Apart from the political attacks both sides brought up who has better proposals and more supports. The Clinton campaign struck first when Roberto Prats and Kenneth McClintock announced an increase in the number of police, in Justice Assistance grants and in drug trafficking monitoring in Puerto Rico an USVI. McClintock underlined that Obama has no specific proposals regarding crime in Puerto Rico. The Clinton campaign announced its campaign structure. Meanwhile, Eduardo Bhatia, Co-President of the Obama campaign in Puerto Rico, announced the support of Miguel Hernandez-Agosto, former Chairman of the Puerto Rico Democratic Committee.

Primera Hora reports today that Hillary Clinton will put more police officers in the streets of Puerto Rico if elected President (mentioned programs include: COPS and the Puerto Rico and USVI high-intensity drug trafficking area. Clinton quotes on day one readiness and security highlighted on page). El Vocero and the San Juan Star also pick up the Spanish language version of the AP article.

Obama's campaign support rises Primera Hora, El Vocero. The San Juan Star http://www.primerahora.com/noticia/politica/noticias/crece_el_apoyo_a_la_campana_de_obama/191506
Primera Hora reports today that Miguel Hernandez-Agosto, former Chairman of the Puerto Rico Democratic Committee, announced yesterday his support for Obama's Presidential Bid (his remarks centered on foreign policy and Puerto Rican culture). Eduardo Bhatia says that the leadership of the PPD is unequivocally with Obama. El Vocero and San Juan Star also report the endorsement.

US Primaries bring NPP and PPD rivals together The San Juan Star
The San Juan Star analysis report on the support of members of the NPP and PDP for both Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama mentioned leaders on the Clinton side: Roberto Prats, Kenneth McClintock, Jose A. Hernandez Mayoral, Ico Zayas, Mayita Melendez, Damaso Serrano and Evelyn Delerme. On the Obama side: Pedro Pierluisi, Anibal Acevedo-Vila, Eduardo Bhatia, Rafael Hernandez Colon, Juan Eugenio Hernandez Mayoral. Article closes mentioning that Fortuño supports John McCain.

This is what is going around the activist/progressive network about HRC. See my earlier email. A solid statement in opposition to the Roberts bill and in favor of "consumers' right to know" would go a long way to putting an end to this flank of Bernie's support.

I don't know if you can put much faith in Hillary's public statements about GE labeling. Back in 2008, I believe both Hillary and Barack said they supported mandatory labeling--I believe at events in Iowa, but Dave Murphy would know about that. In spite of this, no movement toward labeling. During both the Clinton and Obama administrations, I can say that the US vehemently opposed mandatory labeling and tried to block any international consensus on this topic at Codex. In the Obama administration, the US took the position that any mention of GMO on a label was inherently false and misleading because it implied a difference where there was none. Even if Hillary now said she supported labeling, that would probably be because Sanders was saying. Would I trust her to push for mandatory labeling if she became president? No. Sanders, on the other hand, has consistently supported labeling and, back in the day, was the one getting GAO to do investigations into conflicts on interest and other things vis-a-vis the rbGH debate. He clearing supported the rbGH labeling bill that passed in VT. Gov. Dean was against that bill and his AG did not properly support it, which is why it was overturned by the US Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit back in 1996.

Just my 2 cents. Would sure like to hear if anyone has evidence of Hillary recently saying she supports mandatory labeling.

because Sanders was saying. Would I trust her to push for mandatory labeling if she became president? No. Sanders, on the other hand, has consistently supported labeling and, back in the day, was the one getting GAO to do investigations into conflicts on interest and other things vis-a-vis the rbGH debate. He clearing supported the rbGH labeling bill that passed in VT. Gov. Dean was against that bill and his AG did not properly support it, which is why it was overturned by the US Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit back in 1996.

Just my 2 cents. Would sure like to hear if anyone has evidence of Hillary recently saying she supports mandatory labeling.

She gets asked at every event "what's the difference between Sanders and your mom on XYZ" or "why should we vote for your mom over Sanders" and that's where she's made contrasts previously. She will make contrasts when asked to do so, so suggesting staying in affirmative isn't going to work. That said, if there are good ones you want her to make, it'd be great to communicate that here. If there are ones we are staying away from, it'd be helpful to explain that as well (so long as the answer isn't that you don't want her to be substantive because she will be!)

Subject: guidance for Dan

I am taking the reins.

You two seem the closest in coming to consensus - so wanted to run by you what I think the definitive guidance to Dan should be for next round of edits because right now he is getting a lot of conflicting advice. And get your reax. I will go to others before giving this to Dan - but wanted to get your early reax.

GUIDANCE

1) reference to Beau Biden- maybe at beginning with discussion of POTUS, FDR, WJC etc.

2) more Dorothy

3) Embrace her belief that everyone has a role to play to contribute to the health of the economy and strength of the country. But make clear that the middle class has borne both the brunt of the Great Recession and bulk of the work to bring us back from the Great Recession and now wealthy and corporations need to step it and do their part.

4) Use John's formulation of unlocking each American's potential unlocks America's potential to build lasting, shared prosperity. (John - I know I dont have this right, please correct me). Make clear that lasting prosperity means that she is going to tackle the problems that has been holding middle class back.

5) Embrace "it's your time" as manifestation of that belief and while it does not need to be a call and response, it needs to be in the draft more.

6) Change the nurse story so it is not so self-congratulatory. In Dan's defense I would note that the nurse was added by Lissa and Jon and they used her as a way to tell the story that progress is hard and takes a long time. I think that is an Obama story, not a HRC story. So Dan was trying to HRC-ize the anecdote but agree it does not work as revised. I dont like the nurse story at all, but others do. So I guess we go back to the way Jon and Lissa had it.

7) Take out the reference to 2008 and renewing America's promise.

8) Jim did not like the "I am not going to quit now. I am going to run for POTUS" formulation bc it will be the line that gets quoted and is too much about her. This is Favreau's formulation and I LOVE it because it ties the Methodist creed to her ambitions. If her true creed is you have to do good all the time, etc....of course she has to keep going and run for POTUS. So perhaps we can edit this to address Jim's concern, but I would not want to lose the concept all together because I think it is the best, most altruistic explanation I have heard for her running.

9) More humor, first woman, ass kicker and coloring her hair.

Dear Professor Podesta,

Attached is your final teaching schedule for Spring 2016, including your room assignment(s).

As always, it is important to take a minute to review the attached form so we can correct any errors right away. Here's a quick guide on what to check for in the attached form:

1. Course title – is it correct?
2. Credits – Correct?
3. Day/time – Correct? Very important to let us know if you had a different understanding of your schedule.
4. Course Requirements:
    a. Courses with an in-class exam will have a specific date in this column along with a letter code for the time the exam will be held. "A" = 9:00 a.m., "B" = 1:30 p.m., "C" = 6:00 p.m., "D" = 10:00 a.m., and "E" = 2:30 p.m.
    b. Take-home exams are noted with the abbreviation "TK".
    c. Writing requirement seminars are noted with the "WR" abbreviation.
    d. Seminars that do not meet the writing requirement are listed as "Paper" seminars.
    e. "SR" means a special requirement other than an exam or paper.

Please contact me immediately (x9352) if there is a problem with your schedule.

In addition, here is a link to the 2015 - 2016 academic calendar, http://www.law.georgetown.edu/campus-services/registrar/course-registration/academic-calendars.cfm.

Thanks,

Dominique

Since I may only be here for a couple weeks they can't get me into permanent housing yet and thus the three legal guys will share the transient "can." My coworkers, who will leave in a matter of days for Qatar, were kind enough to grab the bottom bunks while I humped their weapon cases into the compound. Then they showed us the legal office. There are two desks. They were kind enough to claim those as well. Odd, considering that I AM STAYING TO WORK HERE!

And so is saying loudly and clearly that yes, black lives matter. As a mother and a grandmother, my heart breaks for the family of Dontre Hamilton. And I join Maria Hamilton, Senator Tammy Baldwin, and Congresswoman Gwen Moore in encouraging the Department of Justice to expedite the investigation into Dontre's death.

We need to restore the trust that has been lost between law enforcement and the people they serve. We need to end the violence that has cast a shadow over Milwaukee and too many of our communities. And we need to recognize that the ability of black mothers across this country to raise their children in safety is a women's issue, too.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

REMARKS AT CULINARY WORKERS PROTEST

AT TRUMP TOWER

LAS VEGAS, NV

MONDAY, OCTOBER 12, 2015

Hello, Local 226! I'm here to stand with you in solidarity and add my voice to yours:

Yes to the right to organize. Yes to a safe workplace. Yes to a living wage.

And we say just as loudly and clearly: No to union busting. No to hateful rhetoric against immigrants. No to Donald Trump.

Some people find Mr. Trump entertaining. They laugh when he insults Mexicans or demeans women. But this isn't reality TV. It's your life. It's your job. It's our country. So I have just one word for Mr. Trump: "Basta! [BAHS-ta!] Enough!"

You're on the front lines of the fight for a better future and a fairer, stronger America. We need you out here. I know it gets tough, but don't get discouraged. We've got your back.

You can count on me to get up every day and fight for you. I'm fighting for an America that works for everyone, not just those at the top. For the struggling, the striving, and the successful. For everyone who's ever been knocked down, but refused to be knocked out. That's you. That's this union. That's this city. So keep up the fight!

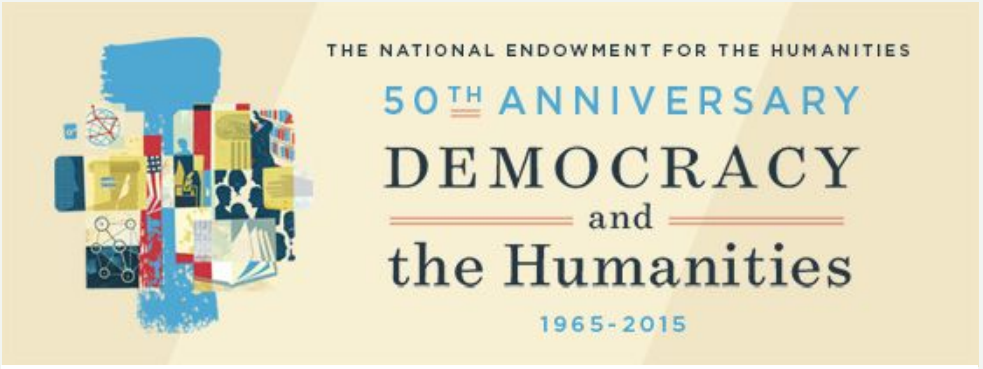
Subject:	Join Loyola University Maryland in Celebrating 50 Years of the National Endowment for the Humanities



The Center for the Humanities at Loyola University Maryland invites you to a two-day Symposium to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the founding of the National Endowment for the Humanities:

Democracy and the Humanities
Friday, Sept. 25 – Saturday, Sept. 26, 2015
Loyola University Maryland
4501 N. Charles Street
Baltimore, Md. 21210

Join us as we celebrate 50 years of promoting excellence in the humanities—both at Loyola and in the United States at large. You are invited to attend the Symposium as our guest with no cost.

Featured speakers include:

- William Adams, Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities
- Danielle Allen, Professor of Government and Director of the Edmond J. Safra Center for Ethics at Harvard University
- Richard Brodhead, President of Duke University
- Alan Wolfe, Professor of Political Science and Director of the Boisi Center for Religion and Public Life at Boston College

The Symposium will also feature breakout panel discussion sessions exploring the humanities' connections with the sciences, technology, democratic citizenship, current politics, and more. These sessions will feature many members of the Loyola faculty as well as distinguished guests, including Sandra Bermann, Patricia Bizzell, David Bromwich, D. Graham Burnett, Scott Casper, Lisa Dowling, Timothy Eatman, Neil Fraistat, Matthew Gold, George Greenia, Donna Heiland, Paul Jay, Stephen Kidd, Lynn Pasquerella, Kenneth Sacks, Christopher Scalia, Phoebe Stein, Sarah Werner, and Kathleen Woodward.

This event is free and open to the public. Seating, however, is limited, and attendees are encouraged to register for individual sessions by Sept. 1.

Learn more about the Symposium , including the full schedule of events and information about all the participants, accommodations, directions to Loyola's campus, and parking.

The Democracy and the Humanities Symposium is being co-sponsored by the American Association of Learned Societies, the Subject: North Carolina Update

I just found out that the CD allocations that we were given by the NCDP last night were based on just the Election Day & provisional ballots (65%), and did not account for the early voting #s (35%). The SBOE has not yet released that data. Of 1,076,699 votes cast, 35 % were EV (373,429). The EV demographics (61% Female, 39.6% AA, 38% 65+ and 74.8% 46+) should push us over the next delegate threshold in a couple of the CDs resulting in a couple of extra CD delegates. As of now, we are either tied, +1 or +2 for delegates in each CD. I know that we need to look ahead, but I'm still counting here!! I'll let you know as soon as the SBOE releases the EV data by CD.

It's a beautiful day in North Carolina!!

Subject: Test it, maybe?

LEAGUE OF CONSERVATION VOTERS

Tell your senators to protect us from toxic chemicals, then watch our "Call Me, Maybe" parody video supporting the Safe Chemicals Act.

John,

We've used almost every tactic to convince Congress to pass the Safe Chemicals Act, which would help us keep toxic chemicals out of our everyday products. We've held stroller brigades, sent tens of thousands of emails, staged rallies at the U.S. Capitol, joined twitter town halls, and more. But there's one thing we haven't tried yet: a music video.

Since everyone from Justin Bieber to the U.S. Olympic Swim Team has done their own renditions of the summer hit "Call Me, Maybe," we decided it was time for us to make our own video to raise awareness about why Congress must pass the Safe Chemicals Act now.

Join our call for safer products by sending a message to your senators now and watching our "Test It, Maybe" video.

Yesterday, Congress returned from their August recess. But since it's an election year, they will only be in session for eight days before hitting the campaign trail until November's elections. We can't wait any longer for legislation that will keep cancer-causing BPA out of canned food or dangerous flame retardants out of our couches. So, we must convince the Senate to vote now to protect our health and our families.

Tell your senators to pass the Safe Chemicals Act this fall!

Watch our video.

How do we do that? We have to flood their inboxes with thousands of messages that they cannot ignore. To get the numbers that will make them pay attention, we need to rally everyone who cares about this issue and educate everyone who doesn't know about it yet. That's why we made this "Test It, Maybe" video along with a series of other videos from our state LCV partners featuring testimonies from people who have been affected by the toxic chemicals in our everyday products that have gone unregulated for decades.

Will you email your senators now and then share our video with everyone you know?

Right now, our nation's primary chemical law is the Toxic Substances Control Act, which has not been updated since it was passed in 1976. The law is badly broken, allowing the EPA to test only a few hundred of the over 84,000 chemicals on the market today. This means that most of the chemicals in our products — everything from the backpacks our children wear to the furniture in our houses — are not tested for their long term effects on our health and the environment.

Rising rates of diseases like asthma, diabetes, childhood cancers, infertility, and learning and behavioral disorders have been linked to toxic chemical exposure. We need our government to protect our families from these chronic illnesses by requiring adequate testing of chemicals before they accumulate in our bodies and environment. The Safe Chemicals Act will ensure that the chemicals surrounding us every day are safe, but we'll only be able to make it a reality if you speak out today.

Tell your senators to pass the Safe Chemicals Act this fall!

After you send your email to your senators, we'll set you up with a page where you can watch and share the "Test It, Maybe" video. So, don't wait to take action. Make your voice heard now.

Together, we can hold the chemical industry accountable to safer standards and protect our families from harmful chemicals. So let's go!

Best,

Vanessa

Dear John,

It's been a while since we last touched base about what I've been up to during my short time in Congress.

Let me start by saying it has been an honor to represent you and your family and to fight for the middle class values that we hold dear.

Within a month of taking office, I introduced my first bill, the Government Waste Reduction Act.

This common sense, bipartisan bill reduces the deficit in a balanced way by cutting down redundant programs and rooting out waste in government, while preserving Medicare and Social Security.

There are ways to get back on the road toward a balanced budget that Democrats and Republicans can agree on-starting with making government more effective and efficient and reducing waste.

My bill does just that.

I'm also standing up against attempts to privatize Medicare by turning it into a voucher system.

The budget put forth by Congressman Paul Ryan earlier this week does just that.

I opposed the Ryan Budget on the campaign trail and will continue to oppose it in Congress. His approach would raise out-of-pocket health care costs by thousands of dollars for far too many hard-working people across our region.

This is unacceptable.

I look forward to staying engaged with you and hearing from you on the issues of the day as I continue to fight for you, your family and Illinois in the weeks and months ahead.

Kindest personal Regards,

Cheri

Main Topics: McCain interview on NBC, Afghanistan, McCain's Tech knowledge, The Economy

Summary of Shift: The New Yorker cover remains to be the main focus of political news. The economy also had its share of coverage with segments about failing banks and high oil prices. Despite President Bush's example, it is unlikely that congress will lift the federal ban on offshore drilling. A video of a Guantanamo interrogation was released, stirring conversations about torture, prisoner's rights and the recent Supreme Court ruling. Despite recent rumors, Jesse Ventura will not be running for Senate in Minnesota. President Ahmadinejad is planning a trip to New York and to speak to the UN, he would also like to speak to US officials. In other news, with The Dark Knight premiering this weekend, talks of an Oscar nomination for the late Health Ledger were common.

Highlights:
1. NBC: John McCain interviewed, asked about Immigration Reform, jobs
2. CNN: "Two Wars, one Military": Pentagon Officials say troops are needed in Afghanistan but they are all being used in Iraq

MAGGIE RODRIGUEZ: I would like to ask you a news of the day question if I may. Have you seen the cover of the New Yorker?

JOHN MCCAIN: Yes

RODRIGUEZ: Your feeling? Is satire acceptable?

MCCAIN: I don't think so. I will leave that judgment to the American people I can only state my personal opinion. I think, if it is an attempt at satire, it's wrong and it's offensive.

RODRIGUEZ: In regard to Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac do you feel that a government bailout is the solution?

MCCAIN: I think that the proposal that has been made, which I don't call it quote bailout but it is certainly is significant assistance in a number of ways, is an appropriate measure to take. Americans are angry. They are angry and they are upset and they are sick and tired of Washington doing nothing for them.

RODRIGUEZ: How much blame should the Bush administration take for that?

MCCAIN: I think that the problem has been festering for many many years. Fannie and Freddie were not created by the Bush administration... there is plenty of blame to go around RODRIGUEZ: You championed the immigration reform bill that now as the nominee you admit you wouldn't vote for if it came up today. Why not?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: The point is not that I would vote or not vote for it. The point is it failed twice. Senator Kennedy and I and a group of senators brought it up twice and it failed twice.

RODRIGUEZ: the fact that it failed does that tell you that the American people didn't want it or that your party didn't want it?

MCCAIN: The American people didn't support. I still believe that we reflect the views of the majority.

RODRIGUEZ: Some political annalist say and in fact Senator Obama made the comments here yesterday, that when you became the nominee when you could no longer risk alienating your conservative base you started emphasizing boarder security over a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants, what about that?

MCCAIN: Actually as soon as we failed I said that obviously we had, for the second time, I lead on the issue. I didn't have to do this Maggie, I knew that it was going to hurt me in my quest for the nomination of my party because it was not popular with a lot of the base of my party. But because I put my country first, and I always put my country first. Senator Obama had a choice of doing the bidding of the labor unions or putting his country first, he chose the special interest. Senator Obama supported measure which would have killed the comprehensive approach.

RODRIGUEZ: What do you say to the American worker who feels that the undocumented worker is taking his or her job?

MCCAIN: I agree with them, but I would also point out that there are jobs that it is clear that still need to be filled. Americans want the confidence that we will have secure boarders and then I believe that the overwhelming majority of them will support a humane and compassionate approach to a temporary worker program and to comprehensive immigration reform.

RODRIGUEZ: But securing the boarder could take years what if it never happens when will you get to comprehensive immigration reform?

MCCAIN: Oh we are moving forward right now with securing our boarders.

RODRIGUEZ: If in one year or two years the boarder isn't secure what will you do?

MCCAIN: It will be secure, it will be secure, sure, it will be secure in a relatively short period of time.

RODRIGUEZ: Like a year?

MCCAIN: It will be done in a very short period of time.

"Two Wars, one Military", Pentagon Officials say Troops are Needed in Afghanistan but They are all Being Used in Iraq
(CNN 07/15/08 09:30am)
BARBARA STARR: Barack Obama and John McCain may be about to find out that the road home from Iraq goes right through Afghanistan. With Taliban fighters staging deadlier and more sophisticated attacks, Afghanistan is now the hotter war facing John McCain and Barack Obama. […] Commanders say more troops and armor must be sent to Afghanistan to fight the rising violence. But first the pentagon says US troops have to get out of Iraq.

ADMIRAL MICHAEL MULLEN: I've made no secret of my desire to fly more forces, US forces to Afghanistan just as soon as I can. Nor have I been shy about saying that those forces will not be available unless or until the situation in Iraq allows us to do so.

STARR: Obama still focused on getting out of Iraq. […] McCain still focused on criticizing Obama:

MCCAIN: His proposals would jeopardize the success we've achieved.

STARR: But little discussion of what US commanders are urgently recommending, sending up to ten thousand additional troops and a lot more equipment. […]

John McCain Flip Flops on Immigration, Tries to Please Conservatives While Still Attracting Moderate Hispanic Voters
(FNC 07/15/08 07:20am)
CLAYTON KELLY: […] John McCain having to go on the defensive for his shifting position on immigration. Or what he says is not really a shift. This comes on the heels of John McCain before supporting a path to citizenship, now saying that he would like to have the border first secured, whether that's a wall there or not, and then look to other options for citizenship.

GRETCHEN CARLSON: In fact he said he would vote against his own legislation if it came up today. So I think the Barack Obama camp does potentially have a flip-flop on their hands as far as being able to attack John McCain on this. […] Democrats are now going to say that John McCain is changing or altering his stance before November.

REPORTER: […] Did he probably make this decision for political purposes, yes. The man trying to get elected, the man is trying to please his party. Isn't that just the reality of politics though?

KELLY: […] Is he trying to support or play to his party. It's interesting for Barack Obama who's moving to the center, he's trying to appeal to independents. Though John McCain has one foot in one camp where he's trying to appeal to conservatives, that's a real conservative position putting a wall down there at the border. And trying also to move toward the center and appeal to Hispanics, they certainly don't want a wall down there. Trying to go after those Reagan Republicans.

CARLSON: Well I think it's interesting at all that we would see McCain in any situation where he's appealing to any particular group because he is known as the maverick and sort of the straight talker. So he needs to be extra careful when he does something like this because he has the reputation as being the straight talker and telling it like it is, and that's frankly what people like about him. For those that are John McCain fans. […]

Hazelbaker Blasts Obama On Iraq, Repeats McCain Endorsement of Surge Strategy (FNC 07/15/08)

GRETCHEN CARLSON: Senator John McCain putting his roadmap for the war in the spotlight for this week. For more on his strategy, I'm joined by the communications director for the McCain campaign, Jill Hazelbaker. Good morning to you Jill.

JILL HAZELBAKER: Good morning Gretchen, thank you for having me.

CARLSON: Yes, of course. Well, we want to talk about this speech that John McCain is going to be giving on Thursday because its my understanding he's going to touch on Iraq and also now the situation in Afghanistan. You know its interesting to see how, with regard to foreign policy, things are changing at a moments notice.

HAZELBAKER: Absolutely. As you know Senator Obama is going over seas this week. He seems to be more interested in how that trip might further his political ambitions rather than how it could shape his world view. I thought it was interesting Gretchen how yesterday how he laid out his strategy for the way forward in Iraq and Afghanistan prior to setting foot in the ground or visiting with any of the commanders in Iraq. Generally those fact-finding missions go the other way.

CARLSON: You're talking about the editorial he wrote and I just had on his communications director. And I asked him since he wrote that report before he went to Iraq if he would also write one when he comes back. Do you think he will?

HAZELBAKER: Well I don't know. Senator Obama was on the wrong side of the surge. You know John McCain, when he saw the situation in Iraq deteriorate, he stood up in stop for a new strategy. The surge strategy is working today. John McCain said he would rather lose a political campaign than lose this war. And, he's been fighting for the right strategy ever since. It would be very interesting to see what Barack Obama has to say after getting on the ground Iraq you know he hasn't been there for almost 900 days. In terms of Afghanistan, Barack Obama has direct oversight on the issue in the United States Senate and yet he has failed to hold a single hearing. He also voted against money for the troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. Its going to be interesting to see how he restores and credibility on the issue.

CARLSON: But Jill this isn't all necessarily good news for John McCain in a sense and I don't have a lot of time because the more we talk about foreign policy. It may be a good thing for John McCain with regard to experience. But it may bring the American pubic back to talking about Iraq, which may be not a good thing for John McCain.

HAZELBAKER: Well I disagree Gretchen. Senator John McCain put his principle above politics when everyone said the war on Iraq is lost, John McCain stood up and fought for the strategy that's working today. I think voters when they go into the voting booth ought to remember the fact that John McCain always been, never been afraid to tackle the big issues. He's always worked across the aisle and his principles always go ahead of the political ambition of the day.

Contessa Brewer Mocks McCain's Age, Lack Of Tech Ability (MSNBC 07/15/08)

CONTESSA BREWER: When John McCain was born, there wasn't even FM radio. And forget about computers, they weren't even a blip on the technological horizon. And while his opponent is using the Internet to bring in unprecedented funds, McCain himself has said he doesn't e-mail and is just now getting up to speed on the web. (begin playing clip of Conan O'Brien)

O'BRIEN: John McCain admits that his staff has to show him websites because he has trouble getting on the Internet by himself. That's what he said. Yea yesterday McCain tried to surf the Internet for half an hour until his staff told him he was actually holding an etcher sketch.

BREWER: On a serious note here voters say age is an issue. A new poll said a 38% McCain is just too old. Just 30% say Obama is too young. John McCain is 72 this year. If elected, he would be the oldest President in U.S. history. Andy Borowitz is a comedian and a satirist and is the man behind BorowitzReport.com It's good to see you today Andy.

ANDY BOROWITZ: It's good to be here Contessa.

BREWER: The fact that McCain doesn't use computers at a time when young people are overwhelmingly turning out to vote, is that a problem going into a general election?

BOROWITZ: Look clearly he's uncomfortable with technology. All these newfangled inventions like the teleprompter, the telephone, these are confusing to him. And I think it might be a problem. I think he has to show he is comfortable with technology, for example the cotton gin. Very very comfortable with that. Also the butter churn. We need to see more moments like that.

BREWER: And that resonates with so many voters out there. I say come on get with- my grandmothers are both proficient with computers and the Internet.

BOROWITZ: They could be a possible VP pick for McCain then. Very helpful around the web.
[…]
BREWER: I mean here's the problem Czechoslovakia has not existed for 20 years.

BOROWITZ: That is a problem. Czechoslovakia broke up awhile ago. This would sort of be like referring to Jennifer Aflek and Ben Aflek and Bennifer today. You just can't do that.
[…]
BREWER: You saw the gears start to turn he meant that as a joke. But there is medical research that says as people start to age that's why perhaps grandma says something that's inappropriate at Thanksgiving dinner its not really her fault. They lose the ability to be socially appropriate. Is that what we're seeing?

BOROWITZ: Well what you are saying then is if we have John McCain as President would sort of be like Estelle Getty from the Golden Girls in the White House, which I think would be awesome.

BREWER: Highly entertaining.

BOROWITZ: I love that show.

BREWER: And effective?

BOROWITZ: First of all, very hip choice to quote a fifty year old beach boys song. Kids dig that. I think that's a good way to go.

Morning Joe Hosts Mock McCain's Ludditism (MSNBC 07/15/08)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: You know, the late night comedians bash McCain all the time on the age issue. Andrea, is there anything McCain people can do about that? They obviously have to be very concerned about the age issue because it remains- you ask Americans what they think about John McCain and when they hear his name, the top issue in all of these latest polls- old.

ANDREA MITCHELL: Well, I think one thing they should do is not have him give interviews with the New York Times about how he's not comfortable using the Internet or 'Internets.' Wish he hadn't said that.

SCARBOROUGH: That's bad. Yeah when you say yeah I have my wife and a couple aides stand around me and they get me on the Internet and get me- that's just not good.

CINDY MCCAIN: We didn't feel Washington was a healthy environment for young kids, particularly doing what we were doing. So, we made the right choice. And it wasn't because I didn't like Washington so much, but I cared more about my children and wanted the best for them.

State Capitol 'Run Against Walker' to Focus on Walker, GOP Attacks on Health Care, Middle Class to Pay for $600 Million Corporate Tax Cuts

Walker Budget Slashes Middle Class Priorities to Pay for Corporate Tax Payoffs to Special Interest Donors

Madison -- Massive attacks against health care, education and middle class priorities launched by Gov. Scott Walker and the Republican legislative majority are the focus of a "Run Against Walker," scheduled at the State Capitol today. The "Run Against Walker," a run/walk for citizens organized by One Wisconsin Now as part of the "Walkerville" activities on the State Capitol Square, will accommodate both runners and walkers who are united against Walker's attacks on the middle class.

The run will begin at 5:30 p.m. at the top of State Street, travel down State Street to the University of Madison-Wisconsin Terrace and along the lake and back to the Capitol in advance of the "Walkerville" health care events scheduled for 7:00 p.m.

"Gov. Scott Walker and the Republicans call for 'shared sacrifice,' while attacking the working people of Wisconsin," said Scot Ross, One Wisconsin Now Executive Director. "But their idea is to sacrifice the health care, public education and priorities of the middle class, while allowing special interests to share more than $600 million dollars every two years in new corporate tax breaks and giveaways."

Walker and the Republicans have already passed into law $140 million in new tax breaks that help corporations and the wealthy. In the recently completed Joint Finance Committee budget writing, the Republican-led committee passed nearly $500 million coming biennial new corporate tax giveaways. [Wisconsin Legislative Fiscal Bureau]

The unprecedented corporate giveaways by Republicans come at the same time Walker and his allies have attempted to pass the following attacks on the middle class, including:

- Allowing the Secretary of the Department of Health Services to cut, without full legislative approval, 70,000 Wisconsinites who pay for health care through the BadgerCare program;
- Increasing the health care costs for potentially 1 million Wisconsinites;
- Refusing to protect seniors from being forced after next year out of the successful SeniorCare prescription drug program and into the more expensive Medicare Part D federal plan that would result in higher costs for seniors.

Walker and his allies are also making drastic cuts to public education and higher education, including $1.6 billion in less funding for public schools, $71 million in cuts to the Technical College System and $250 million in cuts the University of Wisconsin system. Republicans have even voted to increase taxes on the working poor by $60 million.

"We will 'Run Against Walker' as long as Walker runs against the values of the people of Wisconsin and remains in the pocket of corporate special interests," said Ross. "'Run Against Walker' is our effort to make Wisconsin a healthier place for the middle class and workers across Wisconsin."

I hope you and the whole clan are doing well.

I thought of you last night as Katie and I were at the home of Lee Satterfield and Patrick Steel for a fundraiser for Hillary.

I wanted to reach out to you regarding CAP. My business partner, Doug Damron, was part of the team that represented CAP in its most recent office lease transaction in 2010. He worked closely with Sarah Wartell and Kaliope Poulianos. Also I understand that there were serious conversations about buying a building as well as leasing at that time.

The current lease expiration is 3/31/2021 (into Hillary's 2nd Presidential term!) and while that is several years away it may make sense for us to get re-engaged to do a strategic real estate plan for CAP – especially if building ownership is something that is to be considered. Given the administrative changes at CAP with Sarah Wartell and Kaliope Poulianos no longer with the organization, we no longer have the appropriate contacts to keep CAP informed on the real estate market.

Any help in reaching out to the powers that be would be greatly appreciated. We want to continue to count CAP as a client and be a resource for them at all times.

I wish you a happy and safe 4th of July!

Best,

Chris

Here is the real challenge: truth vs. reality.

1. she has no paid consultants doing politics

2. she is as horrified as all of us that maggie H wrote this piece but shutting down these articles is hard given they have decided to cover her.

3. news maker attribute to her what others are doing - so the PACS are treated as her even though she can't and isn't involved with them.

so it would be great to brainstorm how that changes.

I am happy to convene such a gathering/call - though it will get reported if someone talks as a political meeting rather than one designed to preserve her options.

Subject: Recent developments

Dear Jake,

First, I would like to propose an over-arching theme for the campaign, with domestic and foreign policy ramifications; "Rebuilding America". Under this theme she could fit her major infrastructure proposal (which will have broad support), education and job skills for the 21st century economy, a tax system that discourages companies moving abroad and encouraging those abroad to repatriate their earnings,. But this theme can also be used for national security policies--retooling the US military and NATO to combat the new asymmetrical battles we face; modernization of our intelligence capabilities; using our economic strength to help our allies combat terrorism, and build more prosperous societies that reduce the attraction of radicalism.

More broadly, she needs to focus on bread and butter issues of building a 9ompetitive 21st century that lifts the middle class and not just the wealthy. But she also needs to deemphasize (without changing her correct positions) abortion, gay rights, and gun control. Of course, she should continue to support these issues, but not have them dominate her broader economic message.

Second, the Paris attacks (I just returned last night), and those in Lebanon and Mali have changed the political equation. Although at one level this may benefit the "get tough" Republicans, it can play to Hillary's strong suit against Sanders and their likely nominee Rubio: "this is no time for on the job training".

But Jake, if the California tragedy is also a terrorist attack, this could have profound political ramifications that could be harmful. Again, to just talk about gun control and doing more outreach to the Muslim community will be off-putting. There would need to be a tough, uncompromising response.

I will be pleased to help in any of these areas. I will be having a private breakfast with Israeli Ambassador Dermer next week, and will pass along anything of interest.

Best wishes,

Stu Eizenstat

Subject: Kochs' spies

ActBlue

Dear John,

The Koch brothers are proving to be even more insidious than we could have imagined.

Politico* reported yesterday that the Kochs have built a $17 million, 25 person arm dedicated to spying on their liberal rivals — complete with an ex-CIA operative.

The Kochs bankrolled the Republicans in 2012, and they, along with the rest of the party, were stunned by the huge loss.

So the brothers vowed never to be surprised by Democrats' tactics. And their solution wasn't to be better, but rather to spy on operatives on the left.

ActBlue is the antidote to that kind of big money excess and power. We help thousands of Democrats build powerful grassroots campaigns, one small-dollar donation at a time.

Will you chip in $15 a month to help us scale up our tools to handle millions of contributions in 2016?

Because you've saved your payment information with ActBlue Express, your donation will go through immediately:

Express Donate: $15 a month

Express Donate: $25 a month

Express Donate: $50 a month

Express Donate: $100 a month

Or donate another amount:

https://secure.actblue.com/contribute/page/stunned

We'd bet money on the fact that ActBlue is on the Kochs' list of Democratic targets — they are obsessed with money, after all.

It's terrifying how power-hungry the Kochs are, but it's also pathetic. Instead of investing in their own tools and really organizing communities, they're relying upon Kafka-esque tactics.

They can spy all they want, though. The reason ActBlue has become a powerful force for Democrats is because we are transparent, and we make our tools available to every Democrat. The Kochs could never copy that kind of collectivism.

We've got something far more important than money on our side, and that's millions of supporters who believe in Democrats' mission and are willing to chip in through ActBlue to help build strong grassroots campaigns.

Will you chip in $15 a month so we can expand our tools and help Democrats

Good morning Ricky hope all is well. Linda from Distinctive Windows gave me your contact information. Can we set up an appointment to look at the shades in unit 12C. I have copied owner/broker as well. I am the resident manager at Huys Condominium 404 Park Avenue South.

Best,

Joseph

Joseph,

Good morning.

As you probably know, we only manufactured the shades, we did not install nor program. While we could certainly make a service stop, there would be a minimum service charge of $250 + tax for this kind of repair.

I suggest you contact International Blind who did both the installation and programming and who should still be providing this service. We of course are responsible for any additional window treatments we have and will be providing to residents.

Thanks. I also got official word through Joule via John Cobb at Steptoe. Looks to be good news for the company, as the merger is intended to expand their reach.

I checked in and no action is required as investors at this time; they will let me know if/when there is a to do to complete the merger.

We just ended our Ignite! Conference in St. Louis, where 1,000 of our best member leaders gathered to recommit to fighting to build economic and political power for all workers!

I'm following up on our conversation on how Secretary Clinton can engage with SEIU members and non-union workers. As you know our members are putting their hearts and souls into the Fight for $15 and a union, commonsense immigration reform, delivering on the promise of ACA, Blacks Lives Matter, and voting rights for everyone.

I'm looking forward to working together to think about how we can create spaces for the Secretary to have a dialogue with our members and non-union workers, so she can hear their stories, and they can hear how she's thinking about the issues that matter to working people. Here are a few ideas:

1. April 15 -- Fight for $15 Day of Action: The movement that started with fast food workers in NYC has exploded to include Walmart workers, airport baggage handlers and passenger service attendants, home care providers, child care workers, adjunct college faculty, and other underpaid people who want to create jobs that pay people enough to actually live on. On April 15, workers will take action in a major mobilization in Chicago, Los Angeles, New York City and two hundred other cities across the globe. These workers are taking a huge risk by taking a stand and need public support in the media and at actions.

2. Workers' Roundtables: These would provide an opportunity to have a conversation with workers about the challenges they face and to test drive solutions together. For example, we could pull together a group of childcare providers and fast food workers to talk with the Secretary about the challenges of our nation's lack of affordable, accessible, and universal childcare for low-wage workers and providers.

3. "Walk a Day" with our members. Sec. Clinton spending a day with childcare, homecare or other workers would be incredibly compelling and lift up the courageous, important and difficult work that service sector workers do every day to take care of our children, elderly and the disabled.

4. Conversations with SEIU Leadership: The SEIU Executive Committee (approx. 30 local union leaders) will meet in May in Chicago, and our full International Executive Board (70 local union leaders) will meet in Detroit in June. We could also pull together any subsection of leaders based on geography, industry, or other criteria.

Here's a list of some of what's on our calendar already. We're surprisingly nimble and could add public or private events with relatively fast turnaround.

March 30 – April 3	National Week of Action for Commonsense Immigration Reform
April 15	Fight for $15 Day of Action
May 1	May Day Actions for Commonsense Immigration Reform

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

May TBD	SEIU Executive Committee Meeting, Chicago
May/June TBD	SCOTUS decision on King v. Burwell
June 8-12	SEIU International Executive Board Meeting, Detroit

I look forward to talking more. Will be in Eastern time zone the rest of the week.

Subject: An Environmental Champion for Washington State

LEAGUE OF CONSERVATION VOTERS

Contribute directly to Jay Inslee's campaign for Washington State governor. With just 17 days until Election Day, there's still a lot of ground to cover. Please join me in helping make sure Jay wins in November.

John,

Jay Inslee is running for governor of Washington State and I'm proud to support him.

As an LCV member, I hope you will support him too. He's got a tough fight on his hands and with just 17 days left until the election, his team still has thousands of dollars to raise, doors to knock on, and phone calls to make.

Will you join me and make a contribution to Jay's campaign today?

As a 15-year member of the U.S. House of Representatives, Jay put much of his effort into building a clean energy economy and protecting the air we breathe and the water we drink. He is exactly the kind of governor who will put protecting our environment at the top of his agenda--right alongside sustainably growing our economy.

As governor, Jay will provide visionary leadership that not only strengthens our current industries, but also grows a new economy based on the clean-energy jobs of the future.

But that means that, right now, Jay is battling against millions in special interest money that's pouring into Washington State, and he needs our help. I hope I can count on you.

Will you take a moment, right now, to contribute directly to Jay's campaign?

The 112th U.S. House of Representatives was considered by many to be the worst ever on environmental issues, but Jay Inslee stood out as an environmental leader and champion. In 2011, Inslee earned an impressive 100 percent score on LCV's National Environmental Scorecard.

If we can get Jay Inslee elected as governor, his administration is sure to be a model on environmental issues. Here's why:

Jay Inslee has been one of the strongest and most influential voices on environmental issues. He is one of the foremost advocates and leaders on the advancement of clean energy, climate policy, and the protection of natural resources.

This race is just about as close as it gets. Public polls show Jay neck-and-neck with his opponent.

That's why I'm asking LCV members like you to contribute to Jay Inslee for Washington.

I hope you'll join me in making sure Jay Inslee has the resources his campaign needs to win on Election Day. Will you chip in with a contribution today?

Jay can win this. If we hope to protect our planet for our children and grandchildren, we need Jay Inslee as the next governor of Washington State. Please, give what you can today.

Sincerely,

Al Gore

> WASHINGTON, DC (March XX, 2015) – Today the Wilderness Society announced that its Ansel Adams Award is being presented to John Podesta for his tireless work in protecting America's wild public lands. Mr. Podesta served as Counselor to President Obama from January 2014 to March 2015 and as White House Chief of Staff in the Clinton administration, from 1998 to 2001.

The Ansel Adams Award is conferred on current or former federal officials who have demonstrated exceptional commitment to the cause of conservation and the fostering of an American land ethic.

"John Podesta has played a tremendous leadership role in shaping our nation's conservation legacy," said Jamie Williams, president of The Wilderness Society . "In the Obama administration, he led efforts to protect some the most magnificent wild places across the country, and he implemented a critically important action plan to address climate change."

In presenting the award to Podesta, The Wilderness Society cited his key role in major conservation actions over the past two decades. Those actions include the Obama administration's protection of Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks, the San Gabriel Mountains and Pacific Remote Islands as national monuments and the proposed wilderness designation for the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. During his tenure as Counselor to President Obama, John Podesta oversaw the designation and expansion of seven national monuments, protecting more than 258 million acres federal lands and waters. Podesta has also been a champion of the President's efforts to tackle climate change, including EPA's proposed rule to reduce carbon emissions from coal fired power plants and a path-breaking agreement with China to reduce global warming emissions.

During the Clinton administration, he was instrumental in the establishment of the "roadless rule," which protected millions acres of our national forests from logging and road-building. Among his many other conservation achievements in the Clinton administration, he led efforts to establish 19 national monuments, including the California Coastal and the Grand Canyon-Parashant national monuments, which all together protect more than three million acres of invaluable natural and cultural resources. He is the author of The Power of Progress: How America's Progressives Can (Once Again) Save Our Economy, Our Climate and Our Country.

[Mr. Podesta should feel free to add a comment to the release if he's inclined]

The Ansel Adams Award is presented on behalf of the renowned photographer who was an outspoken advocate for defending the nation's natural heritage. Past winners include former Secretaries of the Interior Ken Salazar and Bruce Babbitt, former Arizona Congressman Mo Udall, Earth Day founder Gaylord Nelson, President Jimmy Carter, former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell, and Senators Bill Roth, John Chafee, John Kerry and Joe Lieberman as well as Congressmen Phillip Burton and John Lewis.

###

The Wilderness Society is the leading conservation organization working to protect wild public lands and inspire Americans to care for our wild places. Founded in 1935, and now with more than 500,000 members and supporters, The Wilderness Society has led the effort to permanently protect 110 million acres of wilderness and to ensure sound management of our shared national lands. www.wilderness.org .

All,

In response to Joel's questions below, I've attached some stats on small businesses/microbusinesses. Please let us know if you have questions/suggestions.

Thanks,
Ethan

Ditto on trade.
Adding John on here.
For the purpose of being authentic to our candidate, I was just thinking to myself what issues I've heard from her repeatedly so we can try to reflect that when she sees the draft. Aside from Carbon, my list would be:
--family leave
--early childhood Ed/development
--raising wages
I think we touched on all three on the call but I wanted to flag them. Others here know her brain better than me so please correct me if I'm wrong. I just want to stay tethered to her motivations, even if that means explaining why these ideas won't work.

Americans love both small business and manufactures and it's where the growth has been coming from. It's why Obama frequently uses the phrase "small business manufacturers." I would rather focus on that -- which also connects to a lot of the job training programs than chase the mom & pop businesses until we can clarify the #s on that.

>> 1. small scale entrepreneurship: Prior to Obamacare the number one reason someone would stay in a shitty job is that they needed healthcare and did not have any options. There are a ton of people who want to start new businesses but were handcuffed to their own employer because of healthcare. I don't know if we are seeing any evidence of Obamacare unleashing a new wae of entrepreneurship but I hope it is coming. (I realize access to capital is another big problem)
>>
>> I think sole proprietorships, self-employed, micro businesses and small businesses should be one of our focuses. How do we ignite a new age of entrepreneurship that will continue to feed the American dream? And this is not the next Zuckerberg, as your memo states. It is every imaginable type of service, product and artistry. We need to help create the environment for new, self-employment, take the mystification out of it, aid in the logistics of creation, and yes, help with capitol. Also reward these small businesses with tax credits for new jobs created.
>>
>> Joel sent around some stats about how small a universe micro businesses truly are so we will have to keep that in mind but the general "small business" definition is still a big driver of our economy and new jobs. Also, I would like some clarification between the SBA stats which makes it seem like sole proprietorship is a big chunk of small businesses and the numbers Joel sent around which makes it seem a speck.
>>
>> 2: Manufacturing: I am not sure you can say that manufacturing is alive and well in the U.S. but it is certainly becoming more vibrant and is important to the American economy. We should be encouraging it and I think we will see more manufacturing coming back from China and Mexico for many different reason.
>>
>> 3: Internet, technology, etc. While we certainly need to encourage this sector this is also where venture capital and angel investors already fill the void. I do see a need for state and federal venture capital funds especially in struggling economies (think detroit and new orleans but also among the very young)
>>
>> 4: Infrastructure: America is good at building shit and very good at building roads, bridges, sewer and water systems, airports, ports, etc. And $1 billion in infrastructure spending supports 28,000 jobs. Where else in the economy do we get a return like that. And the multiplier effect is tremendous for the economy. An of course the unions love it.
>>
>> 5: New Energy. Another "all of the above" approach and good return on the number of jobs. Not sure I have a lot to add here.
>>
>> 6: Healthcare: Curious if this should get more attention as our population ages and as cities like Pittsburgh go from a core industry like steel driving their economy to medical driving their economy (and fracking). We have big shortages in health care workers. These are good paying jobs. One idea I had was also to just have the federal gov't come up with the 10% match they are requiring states to pitch in for Medicaid Expansion under Obamacare. This is clearly making winners and losers for working families. If you live in a red state with a GOP governor you are screwed. So just pay for the Medicaid Expansion for states and create literally hundreds of thousands of jobs.
>>
>> 7: for the life of my I had one more and it just flew out of my brain.
>>
>>
>> The following are not sectors but help drive or stunt economic growth:
>> 7: Tax code. Right now it picks the winners and losers and the winners buy all their breaks with lobbyists and lawyers. I would add in this realm onerous regulations.

Thanks to Helen and Jeannie's encouragement, I had a fabulous meeting today with Heather and Elisabeth Jacobs, who will be leading their policy and academic outreach work. As you know, they are not seeking additional funding this year thanks to the grant from the Sandlers (but will next year).

I love what they're doing and the model of commissioning hard hitting economic research from established and emerging economists, but also focusing on translating and packaging and networking it with journalists, speech writers, and people on the Hill. Really interesting.

As you probably know, they are looking at HOW inequality affects growth across 4 categories: human capital, institutions, entrepreneurship, and demand (markets). Jeannie: they are doing some work on student loan debt, early learning and parenting, schooling, and --near and dear to my heart—they may look at transitions to adulthood as well.

I mentioned the convening we hope to do with Brookings and hopefully engaging them too—to put powerful ideas and research in the hands of grantee activist partners, and they were very enthusiastic. We should follow up when you're ready.

Also, JB: they are working with WA Monthly to do an edition (maybe 25 pages) on their early research—with perhaps different segments by stage of life cycle. You and I can discuss more tomorrow. May be a content play of interest to us.

They have the potential to be a key ally and partner in our work. Thanks so much for making the link for me.

We wanted to draw your attention to our e-mail today introducing Dawn Smith, who is a MoveOn member locked in a battle with Cigna to receive adequate coverage for a rare brain tumor. We think personalizing the fight at this critical juncture is an effective way of identifying the true villains in this fight. Dawn is an amazing fighter, and we're hoping to help her get her story far and wide.

Dear MoveOn member,

Meet Dawn. She's lives in Atlanta.

Four years ago, Dawn was diagnosed with a rare, but treatable brain tumor. Dawn's doctors are ready to help her. But CIGNA, Dawn's insurer, refuses to pay for her care because the only hospitals qualified to treat her are out-of-network.

Dawn has been fighting CIGNA on her own for years, but now she's asking for help. What's happening to Dawn could happen to any one of us. And if we all stand with Dawn to shine a light on Big Insurance's abusive practices, we can get Dawn the care she needs and make sure they don't do this to anyone ever again.

I just signed a statement supporting Dawn. CIGNA may be able to ignore Dawn, but they won't be able to ignore millions of us standing together. Will you join me?

http://pol.moveon.org/dawnsmith/?id=&t=4

The statement says, "I stand with Dawn Smith. CIGNA must provide the treatment she needs and stop rejecting legitimate care for all the others who are suffering."

Unfortunately, Dawn's story isn't unique—she's one of the millions of Americans who are suffering—but what she's doing about her situation is. Instead of suffering in silence, she's sharing her painful, powerful story so that, as she says, "no one else has to go through what I have."

Dawn has been fighting CIGNA for the care she needs for years. They may be able to ignore her, but they won't be able to ignore all of us standing together. Will you join me and stand with Dawn?

Click Here

Since she got sick, Dawn's life has been a struggle. She has terrible pain and sudden seizures that can knock her off her feet. She's had to move back in with her mom so she can have constant care. But through all that, she's kept her spirits up.

The worst part is that her condition is treatable. But CIGNA's refusal to treat her has brought her to "the end of my rope," as she puts it. CIGNA gladly accepts Dawn's premium payments, but when she needed care, they refused to pay for it, coming up with new reasons as they went.

Dawn's story is a symptom of a much bigger problem. But if we all rally behind her, we can help not just her, but everyone else who's suffering under our broken system, too. Together, we have the power to make Dawn's story different, and in the process, to remind Congress and the American people why we so desperately need health care reform.

I'm standing with Dawn. Will you join me?

Thanks for all you do.

Dear John:

Thank you for all you have been doing. I take great comfort from your presence in the transition.

I think that you know that my primary focus during the past eight years has been resisting the damage done by the Bush Administration, often from the platform of our successful telecommunications company. I would like to return to the more positive focus of creating change, and if there is an appropriate spot within the Obama administration from which I might do that, nothing would please me more. I am prepared to leave Working Assets, live in Washington for four years, and have the ardent support of my wife and college age kids.

I realize of course that there are hundreds of thousands who similarly wish to contribute, and often with quite different backgrounds than mine. I don't think that we have ever substantively discussed my non-DA life, but I have a PhD in public policy from the Kennedy School, early public experience at EPA and then as economics advisor to then Gov. Jerry Brown of California, and then several decades of business life, all with a public focus. I have also long taught part time, currently at Stanford, previously at UC Berkeley, on social entrepreneurship (now) and financial innovation (then).

I also realize that you may be utterly the wrong person to send a note such as this, but you have the misfortune of being the person I know. If there is someone more appropriate, I hope that you might pass my interest along, or, with your usual candor, tell me that I am just the kind of person that would not fit!

My conclusion about possible positions of interest is narrowed by an assumption that something with a long history of advocacy would face difficulties in a Senate confirmation process. Looking around, there are several positions that strike me as having the potential for significant impact, so I list them for illustration. Of course, my interests are broader, with lots of work over the years in tax policy, climate change, labor markets, and civil liberties, and I would be delighted to contribute however I could.

Director, Office of Information and Regulatory Analysis (OMB) – would love to help unwind all the bad regulations and shepherd through much needed new ones;

Associate Administrator, Policy, Economics and Innovation, EPA – I started at EPA out of graduate school working for Bill Drayton, and retain a passion for the analytics of getting it right. I suspect much of the climate change work will need to happen without legislation.

Senior advisor or special assistant, Undersecretary for Domestic Finance, Treasury. I know quite a bit about financial markets, and clearly there is a great deal to fix.

Director, Community Development Financial Institutions Fund, Treasury. I wrote a book on development finance some time ago, and retain much interest in the field.

Again, thank you for all you have been doing. I would appreciate your consideration in this extraordinary time.

Sincerely,

Michael Kieschnick

I would greatly appreciate it if you could put a good word in for Lizzie. Attached are her cover letter, resume, and writing sample. She is a sociology major at Connecticut College in New London (my hometown) with a 3.08 average and strong writing skills. As part of her Sociology major she has taken several courses on race relations, which is a special interest of hers as an Asian American adoptee from South Korea. In addition, she also studied immigration issues as part of her Danish Politics course during her semester abroad in Copenhagen. She has also focused on global women's empowerment, child exploitation, education and special needs children issues through internships with Child Plan, a global non-profit focused on young women and children, For Love of Children (FLOC) a DC based tutoring program and an Arlington County School Summer Life Skills Program for special needs children. Lizzie is very committed to making a contribution on important public policy issues like race relations, immigration, human trafficking and child exploitation. She is a hard worker, capable of juggling many tasks and would be honored to have the opportunity to work at CAP.

Subject: [big campaign] McCain camp's pre-debate spin is fairly unbelievable. It is essentially, Palin is uninformed just like "regular people," and that's why they'll like her.

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/10/02/mccain-camps-pre-debate-s_n_131295.html

McCain Camp's Pre-Debate Spin: Palin Doesn't Need To Pass IQ Test

Listening to surrogates and aides to John McCain on Thursday, one is left with the impression that there is no great need for Gov. Sarah Palin to actually answer questions during tonight's vice presidential debate.

Indeed, the spin coming from McCain surrogates and strategists is that Palin has to do is pass a sort of artificial personality test, in which she strikes an emotional thread with the average voter -- question, answers, or intellectual capacity be damned.

Such were the talking points mere hours before the debate in St. Louis, which peaked with Sen. Joe Lieberman - a man not unaccustomed to the pressures of such a forum - actually proclaiming that Palin's relative ignorance helped her relate to "regular people."

"She's not lived in the world of Washington, so she doesn't know every detail of all the questions senators deal with," Lieberman told NBC's Andrea Mitchell. "But, frankly, that's her strength. I think that's why a lot of regular people out across America think she's going to be their voice."

Mitchell interjected, "Senator, she wants to be a heartbeat away from the presidency. You know, that doesn't mean just being an average mom, it means bringing other skills."

But Lieberman stayed on the point, stating later, "I think tonight is not a kind of final college exam. I think the point is who is she as a person... Whether she can answer every detailed question, I don't think that ultimately matters to the American people so long as they think she passes those other personal thresholds."

It was the ultimate setting of expectations -- a political get-out-of-jail-free card should Palin stumble this evening. And it wasn't an isolated incident. Over on Fox News, Chris Wallace was relaying a conversation with a McCain "strategist" in which the metrics for debate success were once again defined in strictly personal terms.

"They say they want to show that she is plain spoken, that she relates to Joe Six-Pack and embrace the contrast her to a smooth-talking Washington insider like Joe Biden," Wallace reported. "I said: 'But what if she does not know some of the answer to something?' They said, 'Look, she should not be embarrassed by that. She should say 'I'm not a Washington insider. I'm going to learn about that but I was a reformer in Alaska and I shook things up.'"

Earlier in the day on Fox News, McCain aide Meg Stapleton was also playing up Palin's "Joe Six-Pack" attributes, even arguing that Palin's "experience as an ordinary American" qualified her to be "one heartbeat away" from the Oval Office... "god forbid."

"So if it's the economic crisis, she can certainly speak to the fact that she carries a mortgage. She's got kids ready to go to college, she has a son who is also heading off to the military. So from a military perspective, she is engaged just like any ordinary American. So if she is one heartbeat away, as she is one heartbeat away as a vice presidential candidate, and she assumes the presidency, god forbid -- in terms of John McCain, I don't wish ill, but as your question points -- if she becomes president of the United States, she is ready, and that is because she has the experience of an ordinary American who can get in there and knows what is on people's minds and what people need."

I talked to Matt Paul a little tonight who focused on the following:

1. The venue is small and HRC should focus on where our supporters are, not Bernie's
2. HRC has met tons of Iowans whose stories she tells all the time. Very important to him, that HRC is warm and personal/people oriented
3. A question like one to Bernie on whether he tried to get someone to primary Obama should be an opportunity to emphasize how long and how deeply she has been committed to helping elect Democrats and build the party. Here's what he wrote:

> "I learned a long-time ago that for our party to be strong, we have to support Democrats from the Court House to the White House. And that's why my husband and I have spent so much time supporting Democrats right here in Iowa. When you help elect people like Tom Harkin and Tom Vilsack you are building a better future with more opportunity and security for working families Its been an honor to criss-cross Iowa and the country on behalf of Democrats--and as President, I'll do everything I can to build that opportunity."

Team,

First, use this thread for Friday debate prep matters.

Second, I want to set some time in the afternoon for quick, hard questions – to avoid doing it hours before the debate, as we did in Las Vegas. I have started a list below. Feel free to add. But then we will lock this list, and not bomb her with tricky nasty things right before the debate (unless something new comes up). (Also, we have a separate list of Iowa questions. Send any Iowa things to KC/SS.)

SPECIFIC QUESTIONS

1. Did you actually consider joining the Marines?
2. You supporting building a border fence with Mexico. What is the difference between a fence and a wall? And should be have either on the Canadian border?
3. You say your plan won't raise taxes on the middle class. What is middle class?
4. What should be the highest tax rate?
5. Do you think the fight over gender identity & restrooms is eroding support for vital LGBT issues, as we saw in the Houston vote?
6. Are you sympathetic with college protestors who are demanding the ouster of university administrators over an alleged lack sensitivity to minority concerns on campus? Do you think the journalism professor who tried to ban reporters from covering a protest should be disciplined?
7. At the last debate, you avoided answering this question: Do black lives matter, or do all lives matter?
8. What do you think the top tax rate, on the top earners, should be?
9. Knowing what you know now about how it was abused, do you regret your vote for the Patriot Act?

Please add on THIS THREAD so I can keep them all together!!!

Ron

Hi John-

Tom DeLonge here, The one who interviewed you for that special documentary not to long ago.

Things are moving with the project. The Novels, Films and NonFiction works are blooming and finishing. Just had a preliminary meeting with Spielberg's Chief Operating Officer at DreamWorks. More meetings are now on the books-

I would like to bring two very "important" people out to meet you in DC. I think you will find them very interesting, as they were principal leadership relating to our sensitive topic. Both were in charge of most fragile divisions, as it relates to Classified Science and DOD topics. Other words, these are A-Level officials. Worth our time, and as well the investment to bring all the way out to you. I just need 2 hours from you.

Just looking to have a casual, and private conversation in person.

PRACTICAL PROGRESS

The Most Important News from the Progressive Movement brought to you by the Agenda Project Action Fund

WE, AS A COUNTRY, HAVE TO RECKON -- Advancement Project Co-Director Judith Browne Dianis summed up the tragedy of the Emmanuel AME Church shooting last week in Charleston: "We must call racism and White supremacy what it is and continue the work toward dismantling all forms of discrimination" ... Since South Carolina Governor Nikki Haley (R) urged the removal of the Confederate flag from government grounds on Monday, six major corporations--including Wal-Mart, Target, and Amazon--removed Confederate flag merchandise from their stores, and five other Southern states have taken steps to remove Confederate symbols from parks, license plates, and government buildings.

... BUT SYMBOLS ONLY GO SO FAR. NAACP North Carolina President and Forward Together Movement Leader Rev. Dr. William J. Barber hit the nail on the head: "[The families of the victims] are challenging the schizophrenia of American morality, which allows political leaders to condemn the crime but embrace the policies that are its genesis." GOP efforts blocked the last federal bill to expand background checks for firearm owners and the National Rifle Association supported an amendment to the CDC budget that prevents research that could be used to advocate for gun control .

READ "The Greatest Threats to American National Security are Guns and the Police " over at The Nation, JOIN Everytown for Gun Safety in #RisingForCharleston HERE and SIGN a Rising for Charleston postcard to your members of Congress telling them to pass stronger gun control laws HERE .

TPA BETRAYAL -- Despite massive opposition from the public, labor unions, and progressive organizations including Demos , Fight for the Future , Public Citizen , Common Cause , and Presente , the Senate voted on Tuesday to grant President Obama Trade Promotion Authority (TPA) to push the proposed Trans-Pacific Partnership through Congress. Democracy for America Chair Jim Dean unequivocally outlined the consequences for the few Senate Democrats who voted in favor of TPA: "This vote will be remembered, it will not be erased, and we will hold you accountable. "

SIGN a petition from Stop Fast Track telling your Senators, "If you vote yes on Fast Track, we pledge to vote against you in the next election" HERE .

NOTHING IN THIS WORLD IS INDIFFERENT TO US -- Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC) President Rhea Suh applauded Pope Francis' Encyclical on climate change: "Putting belief into action drives progress." The Encyclical comes as nations around the world prepare for the World Climate Summit in Paris this December. READ "From Bonn to Paris: Navigating the Course to an Effective International Climate Agreement" over at Center for American Progress (CAP) and CHECK OUT a map of oil and pipeline spills in the US at the Center for Effective Government HERE .

ONE FLEW OVER THE FEC -- This week, Public Citizen refiled Federal Election Commission (FEC) Chairman Ellen Weintraub's earlier petition in which she pleaded with her own agency to do its job and regulate dark money corruption in campaign spending. Weintraub reiterated what 84% of Americans already know: campaign finance needs a complete overhaul. READ suggested provisions from the American Anti-Corruption Act HERE and SIGN a petition over at Public Citizen urging President Obama to get big money out of politics HERE .

POLICE BODY CAMERA CONVERSATION TODAY -- The Brennan Center for Justice is hosting "Candid Cameras?: The Impact of Body Cameras on Privacy, Law Enforcement, and Community Policing" TODAY at 12:00 PM in Washington, DC. The event will feature Police Foundation President Jim Bueermann, Brennan Center Senior Counsel Rachel Levinson-Waldman, Streetwise and Safe Senior Policy Counsel Andrea Ritchie, and ACLU Senior Policy Analyst Jay Stanley. RSVP HERE .

IN THE FINE PRINT -- Despite the 78,000 consumers and 71 Progressive organizations --including Alliance for Justice, Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights, Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, and National Council of La Raza--calling on the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB) to end the practice of forced arbitration clauses , House Republicans introduced new legislation last week intended to keep these clauses alive and well. SIGN a petition over at Other98 telling the CFPB to reign in forced arbitration clauses HERE .

HOW TO MONETIZE YOUR OWN DISASTER -- The same Wall Street firms that triggered the 2008 housing crash have profited over $20 billion by buying the titles of 200,000 foreclosed homes , according to a new report from the Center for Popular

Hello,

I recently made the acquaintance (through a friend of over 40 years) of a young teacher looking for housing. He will be returning to New York most weekends to be with his wife. You may contact David directly. His contact information is included in the introduction that he wrote below.

Hello,
My name is David Freeman. I'm currently living in Brooklyn and work as a teaching artists (music). I'll be attending the Graduate School of Education and Human Development at George Washington University in the fall and am looking for a room beginning September 1st, 2015 with a 10 - 12 month lease. I'll be spending most of my time in the Foggy Bottom campus so a room close by with access to the metro would be ideal but am open to accommodating a longer commute. I'm married and my wife will be holding up the fort back in New York so I'll most likely be spending most weekend back there. I am family friendly, clean. kind and creative. Willing to barter music lessons as well. Feel free to reach me at dkfproductions@gmail.com or visit my website to get to know a bit more about me - www.davidkfreeman.com Subject: Reuters: "Key PA Senate race in dead heat"!

Dear John,
This race is this close!!!

Reuters reporting this afternoon:

- "Key PA Senate race in dead heat."

Washington Post:

- "Sestak … is in a close Senate race … against Toomey. Democrats are pushing hard."

We are pushing hard in the closing 27 hours!!

Pennsylvania's Patriot News is reporting of Joe this afternoon:

- "Pennsylvania's two U.S. Senate nominees are capping a hotly contested and watched campaign season today with a flurry of last-minute stumps before supporters ....

  Democrat Joe Sestak focused his attention on Philadelphia and its outskirts, a critical battleground where turnout could tip election results. Sestak scheduled an amazing 12 stops, beginning at dawn at 30th Street Station. He is scheduled to end the day at a University of Pennsylvania rally with First Lady Michelle Obama."

While Philadelphia's Fox 29 says of Congressman Toomey:

- " Mr. Toomey, did not see him yet. But the rally, not one of those Obama-type rallies. Jared, what would you say, a hundred people? >> Or less. >> Or less Jared said. So it's not a massive rally out here in Northeast Philly the day before election day. Not a lot of excitement in there, some balloons, some red and white pom poms, but not super excited. So, a little surprising this morning."

Energy … Momentum … and Enthusiasm … are all on our side!!

And we've got an "amazing candidate" who will not be out-worked and is stumping for every last vote in these closing hours!!

Let's give Joe and your team, the closing resources they need to bring this race home to victory! Please make a contribution … we are just $17,000 short of reaching our goal to help pay for the costs of our ELECTION DAY "Get-Out-The-Vote" ("GOTV") operation!

The next shift of phone-bankers has enthusiastically reported to our offices … and our army of evening canvassers has just departed energetically from our staging areas located throughout the state!!

In 10 short hours … we unleash our ELECTION DAY "Bring It On Home" GOTV operation!

Please support our winning ELECTION DAY "Bring It On Home" GOTV OPERATION by making a quick contribution of $5, $10, $15, $25, $50, $75, $100 - whatever you are able to afford!!

We are raring to go ... optimism and excitement within our campaign … it's time to "bring this race on home" for

Subject: John, join me in supporting Josh Shapiro for AG

John --

Today, I am proud to endorse Josh Shapiro for Attorney General.

Josh Shapiro is a proven reformer who will restore integrity to Harrisburg and he is the best choice to be our next Attorney General.

He'll bring a fresh approach that's focused on putting the law on the side of all Pennsylvanians -- and I hope you'll share my endorsement with your friends.

As the executive of Pennsylvania's third-largest county, Josh led in the fight for marriage equality. He stood up to Republican attempts to implement a Voter ID law that would have disenfranchised tens of thousands of Pennsylvanians. And Josh has taken on the Wall Street money managers in order to protect taxpayers.

Josh also knows a thing or two about cleaning up a mess. Back when he first took office, Montgomery County faced a fiscal crisis so severe they didn't have enough money to make payroll -- but Josh got people together, made smart decisions, and turned things around.

John, I'm going to be doing everything I can to help him win this election, and you can join me by sharing my endorsement on Facebook and Twitter:

Dear Mary and John,

Just a quite note to tell you Luis and I are headed to Guate for an undetermined amount of time. As I mentioned to Mary in the fall, we are in the process of doing a domestic adoption there.

Yes, I am the salmon swimming upstream, having obtained my permanent residency in Guate in February. But had to get the "green card" in order to proceed.

We do not know yet who the little guy is, but he does exist somewhere, since he will be between 4 and 6 years old. We leave on June 6 and will keep you posted.

Matt told us we had to hug Bernie.

Can we do both?

Also - Z, think a reporter would write up a story on his stepped up attacks?

Team, attached are inserts for HRC to add to her normal stump in Iowa on Monday. It includes:

-- Anthony Foxx endorsing and a brief riff building on the progress we've made on infrastructure and not letting GOP rip it away.
-- A riff on her differences with Sanders on health care and taxes and that he's a risky choice (thanks to Podesta and Robby for their suggestions on this)
-- A preview of the millionaire's surcharge and a hit on GOP tax plans
-- Re-upping guns contrast and the Giffords endorsement.
-- "First line of defense" call to action

Environmental Justice Mailing List

3rd Annual Symposium on Environmental Justice and Environmental Health Disparities in Maryland and Washington, DC

Spaces are still available!!!

The Symposium will be held on December 6-7, 2014, 9:00-AM to 4:00-PM; and will take place at the Adele H. Stamp Student Union Building, located at University of Maryland, College Park, MD.

The goal of this year's symposium is to expand the discussion on the Chesapeake Bay to include environmental justice and health issues with a focus on vulnerable and at-risk populations who live in the region, and rely on the ecological goods and services of the Chesapeake Bay and rivers and streams in the watershed. Some of the expected outcomes and benefits of the symposium are:

- Increased awareness of environmental justice and public health issues in the Chesapeake Bay region;
- Increased knowledge of underserved and economically disadvantaged groups about issues in the Chesapeake Bay region; and
- Increase in the level of environmental decision-making in the region that includes environmental justice and health issues.

This event is FREE and open to the public. Please feel free to share this information with colleagues and other interested parties. We look forward to seeing you on December 6 and 7, 2014.

ENDCITIZENSUNITED.ORG

We've been hitting a lot of milestones lately:

- 5OO,OOO Citizen Co-Sponsors to the Constitutional Amendment to overturn Citizens United
- 1OO,OOO dedicated Founding Members
- 3OO,OOO online donations

It would be a shame to end the month on a bad note.

But John, that's exactly what would happen if we miss tomorrow's goal.

With just 24 hours to go, we're well short of our $1,OOO,OOO goal. That's why we're coming directly to you. Will you make a donation right now?

Chip in $5 immediately >>

Chip in $35 immediately >>

Chip in $50 immediately >>

Chip in $100 immediately >>

Chip in $250 immediately >>

Or donate another amount >>

We don't ask right-wing billionaires for money.

We rely on the generosity of everyday Americans like yourself -- folks who can afford to chip in $5 and $25 at a time.

We can compete with Republican corporate money. But only by hitting each and every goal -- starting with tomorrow's end-of-month deadline.

John, will you do your part?

Dear John,

As we agreed, please find attached the final draft of our group's overall strategy paper, topped by a letter of transmittal to the president-elect. I'm sending you the final draft so that you might flag for me any problems you would want us to consider removing from the final document itself.

Please also find below my email to the group members discharging my responsibilities and theirs and the track ahead. You will note I ask for their final comments by Thursday, 11 a.m.

I will send you the final document Thursday afternoon or Friday morning.

As I stressed, we have kept our deliberations entirely private and we have no pride of authorship. Our only aim is, as we state, to help our nation's new leader design an overall strategy -- a thought process and discipline we all believe essential to his and our nation's success.

You can reach me at either 212.472.7320 or 212.988.9313.

Allbest,
Les Gelb

Re: Final Draft and Road to Finish Line

Attached find the final draft of our strategy paper topped by a cover note to the president-elect. We are told there is a window of reading opportunity this coming weekend and so -- with apologies -- I must have your comments no later than Thursday, 11 a.m.

I have put in disclaimers that this is not a consensus document and that there are disagreements on many points. Nonetheless, if you feel exercised by any particular point or argument, you should send me a paragraph or two on that point which I will append to the document.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some of you may be more than exercised and feel disinclined to associate yourself with the paper, and you may want to remove your name from the list at the end of the cover letter to the president-elect. IF YOU WANT YOUR NAME REMOVED, YOU MUST EMAIL ME TO THAT EFFECT NO LATER THAN 11 A.M. ON THURSDAY. OTHERWISE, YOUR NAME WILL BE INCLUDED.

You will also note that no authors are listed and no division of responsibilities in our group stated.

Please also note that we invite the president-elect to put us back to work if he would like to hear more. If not, we should feel that we have discharged our agreed duty to help the president do what he should immediately -- develop an overall strategy for his administration.

You should also know that I am sending a copy of this paper to John Podesta, Michael Froman, and Brian Mathis. They are aware of this enterprise in detail, have seen earlier drafts, and will be responsible for transmitting the document to higher authorities.

Lastly, I want to thank certain people in particular. I leaned on Bo Cutter heavily throughout the process and he was of enormous help. I want to thank colleagues on the staff -- Will Wechsler, Liz Colagiuri, and Jeanne Zelmati -- for their intelligent and hard labors. Not least, deep appreciation goes to Erica Payne for her constant counsel and Rob McKay for his enduring support for an enterprise that really had to be tried for the good of our country.

Allbest,
Les Gelb

America's Top Urban Public Charter School System Eradicates Achievement Gaps, Sends All Students to College

Broad Foundation releases research on best practices of Houston's YES Prep Public Schools, winner of Broad Prize for Public Charter Schools

LOS ANGELES - A report detailing the practices behind the 2012 Broad Prize for Public Charter Schools winner's success in eliminating achievement gaps and reaching 100 percent college admission for all its students was released today by The Eli and Edythe Broad Foundation.

The report details how YES Prep Public Schools, a network of 11 middle and high schools in Houston, has achieved unprecedented success with a high-poverty, high-minority student population. Since YES Prep's inception in 1998, all of its seniors have graduated from high school and been accepted to four-year colleges and universities, and more than 90 percent of its students attend college without the need for remediation.

RMC Research Corporation, a national education consulting company, led a team of education researchers and practitioners through a four-day site visit to YES Prep. RMC evaluated the school system against a research-based framework and multiple rubrics of effective charter school and school system policies and practices. Researchers interviewed administrators, teachers, principals, parents, students and community leaders, analyzed extensive documents, and observed classrooms.

Among the strategies researchers found likely to be contributing to YES Prep's outstanding results with low-income and minority students:

1. Challenging curriculum back-mapped from objectives measured by Advanced Placement exams
2. Longer school days and a longer school year
3. Talented teachers and administrators carefully selected based on qualities exhibited by YES Prep's most successful teachers and administrators
4. Regular teacher professional development, coaching and individualized support

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

5. Character building and community service integrated into the academic curriculum
6. Preparation for students to thrive in a "college culture," including travel opportunities to colleges and other trips, as well as assistance with college and financial aid applications, so students can envision themselves as successful college students
7. Critical academic and social-emotional support for students even after high school on their college campuses
8. Continuous improvement loops built into strategies

"YES Prep not only implements a challenging curriculum, rigorous instruction, careful teacher selection and in-depth professional development for teachers and administrators, but also goes beyond these methods to address other student needs, such as building student character and motivating students-during and after high school, enabling students to envision themselves as successful college students," said Dr. Shelley Billig, vice president of RMC Research Corporation and the lead researcher of the report. "Together, these strategies represent a winning combination to help disadvantaged students both graduate high school on time and thrive in college."

The Broad (rhymes with "road") Prize for Public Charter Schools is an annual award honoring urban public charter school systems that have demonstrated the most outstanding overall student performance and improvement in the nation in recent years while reducing achievement gaps for poor and minority students. YES Prep was chosen as the 2012 winner by a 14-member review board of prominent education researchers, policy leaders, practitioners and executives from around the country who evaluated publicly available student achievement data on 20 large established urban charter school systems. The Broad Foundation did not play a role in selecting the winner.

From 2007 to 2011, publicly available data shows that YES Prep had the best overall student academic performance. For example, YES Prep eliminated nearly all income and ethnic achievement gaps, and its students outperformed higher income and white peers statewide in most cases, achieved higher average Advanced Placement participation and passing rates than their peer average and outperformed their peer average on SAT participation and scores.

"This groundbreaking report reveals what makes this public school system work," said Nina Rees, CEO of the National Alliance for Public Charter Schools. "I encourage charter school practitioners and policy-makers alike to use these findings to help many more public schools-charter and traditional-learn from this successful model."

For more information about YES Prep's student outcomes and The Broad Prize for Public Charter Schools, visit: http://www.broadprize.org/publiccharterschools/2012.html .

The winner of the 2013 Broad Prize for Public Charter Schools will be announced July 2 at the National Alliance for Public Charter Schools conference in Washington, D.C.

Founded by self-made entrepreneur Eli Broad and his wife Edythe, both graduates of Detroit Public Schools, The Eli and Edythe Broad Foundation is a philanthropy that seeks to ensure that every student in an urban public school has the opportunity to succeed. Bringing together top education experts and practitioners, the foundation funds system-wide programs and policies that strengthen public schools by creating environments that allow good teachers to do great work and enable students of all backgrounds to learn and thrive. Subject: Faculty Members Attending Thursday's Dinner at the Board Meeting

Dear Trustees,

As you know, it is customary to invite the newly tenured (and promoted) faculty to Thursday's dinner with the Board during the October meeting. So that you know a little more about those faculty members, please see below a message I sent to the Knox community last June after the Board meeting at which these appointments were approved.

Looking forward to seeing you shortly, and wishing you safe travels to Galesburg. Next week looks to be perfect fall weather.

Best,

Teresa

Subject: Tenure and Promotion Congratulations
To: campus-bulletin <campus-bulletin@knox.edu >

Dear Knox Community,
It gives me very great pleasure to announce formally that at its June meeting, the Knox College Board of Trustees accepted my recommendations and awarded tenure to two faculty members: Todd Heidt, Modern Languages--German and Weihong Du, Asian Studies--Chinese. I brought these valued colleagues forward to the Board upon the recommendations of the Faculty Personnel Committee and Dean Behling. In addition, Greg Gilbert, Art & Art History, was promoted to the rank of Full Professor.

Tenure and Promotion to Associate Professor

Todd Heidt, Modern Languages and Literatures--German, earned his Ph.D. University of Cincinnati; M.A. University of Chicago; and his B.A. University of Cincinnati. Todd teaches a variety of courses in German language and culture, including courses focused on narrative and film in Weimar Germany and contemporary German Culture; film studies. Along with colleagues, he has developed the December travel seminar, Modern European Identities: Berlin and Istanbul, supported by a DAAD Group Study Visit Grant. Todd's scholarship includes: "Aldred Döblin." Routledge Encyclopedia of Modernism; "Double-Take: Béla Balázs and the Visual Disorientation of G.W. Pbst's Dreigroschenoper," Seminar: A Journal of Germanic Studies; "Image and Text, Fact and Fiction: Narrating W.G. Sebald's The Emigrants in the First Person," image [&] narrative; "Two Tales of a City: Photographing Weimar Berlin," Moderne und Antimoderne in Europa; "Kuhle Wampe or Who Owns the World. Kleiner Muggelsee," World Film Locations; and editor of Focus on German Studies (15). His engagement with the campus and community has included service on the Admission, Retention, and Placement Committee, the Vovis Center Advisory Board, and various search committees; he also serves as a peer reviewer and section co-chair for the German Studies Association.

Weihong Du, Asian Studies--Chinese, earned her Ph.D. University of Minnesota; B.A. and M.A. Nanjing University, China. Weihong's teaching includes teaching focused on modern and contemporary Chinese language, literature, and culture; Chinese Film; women and modern Chinese literature; and Chinese popular culture. Dear Trustees,

At the June Knox College Board of Trustees meeting, the Board chose to honor Teresa Amott's leadership of the College with a one-time bonus paid by trustees. It was requested that each trustee consider a gift of $500 or more. Gifts are to be made to Knox College with President on the memo line of a check or in the comment box of an online gift. It would be wonderful to receive these gifts by June 30. This gift is over and above other commitments you may have with the College for fiscal year end.

Thanks for your support of this effort to honor the wonderful leadership President Amott is providing to Knox.

yes. The only caveat is the primary date(march 4th). I think we should start right after that because the Ohio media noise before then will likely be focussed on the Dem primary. Before that we also run the risk that Mitt or Citizens United are running ads attacking from the right. If the CDA was up in the same markets, he may seem like Goldilocks to an independent voter.

> I had a tough conversation with the CDA team minus Bing earlier in the day. I said that my own judgment was that we didn't have the cash to come close to their spend rate in Feb and March. My view is that early media is important to help frame the race and get competitive in some of the must win states. Better, again in my view, to spend seriously in fewer states. I think for a host of reasons, one of those states should be Ohio. After that, it seems like we should be in 3 or 4 other states, but not the universe they are considering. That kind of plan will give us what we need to push the free media story, give us a decent test of the media/messaging and help raise $ going forward. Is this consistent with your all's views?

Subject: [big campaign] MoveOn members pose as "RepubliCorp" at Boehner fundraiser last night

Our members are bird dogging Republican candidates in character all over the country. They dress up as execs from "RepubliCorp" a not-so-fictitious merger between the Republican party and multi-national corporations and go to events. We got a great hit last night at the Boehner event. Made broadcast television, and was pitch perfect on message. Check it out:

http://www.buffalonews.com/city/politics/article214303.ece

Meanwhile, members of MoveOn.org and Citizen Action were scheduled to picket Boehner's appearance at the Gioia home on Meadow Road. They were posing as representatives of a fictitious entity called "RepubliCorp," which the protesters said emphasizes "the close allegiance between corporate interests and their Republican allies who together plan to spend at least $400 million this election cycle to try and take back control of Congress."

"When oil billionaires and health insurance front groups are spending $400 million to take over Congress for the Republicans, how can we expect Boehner to be on the side of America's working families?" said Andrew A. Skolnick, a local MoveOn member.

"Between now and Election Day, we'll continue to remind people that John Boehner, and his Republican counterparts, repeatedly sided with corporations and against the other 98 percent of us not represented by corporate lobbyists."

Subject: tickets and update from Todd

Hi John --

I dropped by CAP this afternoon but I didn't see the inaugural tickets on your desk. If you're planning on going into the office tomorrow then I can go by the in the afternoon, but if not then it's also easy for me to pick them up at your house (just let me know what time would be convenient).

Also, you may already know this but, unfortunately, Todd was told that one of the slots he was hoping to offer me was filled by an HRC staffer and they wouldn't let him bring on anyone else for the time being (his message is below). This is really too bad, and your help or guidance on where I should go from here would be valuable to me.

Thanks again for everything.

Pete

Hi Pete. I'm disappointed to say that I can't clear this right now. Might be able to down the road a bit, but you're probably wiser taking a bird in the hand, if there are any. Cheryl told me most people are only getting one outside person for the time being. I'm getting my #2 (top negotiator under me) + a Senate staffer from HRC, whom HRC is interested in bringing in. Cheryl said things might free up for another person, but no guarantees. I made a direct and strong pitch for you, including that I'll lose you if we can't close the deal now, but they won't do more at this point.

Keep me posted on what you do. But I don't want you hanging around for me only to end up with nothing. And feel free to call if you want to discuss this or anything else. My cell is 202-641-3207 and home is 202-237-2933. Thanks Pete. Sorry I don't have better news -- and more sorry for me!

Hi John,

Alex and I are dancing in our little apartment! We are so excited! GOOOO HILLARY!!!!

I know we have told you this before, but if there is anything we can do, please let us know. I am from CT, Alex is from here but his parents now live in RI. Anything we can do, John, we are with you!

Great to see you this week.

Erin

Subject: Hillary Clinton plans to get "aggressive" on climate. Here's what that might look like.

http://www.vox.com/2015/5/28/8673339/hillary-clinton-climate-policy

Hillary Clinton plans to get "aggressive" on climate. Here's what that might look like.

Hillary Clinton's advisers say she plans to take "aggressive" steps on global warming if elected president. Here's John Podesta last week :

> Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is "quite" involved in climate change policy as a 2016 presidential candidate and will carry on with President Obama's limits on coal-fired power plants if she is elected, her campaign chairman, John Podesta, said yesterday. ...
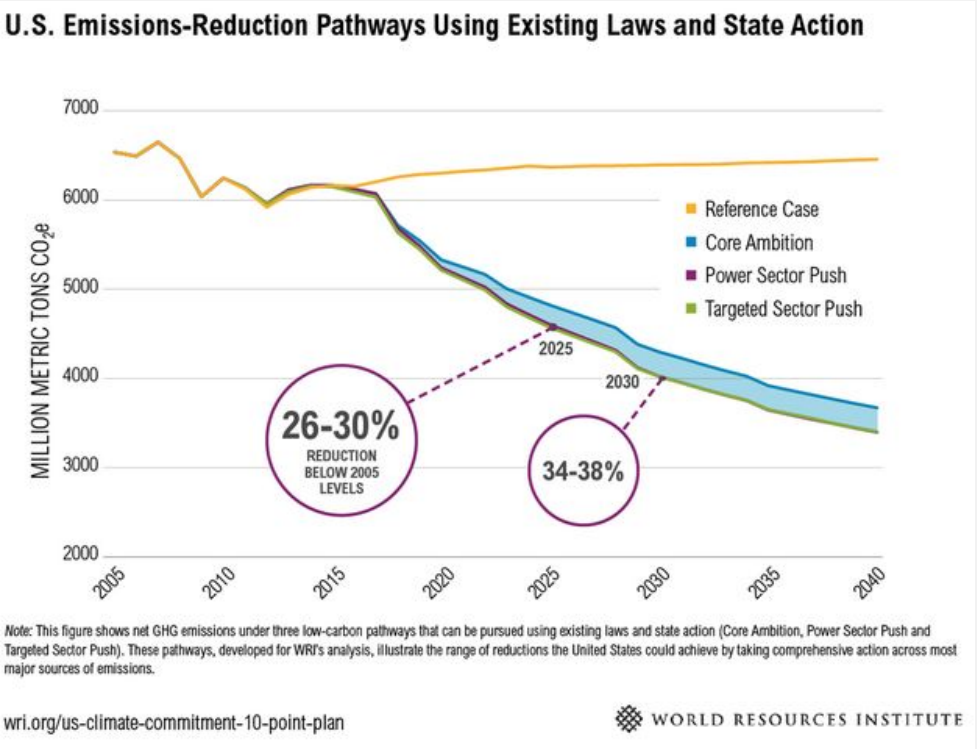
> "I have no doubt that she will move forward with an aggressive program to move the country to a cleaner energy system and do what the United States needs to do to meet the target," he said.

But what would an "aggressive program" entail? One place to look is in this big new report by the World Resources Institute. To be clear, the report isn't affiliated with the Clinton campaign at all. But it does lay out, in detail, what policies the next president could pursue to cut US emissions sharply — even without Congress. If Hillary Clinton or Bernie Sanders or Jeb Bush wants to go big on climate, this would be a place to start.

First, the backdrop: As part of the UN climate talks, President Obama has pledged that US greenhouse gas emissions will be 26 to 28 percent lower in 2025 than they were in 2005. That's the "target" Podesta is talking about. The Obama administration has already put out a battery of regulations toward that end, like stricter fuel economy standards for cars and the EPA's proposal to curtail CO2 from coal plants.

But as the WRI report notes, all of Obama's climate policies so far aren't yet sufficient to hit that big climate goal. (Right now, US greenhouse gas emissions are only about 8 percent below 2005 levels.) So that's where the next president comes in, whether it's Hillary Clinton or whoever else.

10 big things the next president could do to cut emissions — without Congress



This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(World Resources Institute)

The bulk of the WRI report looks at various policies the next president could pursue to build on Obama's existing regulations and hit or even exceed that 2025 target. Most of these things could be done without Congress, mainly by harnessing the EPA's existing authority to regulate greenhouse gases:

1) Follow through on Obama's Clean Power Plan. This summer, the EPA plans to finalize its Clean Power Plan to curtail CO2 emissions from existing coal-fired plants. The WRI report suggests that the Obama administration strengthen this rule before it's finalized, though it concedes this isn't absolutely necessary for the US to hit its 2025 climate target.

The Clean Power Plan would then need to survive all legal challenges, and the next administration would have to make sure the rule gets fully implemented. As I've written before , whoever gets elected president in 2016 will have a ton of leeway over implementation of the power plant rule. Podesta's comments above suggest that Clinton already wants to see these through. So that's step one...

2) Strengthen energy efficiency standards for homes and buildings. Next, the Department of Energy could scale up or tighten various energy efficiency standards for household appliances, residential boilers, commercial ventilation equipment, and so forth. This would help reduce energy demand and CO2 emissions.

3) Expand programs to reduce HFCs. The Obama administration has already begun cracking down on HFCs , a potent greenhouse gas often used in refrigeration and air conditioning. In theory, the next president could direct the EPA to accelerate the phase-out of the worst of these gases and help bolster recycling programs and pursue alternatives.

4) Start regulating industrial CO2 sources. Similarly, the next president could set the EPA loose regulating other sources of CO2 emissions. Under Obama, the EPA has only regulated CO2 from vehicles and power plants. But the agency does have the authority to regulate refineries, cement plants, petrochemical plants, and so on. The WRI report suggests that the EPA under the next president could use this power to improve end-use efficiency and fuel switching in the industrial sector and bring down US emissions further.

5) Crack down on methane leaks from oil and gas infrastructure. Again, the EPA has already begun setting standards for methane leaks from new oil and gas wells . The next president could expand this authority to existing oil and gas wells as well as other natural gas infrastructure.

6) Expand fuel economy standards for cars and light trucks. Federal fuel economy standards for new cars and light trucks are currently set to keep rising each year until they reach 54.5 miles per gallon in 2025. The WRI report points out that the next president could tighten these standards further during the 2017 midterm review, or even extend them further — say, to 63 mpg by 2030.

7) Set new standards for heavy trucks. Similarly, the EPA has already set standards to improve fuel efficiency for medium- and heavy-duty trucks between 2014 and 2018. Either the Obama administration or the next president could extend these standards in the period after that, reducing gasoline consumption.

8) Set CO2 rules for aircraft. Countries around the world are planning to come to some sort of agreement on reducing emissions from flying in the next few years. The WRI report notes that either this administration or the next one could work with the EPA to set a rule to improve the fuel efficiency of new aircraft in the range of 2 to 3 percent annually.

9) Reduce methane from landfills and agriculture. The EPA has already proposed regulations on methane emissions from new landfills. It could go further to restrict emissions from existing landfills and coal mines, as well as look into ways to reduce emissions from agriculture (yes, that means tackling cow burps).

10) Tackle miscellaneous greenhouse gases. On a smaller scale, the WRI notes that the EPA and Department of Energy could likely make inroads on other sources of greenhouse gases, like "off-highway vehicles" or "nitric and adipic acid manufacturing." this wouldn't be world-changing, but it's a small cut that could add up.

About 70 percent of these expand on policies that Obama has already set in motion. But some of them, particularly CO2 rules for industrial sectors, would involve brand-new regulations on entire parts of the economy. Far from simple.

Add these up, and the US could hit its 2025 goal

It depends on how hard the next president wants to push. Many of these regulations are likely to be extremely controversial, so it's far from a given they'll happen. The WRI report models a number of different scenarios here.

In one scenario, called "core ambition," the Obama administration finalizes its CO2 rule for power plants and whoever gets elected in 2016 fully implements it. The next president*also* sets new efficiency standards for appliances, bolsters fuel economy rules for trucks, sets new CO2 rules for industry, expands emissions standards for natural gas systems, and cuts down on HFCs. Add it up, and greenhouse gas emissions fall roughly 26 percent below 2005 levels by 2025.

The WRI also models another scenario, called "Targeted Sector Push," in which, on top of the above, the next administration strengthens existing CAFE standards for vehicles during the midterm review in 2017 and sets even stricter CO2 regulations for industrial sources, plus some other steps. The result? Emissions fall roughly 30 percent below 2005 levels by 2025.

Granted, there are other outside variables here that could potentially sway US emissions, too. If, say, solar power prices plummet faster than expected, that might push emissions down even further. Or maybe self-driving cars will revolutionize transportation. The future's never certain. The point of this paper is to show what an aggressive federal climate policy looks like, given what we know now.

Would Clinton actually do any of this?

Podesta and Clinton, presumably talking HFC phase-outs. (Ethan Miller/Getty Images)

Well, that's the big question. All Podesta has said is that Clinton would move forward with an "aggressive program" to hit that 2025 emissions target. The WRI report sketches out, broadly, what regulatory steps could meet that goal. But maybe Clinton's thought of options no one else has.

Mind you, this analysis also assumes that Congress remains gridlocked on climate change for the foreseeable future. The WRI report points out that there's only so much *any*administration can do on its own to nudge down emissions — particularly for the deeper cuts that will likely prove needed after 2025 for the world to fend off drastic climate change . (Of course, other nations will have to respond in kind.)

"New federal legislation will likely be needed to drive these deeper reductions," the report notes, "for example, a carbon tax, cap-and-trade program, or national clean energy standards." Some of those legislative policies, like a steadily rising carbon tax, would be more cost-effective than having the EPA continue to regulate CO2 from various industrial sectors, chunk by chunk.

In other words, an ambitious climate agenda by the next president could nudge down US emissions quite a bit. An ambitious climate agenda by Congress could go much, much further.

Read more: This earlier piece looks at the flip side — ways in which a more conservative president could dismantle Obama's climate agenda, if he or she so chooses.

Subject: Congratulations and a heads-up

John:

Hope this message finds you well. Had hoped to see you at the Aspen US-India Strategic Dialogue recently, though surprised to see you listed on the program in light of how crazy your life must be right now (what else is new?). BTW perhaps you heard but the day before the dialogue Joe and Molly Nye rolled over their car three times and Molly ended up in the hospital; last I heard she was recovering well but thought you should know.

I thought a lot about you when the Paris climate agreement was concluded, as so much of the important ground work, much not visible to the public, was laid by you. In particular I recall flying back from Beijing with you after the major commitments you helped secure from Xi Jinping last November, which created important momentum to gain other national commitments. I know there is a long row to hoe, but getting that level of consensus in support of these goals, with reporting, transparency, etc., is a big deal. Congratulations!

There is one matter that I wanted to put on your radar for situational awareness in light of your other responsibilities if possible. I am heading to Europe tonight through Tuesday, then away with family December 24-29, but otherwise in DC if you want to get together for coffee or lunch. If you are too busy for that these days then of course we can connect by phone. Let me know.

Warmest holiday wishes to you and yours!

Best,

Dan

Just wanted to thank and congratulate you for the tremendous contributions you made to the president and to the Nation in your most recent tour in government. You made a huge difference on so many issues that matter, and as always you managed it with grace and good humor. The dinner you and Mary hosted for the big data team was just one of the typically generous things you did.

And your efforts will continue to bear fruit, as you started a lot of great things in motion. The upcoming Paulson institute seminar in China is only the most recent example.

Hope you get at least some down time. And as I said before if I can help in any way on energy and security issues please let me know.

All best

Dan
